MANCHESTER, England — Prime Minister Tony Blair, in his final address to his governing Labor Party, said Tuesday that being the United States' strongest ally can be difficult, but it is crucial to stay close to the United States in the war on terrorism.

During his turbulent 12 years as prime minister, British troops were sent into battle in Iraq and Afghanistan and suicide terrorists attacked on British soil.

"Yes, it's hard sometimes to be America's strongest ally," he said. "At the moment, I know people only see the price of these alliances. Give them up and the cost in terms of power, weight and influence for Britain would be infinitely greater. Distance this country, and you may find it's a long way back."

The speech, his last at a Labor Party annual conference as party leader, was a chance for Blair to remind detractors of his accomplishments and urge his party to stay on course when he leaves office in the next year.

Under his leadership, Labor swept into power in 1997 for the first time in 18 years. He forced the left-leaning party into the center and emphasized such issues as health care, fiscal discipline and crime fighting. Blair, 53, and Labor were re-elected in 2001.

He noted Tuesday that the domestic issues that once dominated the agenda had been replaced by global challenges such as climate change, organized crime and religious extremism.

"We used to feel we could shut our front doors on the problems and conflicts of the wider world. Not anymore. The British people today are reluctant global citizens. We have to make them confident ones."

Blair's Farewell Stresses Alliance (WT/AP)

By Jennifer Quinn, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

MANCHESTER, England -- Tony Blair gave his last address to his Labor Party as prime minister yesterday, saying it is important to stay close to Washington in the fight against terrorism even though it can be hard to be the United States' strongest ally.

The 53-year-old leader acknowledged it would be difficult for him to leave office, but that it was the right thing to do.

In a wistful but forward-looking speech, Mr. Blair told the party it must remain bold if it is to hold onto power and said the only legacy he cared about was his Labor Party winning a fourth term.

Delegates, grateful for the three straight election victories to which Mr. Blair led their party, listened raptly as he spoke and frequently interrupted him with cheers. Many waved supportive placards reading "Too young to retire" and "Tony, you made Britain better."

Mr. Blair fondly recalled his start in politics as a young parliamentary candidate in 1983, and said Labor had changed the terms of debate in British politics during his time as leader.

"The truth is, you can't go on forever," he said. "That's why it is right that this is my last conference as leader."

Although Mr. Blair has long had a love-hate relationship with a party he has remade since taking its helm in 1994, he said he would always watch Labor's achievements with pride -- whether or not it took his parting advice.

Mr. Blair said fighting terrorism would remain a tough challenge for Britain in the years after he leaves office, but that it was crucial to stay close to the United States -- despite the severe political damage he suffered for his tight relationship with President Bush and his support for the U.S.-led war in Iraq.

"Yes, it's hard sometimes to be America's strongest ally," he said, adding that close involvement in the European Union could also be difficult. "At the moment, I know people only see the price of these alliances. Give them up and the cost in terms of power, weight and influence for Britain would be infinitely greater.

"Distance this country and you may find it's a long way back," he said.

Mr. Blair gave in to a fierce rebellion in the party to announce on Sept. 7 that he would step down within a year, although he has not set a date.

He offered warm praise for Treasury chief Gordon Brown, the man expected to succeed him, but stopped short of making an endorsement. Mr. Blair said Labor would never have won its three terms without Mr. Brown's contributions, but acknowledged their relationship had been strained at times.

"In no relationship at the top of any walk of life is it always easy, least of all in politics," he said. "[Mr. Brown] is a remarkable man, a remarkable servant to this country. And that is the truth."

Labor, he said, had so succeeded in remaking British politics that the opposition Conservative Party has moved away from the right and toward the center in response.

The address came a day after Mr. Brown strengthened his claim to the top job with a self-confident speech setting out a centrist vision for the party.

DOJ_NMG_0070191

Blair Bids Fellow Laborites Farewell (LAT)

By Janet Stobart

The Los Angeles Times, September 27, 2006

LONDON — British Prime Minister Tony Blair took an emotional leave of his Labor Party on Tuesday with a speech that defended his transatlantic alliance with President Bush and touted his government's achievements at home.

In an address that was frequently interrupted by applause and followed by a standing ovation, Blair acknowledged recent criticisms of his foreign policy. But he told delegates at the party's annual conference in Manchester that battling terrorism meant entering into partnerships that were not easy "for a sovereign nation like Britain."

"It's hard sometimes to be America's strongest ally. Europe can be a political headache," he said in the televised remarks. "But there are not halfhearted allies of America today and no semidetached partners in Europe. And the truth is that nothing we strive for, from the world trade talks to global warming, to terrorism and Palestine, can be solved without America, or without Europe."

Blair, 53, who announced this month that he would step down as party leader and prime minister before the next party conference in September 2007, began his address by offering thanks to "the Labor Party for giving me the extraordinary privilege of leading you these past 12 years."

He also thanked his family, particularly his wife, Cherie, using humor in an attempt to ease controversy over a comment attributed to her. Bloomberg News quoted her Monday as muttering "that's a lie" during an address by treasury chief Gordon Brown, Blair's likely political heir, as Brown spoke of his warm ties with the prime minister.

"At least I won't have to worry about her running off with the bloke next door," Blair quipped. The Brown family lives in No. 11 Downing Street, next door to the prime minister's official residence.

In a brief tribute, Blair said the party's victories in the three last national elections "would never have been secured without Gordon Brown. He is a remarkable man, a remarkable servant of the people."

Blair finished his tour of gratitude with a nod to the British people.

"Leaders lead, but in the end it's people who deliver," contributing to his government's achievements since Labor seized power from the Conservatives in 1997, he said. It was people and not politics, he said, whose efforts had created new hospitals, schools, cities and businesses.

Long applause greeted his vow that Labor would achieve a fourth term in power in national elections to be held by 2009. Before then, Brown is expected to succeed Blair as party leader and prime minister.

Compared with 1997, Blair noted, Britain's future had become more tightly bound to international politics, and that has brought new insecurities.

"Ten years ago, immigration was hardly raised and terrorism meant the IRA," he said, referring to the Irish Republican Army. "Not anymore.

"Globalization, climate change, organized crime, suicide bombers born and bred in Britain who bring carnage to the streets of London in the name of religion" are just some of the issues he said are now facing Britons.

"The British people today are reluctant global citizens; I want them to be confident ones," he said.

Britain could be still more competitive in areas such as technology, financial services and bio-science. "America does not want stem cell research. We do, we welcome it here," he said.

The war on terrorism "is a struggle that I believe will last a generation or more," he said, while rejecting the criticism that the U.S. and British military presence in Iraq and Afghanistan was encouraging Islamic militancy.

"This is not our war against Islam," he added, "this is a war fought by extremists who pervert the true faith of Islam. It is not British soldiers who are sending car bombs into Baghdad or Kabul to slaughter the innocents."

The Anglo-American alliance, and particularly Blair's strong personal relationship with Bush, is still a stumbling block for the prime minister's legacy, said Michael Cox, professor of international relations at the London School of Economics.

"For the first time since the Suez crisis of the '50s, foreign policy is a major issue behind the fall in a prime minister's popularity," Cox said. "It is a major cause of unease in the Muslim world."

Yet there was little criticism offered by the party faithful Tuesday, despite recent complaints over both Blair's foreign policy and his unwillingness to commit to a date for stepping down as prime minister.

Blair's farewell was "highly emotional but not remotely sentimental," said Charles Falconer, the lord chancellor. "He constantly challenged the party to move forward and face challenges like Middle East peace, the war on terror. We have all got to move to respond to these challenges."

In Parting Words, Advice For Labor (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0070192

By Mary Jordan, Washington Post Foreign Service
The Washington Post, September 27, 2006
Blair Urges Perseverance In Fight Against Terrorism

MANCHESTER, England, Sept. 26 -- Prime Minister Tony Blair, addressing his Labor Party's annual conference for the last time, warned Britain that if it retreats from Iraq and Afghanistan after he leaves office, "we will be committing a craven act of surrender."

In an emotional hour-long address, Blair spoke of a continued need for a strong alliance with the United States and for British commitment to a global fight against terrorism that "will last a generation and more."

Blair, 53, recently said he would resign within a year. Pressure in his own party has been building for him to make way for a new leader. Since he became prime minister in 1997, his sky-high popularity ratings have plummeted because of domestic scandals, fatigue with a third-term government, his backing of the Iraq war and his closeness to President Bush.

But Blair won a sustained standing ovation after a televised address that seemed like the beginning of the country's goodbye to him. "Of course, it's hard to let go," he said. Many in the audience dabbed tears. One held a handwritten sign that said "Too Young to Retire."

In what some interpreted as a reference to his much-criticized decision to go to war in Iraq, Blair said: "The British people will, sometimes, forgive a wrong decision. But you know something, they won't forgive not deciding. They know the choices are hard."

"Yes, it's hard sometimes to be America's strongest ally," Blair said. "But believe me, there are no halfhearted allies of America today." He said strong ties are needed with Europe and the United States, though "at the moment I know people only see the price of these alliances."

"Nothing we strive for, from the world trade talks to global warming to terrorism and Palestine can be solved without America or without Europe," he said. Give up these alliances, he said "and the cost in terms of power, weight and influence for Britain would be infinitely greater."

"It's sad to see him go," said Wendy Nichols, 48, a party supporter from Yorkshire.

But others at the convention of 20,000 Labor party members, journalists and guests in Manchester's city center were not won over by Blair's eloquence. "He has made a lot of mistakes," said Mary Clarkson, a city councilwoman from Oxford. "I think the time has come" for his resignation. She said she would be very happy if Gordon Brown, the finance minister and leading candidate to succeed Blair, took over.

Blair praised Brown, though the relationship between the two men has soured recently amid reports that Brown may have directed -- or at least not stopped -- his loyalists from campaigning for Blair's resignation.

On Monday, a reporter wrote that she overheard Blair's wife, Cherie, saying, "Well, that's a lie," when Brown spoke of what a privilege it has been to work with Blair. Although she denied saying those words, they became front-page headlines, reviving talk about a feud between the two men, who live beside each other in London at 10 and 11 Downing Street.

Blair brought down the house when he joked: "At least I don't have to worry about her running off with the bloke next door."

Recapping achievements of his tenure, including enacting new rights for gay couples, shepherding economic growth, reducing poverty and banning fox hunting, Blair offered what he called his "advice" to the party.

He said it needed to resist any urge to move back to the left and should keep the center ground. And, he said, it needed to be fully aware that the world had changed: "We used to feel we could shut our front door on the problems and conflicts of the wider world. Not anymore. Not when suicide bombers born and bred in Britain bring carnage to the streets of London in the name of religion."

He went on: "If we retreat now, hand Iraq over to al-Qaeda and sectarian death squads, and Afghanistan back to al-Qaeda and the Taliban, we won't be safer. We will be committing a craven act of surrender that will put our future security in the deepest peril."

He said he would "dedicate" his waning days as prime minister to trying to broker peace between Israelis and Palestinians. In a distancing from Bush administration policy, he said Britain should strive to lead in bioscience: "If America does not want stem cell research -- we do."

"He is the political phenomenon of our age," Michael Smyth, a partner at a London-based law firm, said after Blair left the stage. To many, a feeling hung in the hall that an era was ending.

The Rebranding Of British Conservatives (WSJ)

By Aaron O. Patrick
The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070193

LONDON -- Since David Cameron became leader of Britain's Conservative Party late last year, he has been on a marketing blitz worthy of the public-relations executive he once was.

Traveling on dog sleds, he visited a Norwegian glacier in April to demonstrate his concern about global warming. This month, he toured impoverished areas of India. He has created an "A-list" of 160 political candidates, including an openly gay soap-opera actor, whom he is pushing for seats in Parliament's House of Commons, saying Conservatives need more diversity among its representatives. The party's new logo is an oak tree, symbolizing strength and endurance.

By concentrating on social and environmental issues, Mr. Cameron hopes to shed the image of Conservatives as right-wingers determined to lower taxes for the wealthy and cut welfare. He reasons that by shifting the party to the center of the political spectrum, he will pick up swing voters who previously supported Prime Minister Tony Blair's Labour Party.

While elections are as long as three years away, it looks like Mr. Cameron, 39 years old, has the best chance in a decade to put the party of Margaret Thatcher back in government.

Mr. Blair, after nine years in office, outlasting four Conservative Party leaders, has said he will step down early next year. That will set the stage for Mr. Cameron and Mr. Blair's successor -- most likely Chancellor of the Exchequer Gordon Brown -- to go head to head in the next general election, which must be held by early 2010.

Mr. Cameron's decision to rework the Conservative Party's image came in response to surveys showing the party was seen as out of touch. Last year, polling company Populus U.K. Ltd. asked 1,509 people if they agreed with a plan to tighten immigration controls. One group was told the idea came from the Conservative Party. Another group wasn't. The latter group liked the policy more.

The findings, along with other research, helped persuade Mr. Cameron he needed to change the Conservative Party's image, or "brand," says Michael Moszynski, a director at the M&C Saatchi advertising agency who supervised the party's ads in the last election.

"When other people have said, 'We just have to work our way through our policies,' he realizes that won't be enough," Mr. Moszynski says. "His objective is to change the way people feel about the Conservative Party. That has to come before the policies." Mr. Cameron declined to be interviewed for this article.

Mr. Cameron's main policy document -- an 11-page "statement of values" -- is so generic it is impossible to know how his rhetorical shift will shape the Conservative Party's position on issues like adoption of the euro, nuclear power and health spending. The document includes the sentence: "We believe that there is more to life than money."

Mr. Cameron's efforts with British voters are paying dividends, putting his party consistently ahead of Labour in opinion polls for the first time in more than a decade. Mr. Blair, in an emotional farewell speech to Labour's annual party conference yesterday, warned the party it would lose the next national elections if it slipped leftward to satisfy its core voters instead of fighting Mr. Cameron for the center.

"David Cameron's Tories? My advice: Get after them," he said, before painting Mr. Cameron as a policy lightweight. Mr. Blair attacked Mr. Cameron for "pandering to anti-Americanism" and his professed dislike of the European Union, hesitating over whether to end Britain's moratorium on building nuclear-power stations, and promising to cut taxes as well as increase government spending.

"The Tories haven't thought it through. They think it's all about image," Mr. Blair said. "If we can't take this lot apart in the next few years, we shouldn't be in the business of politics at all."

Labour has reason to be concerned. In local government elections in May, the Conservative Party received more votes than it had in 14 years. Polls show Mr. Cameron is more popular than Mr. Blair. In a Guardian newspaper poll last week, when respondents were asked which party they would vote for with Mr. Brown as Labour leader versus Mr. Cameron's Conservatives, 31% said Labour and 37% said Conservative.

While Mr. Cameron, a former head of corporate affairs at a British television network, Carlton Communications PLC, had a privileged upbringing -- he attended Eton, then Oxford, and is part a group of Conservatives known as the Notting Hill set for the tony London district where many of them live -- his message is pitched at middle-class voters. In speeches, Mr. Cameron often concentrates on education, environmental issues and social justice. He has dropped the Conservative Party's rhetoric on immigration, taxes and crime. He has distanced himself from the administration of President Bush, saying arguments for the war on terrorism are "unrealistic and simplistic," a big step for a party that has long been closely aligned with U.S. Republicans.

Mr. Cameron frequently bikes to work and is installing a wind turbine, solar panels and rainwater tank at his family's London home where he lives with his wife, Samantha, creative director of a luxury stationery and leather-goods shop, Smythson of Bond Street. And, in a country where health care is a huge political issue, he speaks often about his experiences in public hospitals looking after his 5-year-old son, who has cerebral palsy.

DOJ_NMG_0070194

Jill Diver, a 49-year-old television engineer from North London, says she is considering voting for Mr. Cameron, ending her lifelong support of the Labour Party. "I think he genuinely believes what he says on Green issues," she says. "I think he's trying very hard, and I think he's very genuine."

His political opponents note he has yet to lay out policy details. "I think he's done a clever repositioning of his brand, but his changes are very much skin deep," says Hazel Blears, chairman of Mr. Blair's Labour Party.

Next month, Mr. Cameron will have an opportunity to detail his vision for the country when he gives the keynote speech at the Conservative Party's annual conference. He won't announce any major policies, his office says.

Washington Wire (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

September 26, 2006, 6:44 pm

Party Games

Election year politics appear to be a common factor in splitting Republicans.

In the case of the terrorist surveillance bill, for example, the House leadership wants to give a lead role to Rep. Heather Wilson (R., N.M.), who faces a tough re-election at home and is eager to show her independence from the White House. Debate this week provides such a window, but then precludes a quick deal with the Senate. House Majority Leader John Boehner (R., Ohio) acknowledged as much today, saying it is unlikely the warrantless wiretaps legislation will get to the White House before the elections. “We would like to, but I think that might be a stretch,” Mr. Boehner said.

In the case of the stymied defense authorization bill, House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois wants to add legislation that would make it easier to deport illegal aliens found to be members of criminal gangs. That’s a serious issue with Virginia House members, who turned out in support of the speaker at a news conference today. But Virginia Sen. John Warner, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, has argued that the issue shouldn’t be added at this late stage to a measure for national defense. –David Rogers

Read more: Global, Campaign 2006, Congress, Homeland Security, White House

Permalink | Trackbacks September 26, 2006, 5:29 pm

Spellings Higher Ed Plan Gets Mixed Grades

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings wants to make colleges more accountable to students and their parents, and to that end has proposed setting up an extensive database of student demographics and performance.

Charles Miller, who chaired an Education Department advisory commission, has said he envisions an approach that would require colleges to submit students’ scores on standardized tests. The panel’s report points to such examples as the Collegiate Learning Assessment, currently used by more than 100 colleges, and the Measure of Academic Proficiency and Progress, a gauge of reading, math, writing and critical thinking used by 350 colleges for their own self-assessment or accreditation.

The idea for the database has raised hackles among privacy advocates following disclosures that the Education Department shared information on student financial aid applicants with the Federal Bureau of Investigation as part of the government’s counterterrorism work.

Members of the higher education community aren’t happy, either. “We’re perplexed when she says there’s not much information on accountability,” says David Warren, president of the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities. “Our Web sites are overflowing with information.”

Spellings argues that college is a major investment. “For most families this is one of the most expensive investments we make,” she said. “Yet there is little to no information on why costs are so high and what we’re getting in return.”

Spellings might not have the last word. Key senators led by Mike Enzi of Wyoming, chairman of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee and Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, the committee’s ranking Democrat, warned Spellings that she could be called to the principal’s office. “The draft recommendations. . .are broad and will likely require legislative action before they could be appropriately included in regulations,” they wrote. –Anne Marie Chaker

Read more: Global, Education

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks September 26, 2006, 4:25 pm

FCC Keeps Lid on Media Ownership Hearing

In a week, the five-member Federal Communications Commission is scheduled to hit the road for the first of six public hearings on the contentious media ownership issue. So far, we know the hearing will be in the Los Angeles area and it will be on Tuesday. All of the other details, including where it will be and who will speak, still haven’t been released.

Media interest groups are fuming about the delay as FCC officials continue to bicker over the details. One holdup is that new Republican commissioner Robert McDowell is pressing to hold the hearing in the Los Angeles suburb of El Segundo, where his brother happens to be mayor. Other FCC officials want to hold the event closer to downtown Los Angeles, perhaps the University of Southern California campus. Details are expected to be announced late Tuesday or on Wednesday, two FCC officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0070195

UPDATE: Late today, the FCC said it would hold its ownership hearing in two different places: the USC Campus from 1 p.m. to 4:30 p.m. and the El Segundo High School from 6:30 p.m. to 10 p.m. A list of panelists would be released "prior to the hearing" and the public will be able to participate "via open microphone." –Amy Schatz

Read more: Global, Business

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks September 26, 2006, 4:04 pm

No Laughing Matter

The World Bank plans brown-bag breakfasts next week on management of public toilets in developing nations. "There are 2.6 billion people without toilets of any kind," says senior water and sanitation specialist Peter Kolsky. "If they had a latrine, I'd be a happy camper."

Neighborhood facilities are common in such cities as Nairobi and Bombay; the problem is making sure they're cleaned and maintained. "If it belongs to everybody, it belongs to nobody," Kolsky says. China, India and Kenya provide possible models for other countries.

Kolsky says he is still firming up the timing of a brown-bag lunch on fecal sludge. –Michael M. Phillips

Read more: Global

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks September 26, 2006, 4:02 pm

Senate May Delay Vote on China Tariffs

Leading China critics in the Senate said they may again delay action on a bill to slap a big tariff on Chinese-made goods, signaling a willingness to avoid a confrontation over a long simmering currency dispute. The measure reflects wide concern on Capitol Hill with China's currency practices and is intended to raise pressure on Beijing to loosen control of the yuan. Critics contend Beijing pushes the value of its currency artificially low as part of a concerted strategy to give Chinese companies an unfair advantage in world markets.

Lead sponsors of the legislation, Sens. Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.) and Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.), had been pointing toward a vote this week, raising alarms in the Bush administration that the U.S.'s free-trade credentials abroad could be undermined. But after meeting with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, the senators suggested they would be willing to put off action, pending further discussions with Treasury over the next day or two about the administration's new strategy engagement with China on economic issues. They stressed that no final decision had been made. –Greg Hitt

Read more: Global, Economy, Trade

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks September 26, 2006, 2:07 pm

Puppy Love

Earlier this month, Republican Michael Steele, who's running for Maryland's open Senate seat, made a prediction:

"Soon your TV will be jammed with negative ads from the Washington crowd. Grainy pictures and spooky music saying, 'Steele hates puppies. And worse,'" he warned. "For the record, I love puppies."

Washington Wire loves puppies, too, and the doggie in the commercial was a cutie.

It was perhaps a little surprising that it took 11 days for Steele's prediction to come true. Today, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee released a new ad which went on the air in several broadcast markets around Maryland.

"It's nice that Michael Steele likes puppies, but he's running for the United States Senate, and it's important to know where he stands on the issues," the announcer intones, before panning through photos of the candidate with President Bush, ending on a heart-shaped photo of the two together.

The ad is scheduled to run at least a week, DSCC spokesman Phil Singer said, although he declined to say how big the ad buy is.

Steele's race against Democratic Rep. Benjamin Cardin is capturing a lot of attention and money from both parties. A poll released Sunday by the Baltimore Sun, however, showed Cardin with an 11-percentage point lead over Steele. The survey of 815 likely voters put Cardin at 51% to Steele's 40%.

Steele's puppy ad was among a series of chatty, light spots that have tried to introduce him to Maryland voters as a different kind of candidate. In such a competitive election season, where it seems like every ad is already negative even though the election is still five weeks away, is humor the way to go? –Amy Schatz

Read more: Global, Campaign 2006

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks September 26, 2006, 11:39 am

Another Week, Another Blow for Allen

It must feel like Christmas morning every day in the Arlington, Va., campaign headquarters of Democratic senatorial candidate Jim Webb.

Allen

His opponent, Republican Sen. George Allen, has battled charges of racism for calling a Webb campaign worker "Macaca" and that he denied his Jewish heritage. His campaign went into crisis PR mode, after Salon.com released a story Sunday night which featured three former football teammates at the University of Virginia accusing Allen of using racial epithets when describing black players in the early 1970s.

Allen and his campaign staff vigorously denied the charges, releasing statements from four other ex-teammates that refute the claims. But the story was picked up by national media outlets, including the Washington Post and ABC News.

In some ways, the story took a slightly more serious turn for the Allen camp last night, when well-respected (and widely, widely quoted) University of Virginia political science professor Larry Sabato told Chris Matthews on MSNBC's "Hardball" last night that "I'm simply going…to stay with what I know is the case and the fact is that he did use the n-word, whether he's denying it now or not." Reporters may not know any of Allen's former teammates, but Sabato has returned a lot of phone calls over the years.

Christopher J. LaCivita, senior consultant with the Allen campaign, told the Richmond Times Dispatch that "Allen and Sabato, who were classmates at U.Va., were not friends in college and did not travel in the same social circle." –Amy Schatz

Read more: Global, Campaign 2006

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks September 26, 2006, 11:02 am

McClellan Deputy Is Picked to Be Acting CMS Administrator

Leslie Norwalk, deputy administrator of the Center for Medicare and Medicaid Services, has been chosen to be the acting administrator once Mark McClellan leaves the post Oct. 14. In selecting her, Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt said she "played a central role" in implementing Medicare's new drug benefit and is also helping redesign Louisiana's health care system after Hurricane Katrina.

Norwalk, a lawyer, said in an email to her agency staff today that "CMS has been my home for the past five years.… I am committed to a stable, seamless transition and will work to move forward as quickly as possible." She said that Herb Kuhn, director of Center for Medicare Management, will become her deputy. In his current job, he has been responsible for developing Medicare reimbursement policies and regulations. –Jane Zhang

Read more: Global, Health

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks September 26, 2006, 9:38 am

U.S. Loses Top Spot in Global Competitiveness Survey

The U.S.'s huge budget deficit threatens to make the country's economy less competitive, according to a study by the World Economic Forum, a Switzerland-based institute. The Forum's annual study of global competitiveness says the U.S. is only the sixth most competitive economy in the world, slipping from first place in last year's ranking thanks to mediocre scores for its public finances.

The competitiveness study ranks countries around the world according to a range of criteria — including macroeconomic policies, market regulations, technological development, education systems and public institutions — which the Forum believes influence an economy's level of productivity, and thereby its ability to sustain economic growth over many years. The ranking combines economic indicators with the findings from a survey of business executives.

Switzerland ranks No. 1 in this year's survey, thanks to what the Forum sees as a combination of efficient public administration and flexible markets. Three Nordic countries — Finland, Sweden and Denmark — come next, followed by Singapore and the U.S. Read the full article. –Marcus Walker

Read more: Global, Economy

Permalink | Comments (1) | Trackbacks

Senate May Delay Vote On Punitive Tariffs On China (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Two of the Senate's leading China critics signaled a willingness to avoid confrontation in a long-simmering currency dispute, after a fresh appeal from the Bush administration to delay action on a bill to impose a hefty tariff on Chinese-made goods.

The legislation reflects widespread concern on Capitol Hill about China's currency practices and is intended to raise pressure on Beijing to loosen control of its currency, the yuan. Critics contend Beijing keeps the currency's value artificially low as part of a strategy to give Chinese companies an unfair advantage in world markets.

DOJ_NMG_0070197

The lead sponsors of the legislation, Sens. Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, and Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican, had been pushing for a vote this week, raising alarms in the Bush administration that action on the measure could tarnish the U.S.'s free-trade credentials.

But after meeting yesterday with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, the senators suggested they would be willing to delay action pending further discussions with the Treasury in the next day or two about the Bush administration's new strategy of engagement with China on economic issues. They stressed that no final decision had been made.

For both lawmakers, a critical issue in piloting the legislation is how to maximize their influence in the broader China debate. They might win a victory by forcing a vote on the legislation before Congress leaves town for midterm elections, but that victory might prove ephemeral given the uncertain fate the measure faces in the House and President Bush's opposition to it. On the other hand, carrying the issue forward into this fall's lame-duck session or into the new Congress to be seated next year might give them a better chance of continuing their sway in the debate.

Both lawmakers suggested they were impressed by Mr. Paulson's command of the myriad issues roiling the U.S.-China economic relationship and his commitment to change. "He's of the opinion the Chinese are embarking on real reform," Sen. Graham said. "It may not go as fast as we would like. But I need to absorb what he said and see if I can validate it in my own mind."

On a visit to China last week, Mr. Paulson launched a high-level dialogue aimed at addressing the flashpoints in the relationship between the two countries, including the U.S.'s currency complaints. During the visit, he held face-to-face meetings with Chinese President Hu Jintao and Premier Wen Jiabao. Treasury officials cited the sessions as evidence the new Treasury secretary is able to command the attention of Chinese officialdom in ways his predecessor couldn't.

"We're going to have to weigh this in terms of our long-term strategy of opening up China. Where America has a competitive advantage, we want to make sure that they open up," Sen. Schumer said. "We need to see real progress, and a path to progress."

The Schumer-Graham measure, which would levy a 27.5% tariff on Chinese goods if Beijing doesn't act to relax its control of the yuan, enjoys wide support in the Senate. But Sens. Schumer and Graham have put off an up-or-down vote on the bill three times before, amid urgent appeals from the Bush administration to give the Chinese more time to move on the currency front. In contrast to previous occasions when the issue was coming to a head, the senators this time had specified that they wanted a vote this week, voicing frustration with the slow pace of action in Beijing.

Calpers Looks At Investing In China (FT)

By Anuj Gangahar And Francesco Guerrera

Financial Times, September 27, 2006

The California Public Employees Retirement System, the largest US public pension fund, is considering investing for the first time in Chinese companies, aiming both to capitalise on the country's booming economy and to raise its exposure to emerging markets.

Such a move by Calpers, which has not invested any of its $208bn (€164bn) portfolio in Chinese companies because of poor corporate governance standards, could have a ripple effect on other US public pension funds and increase demand for Chinese shares.

In an interview with the Financial Times, Russell Read, Calpers' recently appointed chief investment officer, indicated that the fund could begin by investing in Chinese companies with US or international listings through American Depository Receipts and Global Depository Receipts.

He said the pension fund's staff could recommend the strategy to Calpers' board in the coming months.

Mr Read, who shaken up Calpers' investment strategy since joining in June, said the issue of how to invest in China and other emerging markets was a primary focus for the Sacramento-based fund. "Investing properly in the emerging markets . . . is fundamental to our investment success," he said.

Calpers, which has a reputation as a tough guardian of shareholders' rights, has so far excluded China from its list of investable markets.

The list is updated yearly and is up for re-evaluation by the Calpers board in February, although permission to invest in ADRs and GDRs could come sooner.

In spite of China's fast-growing economy, its capital markets have proved disappointing to foreign investors. The local stock markets have been volatile and are closed to all but a small group of investors picked by the Chinese government.

However, several big companies, including the state oil giants Petrochina and CNOOC and telecommunications operators China Telecom and China Mobile, have listings in Hong Kong and trade ADRs in the US.

DOJ_NMG_0070198

Calpers has some real estate holdings in China. Other US public pension funds also have a degree of exposure to China, although in most cases it appears to be limited to real estate.

Opera Canceled Over A Depiction Of Muhammad (NYT)

By Judy Dempsey And Mark Landler

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

BERLIN, Sept. 26 — A leading German opera house has canceled performances of a Mozart opera because of security fears stirred by a scene that depicts the severed head of the Prophet Muhammad, prompting a storm of protest here about what many see as the surrender of artistic freedom.

The Deutsche Oper Berlin said Tuesday that it had pulled "Idomeneo" from its fall schedule after the police warned of an "incalculable risk" to the performers and the audience.

The company's director, Kirsten Harms, said she regretted the decision but felt she had no choice. She said she was told in August that the police had received an anonymous threat, but she acted only after extensive deliberations.

Political and cultural figures throughout Germany condemned the cancellation. Some said it recalled the decision of European newspapers not to reprint satirical cartoons about Muhammad, after their publication in Denmark generated a furor among Muslims.

Wolfgang Börnsen, a culture spokesman for Chancellor Angela Merkel's conservative bloc in Parliament, accused the opera house of "falling on its knees before the terrorists."

"It is a signal to other stages in Germany, or even elsewhere in Europe, to put no works on their programs that criticize Islam," he said.

The disputed scene is not part of Mozart's opera, but was added by the director, Hans Neuenfels. In it, the king of Crete, Idomeneo, carries the heads of Muhammad, Jesus, Buddha and Poseidon on to the stage, placing each on a stool.

"Idomeneo," first performed in 1781, tells a mythical story of Poseidon, or Neptune, the god of the sea, who toys with men's lives and demands spiteful sacrifice.

The cancellation of the performances fanned a debate in Europe about whether the West is compromising values like free expression to avoid stoking anger in the Muslim world.

Already in Germany, there is growing sentiment that Pope Benedict XVI may have overdone his contrition for a recent speech in Bavaria, in which he cited a historical reference to Islam as "evil and inhuman." The speech set off waves of protests in Muslim countries.

The interior minister, Wolfgang Schäuble, who has defended the pope and called for more dialogue with Muslims in Europe, said canceling the opera was unacceptable and "crazy."

Michael Naumann, a former German culture minister, said, "It's a slap in the face of artistic freedom, by the artists themselves." Mr. Naumann, now the publisher of the weekly newspaper Die Zeit, added, "The pope showed the way by being so extraordinarily apologetic."

The sulfurous public reaction prompted some people to speculate that the decision might eventually be reversed.

Ms. Harms said the "Idomeneo" production, which was first staged by the Deutsche Oper in 2003, would remain on the opera's program. It could be performed later, she said, though she would have to consider the political and diplomatic aspects of "this complex issue."

The scene with the severed heads aroused controversy among Muslims and Christians when the Deutsche Oper first staged it. But the company was not the target of any organized protests, and the Deutsche Oper put four performances on its calendar for this November.

Then, in August, came the anonymous threat.

"All this came in light of the cartoon controversy," said a police spokesman, Uwe Kozelnik. "We started to investigate and finally concluded that disturbances could not be ruled out."

While the police said they did not pressure the Deutsche Oper to cancel the opera, they supported the decision.

Berlin's chief security official, Ehrhart Körting, drew a parallel between the decision and that of German newspapers earlier this year to resist reprinting the cartoons depicting Muhammad.

"Even the German journalists' association criticized the reprinting of the cartoons because their publication could hurt the religious feelings of one group of people," Mr. Körting said in a statement.

Muslim leaders in Germany reacted cautiously. Several planned to participate in a conference on Wednesday organized by the government to foster a better dialogue with Germany's 3.2 million Muslims.

The leader of the Islamic Council, Ali Kizilkaya, told a radio station in Berlin that he welcomed the cancellation, saying a depiction of decapitated Muhammad "could certainly offend Muslims."

DOJ_NMG_0070199

"Nevertheless, of course, I think it is horrible that one has to be afraid," Mr. Kizilkaya said, according to The Associated Press. "That is not the right way to open dialogue."

The head of the Central Council of Muslims in Germany, Ayyub Axel Köhler, declined to comment on the decision, saying he wanted to learn more about the circumstances.

Those circumstances appear to be in some dispute.

At a news conference on Tuesday, Ms. Harms said she broached the possibility of removing the offending scene with Mr. Neuenfels. When he resisted, she let the matter drop.

However, a lawyer for Mr. Neuenfels, Peter Raue, said Ms. Harms telephoned the director on Sept. 9 to tell him she planned to cancel the performances. The issue of tinkering with the ending never came up, Mr. Raue said, and in any event, "you couldn't change it; it is part of the story."

The scene devised by Mr. Neuenfels puts a sanguinary ending on an opera that, in the way Mozart wrote it, ends with King Idomeneo giving up his throne to appease the god of the sea, and blessing the romantic union of his son Idamante with the Greek princess Ilia.

The severed heads of the religious figures, Mr. Raue said, was meant by Mr. Neuenfels to make a point that "all the founders of religions were figures that didn't bring peace to the world."

André Kraft, spokesman for Komische Oper, a more adventurous opera house where Mr. Neuenfels is engaged in another Mozart production, described the 65-year-old director as "a secularist who does not believe religion solves the problems of the world."

For the Deutsche Oper, the cancellation is a major crisis for a prestigious opera company that has been in transition. Founded in 1912 as the Deutsches Opernhaus, the company moved to its present building in western Berlin in 1961, opening with a production of Mozart's "Don Giovanni."

Ms. Harms was appointed director in 2004, coming from a less prominent opera house in the northern German city of Kiel. While there, she said, she faced a bomb threat to the opera house. Ms. Harms plans to present her first production, a little-known work by Alberto Franchetti called "Germania," on Oct. 15.

Some critics of the decision to cancel said it revealed the weaknesses of Berlin's generously supported cultural institutions.

"Because they are subsidized by the German state, there is a great deal of artistic independence, but also a lack of accountability and intellectual rigor," said Gary Smith, the director of the American Academy in Berlin.

The practice of updating classical operas — often with current political or social themes — is common in Germany. But the cancellation of "Idomeneo" could make this production a landmark of another kind.

"I've never heard of something like this, or even similar to it," said Nikolaus Lehnhoff, a prominent German opera director. "I have seen many politically incorrect performances in Berlin. I think the reaction to the pope's speech has sensitized the cultural scene."

Opera Canceled For Fear Of Muslim Ire (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

Germany's top security official yesterday sharply criticized a Berlin opera house's cancellation of a performance of Mozart's "Idomeneo" for fear of Muslim reaction to a scene showing the severed head of the prophet Muhammad.

"We will tend to become crazy if we start forbidding Mozart in opera houses," German Interior Minister Wolfgang Schaeuble said on a Washington visit, calling the cancellation an "unacceptable" violation of the principle of freedom of speech.

The Deutsche Opera, one of the capital's three main opera houses, announced late Monday that it was scrubbing plans for a revival of a December 2003 production of the Mozart work.

The 1781 original told the tale of a king of Crete at the time of the Trojan War, but the production by director Hans Neuenfels inserts a scene in which the severed heads of Muhammad, Jesus and Buddha are placed on chairs alongside the head of the Greek sea god Poseidon.

When Mr. Neuenfels refused to alter the production, Deutsche Opera manager Kirsten Harms said, she canceled plans for four new shows in November after receiving a warning from police.

"We were alerted by the police that all the press publicity surrounding the play would severely heighten the security risk to this opera," she said at a Berlin press conference.

Opera house officials cited the violent reaction across the Muslim world earlier this year to the publication in several European newspapers of Danish political cartoons, which Islamic leaders say mocked Muhammad. Danish embassies and businesses were targeted and more than two dozen people died in the subsequent protests.

DOJ_NMG_0070200

"We know the consequences of the conflict over the [Danish] caricatures," Deutsche Opera said. "We believe that needs to be taken very seriously and hope for your support."

Berlin Police Chief Dieter Glietsch told a German radio interviewer that "one can find nothing wrong" in calling off the production "in a climate that's already tense between Islam and the Western world."

But Mr. Schaeuble, who oversees Germany's police and legal systems, compared the cancellation to the furor generated by some Islamic leaders earlier this month in response to an address by German-born Pope Benedict XVI at the University of Regensburg.

In an aside, the pope in his talk cited a 14th-century Byzantine emperor who criticized Muhammad for promoting violence as a way to spread the faith.

Mr. Schaeuble said some Islamic leaders "tend to use anything to go crazy." If Western officials and artists censor themselves for fear of the reaction of extremists, he added, "we will never convince anyone that freedom of speech and tolerance are a better way."

Ali Kizilkaya, head of the German Islamic Council, welcomed the cancellation, saying the sight of Muhammad's severed head on stage "would certainly offend Muslims."

But, he added in a radio interview, "of course it is horrid that one has to be afraid. That is not the way to start a dialogue."

Berlin Mayor Klaus Wowereit, federal Culture Minister Bernd Neumann and numerous other politicians criticized the opera house's decision.

"If concern about possible protests already leads to self-censorship, then the democratic culture of free speech is in danger," Mr. Neumann said.

Peter Ramsauer, head of the conservative Christian Social Union party in Germany's parliament, called the cancellation "naked fear of violence."

"That's nothing but pure cowardice," he said.

Monika Griefahn, cultural spokeswoman for the leftist Social Democrats, said, "If we weigh security issues against artistic freedom, it makes me wonder if the fundamentalists haven't already won."

Mr. Schaeuble and other German leaders will attend a major summit today aimed at promoting dialogue with Germany's 3.2 million Muslims.

Germans Jeering Opera's Bow To Islamic Extremists (LAT)

By Jeffrey Fleishman

The Los Angeles Times, September 27, 2006

BERLIN — Mozart has survived grandiose conductors and abstract interpretations, but the librettos for his operas never cast Islamic radicals threatening a skittish theater company.

On a day of messy drama and furious debate over free speech, German Opera in Berlin reaffirmed Tuesday its decision not to revive a production of Mozart's "Idomeneo" out of fear of inciting Islamic extremists over a scene showing the severed head of the prophet Muhammad.

The cancellation of a work that has run intermittently since 2003 drew a rebuke from politicians and theater critics, who regarded it as a defeat for creative expression and a victory for militant Islamists over liberal European tradition.

The opera company's decision comes as Muslim tensions in Europe have risen since the publication last year of Danish cartoon caricatures of Muhammad and recent comments by Pope Benedict XVI about Islam and violence.

"There have been no concrete terrorist threats against the opera," said Michael Nerkle, a Berlin police spokesman. "We received an anonymous call that certain scenes might be offensive to Muslims. In light of what happened against the Muhammad cartoons, it was appropriate to inform the opera house," he said, referring to the outbreaks of violence that followed publication of the caricatures.

In a terse news conference, German Opera Manager Kirsten Harms said she canceled the show after security officials informed her there would be "incalculable risks" if the production reopened in November.

"If I would ignore this everyone would say, 'She has ignored a clear warning,' " said Harms, adding that director Hans Neuenfels has refused to restage the show. "It is always easy to say, 'This is the decision of a coward.' But as head of this opera house, I had to decide like that."

"Idomeneo" is the ancient story of the king of Crete's pact with the Greek god Poseidon to sacrifice his son. The production by Neuenfels, known for his controversial interpretations, is a meditation on enlightenment that shows the king lifting the severed heads of Poseidon, Jesus, Buddha and Muhammad to suggest that overreliance on religion can endanger the human spirit.

DOJ_NMG_0070201

"Closing this opera is very alarming," said Markus Schwering, a critic for Koelner Stadt-Anzeiger, a Cologne newspaper. "The production is anti-religious, but it must be allowed in a free society. It's not a singular attack on Islam. It says religion in general can produce inhumanity and superstition.

"The danger I see now is that theaters may stifle provocative art. We need to have a real and very serious debate on this in Germany."

Mixing satire with anger, Wolfgang Boernsen, cultural spokesman for the Christian Democratic Union, the nation's leading conservative party, said:

"Hurray, we are capitulating. To drop a production critical toward religion out of fear from possible terrorist attacks is hurting the freedom of art.

"With the Berlin opera decision, which is a bow before terrorists, the radical scene is encouraged to continue to pressure and threaten Western culture and Christianity."

Most Muslim organizations were unaware of the opera.

Ali Kizilkaya, the leader of Germany's Islamic Council, said the production would offend Muslims, but he told Berlin's Radio Multikulti, "Nevertheless, of course, I think it's horrible one has to be afraid. That is not the right way to open dialogue."

Kenan Kolat, national chairman of the Turkish Union in Germany, which represents immigrants, expressed similar sentiments. "I recommend that all Muslims accept certain things. Art has to stay free," Kolat told a news website.

A poll by the German television network N24 found that 92% of those questioned opposed canceling the production.

The opera company's announcement comes the same week that the government is holding a conference to improve relations with Muslim leaders. The sponsor of the conference, Interior Minister Wolfgang Schaeuble, was in Washington on Tuesday. When he heard of the opera company's decision, he told reporters, "That is crazy. This is unacceptable."

Neuenfels could not be reached for comment. He told the Berlin daily Der Tagesspiegel, "Where will we end if, in the future, we allow ourselves, in foresighted obedience, to be artistically blackmailed?"

Neuenfels' reading of "Idomeneo" and the depiction of beheaded divinities infuriated the largely Christian audience when the show opened in 2003.

"They cried and smashed doors. It was a typical Berlin theater scandal," said Schwering, the Cologne critic. "It lasted two or three days and then died down. No one called for canceling the show."

But Europe has experienced terrorist bombings in Madrid and London and increasing problems with integration. In August, German authorities arrested two Lebanese students in an alleged plot to blow up trains. Such an atmosphere has led to intense police surveillance and growing suspicions between Europeans and immigrant Muslims.

Kay Kuntze, director of the Berlin Chamber Opera, said, "If we give up the central point of our culture — the freedom of art — we end up giving up our entire culture."

Fear Of Muslim Backlash Cancels Opera (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

BERLIN, Sept. 26 -- German lawmakers and cultural leaders assailed a Berlin opera house Tuesday for canceling a production that included a scene of the severed head of the prophet Muhammad, saying it was caving in to fears about religious extremism.

Officials with the world-renowned Deutsche Oper decided late Monday that the show -- an avant-garde remake of Mozart's "Idomeneo" -- could not go on after police warned that it could result in a violent backlash from Muslim fundamentalists. Opera officials said they were worried about a repeat of the worldwide protests that erupted this year after a Danish newspaper published cartoons satirizing Muhammad.

Kirsten Harms, general manager of the Deutsche Oper, said Tuesday that top Berlin police officials had said the production would "pose an incalculable security risk to the public and employees."

"If I had paid no attention and something had happened, everyone would rightly say that I had ignored the warnings of security officials," she said at a news conference.

Director Hans Neuenfels declined to cut the scene, and so the production was canceled.

The mayor of Berlin, federal officials and other lawmakers panned the decision, arguing that it was wrong to squelch artistic expression, even if it risked offending Muslims. "Our ideas about openness, tolerance and freedom must be lived on the offensive," Mayor Klaus Wowereit said.

German Interior Minister Wolfgang Schaeuble called the cancellation "crazy" and "unacceptable" during a visit to Washington. In a meeting with Washington Post reporters and editors, he added: "We have to be very, very clear -- we will not begin to discuss it. Otherwise we will not be convincing. Tolerance needs a clear position."

DOJ_NMG_0070202

The show premiered at the Deutsche Oper in March 2003 and drew some jeers -- but no violence -- for a scene in which Idomeneo, the king of Crete, balks at making sacrifices to the gods and instead produces the severed heads of Muhammad, Jesus, Buddha and Poseidon, god of the sea.

Set in ancient Greece, the opera is considered a forceful critique of theological dogma and wars conducted in the name of religion. Neuenfels's three-act, Italian-language production was last at the Deutsche Oper in 2004.

Islamic tradition bans depictions of Muhammad and other prophets. About 5 percent of Germany's 83 million people are Muslim.

Coincidentally, the German government is sponsoring a conference on Islamic relations Wednesday a few blocks from the Deutsche Oper. The event is intended to aid the assimilation of Muslim immigrants in German culture and bolster religious tolerance.

Ali Kizilkaya, chairman of the Islamic Council for Germany, praised the decision to cancel the opera, saying that "it could certainly offend Muslims."

"Nevertheless, of course I think it is horrible that one has to be afraid," he added in a radio interview. "That is not the right way to open dialogue."

Germany has a strong tradition of free speech developed largely in response to the censorship policies enforced by the Third Reich.

In fact, the Nazis took control of the Deutsche Oper after they came to power in 1933. Propaganda Minister Joseph Goebbels oversaw the programming, and a box was reserved for Adolf Hitler.

Bulgaria, Romania To Join EU (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, September 27, 2006

The European Union will welcome Bulgaria and Romania, two of Washington's strongest allies on the Continent, as full members on Jan. 1, but the strings attached to their accession will be the toughest in the organization's history, EU officials said yesterday.

The officials also indicated that further enlargement will have to wait until member states find a compromise on the EU constitution, whose adoption last year was derailed by French and Dutch rejection in high-profile referendums.

The Bush administration praised the decision on Bulgaria and Romania, which joined NATO in 2004, but State Department spokesman Sean McCormack urged "the EU to continue to keep open a European horizon for a number of states, including those in the Balkans, and Turkey as well."

The fifth wave of EU expansion caps seven years of negotiations with the two Balkan countries and brings the bloc's membership to 27 and its population to about half a billion.

"The accession of Bulgaria and Romania will mark a historic achievement. Their readiness is a direct result of the sustained progress both countries have made," said European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso.

Enlargement Commissioner Olli Rehn called the EU's approach fair and rigorous. "It is fair because we recognized the progress that has been achieved, and we gave credit where it is due. It is rigorous because we established the necessary mechanism to accompany Bulgaria and Romania on their reform path, in the interest of the two countries and of the EU as a whole."

The commission proposed close monitoring of areas where it determined reforms have not been sufficient -- justice and home affairs, food safety and disbursement of EU subsidies -- and will require progress reports every six months, beginning in March.

Serious crime is of particular concern in Bulgaria, whose judiciary has been criticized as sluggish and graft-prone, and it was asked to change its constitution to ensure the independence and accountability of its judicial system.

Romania is required to establish an anti-corruption agency to examine government officials' potential conflict of interests. Both countries will have to guarantee a more transparent and efficient judicial process.

They must also eradicate swine fever to be able to sell pork in the rest of the bloc without restrictions, and improve safety of dairy products. They need to set up proper mechanisms to distribute billions in farm subsidies and other economic aid.

"Payments can be interrupted, suspended or canceled if the commission detects cases of irregularities, fraud or corrupt practices," Mr. Rehn said, but he added that the commission hoped sanctions would be unnecessary.

Both countries also will face restrictions on access to other EU markets for their work force. Britain, Ireland and Sweden, which have complained of a flood of workers from Poland, the Baltic states and other countries that joined the EU in 2004, are considering the strictest rules.

DOJ_NMG_0070203

But the Bulgarian ambassador to Britain, Lachezar Matev, told London's Sunday Telegraph last week that Bulgarians are not likely to rush to Britain, because "we don't like the climate, it's every expensive and our medical services are better."

Bulgarian Prime Minister Sergei Stanishev said yesterday that EU membership was "the final fall of the Berlin Wall" for his country.

Romania, Bulgaria Favored To Join E.U. (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

PARIS, Sept. 26 -- The European Commission recommended Tuesday that Romania and Bulgaria be admitted to the European Union on Jan. 1 but attached unprecedented conditions, signaling that there is still deep unease about the union's expansion eastward and the potential economic and political problems that go with it.

The addition of the two Balkan nations would bring the bloc's membership to 27 countries, raise its population by 30 million to 490 million and expand its borders to the Black Sea. Analysts expect the recommendation by the commission, the E.U.'s executive arm, to win final approval of European leaders next month.

Commission President JosÃ© Manuel Barroso, underscoring the ambivalence toward future expansion, said that following the two countries' entry, he would favor freezing membership until the union resolves a controversy over its proposed constitution, which voters in France and the Netherlands rejected last year.

Many of those no votes reflected popular fatigue with continuing enlargement after 10 countries -- most from the former Soviet bloc -- joined in 2004.

Many citizens of affluent Western Europe express concern about the potential impact that poor, new members from the East could have on immigration, unemployment and terrorism threats. In France and the Netherlands, voters said they particularly opposed the proposed membership of Turkey, which would be the only E.U. country with a Muslim majority.

Fifteen countries have approved the constitution, but adoption requires unanimous acceptance by member states.

Katinka Barysch, a political scientist at the Center for European Reform in London, said Barroso's proposed freeze was a message to the current 25 E.U. governments that "guys, we really need to get together and we really need to make progress on internal reforms." It also served to reassure the European public that enlargement "is not a policy that will continue regardless."

For most countries, the membership process brings on years of painful political, judicial, electoral and economic change. Supporters of continued expansion say this compels nations to rise to European standards and enhances regional security. Embracing Turkey as part of the E.U., they say, could make it an example of moderation for Muslim countries around the world.

In an interview with [a] news agency last week, Romanian President Traian Basescu warned that barring Turkey would aggravate a standoff between the West and Islamic fundamentalists and undermine Europe's security. "Keeping Turkey out means that it would become Islamist," he said.

Croatia and Macedonia are also candidates for membership.

Many European political analysts say they expect little progress on what to do about the E.U.'s proposed constitution until after French presidential elections in May.

Romania and Bulgaria are now members of the NATO alliance, with troops in Iraq and Afghanistan. Their entry to the E.U. would come with significant strings attached, constituting the toughest monitoring of new members. The conditions are meant not only to mollify skeptics in old E.U. countries but to encourage the two newcomers, which would be among the union's poorest member states, to accelerate and deepen reform.

Both nations would be required to curb corruption, money laundering and organized crime, improve food and aviation safety and continue with judicial and agricultural reforms, according to a report released Tuesday in Brussels on the preparedness of the two countries to meet the criteria for membership.

If they do not continue to improve in agriculture, the E.U. could withhold billions of dollars in agricultural subsidies, according to the report. And if judicial reform and corruption suppression stall, other E.U. states might not have to recognize decisions by their courts, the report said. Bulgaria, in particular, needs to improve aviation safety, the report says, or its airlines may be banned from E.U. airspace, it said.

Despite the continuing concerns, the report said both countries had made substantial progress in reaching E.U. standards. Barroso told the European Parliament that their membership would be "a historic achievement" on the path to "reunification of our European family."

Bulgarian Prime Minister Sergei Stanishev said that for his country, it would mark "the final fall of the Berlin Wall."

Through Lens In Darfur, 'I Was A Witness To Genocide' (USAT)

By Rick Hampson

DOJ_NMG_0070204

USA Today, September 27, 2006

As an admiral's son and a former Marine officer, Brian Steidle believed that following orders and doing the right thing were one and the same. Then he went to Darfur.

As an official international monitor of the vicious conflict in western Sudan, he faced a choice: respect authority and honor a code of silence or show the world what he'd seen and kiss his career goodbye. He puckered up … and blew the whistle.

"I was a witness to genocide," he says. "I wanted to make a difference."

Since returning last year from Darfur, where he was a U.S. representative on an African Union observation team, Steidle has become the most vivid chronicler of one of the world's worst humanitarian catastrophes. His photographs — which were supposed to be for his superiors' eyes only — have helped make Americans care about a complex crisis in a faraway place of little economic or strategic value.

Jerry Fowler of the U.S. Holocaust Museum in Washington says Steidle "has given people images of Darfur they can hold onto": a soldier standing next to the store he's just torched; a military helicopter firing on a village; a baby with a bullet in her back.

Since 2003, when war broke out between the Sudanese government and Darfuri rebels, about 200,000 civilians have died. Another 2.5 million, a third of Darfur's population, have been driven from home. American food has helped stave off famine and U.S. diplomacy has fostered a partial cease-fire, but it has not been enough.

The Sudanese government refuses to admit 20,000 United Nations troops to relieve a poorly equipped 7,000-member African Union force. Since May, when the government and one of several rebel factions signed a peace agreement, Darfur has become even more violent and lawless.

Steidle is a compact, intense 29-year-old. He lives on a sailboat in southern Maine, where he's writing a memoir.

He's the son of retired rear admiral Craig Steidle, a Naval Academy graduate who flew fighters off carriers in Vietnam, tested experimental planes and trained test pilots, and directed the Defense Department's biggest aircraft program. Then he became associate administrator of NASA in charge of space exploration planning. "He was the best at everything," his son says, "and we had to try to live up to that."

That's what he was trying to do in Darfur. "Brian told a story others could not," says David Del Conte, an American humanitarian worker who met Steidle in south Darfur. "He moved Darfur onto the front page. He saved thousands of lives."

Steidle says he went to Darfur for several reasons. Mostly, he went because of what he saw one day in 2004 on a computer screen.

He was in the Nuba Mountains in south-central Sudan, working for the international commission supervising a cease-fire in another civil war, between the government and another rebel group.

He was bored. Promotions had put him behind a desk. That's why he'd left the Marines in 2003 after more than four years, having served in Kosovo, made captain and risen to company commander.

That day, a colleague was back from a trip to Darfur. Steidle had heard reports of atrocities against African farmers, who supported Darfur's rebels, by nomadic Arab militias armed and supported by the government. The raiders were called Janjaweed — "devil on horseback."

How was Darfur? Steidle asked his colleague. The man flipped around the laptop on his desk, clicked up a slide show and invited Steidle to take a look.

Steidle had never seen anything like it — schoolgirls, bound together with makeshift handcuffs and burned alive. He was shocked, then outraged, then intrigued. He wanted to see for himself.

Today, when asked why he volunteered for a situation from which most would flee, he sticks his chin out: "I heard there was shooting, and I run toward bullets." Or he'll cite "selfish reasons" — money ($3,500 a week tax-free, paid by a private company under contract with the State Department) and adventure.

That month he wrote an e-mail to his sister Gretchen, which she shared with USA TODAY. It suggested another motive:

"I have to write to you to get this out of my mind. I have seen these photos from a confidential report. I am not permitted to send them, nor do I wish on you the same dreams that I have as a result. … Why are we sitting here letting this happen? This is not the doing of humans, this is the work of the devil. We as humans, all races, religions, colors, creeds, etc., have to stand up for what is right."

He applied for a job monitoring Darfur's shaky cease-fire under the auspices of the African Union, the association of African nations whose mission in Darfur receives financial support from the United States and other nations. He'd have no power or authority to stop the violence, not even a sidearm.

But Steidle did not go unarmed. Photography had been his hobby; now he bought the best digital camera he could afford: a professional-grade Canon EOS 1D Mark II. In Darfur, it would prove more powerful, and more dangerous, than a gun.

Steidle believed the world needed information to prick its conscience. If the classified photos he'd seen had been released to the public, he wrote Gretchen, "there would be troops in here in a matter of days."

DOJ_NMG_0070205

Photography was a touchy subject. Although then-Secretary of State Colin Powell had just described what was happening in Darfur as genocide, there had been virtually no pictures of Janjaweed attacks on civilians; Steidle says he was warned the Sudanese government wanted to keep it that way.

A few photos of atrocities had been leaked outside official channels, so African Union commanders — not wanting to offend the host government — were suspicious of the new man with the camera that could zoom in on a face on the ground from 500 feet in the air.

It took Steidle several weeks to win their trust before he was allowed to use his camera. That was Oct. 20, 2004, when his team visited a village that the Janjaweed had torched. They found some women and children huddled under a tree.

A woman handed Steidle a 1-year-old girl. This was Mihad Hamid. Her mother had been shot to death while fleeing with Mihad in her arms. Mihad was shot in the back. She was having trouble breathing. She probably didn't live the night, he says.

There were many days like that. On the worst, he counted smoke from attacks on 37 villages. On another, he stood next to a Sudanese army commander, who watched as soldiers looted a village. Steidle says that when he asked Brig. Gen. Ahmed El Hajer Mohammed why he didn't stop them, the general said they weren't his men — anyone could put on a uniform.

He heard Janjaweed riders explain that they destroyed villages over stolen cattle. He saw neither regret nor remorse: “It was like looking into the devil's eyes.”

“My reports,” Steidle used to say, “are my ammunition.” He soon realized he was firing blanks.

His photos and descriptions vanished into the AU's bureaucracy; others reached the AU's sponsors, including the U.S. government, months late. In secret, he began to send reports directly to the U.S. Embassy in Khartoum.

After a mission, he'd head straight to his tent to download all his images on his laptop. Only then would he go to the operations tent, download into the AU computer and delete the images from his own camera as required.

He became increasingly frustrated with the AU's impotence. By charting Janjaweed attacks, movements and motives, “We got to where we knew where the next attack would be,” he says. “But I couldn't stop the attacks I was predicting.” Some attacks were deterred by the AU observers' presence. The top commanders, however, refused to systematically place teams in the way of attacks.

Steidle says he knew why. The AU was in Darfur with the government's permission, and anything that antagonized Khartoum — especially taking sides against its Janjaweed proxies — threatened the AU's ability to function. “The attitude was, ‘We gotta tread lightly,' ” Steidle says.

(The AU did not respond to a request for comment. In the past, the AU has emphasized the legal, logistical and financial constraints on its operations in Darfur.)

In January, he predicted — based on Janjaweed movements — that the town of Hamada would be attacked within two weeks. When it was hit 10 days later, Steidle says he refused to go with the observation team: “I knew what they were going to see. I said, ‘I've seen enough.' ”

The team found babies with their faces bashed in. When members came back to the post, “they were like zombies,” Steidle recalls. “A guy who'd usually brief me just held up his hand and said, ‘I must go pray.' ”

The people he'd hoped to help were furious. “They'd say, ‘Leave if you can't protect us.' I thought, ‘What are you doin' here? Just here makin' money?' ”

He returned to the USA in February 2005 with hundreds of images, including those of a man castrated and left to bleed to death, people with their ears cut off and eyes plucked out and an aerial view of government troops joining ranks with the Janjaweed.

Steidle planned to make public his photos, not his identity or affiliation. “It was never his intention to speak out,” Gretchen says, “even when he quit.”

He'd break the trust of AU commanders and make them less likely to share intelligence with the humanitarian agencies for whom AU patrols were eyes and ears.

He'd ruffle the U.S. State Department, which had not authorized him to go public. He'd throw away a lucrative career doing freelance military and security work overseas.

“Did I promise not to release anything? No. Do I own the copyright to my photos? Yes. I took them with my own camera,” he says. “But I was apprehensive. I was paid to do what I was told, keep my mouth shut, and go home.”

Gretchen put him in touch with New York Times columnist Nicholas Kristof. Steidle gave him some photos but said not to use his name.

After the Times printed the photos Feb. 23, Steidle says, Kristof called. “He said, ‘Everybody's asking me where I got these photos. Can I use your name?' ”

His father says Brian struggled with the decision. “He felt he gave his word.” But Steidle thought about what his sister — the family's social conscience — had asked: “Who has the right to keep genocide a secret?”

DOJ_NMG_0070206

He thought about the impact of personal testimony. People could look at a photo, but unless there was a witness to tell them that this girl's name was Mihad Hamid and that her mother was shot in the back, it was just a picture.

"I thought about if for a few days," Steidle says, "and I told Nick, 'Go ahead.' "

Back in Darfur, some of his comrades felt Steidle had broken trust.

In May 2005, USA TODAY spoke with Dale Fage, a former U.S. Army officer who served with Steidle on the AU force, at the airport in south Darfur.

When Steidle's name came up, Fage's face hardened. "Brian was only here five months," Fage said. "He didn't take all those photos himself." (Photos of the attack on Hamada had been taken by another photographer.) "What he did created problems for people here." Having vented his frustration, Fage relented. "He's a good kid," he said. "He just wanted to do the right thing."

For the past 18 months, Steidle has shown his photos, told his story and asked people to lobby the Bush administration and the U.N. to stop the carnage in Darfur.

He has taken his message to Congress and the British House of Commons, to an audience of 35 on a college campus in San Antonio and to 100 people at church in Fort Wayne, Ind. Wherever he goes, a newspaper story or broadcast interview usually follows.

(Khalid Musa, spokesman for the Sudanese Embassy in Washington, did not respond to a request for comment on Steidle.)

Sometimes he seems haunted by his photos, like the ones on display last week for a Darfur benefit at a gallery in New York City: "The whole thing comes back to me, not just that image, but the whole scene — the smell, the sound, everything. When I look at … that burned guy that I (photographed) who was burned alive in his hut, I smell him every time I look at that photo."

As the situation there has grown more desperate, so has he.

"I've been banging my head against the wall," he told The Philadelphia Inquirer in February during a stop on a national speaking tour. "It's like screaming in a dream, and no sound comes out."

He says he has no regrets about going public. Neither does his father. "I knew he'd make the right decision," Craig Steidle says. "I'm proud of him."

U.S. Pushes Anti-Castro TV, But Is Anyone Watching? (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

MIAMI, Sept. 26 — Soon after Fidel Castro announced his mysterious illness in July, the Bush administration stepped up its anti-Castro television broadcasts to Cuba with a new $10 million system.

For the last two months, a twin-engine plane has beamed the signal of the American broadcast, called TV Martí, toward the island from over the Straits of Florida for four hours a day, six days a week, up from four hours of transmission from an Air Force plane on Saturdays. Because the plane flies at 20,000 feet, administration officials say, the Cuban government cannot jam the signal as easily as in the past, when a blimp tethered 10,000 feet over the Florida Keys did the transmitting.

But in interviews in the past two weeks, many Cubans said they still saw just snowy interference where the TV Martí broadcasts should be. About a dozen people in Havana said they still had never glimpsed the station even after the expanded airborne broadcasts began, raising questions about the usefulness of the $10 million expenditure.

Some said they would not watch the station even if they could, because they assumed that it would be biased.

"In my opinion, that is wasted money," said a 35-year-old homemaker in Havana who, like all those interviewed, asked that her name not be used. "It's propaganda."

She and her husband said many Cubans tried to pick up commercial programs broadcast from Florida, but what they wanted was Spanish soap operas, not TV Martí.

A few Cubans in the interior of the island, away from Havana, said they were able to pick up the signal, but others said they could not.

Nonetheless, Representative Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, Republican of Florida, who has long championed TV Martí and its sister station, Radio Martí, said the government had received some promising anecdotal reports about the new plane, which started flying on Aug. 5.

"The U.S. has received reports from Havana and Matanzas that it is being seen every day," Ms. Ros-Lehtinen said of TV Martí, "and it's getting better as the equipment is being fine-tuned." The government, however, has no hard evidence of the station's popularity.

DOJ_NMG_0070207

The federal International Broadcasting Bureau, which also operates the Voice of America, says the purpose of Radio and TV Martí is to broadcast "accurate and objective news and information" to Cuba, where news is tightly controlled by the government.

The stations, which have broad political support among Mr. Castro's many opponents in southern Florida, hope to have legions of Cubans tune in to pro-democracy news and talk programs and others like "Office of the Chief," a laugh-track comedy with Cuban exile actors playing dimwitted versions of Mr. Castro and his brother Raúl.

Cuban exiles in Miami do most of the writing and acting for TV Martí, which was moved here from Washington in 1996 after intense lobbying by exile leaders. On a recent episode of "Office of the Chief," which TV Martí calls its most popular show, an actor playing Raúl Castro said he would mummify Fidel Castro when he died by wrapping him in the pages of a book by Karl Marx, then display him on Havana's seaside boulevard.

The laugh track went wild.

For years, though, critics of the stations have called them overly blunt tools in what should be a nuanced campaign to promote democracy in Cuba.

"The really shrill, outrageous kind of stuff they broadcast has no credibility in Cuba," said John Nichols, a communications professor at Pennsylvania State University who studies Radio and TV Martí.

Mr. Nichols said elected officials in Washington would not dare to anger Miami's 350,000 Cuban-American voters by eliminating a popular anti-Castro program, even if it was largely symbolic.

"It's a litmus test of support for a certain policy on Cuba," he said. "Few right-minded politicians or government bureaucrats are willing to take that on. So essentially we've created a pork-barrel patronage system and the policy is hands-off."

Both stations have been accused of shoddy journalism and hiring practices, especially since the move to Miami, where some say they are primarily a jobs program for hard-line exiles.

In 1999, the inspector general of the State Department told Congress that the stations had "problems with balance, fairness, objectivity and adequate sourcing that impacted credibility."

Another inspector general's report, in 2003, criticized the hiring practices and program quality at the Office of Cuba Broadcasting, prompting its director to resign. His successor, Pedro Roig, says he has improved Radio and TV Martí by hiring freelance professional journalists and broadcasting more news and youth-oriented programming like music videos. But this month, three journalists moonlighting at the stations were fired by El Nuevo Herald, the Spanish-language affiliate of The Miami Herald, after the newspaper's publisher learned of the arrangement and called it a conflict of interest.

Rob Carr, the director of engineering services for the journalism school at the University of Florida, said airborne broadcasts could be easy to jam because the signal output from planes was generally weak.

Mr. Roig declined to be interviewed, but Joe O'Connell, a spokesman for the International Broadcasting Bureau, said TV Martí relied on correspondence from Cuba and reports from recent immigrants to gauge viewership. A telephone survey commissioned by the International Broadcasting Bureau in 2005 found that 13 people out of the 1,589 respondents had seen TV Martí in the past year. Mr. O'Connell said the real number was probably higher, because many Cubans are afraid to admit they watch the station.

In addition to the initial $10 million expense to begin the new airborne broadcasts, he said, the Office of Cuba Broadcasting has requested about $6 million a year to operate and maintain the plane. It is also replacing the blimp, which was destroyed in a hurricane last year.

Altogether, the Office of Cuba Broadcasting received about $38 million this fiscal year, up from $27 million in 2005. The office spends nearly $400,000 to broadcast TV Martí by satellite, a more reliable transmission but one that only a few Cubans with illegal satellite dishes receive.

Several Cubans interviewed said they saw Radio and TV Martí primarily as a source of income for well-connected exiles in Miami, a view shared by José Basulto, founder of Brothers to the Rescue, a strongly anti-Castro exile group.

"The joke goes on," Mr. Basulto said. "They pay individuals who are instrumental in making the lives of United States politicians easier come election time."

One man in Havana said his neighbor knew people who had seen TV Martí in Matanzas, a province east of the capital. Some reports suggest that the Cuban government focuses it jamming efforts in Havana.

Most of the Cubans interviewed said that while TV Martí remained inaccessible, they were able to receive Radio Martí, albeit with interference that sounded like heavy rain. Some said Radio Martí used to be an important news source — such as when the Cuban government regime sank a tugboat hijacked by would-be migrants in 1994 — but that many more options existed now.

DOJ_NMG_0070208

Shortwave radios — which are not sold in Cuba but are smuggled in — can pick up Radio Canada, Radio Netherlands and the BBC, several said. Satellite dishes, while illegal and rare, can pick up television broadcasts from South Florida, Mexico and the Caribbean.

Unhappy Couple Run Against Each Other For Congress In Brazil (WSJ)

By Matt Moffett

The Wall Street Journal, September 27, 2006

SÃO PAULO, Brazil -- They came from different worlds. Maria Christina Mendes Caldeira was the daughter of an old-money real-estate magnate. She had studied in Europe and loved polo. Valdemar Costa Neto was the son of a provincial mayor who grew up in smoke-filled political halls on his way to becoming a powerful Brazilian congressman.

They married in 2003, on New Year's Eve in Las Vegas. But the union soon flamed out. In July of 2004, Mr. Costa had the water and electricity cut off in the mansion they had shared in Brasilia to force Ms. Caldeira to move out, which she eventually did.

But his wife found a way to strike back, personally and politically. During nationally televised congressional hearings last year about an alleged political slush fund, she stepped forward to testify that she had seen Mr. Costa stowing big stacks of cash in a secret safe. Facing possible impeachment and a ban on holding office, Mr. Costa resigned his seat.

The couple, still in court over the terms of their separation, are now fighting in a different arena as Sunday's election approaches. Mr. Costa, president of the influential Liberal Party, is campaigning for a new four-year congressional term. His estranged wife has become his chief opponent as candidate of the Green Party. It's an uphill struggle for Ms. Caldeira, who lacks Mr. Costa's fund-raising ability and the political chits he picked up in his 14-year congressional career.

Last Saturday, she led a group of protesters armed with brooms and buckets in a symbolic "cleaning" of Liberal Party headquarters in Mr. Costa's hometown of Mogi das Cruzes. When a woman loyal to the Liberal Party hit Ms. Caldeira with a shoe, the candidate doused the woman with a bucket of water. After police cruisers came and Ms. Caldeira didn't immediately hand over her ID to an officer, she was taken away and held at precinct headquarters for several hours. "Valdemar sent you!" she shouted at one policeman.

More than just a story of romance gone sour, the contest between the estranged couple goes to the heart of the big question looming over Brazil's election: How much do voters really care about political corruption?

Brazil has rarely seen political scandals that compare with those of the past few years, yet the electorate hardly seems to care. President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva is set to win re-election easily, even though several close allies were forced out of office by scandal. Federal authorities charge the officials operated an illicit fund to buy support for the government in Congress.

Political consultant Gaudêncio Torquato says he expects about 70% of Congress to be returned to office, including Mr. Costa and several others who allegedly received or distributed payments. He says the government, flush with cash generated by Brazil's mining and agricultural exports, has mollified voters on the subject of corruption with heavy spending on welfare programs and public works.

In the race between Mr. Costa and Ms. Caldeira, Mogi das Cruzes retiree João Batista Savio opts for Mr. Costa, who is known as Boy. (Some people use it as an allusion to "playboy," others to distinguish him from his father, who was well known as a mayor here.) "I have to vote for what's best for my city, and Boy has built things here," says Mr. Savio, pointing to a $25 million water-treatment project and a viaduct. Mr. Savio says Ms. Caldeira should keep her nose out of politics. "Women are emotional, and maybe she attacks Boy because she's jealous," the voter said. "I don't think he did anything seriously wrong."

As part of an indictment brought against 40 politicians in April, Mr. Costa was charged with racketeering, corruption and money laundering in allegedly receiving $4.9 million from the slush fund.

Mr. Costa, 57, hasn't been talking to reporters in his campaign. In a videotaped ad, he says the questionable funds were reimbursements for his party's campaign expenses from its coalition partner, the governing Workers Party. Mr. Costa insists no public money was involved, an assertion that congressional investigators dispute. Mr. Costa said: "I erred and there were only two paths left to me: abandon public life, or stay, recognize the error and start all over."

According to electoral records, Mr. Costa is running one of Brazil's best-financed congressional campaigns, with $350,000 in contributions.

His disaffected wife, on the other hand, is running a shoestring campaign. One Saturday earlier this month, Ms. Caldeira, 40, was passing out fliers from her campaign vehicle, a bright green 1984 Volkswagen motor home emblazoned with her slogan "Tenho Atitude" ("I've Got Attitude"). But the vehicle was having mechanical problems and its balky speaker system wouldn't even let her play her campaign song. Undaunted, the candidate, stylish in boots and a riding jacket, started buttonholing voters on the street. "Vote for me. I denounced Boy," she said. "I'm his ex-wife."

DOJ_NMG_0070209

Hairdresser Elena Maria da Silva excitedly embraced Ms. Caldeira. "I saw her on TV," Ms. da Silva said. "She's very brave." But some other passersby went out of their way to avoid Ms. Caldeira or discreetly crumpled her fliers after walking a few steps.

Over the course of his political career, Mr. Costa developed a raffish reputation. During Rio de Janeiro's 1994 Carnaval, for instance, he introduced a young model named Lilian Ramos to then President Itamar Franco. That twosome became internationally famous when photographers captured the scantily clad model standing alongside the president.

His marriage to Ms. Caldeira had long since fallen apart by the time last June when a congressman accused Mr. Costa of slush-fund involvement. Ms. Caldeira supported the accusations to the congressional committee, where she characterized Mr. Costa as a heavy gambler whose personality would change from "Dr. Jekyll to Mr. Hyde." She said he kept stacks of cash in a "big safe...not a little piggy bank."

Mr. Costa and a Liberal Party associate have filed defamation suits against Ms. Caldeira. "The judicial system is scrutinizing her words," a spokesman for Mr. Costa says.

The Green Party invited Ms. Caldeira to run for Congress, hoping to capitalize on her celebrity and to shake voters out of their lethargy over government corruption.

Benedito Faustino Taubaté Guimaraes, a Mogi das Cruzes councilman, scoffs at the notion that Ms. Caldeira can topple Mr. Costa, who is famous for helping constituents. "People want solutions to their problems, not a socialite who wants to talk over coffee," he said. Mr. Guimaraes shows a testimonial letter written by an adolescent, Fabinho Dorneles, who says that after an accident left him in a wheelchair, Mr. Costa pulled strings to get him treated at a top hospital.

But Brazilian politics are hard to predict. In the country's system of proportional representation, each party gets a quota of congressional seats that varies with its share of the popular vote. The top vote getters within each party fill the quota. So it's possible that both Ms. Caldeira and Mr. Costa could be elected, meaning they'd be back together again, in Congress.

Fill 'Er Up With Dictators (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

Are you having fun yet?

What's a matter? No sense of humor? You didn't enjoy watching Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez addressing the U.N. General Assembly and saying of President Bush: "The devil came here yesterday, right here. It smells of sulfur still today." Many U.N. delegates roared with laughter.

Oh well then, you must have enjoyed watching Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad breezing through New York City, lecturing everyone from the U.N. to the Council on Foreign Relations on the evils of American power and how the Holocaust was just a myth.

C'mon then, you had to at least have gotten a chuckle out of China's U.N. ambassador, Wang Guangya, trying to block a U.N. resolution calling for the deployment of peacekeeping troops to Sudan to halt the genocide in Darfur. I'm sure it had nothing to do with the fact that the China National Petroleum Corporation owns 40 percent of the Sudan consortium that pumps over 300,000 barrels of oil a day from Sudanese wells.

No? You're not having fun? Well, you'd better start seeing the humor in all this, because what all these stories have in common is today's most infectious geopolitical disease: petro-authoritarianism.

Yes, we thought that the fall of the Berlin Wall was going to unleash an unstoppable wave of free markets and free people, and it did for about a decade, when oil prices were low. But as oil has moved to $60 to $70 a barrel, it has fostered a counterwave — a wave of authoritarian leaders who are not only able to ensconce themselves in power because of huge oil profits but also to use their oil wealth to poison the global system — to get it to look the other way at genocide, or ignore an Iranian leader who says from one side of his mouth that the Holocaust is a myth and from the other that Iran would never dream of developing nuclear weapons, or to indulge a buffoon like Chávez, who uses Venezuela's oil riches to try to sway democratic elections in Latin America and promote an economic populism that will eventually lead his country into a ditch.

For a lot of reasons — some cyclical, some technical and some having to do with the emergence of alternative fuels and conservation — the price of crude oil has fallen lately to around $60 a barrel. Yes, in the long run, we want the global price of oil to go down. But we don't want the price of gasoline to go down in America just when $3 a gallon has started to stimulate large investments in alternative energies. That is exactly what OPEC wants — let the price fall for a while, kill the alternatives, and then bring it up again.

For now, we still need to make sure, either with a gasoline tax or a tariff on imported oil, that we keep the price at the pump at $3 or more — to stimulate various alternative energy programs, more conservation and a structural shift by car buyers and makers to more fuel-efficient vehicles.

DOJ_NMG_0070210

"If Bush were the leader he claims to be, he would impose an import fee right now to keep gasoline prices high, and reduce the tax rate on Social Security for low-income workers, so they would get an offsetting increase in income," argued Philip Verleger Jr., the veteran energy economist.

That is how we can permanently break our oil addiction, and OPEC, and free ourselves from having to listen to these petro-authoritarians, who are all so smug — not because they are educating their people or building competitive modern economies, but because they happen to sit on oil.

According to Bloomberg.com, in 2005 Iran earned $44.6 billion from crude oil exports, its main source of income. In the same year, the mullahs spent $25 billion on subsidies to buy off the population. Bring the price of oil down to $30 and guess what happens: All of Iran's income goes to subsidies. That would put a terrible strain on Ahmadinejad, who would have to reach out to the world for investment. Trust me, at $30 a barrel, the Holocaust isn't a myth anymore.

But right now, Chávez, Ahmadinejad and all their petrolist pals think we are weak and will never bite the bullet. They have our number. They know that Mr. Bush is a phony — that he always presents himself as this guy ready to make the "tough" calls, but in reality he has not asked his party, the Congress, the people, or U.S. industry to do one single hard thing to reduce our dependence on foreign oil.

Mr. Bush prattles on about spreading democracy and freedom, but history will actually remember the Bush years as the moment when petro-authoritarianism — not freedom and democracy — spread like a wildfire and he did nothing serious to stop it.

Don't Play Politics With Kazakhstan (WP)

By S. Frederick Starr

The Washington Post, September 27, 2006

The president of Kazakhstan will be visiting the United States soon, and the critics are already sharpening their pens. The trip by President Nursultan Nazarbayev will mark 15 years of independence for his country as well as a growing strategic partnership with the United States. But whereas the State Department sees Kazakhstan as a successful "corridor of reform," critics claim that it's just another corrupt petro-state and Nazarbayev himself a repressive, authoritarian ruler. The fact that Vice President Cheney recently visited the Kazakh capital of Astana only confirms their darkest suspicions: It's all about oil, and probably about Halliburton as well.

To be sure, Kazakhstan has oil and a lot of it. Russia and China have been buying as much of it as they can get, and Europe and the United States are eager to do the same. American firms, including Halliburton, have made big investments there, but so have the Chinese, Italians, British and Dutch. Shouldn't the United States be pursuing this prospect?

Those who say no point to widespread corruption in Kazakhstan. Indeed, corruption thrives in nearly all the countries that were formerly under communist rule. That is why the Kazakh government set up a national fund in 2000 that makes the management of oil revenue more transparent, why its banking system will meet E.U. standards by 2008 and why it has signed on with Britain's rigorous Extractive Industries Transparency Initiative. This year alone it has successfully prosecuted several dozen high- and mid-level officials for corrupt practices.

U.S. critics brush this aside and point instead to the case of an American, James H. Giffen, who is on trial in New York for allegedly arranging massive bribes to senior Kazakh officials over a decade ago. But in spite of much finger-pointing, the only person being prosecuted so far is Giffen. In light of this, should Kazakhstan start refusing U.S. investments?

Under both Democrats and Republicans, the U.S. approach toward Kazakhstan has been to work with the government to reform its laws and courts. The American Bar Association, Freedom House, Counterpart Consortium and the U.S. Agency for International Development have made much headway in this regard. We should be exploring how to continue and expand this fruitful collaboration. Accusations from our side will only strengthen the hand of hard-core nationalists and others in Kazakhstan who defend the old practices.

The majority of Kazak citizens are Muslims. Fundamentalists from the Persian Gulf states and elsewhere are eager to exploit the situation. A few years back members of a group with links to al-Qaeda penetrated the country. But so far Kazakhstan has shown remarkable success in addressing the social conditions that can feed extremism. The Asian Development Bank reports that the poverty rate has been cut by half in five years. A large middle class is rapidly forming, thanks in part to a revised tax code that favors small and mid-size businesses. The government now spends a respectable 4 percent of gross domestic product on modern, Western-style education and pays the full cost of sending its top 3,000 high school graduates for study in the United States, Europe, Japan and other developed countries. Graduates of this program are accustomed to modern freedoms and expect their country to embrace them.

Granting this, critics point to what they politely term Kazakhstan's "democratic deficit." They're right. The Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) has drawn the same negative assessment of Kazakh elections that it has of all elections in the former Soviet Union except for the three Baltic countries: They fail to meet European standards. But the OSCE has acknowledged that recent revisions in Kazakhstan's electoral law represent "significant progress." It also concluded that the Central Election Commission managed the crucial run-up to the 2005 elections in a "generally transparent manner." For all the problems that remain, this argues for continuing a quiet process of engagement on electoral reform.

DOJ_NMG_0070211

Kazakhstan merits our support for another reason. For a decade the United States has watched helplessly as India, then Pakistan and now Iran developed nuclear weapons. The trajectory is chilling. Contrast this with Kazakhstan, which inherited a large nuclear arsenal from the Soviet Union and -- with U.S. support -- voluntarily got rid of it.

Moreover, Kazakhstan has managed to do what no other country has: maintain cordial and balanced strategic partnerships with China, Russia and the United States. Its links with Washington go far beyond the ceremonial; Kazakh troops stand with ours in Afghanistan. Its contingent in Iraq has destroyed more than 3 million land mines. And the Kazakhs are working closely with the United States in opening up Afghanistan to continental trade.

All this suggests that U.S. links with Kazakhstan are among this country's most promising relations in the Muslim world. Developed over 15 years under both Democratic and Republican administrations, they are the fruit of hard work by U.S. agencies, businesses, educational institutions and scores of nongovernmental organizations. They are creating a successful model of economic and social development for majority-Muslim societies. What a contrast to what we see daily in the Arab world.

U.S. critics of Kazakhstan have every right to remind us that the country still falls short in many respects. But in the eyes of some Kazakhs, the United States may be a less than perfect partner as well. If either of these groups succeeds in damaging the basis of our partnership, further progress in Kazakh social policy and legal and electoral reform will be the first to suffer. And Kazakh oil will then flow mainly to China and other countries that pay their bills and ask no questions.

The writer is chairman of the Central Asia-Caucasus Institute at Johns Hopkins University's School of Advanced International Studies.

Shinzo Abe's Asian Challenge (NYT)

The New York Times, September 27, 2006

If Japan's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, hopes to be as popular and successful as his departing predecessor, Junichiro Koizumi, he needs to be equally daring in breaking with failed policies of the past. The obvious place to start is by rebuilding Japan's badly damaged relations with China.

Nothing is more important to Japan's prosperity and security than normal relations with its giant neighbor. An ugly, but increasingly distant, history of Japanese aggression and war crimes stands in the way. Mr. Koizumi, in one of the greatest errors of his administration, deliberately glorified this history, playing into the hands of Chinese leaders who often use nationalism to distract their people from official corruption and political repression.

Mr. Abe needs to extricate Japan from this destructive dynamic. The first step should be declaring that he will not continue Mr. Koizumi's provocative practice of visiting the Yasukuni Shrine, where the spirits of convicted war criminals are honored. The shrine controversy, and the failure of Japanese textbooks to deal honestly with the wartime behavior of Japanese troops, complicate the nation's ability to handle contemporary military issues, like the emerging debate over amending the pacifist constitution that America imposed on it after World War II. There is no reason Japan should not be able to make that change. But unless it first comes to terms with its history and its neighbors, such a step would be poorly received by other Asian nations.

Japan has a great deal to be proud of, including an increasingly vital democracy, a revived economy and the difficult but necessary economic reforms that Mr. Koizumi began to push through and that Mr. Abe will now need to take further. It does not need to glorify the darkest period of its recent history and the war criminals most responsible for that terrible aberration.

DOJ_NMG_0070212

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Thursday, September 28, 2006 8:26 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Thursday, September 28, 2006
Attachments:	agnb060928.pdf; agnb060928.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

House Passes Detainee Bill 253-168, With Senate Approval Expected Today ... 3
Judge Denies Ashcroft Immunity In Terrorism Case ... 4
Domestic Surveillance Dispute Heads For Detroit Courtroom ... 4
Albany Terrorism Case Defendant Takes Stand ... 4

Patriot Act:

Patriot Act, Real ID Reducing Number Of Refugees Allowed To Enter US ... 5

Homeland Response:

House Democrats' Report Critical Of Administration's Local Anti-Terror Efforts ... 5
DHS Official Who Made Anti-Terror Funding Cuts Is Out ... 5
Suspicious Package Forces Evacuation Of DC Federal Courthouse ... 5
Emergency Room Strain Raises Disaster Preparedness Concerns ... 6
Collins, King Say Chemical Plant Security Agreement Will Protect Americans ... 6
Holt Harshly Criticizes FBI Over Anthrax Probe ... 6
Johanns Says Americans Should Not Discount Agroterrorism Threat ... 6

War News:

White House Refuses To Release Entire NIE ... 6
Bush Dinner Provides Forum For Karzai, Musharraf To Air Differences ... 9
Senior US Commanders Question Maliki's Will To Prevent Civil War ... 10
Poll Finds 61% Of Iraqis Support Attacks In US Troops ... 10
Two Networks Air Excerpts Of Video Showing Attack On Convoy In Iraq ... 10
US Military Spokesman Says Baghdad Violence Increasing With Onset Of Ramadan ... 11
Sadr Said To Have Lost Control Over Parts Of His Militia ... 11
Construction Of $75 Million Baghdad Police College "Grossly Mismanaged." ... 11
Boehner Defers To Generals' Judgment On Troop Levels In Iraq ... 11
Favoring Afghanistan War Over Iraq Conflict Said To Be "Senseless." ... 11
Schieffer Says Pentagon Risks Losing Volunteers' Trust ... 12

DOJ:

New Colorado US Attorney Profiled ... 12

Corporate Scandals:

Dunn Expected To Mount Vigorous Defense Of Her Role In H-P Leak Hunt ... 12
Former Comverse Executive Arrested In Namibia ... 13
Plaintiffs Seek $21.5 Million From Bearing Point Bond Default ... 14
Regulators Urge Borderless Solution To Derivatives Growth Problems ... 14
DOJ, SEC Probing Halliburton Work In Nigeria And Elsewhere 14
Fastow Sentence Surprises Experts ... 14

Criminal Law:

Pirro Under Federal Probe Over Marital Spy Plot ... 15
Another Mistrial Declared In Gotti Racketeering Case ... 17
Rare Map Thief Sentenced To 42 Months In Prison ... 18
Louisiana Woman Pleads Guilty To FEMA Fraud ... 18
Former Michigan Prosecutor Acquitted Of Corruption Charges ... 19
New Orleans Corruption Probe Defendant Sentenced To Probation ... 19
Prosecutor Seeks Protection Order On Fumo Evidence ... 19
Judge Sets Nov. 21 Cause, Bail Hearing For Jeffs ... 20
Prosecutors Seek To Bar Release Of Intelligence Documents In Libby Trial ... 20
House Suspends License For Firm Linked To Abramoff ... 20
US Charges Pennsylvania Woman In Child Porn Case ... 21
Eased Lender Requirements Fueling Surge In Mortgage Fraud 21
Good Samaritans Keep Watch For ID-Theft Victims ... 21
Blanco Renews Extradition Request For Sportingbet Chairman 22
DC Officials Consider Extending Anti-Crime Legislation ... 22
Karr Lawyers Seek Dismissal Of Child Porn Charges ... 22
Sex Offender Admits Killing 15-Year Old Boy ... 22
Navy Midshipman Faces Rape Charges ... 22
US Charges Former National Guardsman With Smuggling Machine Guns ... 22
Judge Sentences Pennsylvania Inmate In Assault Of US Marshal ... 23

US Charges Man With Defrauding Priests 23
Cost Of Houston Crime Lab Probe To Grow By $1.5 Million 23
Expert Says Inmates Conscious During Lethal Injections 23

Civil Law:

San Jose Nursing Home Convicted Medicare Fraud 24
House Panel Approves FOIA Reform Bill 24
Court Declines To Intervene In Maine "Electioneering" Dispute. 24

Civil Rights:

Ruling Opens Door For ADA Claims Involving Internet Access . 24
DOD Strives To Get Ballots To Soldiers In Field Before Election Day 25
Voters Abroad Still Face Challenges 25
Hyde Defends "Federal Election Integrity Act." 25

Antitrust:

Mittal To Sell WV Mill To Settle DOJ Antitrust Concerns 25
Icahn Eyes Bigger Stake In Federated Stores 25
Judge Dismisses Key Portion Of AMD Antitrust Suit Against Intel 26
Symantec Claims Microsoft Withholding Spyware Technology . 26
Johnson & Johnson Suit Claims Abbott Leak Subverted $24 Billion Deal 26
Endesa Board Expected To Approve E.On Offer 26
Phone Companies Seek To Unload Land Lines In Rural Areas 27
Glassman Makes Case For Cable Competition 27

Environment/Indian Affairs:

US Will Not Charge ConocoPhillips For 2004 Oil Spill 27
Schwarzenegger Signs Greenhouse Gas Measure Into Law 27
DC Area Has Fewer Smoggy Days But Still Falls Short OF Federal Standards 28
Indian Ranchers Await Trial On Suit Against US 28
Navajo Teen Aspires To Serve Reservation As FBI Agent 28

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

San Diego Chargers Safety Arrested In Cough Syrup Investigation 28
Suspected Illegal-Immigrant Drug Dealers Targeted In Colorado Investigation 29
Border Tunnel Prevention Act Gains Support 29
Effectiveness Of Plan Colombia Scrutinized Following Police Unit Killings 29

Immigration:

Boehner Says Congress Will Pass An Additional $1.2 Billion For Border Security 30
Herndon, VA, Moves To Crack Down On Illegal Immigration..... 31

Tax:

IRS Probing Merck's Offshore Partnership 31

Congress-Administration:

Congress Set To Approve Record-High Defense Budget 31
Congress Nears Recess With "Do Nothing" Label Looming 31
Bush To Rally Senate Republicans Before Recess 32
Jeb Bush Offering Public Criticisms Of President's Education Policy 32
Conrad, Spratt Criticize Bush Tax Cuts, GOP Budget Shortcomings 32
House GOP Leaders Announce Date For Leadership Elections 32
Liberal Democrats Not Rallying To Murtha For Possible Majority Leader Race 33
Snow Walking "Fine Line" In Attending GOP Fundraisers..... 33
Budget Cuts Seen As Threatening NASA's Aviation Program ... 33
Military Officers Group Concerned About Military Pay Raise 33
Amendment Would Block Spending On Parts Of National Security Personnel System 33
Morris Says Frist Has Failed As Majority Leader 33
Wessel Says Paulson Is "Brightest Bulb" In Bush's Cabinet 34
NYTimes Praises Advisory Group's Recommendations For FDA34

Other News:

Dow Jones Edges Closer To All-Time High 34
Press Corps Resents Closed Bush Fundraisers..... 35
Bush-Rove, Hillary Clinton Fundraisers Take Place On Same DC Street 35
Danforth Says GOP Needs To Move Away From Christian Conservative Base 35
GOP Open House Seats in Arizona, Colorado, Iowa At Risk..... 35
Good Economic News Seen As Boosting GOP Chances For Keeping Congress 36
Democrats Said To Have Serious Shot At Senate Majority..... 37
Allen Campaign, Beset By Controversies, Has Difficulty Gaining Traction 37
Ford Running Competitive Race For Tennessee Senate Seat .. 38
Mfume Endorses Cardin, Warns Democrats About Lack Of Diversity 38
Crist Leads Davis By 15 Points In Florida Gubernatorial Race .. 39
Polls Show Schwarzenegger With Double-Digit Lead Over Angelides 39
Democrats' Attacks On Fox News Rally Base 39
Hillary Clinton Faces Quandary On AIDS Funding Bill 40
GOP To Hold 2008 Convention in Twin Cities 40
Prominent Scientists Form 527 Group 41
Will Says Taxpayer Financing Of Presidential Elections Will Die In 2008 41
WPost Says Fairfax County Should Examine Deployment Of Its Vehicles 41
WSJournal Defends Wal-Mart's Drug Discounts 41
Ahmadinejad Says Iran Won't Give Up Right To Pursue Nuclear Program 42
Egypt Working On Nuclear Program 42
Hill Says Pyongyang Talks Are Entering "Crucial Phase." 42
Rice Warns Khartoum About Continued Attacks, Opposition To UN Force 43
Hezbollah Facing Little Pressure To Disarm 43
Israel Releases Palestinian Deputy Premier After Five Weeks .. 43
State Dinner For Kazakh President Said To Highlight Conflicting Foreign Policy Goals 43

DOJ_NMG_0070215

Mexico Criticizes Rice's Comments 44
China Asks US Senate To Drop Tariff Bill 44
Effectiveness Of Plan Colombia Scrutinized Following Police Unit Killings 44
Decision To Cancel Berlin Opera That Might Offend Muslims Draws Fire..... 44
Guatemalans Seek Closure Decades After Civil War..... 45
Bill Clinton Seeks To Boost Britain's Labour Party 45
Hoagland Warns US To "Be Careful" In Backing Ban For UN Secretary General 45

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages..... 45

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington 46

TERRORISM NEWS:

House Passes Detainee Bill 253-168, With Senate Approval Expected Today. Fox News' Special Report (9/27, Hume) reported the House "passed a bill governing the treatment and trial of war on terror detainees. Passage of the measure was expected. What was not expected were the strong objections of Democrats who contend the bill is unfair to detainees and hurts America's standing around the world." The bill passed 253-168, with 160 Democrats opposed. The New York Times (9/28, Hulse, Zernike, 1.21M) notes that most of the 34 Democrats who supported the bill are in "more competitive districts" this fall. USA Today (9/28, 6A, Kiely, 2.27M) says the measure "is headed for Senate approval today, as Congress tries to balance national security needs with the rights of prisoners." It would "permit creation of military tribunals to try terrorism suspects" and would also "allow President Bush to claim a legislative victory on national security 40 days before the Nov. 7 elections." The Hill (9/28, Allen, Tiron) notes that since the Senate is "considering identical but separate legislation," one chamber "would still have to pass the other chamber's version of the bill for it to be sent to the president."

The AP (9/27, Flaherty) says the legislation "also provides extensive definitions of war crimes such as torture, rape and biological experiments -- but gives Bush broad authority to decide which other techniques U.S. interrogators can legally use. The provisions are intended to protect CIA interrogators from being prosecuted for war crimes." AFP (9/27, Raab) says that while the bill "forbids 'cruel and unusual' punishment of detainees," it does not offer "further clarification of what falls in that category."

A straightforward Washington Post (9/28, A1, Babington, 748K) report says the President "is scheduled to meet with GOP senators in the Capitol this morning for a final pep rally before the measure's expected passage. Republicans hope to campaign on the bill as proof of their party's tough stand against terrorists. Many congressional Democrats decided to swallow their misgivings and vote for the bill to avoid being portrayed as less than vigilant against suspects captured in Afghanistan, Iraq and elsewhere."

The Washington Times (9/28, Hurt, 88K) reports that just before the vote, Majority Leader John Boehner "made clear that Republicans will use the vote in the November elections against Democrats who opposed the bill." He said, "Will my Democrat friends work with Republicans to give the president the tools he needs to continue to stop terrorist attacks before they happen, or will they vote to force him to fight the terrorists with one arm tied behind his back?" Later, House Speaker Dennis Hastert said, "Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi and 159 of her Democrat colleagues voted today in favor of more rights for terrorists. So, the same terrorists who plan to harm innocent Americans and their freedom worldwide would be coddled if we followed the Democrat plan."

The Los Angeles Times (9/28, Simon, Barnes, 918K) reports that as the Senate debate began, Majority Leader Bill Frist said, "We must remember that we are fighting a different kind of enemy -- and a different kind of war. To win this war, we must provide our military, intelligence and law enforcement communities the tools they need to keep us safe." But Armed Services ranking Democrat Carl Levin "objected that the measure would be 'used by our terrorist enemies as evidence of U.S. hypocrisy when it comes to proclamations of human rights.'"

Editorial Pages Critical Of Legislation. Newspaper commentary on the measure is markedly negative. Under the headline "Rushing Off A Cliff," the New York Times (9/28, 1.21M) editorializes, "Here's what happens when this irresponsible Congress railroads a profoundly important bill to serve the mindless politics of a midterm election: The Bush administration uses Republicans' fear of losing their majority to push through ghastly ideas about antiterrorism that will make American troops less safe and do lasting damage to our 217-year-old nation of laws -- while actually doing nothing to protect the nation from terrorists. Democrats betray their principles to avoid last-minute attack ads. Our democracy is the big loser."

The Los Angeles Times (9/28, 918K) editorializes that Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter's "warning that the Supreme Court is likely to invalidate pending legislation that would create military commissions to try terrorist suspects deserves a hearing -- in the Senate. The problem with the legislation…is that it would make it impossible for alleged enemy combatants to file what is known as a writ of habeas corpus, which allows them to challenge the legality of their imprisonment. … On Wednesday, the House approved a bill that does not permit detainees to file habeas corpus petitions. That means that it will be up to Specter and his colleagues to preserve the Great Writ when the Senate votes."

DOJ_NMG_0070216

In a Los Angeles Times (9/28, 918K) op-ed, Bruce Ackerman, author of "Before the Next Attack: Preserving Civil Liberties in an Age of Terrorism," writes, "The compromise legislation, which is racing toward the White House, authorizes the president to seize American citizens as enemy combatants, even if they have never left the United States. And once thrown into military prison, they cannot expect a trial by their peers or any other of the normal protections of the Bill of Rights. This dangerous compromise not only authorizes the president to seize and hold terrorists who have fought against our troops 'during an armed conflict,' it also allows him to seize anybody who has 'purposefully and materially supported hostilities against the United States.' This grants the president enormous power over citizens and legal residents."

Judge Denies Ashcroft Immunity In Terrorism Case. The AP (9/28, Boone) reports from Boise, ID, "Former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft could be called to testify in a lawsuit that claims a student was wrongly imprisoned in a computer terrorism case, a federal judge ruled Wednesday." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Edward Lodge rejected Ashcroft's argument to toss out the lawsuit because he was entitled to absolute immunity since his position at the Department of Justice was prosecutorial." The AP adds, "Abdullah al-Kidd, who played football for the University of Idaho, claimed government wrongfully arrested him in the case against a fellow student, Sami Omar Al-Hussayen, in 2003. … They both worked for the Islamic Assembly of North America, a Michigan-based charitable organization that federal investigators said funneled money to activities supporting terrorism and published material advocating suicide attacks on the United States." The AP notes, "A jury acquitted Al-Hussayen of using his computer skills to foster terrorism and of three immigration violations after an eight-week federal trial. But Al-Hussayen — who was only months from finishing his doctorate study at the University of Idaho — was eventually deported to Saudi Arabia. … Al-Kidd was never called to testify, but he spent two weeks in jail as a material witness and was later released to the custody of his wife with strict limitations on where he could travel. … His lawsuit claimed Ashcroft was personally liable for violating his rights because after the terrorist attacks Ashcroft 'created a national policy to improperly seek material witness warrants, oversaw the execution of such warrants, and failed to correct the constitutional violations of conducting such actions,' according court documents. Al-Kidd said the investigation and detainment not only caused him to lose a scholarship to study in Saudi Arabia, but that it cost him employment opportunities. … The ruling also means U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez and others in the Department of Homeland Security could be called to testify in the lawsuit. … 'We are literally reviewing it at this minute and no, we have not made any decisions at this time,' Charles Miller, spokesman for the Justice Department's civil division, said of the ruling."

Domestic Surveillance Dispute Heads For Detroit Courtroom. The Detroit Free Press (9/28, Ashenfelter) reports, "Justice Department lawyers will be back in federal court in Detroit on Thursday to try to persuade a judge to delay enforcement of last month's decision to halt the National Security Agency's domestic spying program until the outcome of the government's appeal. … And ACLU lawyers will be there to try to persuade U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs to order the government to stop the program now." The Free Press continues, "Taylor ruled Aug. 17 that the Bush Administration's program of monitoring international phone calls and emails involving suspected Al Qaeda members is unconstitutional because it violates Americans' free speech and privacy rights and is contrary to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978. … Under that law, the government can eavesdrop for up to a year without a warrant provided the Attorney General certifies that the eavesdropping is legal." The Free Press adds, "The Justice Department appealed Taylor's ruling to the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati."

Albany Terrorism Case Defendant Takes Stand. Capital News 9 Albany (9/27) reported, "The prosecution has rested in the trial of two Albany mosque leaders accused of supporting terrorism, and the defense wasted no time calling their client to the stand. … Prosecutors finished up with a Middle Eastern expert who explained what references in [Mohammed] Aref's journal are terrorist organizations and which ones aren't. Once Aref took the stand, the mood clearly changed in the courtroom as Aref explained his growing up in Northern Iraq where Saddam Hussein killed more than 180,000 fellow Kurds in the late 1980s. That's important because Aref argues that his rhetoric the courtroom previously heard was directed at Saddam's regime and that he's always been peaceful as he spoke out as a student 0- but not a member of any political party which prosecutors accused him of omitting on an immigration document."

DOJ_NMG_0070217

PATRIOT ACT:

Patriot Act, Real ID Reducing Number Of Refugees Allowed To Enter US. The New York Times (9/28, Swarns, 1.21M) reports State Department officials said Wednesday that the USA Patriot Act and the Real ID Act have led to a 23 percent reduction in the number of refugees admitted to the US this year because "of provisions…that have sharply reduced the number of resettled refugees." The provisions, which "deny entry to anyone who belongs to or has provided material support to armed rebel groups," regardless of circumstances, "have derailed the resettlement of thousands of refugees fleeing the authoritarian government of Myanmar, formerly known as Burma; hundreds of refugees from Vietnam and Laos who fought alongside American troops in the Vietnam War; and dozens of Cubans who supported armed groups opposed to Fidel Castro in the 60's, according to the State Department and the United Nations refugee agency."

Refugees Settling In Non-Traditional Areas. Meanwhile, the Washington Post (9/28, A3, Layton, 748K) a study released today by the Brookings Institution finds more political refugees in the US are "putting down roots in metropolitan areas without large immigrant populations." Brookings "found that while traditional immigrant gateways such as New York, Chicago and Los Angeles still absorb most refugees, that flow has slowed in the past several years, and refugees are increasingly settling in Seattle, Atlanta, Sacramento, Minneapolis-St. Paul and Portland, Ore." Audrey Singer, a Brookings demographer who co-wrote the study, said states "such as Iowa, Pennsylvania and North Dakota, have been lobbying for refugees."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

House Democrats' Report Critical Of Administration's Local Anti-Terror Efforts. The Wall Street Journal (9/28, Block, 2.03M) reports, "Amid the political storm over the intelligence community's report that al Qaeda remains a serious threat to the US homeland, House Democrats plan to release a report Thursday accusing the Bush administration of failing to support local police as the frontline against terrorism. The report says the administration hasn't done enough to reach out to the country's 800,000 state and local police officers to determine their needs in fighting terrorism." DHS "officials said the department is working on ways to improve the information flow to police, and next month expects to roll out initiatives to cooperate more closely with state and local law enforcement." The report, prepared for Rep. Bennie G. Thompson, "follows growing complaints from police departments around the country that federal agencies, especially the Department of Homeland Security, deny local law enforcement access to timely, relevant information about threats and terrorist activity."

DHS Official Who Made Anti-Terror Funding Cuts Is Out. The Long Island Newsday (9/28, Eisenberg) reports, "The political appointee who oversaw 40-percent cuts in anti-terror funding to New York City and Washington, D.C., is being edged out of her job at the Homeland Security Department, according to House and Senate sources." Newsday continues, "Tracy Henke, executive director for grants and training, was responsible for divvying up anti-terror money to cities, ostensibly based on risk. She ignited a firestorm in June after the department slashed funding to New York and Washington while bolstering money for cities such as St. Louis and Kansas City in her home state of Missouri. … 'She didn't do a good job and my understanding is she's not going to be there much longer,' Rep. Peter King, chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, said yesterday. … 'I view her as being primarily responsible for the terrible cuts that were made to New York in June,' the Seaford Republican said. 'She did a poor job in coming up with the numbers. She did a poor job of explaining it to the committee and, quite frankly, a lot of people didn't like her attitude.'" Newsday adds, "That vote of no confidence appears to extend to the White House. This week, White House Homeland Security Adviser Frances Townsend told a group of reporters that she had been 'quite surprised and dismayed' by the grant decisions. … Henke, a backdoor appointment by the White House Jan. 4, had not been confirmed by the Senate before the funding controversy because of concerns about her qualifications, as well as allegations she played politics in her prior job at the Justice Department."

Suspicious Package Forces Evacuation Of DC Federal Courthouse. The Washington Post (9/28, Leonnig, Branigin) reports, "A federal courthouse in downtown Washington was evacuated for about three hours today because of what authorities described as a suspicious package, which was later determined to be harmless." The Post continues, "The evacuation disrupted a hearing in a high-profile case stemming from the leak of a CIA operative's name. The hearing, originally set for 10 a.m., was rescheduled for 1:30 p.m., about an hour after authorities reopened the E. Barrett Prettyman Federal Courthouse." The Post adds, "According to acting chief judge Henry Kennedy, the suspicious item, which was found by a security guard in a construction zone near the courthouse, may have contained the soiled clothing of a homeless person. A bomb-sniffing dog alerted to the item, possibly because of nitrates on the clothing, Kennedy said. Nitrates used as oxidizing agents can be mixed with other compounds to form flammable or explosive material. … In addition to examining the suspicious package, authorities swept the courthouse building for explosives but did not find any, officials said."

DOJ_NMG_0070218

The AP (9/28, Apuzzo) reports, "Evacuation of the courthouse occurred shortly before a hearing was to begin in the CIA leak case. The hearing was reset for 1:30 p.m. … Special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald and about eight of his associates were forced to leave the building and join more than 100 others on the sidewalks nearby." The AP adds, "The defendant in the case, former White House aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby, and his legal team arrived a short time later and joined the throng outside the courthouse."

Emergency Room Strain Raises Disaster Preparedness Concerns. The Washington Post (9/28, A11, Lee, 748K) reports, "Emergency rooms at many hospitals are routinely stretched to the breaking point, raising concerns that they would not be able to handle victims during a terrorist attack or natural disaster, according to congressional testimony yesterday and a new federal study. Between 40 percent and 50 percent of emergency departments experienced crowding during 2003 and 2004, the study by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention found." The findings, which "echo three reports published in June by the Institute of Medicine, a branch of the National Academies," have sparked "interest in Congress, and the Senate Health subcommittee on bioterrorism and public health preparedness convened a panel of experts yesterday to discuss the problems. 'If our emergency rooms are stretched thin now, how will they provide medical care in the event of a disaster?' Sen. Richard Burr…said in a statement."

Collins, King Say Chemical Plant Security Agreement Will Protect Americans. Sen. Susan M. Collins and Rep. Peter T. King, in a letter to the New York Times (9/28, 1.21M) write that the paper's Sept. 25 editorial criticizing an agreement on chemical plant security as weak did "not include some basic facts. The chemical security legislation we negotiated will give the secretary of homeland security new authority to set mandatory standards for high-risk chemical plants and, equally important, to enforce those standards. The bill gives the secretary the strongest possible authority: the power to shut down dangerous plants." Collins and King write that the editorial's assertion "that Congress has done nothing to protect Americans from a terrorist attack on chemical plants is off the mark. We prevailed in including provisions fought by the chemical industry's trade associations. … We also included a three-year sunset to prompt Congress to pass even more extensive legislation."

Holt Harshly Criticizes FBI Over Anthrax Probe. The AP (9/28, de la Cruz) reports New Jersey Democratic Congressman Rush Holt "said Wednesday it should have taken the FBI days, not years, to determine the anthrax used in 2001 that killed a Connecticut woman and four other people was much less sophisticated than believed." Holt "asked FBI Director Robert Mueller for a classified briefing about the status of the bureau's investigation into who was behind the attacks. … In his letter to Mueller, Holt said the FBI's failure to determine what kind of anthrax was used meant that 'resources were diverted and countless agents wasted their time investigating a small pool of suspects, instead of the broader search we now know was needed.'"

Johanns Says Americans Should Not Discount Agroterrorism Threat. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/28, Fisher) reports, "There hasn't been a specific terrorist threat against the U.S. food supply, but Americans should not take the safety of their food for granted, U.S. Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns said Wednesday. … Johanns, who delivered the keynote address to about 1,000 delegates from 21 countries attending the second International Symposium on Agroterrorism, said the recent outbreak of E. coli in spinach shows how quickly food-borne illnesses spread and how tough they can be to trace." The AP notes, "Johanns pointed to steps the government has taken to ensure a safe food supply, including the U.S. Department of Agriculture's animal identification system," and he "said partnering with businesses and coming up with new ways to protect the food supply would be an ongoing concern of the administration."

WAR NEWS:

White House Refuses To Release Entire NIE. The AP (9/28, Shrader) reports, "The White House refused Wednesday to release the rest of a secret intelligence assessment that depicts a growing terrorist threat, as the Bush administration tried to quell election-season criticism that its anti-terror policies are seriously off track." Press secretary Tony Snow "said releasing the full report, portions of which President Bush declassified on Tuesday, would jeopardize the lives of agents who gathered the information." It would also "risk the nation's ability to work with foreign governments and to keep secret its US intelligence-gathering methods, Snow said, and 'compromise the independence of people doing intelligence analysis.'"

DOJ_NMG_0070219

Much of the coverage describes the debate over the NIE as having put the White House on the defensive. In political terms, reports suggest the issue could give Democrats an opening in the final weeks of the congressional campaigns. The New York Times (9/28, Nagourney, 1.21M), for example, says "the dispute…has threatened a pre-election script in which the White House had sought to put Democrats on the defensive on national security. As the White House saw it, this was to have been the week in which Republicans seized the advantage by pushing two antiterrorism bills through Congress over the objections of recalcitrant Democrats." Instead, "on Wednesday for the second day in a row, Democrats seized on the intelligence report as confirmation of their case that the Iraq war has in fact compounded the global terrorism threat." However, "Republicans said even if they were momentarily put off course, they were confident that in the end this fight would not help the Democrats. Democrats, they said, lose every time they try to fight Republicans on the issue of security."

Fox News' Special Report (9/27, Baier) reported that "top Democrats on Capitol Hill, eager to use the report as evidence the Iraq war has made the US less safe, called for the full NIE to be released." CNN's The Situation Room (9/27, Koppel) said "for the third day in a row, Democrats went on the attack. The chairmen of both the Senate and the House Congressional Campaign Committees even called a press conference today to again really put Republicans on the spot and put a question to them." Democrats are "expressing optimism that the NIE's findings could even win them some more votes in November, as they seek to tie Republicans who continue to support U.S. policy in Iraq with President Bush."

All three networks reported on the NIE last night, portraying the controversy as a negative for the White House and Republicans in general. NBC Nightly News (9/27, story 3, 2:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported the parts of the report "that were made public yesterday are creating a major campaign issue." NBC (Gregory) added, "From Afghanistan to Iraq no one questions whether this President has been tough on terror, but what is the result? Mr. Bush says one thing." President Bush: "Five years after September 11th, 2001, America is safer and America is winning the war on terror." Gregory: "This grim intelligence report says another: That 'jihadists…are increasing in both number and geographic dispersion.' Are we really winning? Three years ago that was the question Defense Secretary Rumsfeld asked in this memo to top advisors, 'Are we capturing, killing and deterring more terrorists every day than the Madrassas and the radical clerics are deploying against us?' The report says no. Democrats charge the US is creating more terrorism because of Iraq." Sen. Joseph Biden: "It is not a surprise at all that we have been significantly limited in our ability to deal with worldwide terror because we are tied down and bogged down in Iraq."

ABC World News (9/27, story 2, 1:30, Raddatz) reported, "The White House was under fire today to explain how the President can say we are winning the war on terror when its own intelligence agencies say the global jihadist movement is spreading. Tony Snow had many answers." Snow was shown saying, "Since September 11, 2001, we have not been attacked. Al Qaeda has been significantly degraded. The operational structure has been weakened." Raddatz: "There are more of them. They're more the dispersed. They're harder to find. And yet, the President is saying we're winning the war on terrorism." Tony Snow: "That's right. We're also fighting the war on terrorism." Raddatz: "But Democrats clearly see political opportunity. Little more than 24 hours after the release of the report, the political ads are ready. Connecticut Democrat, Chris Murphy, zeroing in on Republican incumbent Nancy Johnson." Murphy Ad: "A new intelligence report says Johnson's support of President Bush's war in Iraq has increased terrorism." Raddatz: "And in the where are your friends when you need them category, one of America's principal allies in the war, Pakistan's Pervez Musharraf, told comedian John Stewart, the war in Iraq has had a negative impact." President Pervez Musharraf: "It has led to more extremism and terrorism around the world."

CBS Evening News (9/27, 2:40, Martin, 7.66M) led its broadcast with the story, reporting, "Although the White House today called the National Intelligence Estimate on terrorism a snapshot, it is really a forecast. In the words of the document, it analyzes the nature of the threat terrorist groups will pose during the next five years." Paul Pillar, former CIA Counter Intelligence officer: "It lays out the direction we're heading and the direction we can expect to see continue to evolve over the next five years if we don't change course." To the question "do the folks at the Pentagon believe there's anything that might change that bleak forecast," CBS replied, "The estimate singles out two things, one getting bin Laden and Zarqawi, which could cause al Qaeda to break apart and, two, winning in Iraq which could convince some terrorists to give up the fight."

In its analysis of the NIE, the Christian Science Monitor (9/28, Grier, 58K) reports, "Military pressure has had an effect on Al Qaeda, changing it from a centralized organization to more of a diffuse movement, according to the NIE." But "the invasion of Iraq has allowed jihadists a 'cause célèbre,' the document notes." The report also "notes that the jihadists would be further helped by an appearance of success in Iraq -- such as a US pullout. Their cause would be damaged, says the NIE, if 'jihadists leaving Iraq perceive themselves, and be perceived, to have failed.'"

DOJ_NMG_0070220

The Wall Street Journal (9/28, Solomon, Lueck, 2.03M) reports Snow said yesterday the report "confirms the importance of the war in Iraq as a bulwark against terrorists. 'Iraq has become, for them, the battleground,' he said. 'If they lose, they lose their bragging rights. They lose their ability to recruit.'"

The New York Times (9/28, Mazzetti, 1.21M) reports, "In mid-August, John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, gave the go-ahead for a National Intelligence Estimate that will address security in Iraq and the potential for civil war there. White House and intelligence officials say the work is still in its early stages and will not be done until next year." But "Democrats contend that the White House is "slow rolling" the document -- that is, deliberately withholding what could be bleak conclusions -- until after the November elections." The Democrats "have intensified those complaints since the White House, under political pressure, on Tuesday released parts of a separate intelligence report, a sober assessment of global terrorism." Yesterday, Rep. Jane Harman, the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, "even said sources had told her that a draft of the document had been finished."

The Los Angeles Times (9/28, Miller, Wallsten, 918K) reports Frances Townsend, White House domestic security advisor, "said…that the intelligence estimate focusing on Iraq was expected to be finished in January. A senior US intelligence official cautioned, however, that Negroponte's office had not set a timetable for the completion of the work, suggesting it could be delayed beyond the beginning of next year."

Cheney Says Declassifying Intelligence Reports Hurts Efforts In War On Terror. Fox News' Special Report (9/27, Baier) reported, "In an exclusive interview with Fox, Vice President Dick Cheney said declassifying intelligence reports to counter leaks hurts US efforts in the war on terror." Cheney: "It has a corrosive effect inside the bureaucracy. The inability to receive classified information and have it stay classified is devastating."

Intelligence Experts Say NIE Leak Has Damaged War On Terror. CNN's The Situation Room (9/27, Todd) reported, "The White House holds firm, it will not release the bulk of a classified National Intelligence Estimate on terrorism. That would risk the lives of agents, officials say, compromise sources and methods. … But the damage has already been done, say intelligence experts." CNN added, "There's also the spin factor. As one former CIA officer put it, Al-Jazeera will get this material and the jihadists will use it for propaganda. And there's cumulative damage. This is the fifth leak of a major intelligence operation in recent months, after the warrantless wiretapping program, the monitoring of terrorist financing, the collection of phone records, and the CIA secret prisons leak. The result of all those leaks put together, former CIA officers say terrorist networks now know more about how they're monitored than they've ever known before."

Boehner Says NIE Shows Victory In Iraq Will Undercut Terrorists' Ability To Recruit. House Majority Leader John Boehner said on MSNBC's Hardball (9/27) that "if you look at what was leaked out of the National Intelligence Estimate over the weekend by the New York Times, and you read the rest of what was declassified yesterday, you also see in there that they make it clear that winning in Iraq will undercut their ability to recruit new terrorists. Republicans are serious about giving the President the tools to take on the terrorists and to defeat them, while our colleagues across the aisle say all the right words, but when it comes to standing up and voting to give the president the tools, they are never there."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (9/28, A16, 2.03M) editorializes, "National Intelligence Estimates are bland documents that represent the lowest-common-denominator judgment of more than a dozen intelligence agencies. We doubt they're very useful for policy makers, and they certainly aren't suitable for use as political cudgels in a national election." Bush "could do himself, and the country, a favor if he reacted to this latest attempt to politicize NIEs by asking our spy agencies to stop producing them. Their focus should be more and better intelligence. They should leave the policy judgments to elected officials -- and the voters."

The Washington Post (9/28, A22, 748K) editorializes, "Bush was right to declassify and release the intelligence community's most recent estimate of global terrorism." The document's "grim conclusions are hard to square with Mr. Bush's contention that the country is 'safer' today than it was five years ago or that the invasion of Iraq helped rather than hindered the fight against terrorism. In fact, the president seems unwilling to accept the conclusions of the intelligence professionals."

The Los Angeles Times (9/28, 918K) editorializes, "The argument that the US presence in Iraq has exacerbated the international terrorist threat is an important one fully deserving of discussion. So is the NIE's conclusion, more congenial to the Bush administration, that defeating insurgents in Iraq would demoralize other potential jihadists. That debate was going on before the NIE was publicized." And "it should continue after the thrill of declassification is gone."

Fouad Ajami, a professor at the School of Advanced International Studies at Johns Hopkins, writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/28, A16, 2.03M), "Strictly speaking, the National Intelligence Estimate…is not a finding: It is an assessment of Islamic terrorism and its perceived links to Iraq. (It is odd, and ironic, that the intelligence agencies that had been mocked by liberal opinion for their reporting on Iraq before the war have now acquired an aura of infallibility.)"

DOJ_NMG_0070221

David Brooks writes in the New York Times (9/28, 1.21M), "The National Intelligence Estimate predicts terror violence will get worse in the years ahead. The scarier estimate was made by a veteran of the 1948 Arab-Israeli war, in conversation with his grandson who now lives in Boston: 'This is forever.'"

Bush Dinner Provides Forum For Karzai, Musharraf To Air Differences. The Washington Post (9/28, A16, Abramowitz, 748K) reports President Bush "welcomed the feuding leaders of Afghanistan and Pakistan to the White House last night for an unusual round of personal diplomacy aimed at forging better relations between two key partners in U.S. efforts to hunt down members of al-Qaeda and other Islamic terrorists." Presidents Hamid Karzai and Pervez Musharraf agreed to join "Bush and his most senior advisers" because the "two have been sniping at each other for months over what Karzai considers Pakistan's tolerance of Taliban militants crossing the border to mount armed attacks in Afghanistan. Musharraf has testily rebutted Karzai's assertions," and Administration "officials are worried that the deteriorating relations between the two men threaten their effort to pacify Afghanistan and hunt down Osama bin Laden." The Post notes, "A White House statement said the three leaders 'committed to supporting moderation and defeating extremism through greater intelligence sharing, coordinated action against terrorists, and common efforts to enhance the prosperity of the people of Afghanistan and Pakistan.'" The Post says the Administration "is confronting a resurgent Taliban," and "tense relations between Pakistan and Afghanistan date back years." The AP (9/28) says that "judging by the body language,… there were plenty of tensions to overcome."

The New York Times (9/28, Stolberg, 1.21M) reports Musharraf and Karzai "stood glumly -- more like caged cats -- in the Rose Garden." The Washington Times (9/28, Curl, 88K) says "the three men then walked grim-faced down the colonnade, heading to what was expected to be a tense dinner of 'sunchoke' soup, spicy sea bass and endive salad in the Old Family Dining Room of the White House."

The Los Angeles Times (9/28, Richter, 918K) reports the story under the headline "Hold the Vinegar, Bush Urges," noting "aides said Bush hoped" that the leaders "would promise to improve cooperation and intelligence-sharing on their shared border, the site of escalating attacks by Taliban and Al Qaeda fighters." After dinner, Tony Snow "released a statement saying the three leaders had 'committed to supporting moderation and defeating extremism through greater intelligence sharing, coordinated action against terrorists, and common efforts to enhance the prosperity of the people of Afghanistan and Pakistan.'"

All three networks reported on the dinner, which took place after their evening broadcasts. NBC Nightly News (9/27, lead story, 2:55, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "To call this a dinner party would be a big mistake." NBC (Miklaszewski) added, "US officials for years suspected members of Pakistan's intelligence service were aiding the Taliban. And in an interview today for NBC's 'Meet the Press,' Musharraf admits former intelligence officials may be working with the Taliban." President Pervez Musharraf: "We are keeping a very tight watch and we will get all of them if that happens." Miklaszewski: "40,000 US and NATO troops are battling the Taliban in Afghanistan and NATO commanders confirm Taliban leaders conduct the operations from Pakistan." Robert Templer, foreign policy analyst: "As long as they have a refuge in Pakistan this battle will be extremely difficult. If you can escape to a place where you can rearm, train and recruit, it is extremely difficult for NATO and the US forces to get rid of them." Miklaszewski: "Before 9/11 Pakistan relied on the Taliban to keep Afghanistan under control. Some foreign policy experts now fear that old connection may be hard to break, Brian."

ABC World News (9/27, story 3, 0:25, Gibson) reported, "Should be an interesting meal." CBS Evening News (9/27, story 2, 0:55, Axelrod, 7.66M) said "these two men [are] obviously very important in the hunt for Osama bin Laden because bin Laden is thought to be hiding in the borderlands of these two countries."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/27, Roberts) also reported that the stakes are "huge" for Bush, adding that "these are two of the three most important nations when you're talking about that war on terror, perhaps Iraq first, Afghanistan second, and Pakistan third."

Attacks On US Troops Along Pakistani Border Have Tripled Since Truce. The Washington Times/AP (9/28, Krane) reports, "American troops on Afghanistan's eastern frontier have seen a tripling of attacks since a truce between the Pakistani army and pro-Taliban tribesmen that was supposed to stop cross-border raids by militants, a US military officer said yesterday." Pakistan's Foreign Ministry "rejected the US assertion and said home-based insurgents were behind the violence in Afghanistan, where at least 25 militants were reported killed in fighting yesterday." The AP adds, "Raising further questions about the cease-fire, a Pakistani political leader maintained that Taliban leader Mullah Mohammed Omar approved the deal. A government official denied that."

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (9/28, A1, Constable, 748K) reports, "Three weeks after…Musharraf announced a peace pact with Taliban radicals in a tribal area bordering Afghanistan, recent visitors say there is now pin-drop silence in a territory that once shook with artillery and bomb blasts. Religious patrols are enforcing law and order, they say, in place of Pakistan army troops who have withdrawn to their barracks." But "as the toll from violence rises across the border in Afghanistan, with suicide bombings killing 22 people in three cities this week, there are reports that militant Pakistani tribal leaders, while complying with their pledge to reduce the presence of foreign Islamic fighters, intend to defy the peace pact by sending local fighters and suicide bombers into Afghanistan." Musharraf "continues to deny Afghan charges that the Pakistani government is sheltering and encouraging the revived Taliban insurgency from the tribal zones." But "people interviewed in northwest Pakistan said there is widespread support in the tribal region for the Taliban movement's harsh Islamic morality and its war against US forces and their allies in Afghanistan."

DOJ_NMG_0070222

Karzai Says Musharraf Isn't Doing Enough. Afghan President Hamid Karzai was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (9/27) about Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf's claim that Karzai is turning a blind eye to what is happening in his country. Karzai said, "He is right to say that I know the facts. I indeed know the facts, but I also know a lot of facts in Pakistan. And that's why I am pleading with President Musharraf that, for the sake of security for all of us and for our allies, it is extremely important to place serious attention and take action against some of the places called madrassas that are not madrassas, but are training extremists full of hatred for the rest of the world." Karzai added that Musharraf is "not doing enough." USA Today/AP (9/28) reports, "Musharraf says Karzai has bad information and noted that Pakistan has deployed 80,000 troops along the border." Musharraf also "said Karzai is behaving 'like an ostrich,' refusing to acknowledge the truth and just being political."

UK Defense Minister Says NATO Needs Faster Response To Taliban. The Financial Times (9/28, Fidler) reports, "Nato takes too long to build forces for its missions and needs to be able to respond more rapidly to requests for troops, Des Browne, the UK's defence minister, said on Wednesday." Speaking "the day before a meeting of defence ministers of the 26-member alliance in Slovenia that is set to discuss a military request for more Nato troops in Afghanistan," Browne "said Nato faced a short-term test in getting 'boots on the ground or the equipment in to support them' in Afghanistan."

Senior US Commanders Question Maliki's Will To Prevent Civil War. The Washington Post (9/28, A19, Raghavan, 748K) reports "senior U.S. military commanders" are questioning whether Iraqi PM Nouri al-Maliki "has the political will to weed out official corruption and tackle the brutal militias that are threatening to plunge Iraq into civil war." One official, :who spoke on condition of anonymity at a briefing with reporters" said, "It's going to take time for a government to cleanse itself over time." The Post says the "questions about Maliki are being posed only privately, with U.S. officials in their public statements still voicing cautious confidence in Maliki's ability to recognize and tackle the problems."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (9/28, Oppel, 1.21M) says the officials said the Maliki government must also "purge ministries of corrupt officials who are diverting large sums of money to their own political parties." An unnamed official said Iraqi parties "who were plundering ministries were squandering chances to make progress that could reduce sectarian violence." The Los Angeles Times (9/28, Moore, 918K) says the official said the Maliki government is "thwarting efforts to go after Shiite death squads" in comments that "highlight rising American dissatisfaction" with Maliki and an "increasing willingness to exert pressure on the fledging Iraqi government."

Chiarelli Says US Thinks Maliki Running Out Of Time. McClatchy (9/28, Youssef) reports Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli said the US now believes the Maliki government is "running out of time to prevent Iraq from dissolving into outright civil war." Chiarelli said, "We have to fix this militia issue. We can't have armed militias competing with Iraq's security forces. But I have to trust the prime minister to decide when it is that we do that."

Poll Finds 61% Of Iraqis Support Attacks In US Troops. The AP (9/27, Schweid) reports a poll by the University of Maryland's Program on International Policy Attitudes finds that "about six in 10 Iraqis say they approve of attacks on U.S.-led forces, and slightly more than that want their government to ask U.S. troops to leave within a year." About 61% "approved of the attacks -- up from 47 percent in January. A solid majority of Shiite and Sunni Arabs approved of the attacks, according to the poll. The increase came mostly among Shiite Iraqis." In addition, "three-fourths say they think the U.S. plans to keep military bases in Iraq permanently." The poll, "which included an oversample of 150 Sunni Iraqis, has a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points."

With such dire numbers, the Washington Post (9/28, A19, Pincus, 748K) reports the US military "is looking for ways to achieve stability through opinion polls and public relations." The Multi-National Command is planning to "hire a private firm to conduct polling and focus groups in Iraq 'to assess the effectiveness of operations as they relate to gaining and maintaining popular support,' according to a notice the Department of the Army posted yesterday."

Two Networks Air Excerpts Of Video Showing Attack On Convoy In Iraq. ABC World News (9/27, 3:40, Gibson) opened its broadcast with "an extraordinary view of Iraq that we don't often see: the perspective of the civilian contractors who are a central part of the US mission." Noting that "643 contractors have been killed since the war began," ABC reported on a video of a truck ambush made by Preston Wheeler, a former Halliburton driver. ABC (Ross) added, "It was September, one year ago, as the convoy headed out of Camp Anaconda, near Balad, Iraq. Twelve big trucks and 5 military vehicles make a wrong turn. Residents pelt the convoy with rocks. … A roadside bomb is coming up. … The attack only intensifies. The lead truck, truck number one, is hit and rolls over." Wheeler: "Truck down." Ross: "Wheeler is truck number five. …. The military vehicle in front keeps moving and does not come back." Wheeler: "Truck five cannot move. Please help me. I'm taking fire. 10-4, come back? I'm fixing to get killed. I cannot move." Ross: "You were abandoned?" Wheeler: "Yes, sir. I do not know who the driver was of that humvee. But he abandoned us." Ross concluded by saying Wheeler "says the military vehicles that left the convoy were units of the Virginia National Guard. Officials there said the incident had been investigated by the Army, which told us it was unaware about the incident and could not comment. Nor would Halliburton, which says all its employees know the risks before they go to Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0070223

Though ABC claimed its report was an exclusive, NBC Nightly News (9/27, story 2, 1:45, Williams, 9.87M) also reported on the "private contractor working in Iraq whose convoy made a wrong turn and rolled right into an ambush." The report is largely similar to the ABC report, with some of the same excerpts aired. NBC (Myers) said, "Wheeler claims the convoy was not properly equipped or trained by Halliburton. Tonight Halliburton acknowledges the attack occurred but says the convoy was under the control of the US military. The company also says employees receive extensive training and their safety and security is a priority."

US Military Spokesman Says Baghdad Violence Increasing With Onset Of Ramadan. USA Today/AP (9/28) reports, "The top US military spokesman in Iraq said Wednesday that violence in Baghdad had risen, as predicted, with the onset of Ramadan. In Iraq, the Muslim holy month officially started on Monday. Suicide attacks were at their highest level ever, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said. He didn't provide any figures."

Sadr Said To Have Lost Control Over Parts Of His Militia. The New York Times (9/28, Tavernise, 1.21M) reports, "The radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr has lost control of portions of his Mahdi Army militia that are splintering off into freelance death squads and criminal gangs, a senior coalition intelligence official said Wednesday." The Times adds, "The question of how tightly Mr. Sadr holds the militia, one of the largest armed groups in Iraq, is of critical importance to American and Iraqi officials. Seeking to ease the sectarian violence raging across the country, they have pressed him to join the political process and curb his fighters, who see themselves as defenders of Shiism -- and often as agents of vengeance against Sunnis." But "as Mr. Sadr has taken a more active role in the government, as many as a third of his militiamen have grown frustrated with the constraints of compromise and have broken off, often selling their services to the highest bidders, said the official, who spoke to reporters in Baghdad on condition of anonymity because he was not permitted to speak publicly on intelligence issues."

Construction Of $75 Million Baghdad Police College "Grossly Mismanaged." The Washington Post (9/28, A1, Paley, 748K) reports, "A $75 million project to build the largest police academy in Iraq has been so grossly mismanaged that the campus now poses health risks to recruits and might need to be partially demolished, US investigators have found." The Baghdad Police College, "hailed as crucial to US efforts to prepare Iraqis to take control of the country's security, was so poorly constructed that feces and urine rained from the ceilings in student barracks. Floors heaved inches off the ground and cracked apart. Water dripped so profusely in one room that it was dubbed 'the rain forest.'" Stuart W. Bowen Jr., the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, said, "This is the most essential civil security project in the country -- and it's a failure." Bowen's office "plans to release a 21-page report Thursday detailing the most alarming problems with the facility."

Boehner Defers To Generals' Judgment On Troop Levels In Iraq. House Majority Leader John Boehner was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (9/27) if the US has enough troops on the ground in Iraq. Boehner said, "The generals on the ground say we have enough troops. We ought to take their word for it." Boehner added, "Let's let the generals on the ground make that decision."

Favoring Afghanistan War Over Iraq Conflict Said To Be "Senseless." In a Los Angeles Times (9/28, 918K) op-ed, National Review editor Rich Lowry and attorney David B. Rivkin Jr. write, "To critics of the Bush administration, the war in Afghanistan is the 'good' counterinsurgency. Their calls for troop reductions or a timetable to end the 'bad war' in Iraq are matched by demands for more resources and perseverance in Afghanistan. However, this preference is senseless, driven either by sentimentality or partisanship. There is no sound strategic reason to favor the Afghan war over the war in Iraq. In fact, the fates of Baghdad and Kabul are intertwined. … If you put aside how the wars began -- and we realize that many opponents of the Iraq war will never be able to do that -

DOJ_NMG_0070224

- there is little to differentiate them." In both cases, "we face a vicious insurgency that will take years to defeat," one that is "made more difficult by the overlay of sectarian violence." In both, "the insurgents are aided by infiltration from neighboring countries" and we are "trying to rebuild the army and the police -- with fitful progress -- and fostering a fragile central government whose writ doesn't seem to extend very far across the country. … There is no good reason to favor the Afghan war over the Iraq war. The Afghan war was launched in a brief period of national unity, while the Iraq war helped stoke our current period of political enmity. But one war will not be won without the other."

Schieffer Says Pentagon Risks Losing Volunteers' Trust. The CBS Evening News (9/27, story 10, 2:15, 7.66M) "Free Speech" segment dealt with "the US military and broken promises," in anchor Katie Couric's words. The commentator, Bob Schieffer, then said, "What can those who serve their country do when government breaks its promises to them? Not much, apparently. But that's what happened this week when 4,000 of our soldiers were told they would have to stay in Iraq longer than the government had promised. It's happened over and over. … Our Army is just too small to carry out the mission it has been assigned. We need to fix that or change the mission and find a way out of this war. With an all-volunteer force, we have no choice. If Americans come to believe the Pentagon cannot be trusted to keep its promises to those who join, no one will volunteer. Then where will we be?"

DOJ:

New Colorado US Attorney Profiled. The Denver Post (9/28, Finley) runs a profile of Troy Eid, the new US Attorney in Denver. The Post reports, "Tommorrow Eid marks the formal start of his service after an ambitious first six weeks on the job as the government's top law enforcement officer for Colorado. The only son of an Egyptian immigrant, Eid, 42, appears to be the the only Arab-American among the 94 U.S. attorneys. … And with enforcement of immigration law his top priority, Eid said he'll draw on this background and a longstanding 'interest in the underdog' to ensure fairness." The Post continues, "The criminals he vows to prosecute most aggressively - deportees who illegally re-enter the United States - often prey on immigrant communities, he said. … And criminals from abroad often drive illegal drug trafficking, his second major priority. Colorado has emerged as one of the busiest drug distribution centers in the country with transnational gangs taking root. … Taken together, immigration and drug-related crime now dominate federal criminal prosecution in Colorado." The Post notes, "Other priorities for Eid: sexual exploitation of children using the Internet, and terrorism cases - the overall top priority of the Justice Department under Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. … 'We get terrorism cases. We take them very seriously. They typically come to us through the JTTF (the FBI-run Joint Terrorism Task Force). ... We have some investigations that have resulted in charges and convictions.' … A symbolic investiture ceremony scheduled for this afternoon marks the formal beginning for Eid, who on Aug. 11 replaced acting U.S. Attorney William Leone. He had served since December 2004, when John Suthers resigned to become Colorado attorney general, after Ken Salazar left that position for the U.S. Senate."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Dunn Expected To Mount Vigorous Defense Of Her Role In H-P Leak Hunt. Ousted Hewlett Packard Chairman Patricia Dunn is expected to mount a vigorous defense of her role in the company's investigation into boardroom leaks. The Financial Times (9/28, Allison) reports that Dunn "is expected to testify on Capitol Hill that she never considered herself the 'supervisor' of the early stages of the company's controversial mole hunt, and that she never 'hired' investigators who were later found to have used legally questionable tactics. In an appearance before members of the House Committee on Energy and Commerce, Ms Dunn is expected to say it was her assumption that Bob Wayman, HP's chief financial officer and former acting chief executive, had authorised the company's leak investigation."

The Wall Street Journal (9/28, A3, Waldman, Clark, Stecklow) reports that Dunn "said she relied on advice from H-P executives, including the company's chief financial officer, before pushing a leak investigation that delved into personal phone records and used tawdry tactics. Ms. Dunn, in testimony prepared for a House committee hearing today on the H-P investigation scandal, said she was informed that using Ronald DeLia, a Boston-area private investigator involved in the affair, constituted 'normal processes' in pursuing investigations at the Palo Alto, Calif., computer company, having been told he had worked for H-P for 'eight or nine years.'"

The New York Times (9/28, Helft, Darlin) reports that in her prepared testimony, Dunn "said she never had reason to believe that illegal methods were used. And she said she repeatedly sought assurances on that point from those directly involved."

The AP (9/28, Gordon) also reports this story.

Hurd To Testify Before House Panel Today. USA Today (9/28, Kessler) reports that as H-P CEO Mark Hurd takes the stand before the House Energy and Commerce committee today, "he will be fighting for his reputation — and possibly his job." Hurd, who "has acknowledged approving at least part of a plan to snoop on journalists, board members, even his own employees," has been asked, along with other key players in the H-P scandal "to defend their actions before the House Energy and Commerce Committee. … But none will face as much scrutiny as Hurd, who as CEO, is ultimately responsible for what happened at HP."

DOJ_NMG_0070225

In a separate story, USA Today (9/28, Kessler, Swartz) reports that Hurd "is expected to apologize before Congress for HP's snooping scandal today. … According to prepared remarks released by the House Energy and Commerce Committee, Hurd will tell Congress that a hunt to find out which board member was leaking information to the press 'became a rogue investigation that violated our own principles.'"

House Panel Issues More Subpoenas In H-P Probe. The House Energy and Commerce Committee has issued five more subpoenas to detectives involved in the leak investigation at H-P. The Hill (9/28, Schor) reports that the new subpoenas set the stage "for two days of hearings that could reveal new details of the tech company's now-infamous spying practices." The Hill adds, "The witness list for today's hearing includes most central players in the widening HP scandal. HP chief executive officer Mark Hurd offered to appear last week to discuss the company's use of pretexting, and Patricia Dunn, who resigned as board chairman last Friday over her role in the affair, also will testify under oath."

H-P Leak Probe Continued Despite Warnings From Security Personnel. The Washington Post (9/28, D1, Nakashima) reports that H-P's leak probe went forward "despite warnings from HP security personnel that the tactics used were 'probably illegal' and should be stopped, according to documents collected for today's congressional hearing on the scandal. In February, HP global security investigator Vince Nye told a Boston colleague working with him on the leak probe that he had 'serious reservations' about how they were obtaining phone-record information in an internal probe to ferret out the source of media leaks." The Post adds, "How and why top management failed to heed the warning are among the questions members of the House Energy and Commerce oversight and investigations subcommittee want answered at today's hearing."

WSJournal Says H-P Scandal Is A Case Of Bad Business Judgment. The Wall Street Journal (9/28) editorializes, "One refreshing aspect of the Hewlett-Packard 'leak' scandal is that it hasn't become an excuse to diagnose some larger sickness in all of corporate America. Today, however, the story heads to Congress, which specializes in false diagnoses, not to mention bad prescriptions. So perhaps it's time to sort out the lessons of this case, prosaic as they are." The Journal adds that "None of this is to say that board leaks aren't a problem. … As for Congress, we understand the impulse to grab some camera time by beating up on H-P witnesses. But even otherwise shrewd Members of Congress have been known to do stupid things from time to time. The last thing the country needs is a new Bureau for the Prevention of Bad Business Judgment, which is at bottom what the H-P saga is all about."

Former Comverse Executive Arrested In Namibia. The Wall Street Journal (9/28, Forelle, Scannell, Davies) reports that Kobi Alexander, former chief executive of Comverse Technology Inc., who was "embroiled in a stock-options scandal and the focus of an international manhunt," was arrested yesterday in Namibia. Namibia's justice minister "filed a special notice with parliament to allow the country to extradite Mr. Alexander to the US, and a magistrate issued an arrest warrant soon after. … Shortly thereafter, the U.S. attorney in Brooklyn, N.Y., unsealed a 32-count indictment against Mr. Alexander for his alleged role in a scheme to backdate stock options at the company he had co-founded."

The New York Times (9/28, Creswell) reports that Alexander "is expected to be brought before a court in Namibia, possibly as soon as today, and the United States intends to seek his extradition to face charges stemming from a scheme to backdate stock option grants at Comverse, according to the United States attorney's office in Brooklyn. Once back in the United States, Mr. Alexander, 54, will face conspiracy, securities fraud and money-laundering charges, according to a 32-count indictment against him that was unsealed yesterday. Prosecutors are also seeking forfeiture of $138 million in bank accounts or other assets held by Mr. Alexander."

The AP (9/28, Hays) reports that "in a statement, U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf credited local officials in the southwest African nation for assisting the FBI in the capture. … 'We are very grateful for the Namibians' swift action and commend them for their vigilance,' she said." The AP adds, "Mauskopf said she would seek Alexander's swift extradition to face charges in federal court in Brooklyn. A call to his defense attorney in New York was not immediately returned. … The manhunt was launched in late July shortly before authorities unsealed a criminal complaint accusing Alexander and two other former top executives of secretly manipulating stock options for personal profit."

Bloomberg (9/28, Frank, Van Voris) reports, "Alexander, the ex-Israeli intelligence officer turned high- technology entrepreneur, will be brought before a court in Windhoek within 48 hours, and the U.S. will seek his extradition, the Justice Department said." Bloomberg adds, "Federal prosecutors charged Alexander, 54, on Aug. 9 with backdating stock options to boost the compensation of executives at New York-based Comverse, the world's largest maker of voicemail software. He is the second CEO charged in the government's probe of illegal stock-option backdating, the largest investigation of corporate wrongdoing since a mutual fund trading scandal three years ago led to $4.3 billion in penalties. … 'Alexander's alleged role in options back-dating victimized Comverse shareholders and deceived prospective investors,' Brooklyn U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf said today in a statement. 'The fraud affected the company's bottom line by misstating earnings.' … Alexander, the wizard of Israel's technology boom, was arrested by Interpol and local police on a Namibian warrant issued at the request of the U.S., said Ray Castillo, a spokesman for the U.S. embassy in Namibia."

DOJ_NMG_0070226

Plaintiffs Seek $21.5 Million From Bearing Point Bond Default. The Washington Post (9/28, D1, Hart, O'Hara) reports, "Plaintiffs who won a bond default ruling against BearingPoint Inc. last week said that they aren't trying to ruin the company and that they don't think the $21.5 million in damages they have requested will hurt the McLean consulting firm's business. A group of bondholders sued BearingPoint for failing to file up-to-date financial reports -- a violation of the bond agreement that has become a common tool used by creditors and most typically hedge funds to extract concessions. A New York court last week agreed that the firm was in default on about $200 million in corporate debt." BearingPoint officials "have appealed the court ruling and asked other creditors to grant waivers to avoid similar suits. The company said it would delay filing its annual report, expected tomorrow, because of the uncertainty that the court ruling has produced for the company."

Regulators Urge Borderless Solution To Derivatives Growth Problems. The Financial Times (9/28, Tett, Gangahar) reports, "Three of the world's most powerful financial regulators have taken the unusual step of issuing a joint warning that individual nations cannot contain some of the risks posed by the explosive growth of derivatives and must collaborate across borders. The dramatic pace of integration and innovation in global markets makes it increasingly difficult to solve problems with 'a local or national solution,' top officials from the UK Financial Services Authority, the Federal Reserve Bank of New York and the US Securities and Exchange Commission write in the Financial Times. 'In a more integrated global market, we will increasingly find ourselves compelled to pursue borderless solutions,' write Timothy Geithner, president of the New York Fed; Sir Callum McCarthy, chairman of the FSA; and Annette Nazareth, a commissioner at the SEC."

DOJ, SEC Probing Halliburton Work In Nigeria And Elsewhere. The Houston Chronicle (9/28, Ivanovich) reports, "Federal investigators, who have been looking into a possible bribery scheme involving Houston's Halliburton Co. and a Nigerian natural gas plant, are scrutinizing 'multiple' projects both within and outside Nigeria, according to company filings." The Chronicle continues, "Recently uncovered information suggests employees at Halliburton's M.W. Kellogg Co. — some time before 1998 — may have planned to funnel payments to government officials to land projects in countries outside Nigeria, Halliburton subsidiary KBR said in a filing with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission. … The SEC has issued subpoenas seeking documents related to multiple projects from the last 20 years in and outside Nigeria, the filing said." The Chronicle adds, "Halliburton officials have been scrutinizing the activities of an unnamed agent who 'has worked with us outside of Nigeria on several current projects and on numerous older projects going back to the early 1980s,' the company said in the filing. … Halliburton officials are trying to determine whether this individual broke the law or violated the company's code of conduct. … The latest inquiries grew out of a long-running investigation into the construction of a $5.5 billion natural gas liquefaction complex at Bonny Island in Nigeria's Rivers State. … The SEC and Justice Department, as well as authorities in France, Nigeria, Switzerland and Britain have all been investigating. Halliburton officials said they do not expect those probes to be wrapped anytime soon."

Fastow Sentence Surprises Experts. The Houston Chronicle (9/28, Hays, Fowler) reports, "Andrew Fastow's six-year prison sentence caught many longtime observers of the case off guard this week, including a former member of the government team that negotiated his 2004 plea agreement." The Chronicle continues, "Fastow had agreed to a 10-year prison sentence in the plea deal with the understanding that he would not ask for a lesser sentence later. … Yet his lawyers asked for just such a break. The government didn't object and instead stressed the critical cooperation Fastow provided in helping the government build criminal cases against former Chairman Ken Lay and former CEO Jeff Skilling." The Chronicle adds, "With no dissenting opinion from prosecutors, U.S. District Judge Kenneth Hoyt cut four years from Fastow's term. … 'The way the government handled it is surprising, given the written terms of the agreement,' said Andrew Weissmann, former director of the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, who was on the team when Fastow's plea was negotiated. Weissmann stepped down from the task force last year and later went into private practice. … Michael Wynne, a former federal prosecutor in Houston, also was surprised. … 'I expected him to receive the full 10 years. The judge even said that there was no way Fastow would be able to repay all the harm that he caused,' Wynne said." The Chronicle notes, "Fastow, 44, has long been considered among the most egregious of Enron's felons, having orchestrated multiple schemes to help Enron manipulate earnings while enriching himself with kickbacks. Some of those unsustainable schemes began crumbling in 2001 and helped fuel the company's failure late that year. … Both Lay and Skilling argued in their fraud and conspiracy trial earlier this year that no fraud occurred at Enron other than Fastow's self-dealing. But Fastow linked both to fraud, either for participating in or approving fraudulent schemes or lying to investors about Enron's financial strength to maintain an illusion of success."

DOJ_NMG_0070227

CRIMINAL LAW:

Pirro Under Federal Probe Over Marital Spy Plot. Jeanine Pirro, the Republican candidate for New York Attorney General, is under federal investigation for allegedly plotting with former New York City Police Commissioner Bernard Kerik to spy on her husband. WNBC-TV, New York (9/28) reports that the "allegations center on whether Pirro illegally spied on her own husband, Albert Pirro, while she held the office of the Westchester District Attorney." Sources gold WNBC-TV "that court authorities wiretapped conversations that appear to show that while preparing for a statewide run for office, Jeanine Pirro was desperate to prove her husband was cheating on her." WNBC-TV adds, "According to documents now in the hands of several defense attorneys, Pirro and the former New York City Police Commissioner Bernard Kerik were apparently talking about planting a hidden device aboard her husband's boat. Her possible motive may have been to see if he was having an affair."

The New York Times (9/28, Healy) reports, "At a hastily arranged news conference yesterday, called because of an imminent television report on the inquiry, Ms. Pirro conceded that she had her husband, Albert, followed in the summer of 2005. She said she had discussed bugging the family's boat with Mr. Kerik, an old friend who was then running his own security business. But Ms. Pirro, who was the district attorney of Westchester County at the time, said she never went through with the plan, and she insisted that she broke no laws." The Times adds, "Seething with anger, and choking up as she laid bare her marital problems, Ms. Pirro said that two federal agents approached her at her home late one recent night and revealed that the United States attorney's office for the Southern District of New York was investigating her surveillance discussions. They had been caught on tape by Bronx authorities who were conducting a separate investigation of Mr. Kerik. … With less than six weeks to go until the Nov. 7 election, Ms. Pirro said she was being hounded by authorities as part of a 'political witch hunt and smear campaign' led by the same federal lawyer who helped convict Mr. Pirro of tax evasion in 2000. But the United States attorney for the Southern District, Michael J. Garcia, a Republican appointee, issued a statement denying that the inquiry was politically motivated."

The AP (9/28, Fouhy) reports, "Pirro…said that any probe into her troubled marriage was 'highly improper' but she had no intention of quitting her campaign, calling the investigation politically motivated and sexist." The AP continues, "She also said that federal prosecutors had no business delving into her union with millionaire lobbyist Albert Pirro, who spent 11 months in prison after being convicted on tax fraud charges in 2000 and fathered an illegitimate daughter after their wedding in 1975. The couple has a 21-year-old daughter and a 17-year-old son. … 'Sometime last year, I came to believe that my husband was seeing another woman,' Pirro said. 'In the midst of matrimonial discord, I was angry and had him followed to see if what I suspected was true. Although I spoke about taping him, there was no taping by me of anyone. There was anger, and frustration, and disappointment.' … Pirro, former district attorney of Westchester County, just outside New York City, said that 'placing a recording device on one's property to intercept a conversation involving one's spouse is not a crime.'"

Newsday (9/29, Riley) called the FBI investigation "a jaw-dropping disclosure that could shatter her campaign" and notes Pirro said at yesterday's press conference, "There is no way, when I have the opportunity to be the first woman attorney general in the history of this state, that I'm going to be pushed out of a race because somebody wants to delve into the personal lives of my husband and myself. I'm standing up for myself and standing up for women." The New York Post (9/28, Lovett, Dicker, 608K) similarly calls the probe "a devastating blow to her campaign" and reports that in the tapes, "Pirro also belittled the AG's office she is now seeking, calling it a 'been-there-done-that kind of thing.' She said she would have been in the governor's mansion if it weren't for her husband." The New York Daily News (9/28, Lucadamo, Smith, 729K) notes, "Kerik's lawyer, Joseph Tacopina, said, 'Bernie spoke to a friend in distress regarding a domestic conflict. Nothing illegal was discussed and nothing illegal was done. I find it extremely troubling that in the midst of a federal investigation, sealed documents were leaked to the media.'"

CBS 2 Chicago (9/28) reports, "Pirro confirmed she had been informed by FBI agents this week that she was under investigation and said she had hired an attorney to represent her in the case. … Pirro noted that one of the U.S. attorneys assigned to the case, Elliott B. Jacobson, had prosecuted her husband's tax evasion case seven years ago."

FNC's Big Story (9/27, 5:29 p.m.) reported, "A prominent former New York D.A running for state attorney general just dropped a bombshell at news conference a couple of minutes ago. Republican candidate Jeanine Pirro says she is under investigation for allegedly plotting to secretly record her husband to find out whether he was having an affair."

DOJ_NMG_0070228

CNEWS9-TV Albany, (9/27, 8:00 p.m.) reported, "New explosive allegations reveal that the Republican candidate for Attorney General is the subject of a federal investigation. Jeanine Pirro publicly defends herself in the biggest case of her career. Federal prosecutors are investigating the Republican state Attorney General candidate for allegedly scheming to secretly record her husband Al Pirro. She suspected her millionaire lobbyist husband of having an affair and allegedly talked about catching him with the help of former NYC police commissioner Bernard Kerik. She says she had her husband followed but did not record him. Although Jeanine Pirro's news conference this afternoon was very painful and personal, it will have political implications."

WXXA-TV Albany, (9/27, 5:02 p.m.) reported, "Republican state attorney general candidate Jeanine Pirro is being investigated by the federal government. According to sources close to Pirro, she allegedly plotted to secretly record her lobbyist husband because she thought he was having an affair. They say she allegedly discussed the plot with former New York City commissioner Bernie Kerik last year."

CNEWS9-TV Albany, (9/27, 6:31 p.m.) reported, "At a news conference, Pirro issued a strong statement saying that the federal government has no right to investigate her personal life. She says the investigation into allegations that she plotted to record her husband are unwarranted. She admitted that she considered recording her husband when she thought he was cheating on her."

CNEWS9-TV Albany, (9/27, 6:59 p.m.) reported, "She says it's a political witch-hunt by one U.S. attorney."

WRGB-TV Albany, (9/27, 6:32 p.m.) reported, "An angry Jeanine Pirro held a press conference late this afternoon blasting what she called overzealous prosecutors, who are looking into whether she tried to secretly record her husband. … She denied ever making any recordings"

WRGB-TV Albany, (9/27, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "Pirro calls it a political move, and says absolutely nothing will come of it."

WTEN-TV Albany, (9/27, 5:33 p.m.) reported, "Two anonymous sources say no recordings were ever actually made, but that they overheard Pirro discussing those plans with the former NYCP Commissioner. They say Pirro suspected her husband, Albert Pirro, was cheating on her. Pirro went on to say she'd like the person who leaked the story brought to justice."

WTEN-TV Albany, (9/27, 5:59 p.m.) reported, "Even if it did (it), Pirro says it would have been lawful and. her personal business."

US Attorney Responds To Allegations Of Impropriety. WNBC-TV (9/28) reports that shortly after Pirro's press conference, US Attorney Garcia "released this statement: … 'This Office is, as Jeanine Pirro said today, investigating allegations recently brought to our attention by other law enforcement agencies, involving possible violations of Title 18, United States Code, Sections 2511(1)(a) and (b). … There are two Assistant United States Attorneys assigned to the case. They are both career prosecutors with experience in public corruption matters. They are working in conjunction with an experienced Assistant District Attorney from the Westchester County District Attorney's Office. … Their actions, and those of the FBI agents with whom they are working, have been approved by several layers of supervisors, including me. Because the investigation is ongoing, we will not comment as to its substance, except to say that we do not take politics into account in deciding either the subject matter or timing of our investigations.'"

Case Highlights Murky World Of Marital Spying. The New York Times (9/28, Eaton) reports, "Ms. Pirro's insistence that she never contemplated doing anything illegal in investigating her husband — including her discussion of placing a recording device on a boat he owned — involves the somewhat murky world of what amounts to marital spying. … Paul Shechtman, the lawyer Ms. Pirro retained recently, said that federal law permitted spouses to eavesdrop on each other in a house they shared. He cited several cases, including one from 1986 in which a federal judge on Long Island dismissed a case brought by a woman whose husband placed a listening device on the family phone in the course of their divorce, but while they were still sharing a house. … And on the specific question of whether it would be legal for Ms. Pirro to place a device on her husband's boat, Mr. Shechtman argued that it would be as well, because the boat was used by the entire family. … But some experts were not so sure. … 'If the boat is registered only in his name, it could be considered unlawful wiretapping,' said Robert Mann, director of global operations for Worldwide Intelligence Network, a private investigation and personal protection company headquartered in Los Angeles."

Kerik No Stranger To Controversy. The New York Times (9/28, Buettner, Rashbaum) reports, "The name of Bernard B. Kerik has already figured in embarrassing moments for the Bush administration and for former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani. … Yesterday, Mr. Kerik's name turned up in yet another uncomfortable place: a federal investigation that threatens to disrupt the race for state attorney general." Pirro's conversations with Kerik "The conversations took place in mid-2005, long after Mr. Kerik's rise to fame in the months after Sept. 11, 2001, had been upended by damaging allegations that emerged after his nomination by President Bush to become the nation's homeland security secretary. …

DOJ_NMG_0070229

Mr. Kerik had left Mr. Giuliani's consulting business, Giuliani Partners, months earlier and was opening his own security firm, the Kerik Group. But he remained under investigation by the Bronx district attorney's office, which was finding that as New York City corrections commissioner, he had accepted free renovations to his Bronx apartment from a city contractor when the company was under investigation for possible ties to organized crime. … Apparently as part of that investigation, Bronx authorities began listening to Mr. Kerik's conversations, including several in which Ms. Pirro asked him to undertake the grunt work of the average private investigator, marital surveillance."

Another Mistrial Declared In Gotti Racketeering Case. The AP (9/28, Neumeister) reports, "For the third time in the past 12 months, a judge declared a mistrial Wednesday in the racketeering trial of former mob boss John A. 'Junior' Gotti." The AP continues, "The jury, which deliberated for seven days over two weeks, sent out a second note in as many days indicating it could not reach a unanimous verdict. "Your honor, unfortunately we are deadlocked," said the note, prompting U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin to declare the mistrial shortly after noon. … Two previous juries in the last year wound up deadlocked, with resulting mistrials, after Gotti's lawyers argued the second-generation Mafiosi had years ago severed his ties to organized crime. If convicted, the 42-year-old Gotti had faced up to 30 years in prison. … He is free on $7 million bail, and there was no immediate word on whether the government would mount a fourth prosecution. … 'That's a decision above my pay grade,' said prosecutor Victor Hou when asked about the possibility. The defense made motions to suspend Gotti's current home detention and electric surveillance by the government."

The New York Times (9/28, Williams) notes that this was the third time in just over a year a jury has failed to return a verdict in Gotti's trials. A federal official "said that after three mistrials, the prosecution was unlikely to retry Mr. Gotti unless new evidence turned up, a decision that would all but end an expensive and highly publicized organized crime prosecution in a startling defeat for the government." The Times adds, "Jurors said they believed Mr. Gotti was guilty of orchestrating the 1992 shooting and bungled kidnapping of Curtis Sliwa, the radio talk-show host. But, the jurors said, the government failed to prove that the shooting was part of a pattern of crimes, a necessary part of the racketeering charge, and so they could not convict him." The New York Daily News (9/28, Zambito, 729K) also reports, "The hours of jailhouse tapes…made for some great courtroom drama -- but didn't have much of an impact on the jury deciding his fate. 'The tapes were a very cloudy issue because you couldn't hear them very well,' one juror said yesterday after the panel deadlocked."

The New York Post (9/28, Cornell, Gittens, 608K) reports, "It was strike three for prosecutors…a stunning development that could mean freedom for the mob scion. … 'I'd be better off dead,' said a disgusted Sliwa, who got little consolation from the mixed result. 'This guy got away with a crime…but as God is my witness, God will not forget that he tried to kill me.'" Newsday (9/28, DeStefano) notes, "The mistrial was a clear indication that a revised government presentation, which included prison tapes and financial evidence, failed to sway the jury. … Immediately after the verdict, Manhattan U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia issued a terse statement that expressed disappointment but praised his staff." He added, "We will inform the court in the very near future about how we plan to proceed." The New York Daily News (9/28, Fenner, Martinez, Zambito, 729K) adds, "It appeared unlikely last night that the government would seek a fourth trial, giving the Teflon Son a chance to prove he really has ditched the mob life he inherited from his father, whose specter loomed large over the courthouse."

Legal Experts Say US Should Not Seek Fourth Trial. Newsday (9/28, Mallia, DeStefano) reports, "Legal experts to Gottiprosecutors: Three strikes, you're out. … 'This case is fatally flawed. One could even say that if they bring it again it would be abuse of prosecutorial power,' said Fordham Law School professor Jim Cohen, who specializes in criminal law." Newsday adds, "One thing on which several experts agreed: After the highly visible defeats, prosecutors must balance mounting costs -- by one estimate already exceeding $1 million -- against chances of success. … 'If I were in charge, the kind of question I would ask is, "Can you convince me that, in a subsequent trial, we can be more persuasive?"' New York University Law School professor James Jacobs said. .. Jacobs was skeptical that any new evidence is forthcoming."

Victoria Gotti Praises Judge, Assails NYPost. In a New York Daily News (9/28, 729K) op-ed, Gotti's mother, Victoria Gotti, writes, "I will thank our good fortune every day for a judge like Shira Schiendlin. She is the difference between a fair trial and a railroad job. God bless her. The defense team was second to none and basically worked pro bono. Last, but not least, God bless those jurors for not believing the swill they were being fed daily by government and stories being planted by their government shill at the New York Post." Gotti adds, "It was a government source who tried his best to get my son murdered by circulating that he was a rat. Conveniently, the government source, an FBI agent, gave this garbage to The Post ... We learned that Curtis Sliwa's best friend...is the new publisher of that paper. We didn't expect anything but yellow journalism."

Local Television. WQAD-TV Davenport, (9/27, 10:22 p.m.) reported, "A judge declared another mistrial in the racketeering case against the former mob boss. A jury deliberated for seven days without reaching a verdict. Gotti says he just wants to move on with his life. It's the third mistrial for the son of the notorious John Gotti."

DOJ_NMG_0070230

WBRE-TV Wilkes Barre, (9/27, 11:22 p.m.) reported, "A judge in New York City has declared a mistrial in the racketeering case against former mob boss John Gotti Junior. 'I'm going to close by just saying this: My father's dead over four years. It's time to let go, and it's time for us all just to move on.'"

WJZ-TV Baltimore, (9/27, 5:37 p.m.) reported, "A big sigh of relief today from John Jr. Gotti. Today, a New York judge declared a mistrial in his racketeering case."

WTTO-TV Birmingham, (9/27, 9:00 p.m.) reported, "The son of notorious mob boss John Gotti escapes yet another conviction. John Jr. walked out of court a free man."

WKRN-TV Nashville, (9/27, 4:52 p.m.) reported, "The third time is not the charm for prosecutors in the trail of john Gotti Jr. For the third time in a year, the judge declares a mistrial."

WTNH-TV Hartford, (9/27, 5:33 p.m.) reported, "In the third racketeering trial against former mob boss John junior Gotti. The jury deliberated for seven days before breaking down. … A majority favored acquitting Gotti."

KXJB-TV Fargo, (9/27, 10:03 p.m.) reported, "Gotti says enough is enough, and it's time for the feds to let go."

WNWO-TV Toledo, (9/27, 11:21 p.m.) reported, "Gotti says it's time for the feds to let go."

CNEWS9-TV Albany, (9/27, 10:44 p.m.) reported, "Prosecutors now have the option of attempting a fourth trial or dropping the charges against Gotti."

WRGT-TV Dayton, (9/27, 10:27 p.m.) reported, "No word on whether the feds will try Gotti again."

Rare Map Thief Sentenced To 42 Months In Prison. The New York Times (9/28, Cowan) reports, "A map dealer who stole nearly 100 rare maps valued at $3 million from Yale and other institutions was sentenced to three and a half years in prison on Wednesday after a federal judge credited him for helping the authorities retrieve most of the items taken." The Times continues, "Representatives of the institutions that were looted, who had traveled long distances to lobby for a stiff sentence, left the court saying they were deeply disappointed with the punishment given the map dealer, Edward Forbes Smiley III. Federal sentencing guidelines suggested that Mr. Smiley was looking at a term of 57 to 71 months, although the maximum penalty was 10 years." The Times adds, "Mr. Smiley, 50, was arrested by the Yale police in June 2005, shortly after leaving Yale's rare-book library with seven maps stashed in his briefcase and tweed jacket. … After a year of cooperating with the authorities, he pleaded guilty in federal court in June this year to the theft of a major artwork. As part of the plea agreement, he admitted to removing maps from collections at Harvard, Yale, the New York Public Library, Boston Public Library, the Newberry Library in Chicago and the British Library in London."

The Boston Globe (9/28, Abel) reports that Smiley "admitted that over an eight-year span he stole more than 30 maps from Boston and New York public libraries, eight from Harvard's Houghton Library, and 10 from Yale's Beinecke Rare Book and Manuscript Library in New Haven, prosecutors said. The British Library has said Smiley took centuries-old maps that told the story of the New World. … The judge ordered Smiley to report to prison in January, at a facility to be designated by the Federal Bureau of Prisons."

The AP (9/28, Christoffersen) reports, "U.S. District Judge Janet Bond Arterton said she wanted to send a dual message with the sentence. Prosecutors did not ask for a specific a sentence, but recommended Smiley be given credit for his cooperation with the investigation. … Leaders of the prestigious libraries urged a stiff sentence, saying he took world treasures and left a trail of victims."

Louisiana Woman Pleads Guilty To FEMA Fraud. The Baton Rouge Advocate (9/28) reports, "A Baton Rouge woman pleaded guilty Tuesday in federal court to two counts of fraud related to hurricane disaster relief programs." The Advocate continues, "Keosha Martin, 24, pleaded guilty to making two false and fraudulent claims to the Federal Emergency Management Agency. … According to the indictment, Martin was employed by FEMA between October 2005 and November 2005 as an applicant assistant whose duties included assisting disaster victims in applying for benefits. … At the time, Martin filed a claim on her behalf for damage from Hurricane Katrina and later filed a claim for damage from Hurricane Rita." The Advocate adds, "Martin could be sentenced to 10 years in prison, a $500,000 fine or both, per count. … The number of people who have been charged in the Baton Rouge based Middle District of Louisiana with violations related to hurricane disaster relief funds stands at 74. … In September 2005, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales formed the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force to deter, investigate and prosecute disaster-related crimes such as charity fraud, identity theft, procurement fraud and insurance fraud. The task force includes the FBI, the U.S. Inspectors General community, the U.S. Secret Service, the U.S. Postal Inspection Service, the Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys and others."

Two FEMA Workers Charged With Filing False Claim. The New York Times (9/28, Lipton, 1.21M) reports that two FEMA workers "have been charged with trying to defraud the government by filing a false claim for damage to a houseboat, which resulted in an award of $25,500 in disaster assistance." Duane Adams and Emily Fuqua, who "who worked in clerical administration and disaster recovery programs, have been placed on unpaid leave, a FEMA official said."

DOJ_NMG_0070231

Former Michigan Prosecutor Acquitted Of Corruption Charges. The Detroit News (9/28, Egan) reports, "Former Macomb County Prosecutor Carl Marlinga burst into tears, embraced his wife, Barbara, and whispered, 'It's over,' after a federal jury acquitted him Wednesday of public corruption charges." The News continues, "Marlinga, 59, who loudly proclaimed his innocence even before the federal government indicted him on bribery and fraud charges in 2004, was ecstatic but not bitter after the jury forewoman read the words 'not guilty' five times. … 'Marlinga, who was represented by Mark Kriger and N.C. Deday LaRene, said he ignored his lawyers' advice when he repeatedly agreed to be interviewed by investigators and twice testified before a federal grand jury investigating his conduct. At his trial, Marlinga found his own words forming a central part of the government's case." The News adds, "Now a lawyer in private practice, Marlinga would not rule out a return to politics. His future could test whether a politician, once cleared, can cleanse the stain of an indictment and return to public life. … It also represents the latest in a series of setbacks for the federal government in high profile cases in Detroit. … The case is another prominent defeat for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Detroit. … The government does not appeal jury acquittals in criminal cases. 'We respect the jury's decision, I congratulate Mr. Marlinga's attorneys on the defense, and we're moving on,' said U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy."

The Detroit Free Press (9/28, Hunt, Ashenfelter) reports, "Marlinga…had faced up to 10 years in prison and $250,000 in fines for allegedly swapping prosecutorial favors in two rape cases for contributions to his failed 2002 congressional campaign. The five charges included two counts of bribery, deprivation of honest services, making false statements to the Federal Elections Commission and exceeding campaign contribution limits." The Free Press adds, "The charges derailed Marlinga's political career, causing the popular Macomb County Democrat to step aside shortly after the indictment was issued in April 2004, after 20 years as the county's chief prosecutor. … As they filed out of the courthouse, jurors said federal prosecutors weren't convincing. … 'We felt the government didn't prove its case and Mr. Marlinga's attorneys did,' said jury forewoman Mary Shultz of Rochester. … 'There were way too many loose ends,' said juror Megan Bowman, an Ortonville homemaker. 'There wasn't a whole puzzle.'" The Free Press notes, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Cares, who said during the trial that Marlinga's political ambition caused him to sell his influence, declined comment. His cocounsel, Jonathan Tukel, said later: 'We always respect the jury's verdict." The Free Press notes, "U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy said it was a difficult case and congratulated Marlinga's lawyers. … Although the office had a string of high-visibility losses in the months before Murphy took the helm in 2005, he said: 'No prosecutor's office in America will or should have a 100% batting average. We strive to do the right thing in every case.'"

More Commentary. The Detroit Free Press (9/28) editorializes, "Carl Marlinga may have exercised poor judgment or been naive about how things would look, but a federal court jury decided Wednesday that the former Macomb County prosecutor was not guilty of a crime. The verdict clearing him on five corruption charges rewarded Marlinga's faith in a system that he served pretty well for 20 years." The Free Press adds, "The allegations that he swapped favors in criminal cases for contributions to a failed congressional campaign effectively ended Marlinga's political career. … But he has always been a pretty straight shooter as a public official and took the witness stand to declare his innocence with the same earnest demeanor that made him a favorite of Macomb County voters. This time, Marlinga got all the votes he needed."

New Orleans Corruption Probe Defendant Sentenced To Probation. The AP (9/28) reports, "A figure in a federal investigation targeting corruption in the New Orleans transit authority was put on three years of probation on Wednesday. John S. Keller pleaded guilty in August 2005 to failing to report a felony. U.S. District Judge Ginger Berrigan also ordered him to perform 200 hours of community service and pay $10,000 in restitution to the Regional Transit Authority, along with a $5,000 fine. Keller was the business partner of Glenn Haydel, who pleaded guilty in May to stealing $550,000 from the RTA."

Prosecutor Seeks Protection Order On Fumo Evidence. The AP (9/28, Dale) reports, "The federal grand jury investigating whether state Sen. Vincent Fumo extorted corporate donations for a charity in his district should wrap up its work by February, prosecutors disclosed Wednesday. 'The grand jury is sorting out potential defendants, potential charges,' Assistant U.S. Attorney John Pease said at a hearing in a related case." Yesterday, prosecutors "asked the judge to order defense lawyers to keep under lock and key the e-mails, grand jury transcripts and other evidence that prosecutors must turn over to the defense. … U.S. District Judge William H. Yohn Jr. asked the sides to try to narrow the scope of the documents that would come under a protection order, and scheduled a telephone conference with lawyers on Monday." The AP notes, "Defense lawyers argue that prosecutors themselves have courted the press, with dramatic pre-dawn arrests and the public filing of a 65-page

DOJ_NMG_0070232

FBI affidavit that spells out the focus on Fumo and includes colorful e-mail excerpts about the senator."

The Philadelphia Daily News (9/28, Hinkelman, 109K) reports, "At issue are summaries of FBI and IRS interviews with witnesses, grand-jury transcripts and two search-warrant affidavits that have been filed under seal. 'We think the defense counsel should have that under discovery obligations,' Pease said, 'but some of it is scandalous, even criminal, and would be extremely embarrassing to the persons involved' if it were made public." The Philadelphia Inquirer (9/28, Shiffman, 399K) also reports on the hearing, under the headline "Prosecutor Says U.S. Probe Of Fumo To End This Year."

Philadelphia Ad Executive, Consultant Plead Guilty To Fraud Charges. The Philadelphia Inquirer (9/28, Anastasia, 399K) reports, "A former advertising-company executive and a consultant for that company each pleaded guilty to fraud charges yesterday, bringing an end to one phase of an ongoing federal corruption investigation at Philadelphia International Airport. Joseph Evans, 51, the former chief executive officer of Sky Sites Inc., and Joseph Moderski, 69, a consultant, entered their pleas during hearings before U.S. District Judge James T. Giles. Evans, under terms of a plea agreement, pleaded guilty to one count of mail fraud. Moderski pleaded guilty to conspiracy, mail fraud and wire fraud." The Inquirer notes, "Evans and Moderski were charged in a pay-to-play scheme in which they conspired to funnel money out of the company to finance illegal campaign contributions to Mayor Street. The mayor has not been charged with any wrongdoing, but his office was briefly bugged by the FBI as part of a broad corruption probe."

Judge Sets Nov. 21 Cause, Bail Hearing For Jeffs. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/28, Dobner) reports, "Polygamist sect leader Warren Jeffs, a fugitive for nearly two years, appeared in a Utah courtroom Wednesday and said he was willing to wait several weeks for a judge to decide whether to send him to trial on charges of arranging an underage marriage. … The judge set a Nov. 21 probable cause hearing and said he would address Jeffs' bond status at that time." The AP notes, "Defense attorney Walter Bugden said 'absolutely' when reporters asked if this was religious persecution. 'Let's wait until we can have a trial in this matter before we jump to the conclusion that Mr. Jeffs is guilty of anything,' Bugden said." Under the headline "Jeffs' Attorney Says Case Is 'Religious Persecution,'" the St. George Spectrum (9/28, St. Germain) adds that Budgen said outside the court, "We're going to have a preliminary hearing, with one step at a time. We intend to confront the witnesses against us and there will be cross-examination at the preliminary hearing."

The Deseret Morning News (9/28, Winslow) reports, "A representative from the U.S. Attorney's Office in Utah was also in the courtroom Wednesday, observing the proceedings. 'We remain interested in the case. We're preserving the options that we may have,' U.S. Attorney's spokeswoman Melodie Rydalch told the Deseret Morning News as she left the courthouse. Federal prosecutors have refused to drop an unlawful flight to avoid prosecution warrant against Jeffs and have threatened to indict him on it should he be granted bail."

Teen Bride To Testify At Hearing. The Salt Lake Tribune (9/28, Adams) reports, "The state's key witness in the case" will testify at the Nov. 21 hearing, and she "is expected to describe her assigned marriage to an older man she alleges later raped her, as well as Jeffs' alleged instructions that she submit 'mind, body and soul' to her husband. … The woman, who was between 14 and 18 at the time of her spiritual marriage, is looking forward to her day in court, according to Brian Filter, spokesman for the Washington County Attorney's Office. He also said other witnesses and evidence will be presented."

Prosecutors Seek To Bar Release Of Intelligence Documents In Libby Trial. The AP (9/28, Apuzzo) reports Federal prosecutors "went into a private hearing Wednesday to urge a judge not to release sensitive intelligence reports at the upcoming trial" of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff. Libby "wants to use President Bush's daily terrorism briefings as evidence at his obstruction and perjury trial in January." Libby says "the records from 2003 and early 2004 will show he did not lie to investigators about his role in the leak of a CIA officer's identity. He contends he had important things on his mind and may have forgotten details about the leak." Prosecutors and defense lawyers "will not discuss the contents of the classified briefing summaries. But the dates overlap with the military's hunt for Iraq's Saddam Hussein, the death of his two sons, and continuing discussions about nuclear programs in North Korea and Iran."

House Suspends License For Firm Linked To Abramoff. The Washington Post (9/28, D3, Grimaldi, 748K) reports, "House leaders have suspended a multimillion-dollar wireless communications license that federal prosecutors say was corruptly awarded to a Dulles telecommunications firm by Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) in exchange for gifts from lobbyist Jack Abramoff. The award of the license was one of a series of acts that Ney said he performed for Abramoff in exchange for campaign contributions, expensive meals, luxury travel and sports tickets. Ney agreed this month to plead guilty to corruption charges and is set to enter his plea Oct. 13. The license to install antennas for cellular and wireless telephones in House office buildings was awarded in 2002 to MobileAccess, formerly known as Foxcom Wireless, which was based in Israel. The company, now based in Vienna, Va., later paid Abramoff $280,000 in lobbying fees and donated $50,000 to a charity operated by Abramoff that paid for a golf junket to Scotland for Ney."

DOJ_NMG_0070233

Roll Call (9/28, Bresnahan) reports, "Ney's alleged influence peddling in granting the license to provide cell phone antennas in House office buildings to Foxcom Wireless, now Mobile Access Networks, was part of the plea agreement that the Ohio Republican recently reached with the Justice Department. Ney admitted to accepting 'things of value' from Abramoff in return for official actions, including granting the Mobile Access license." Roll Call adds, "House insiders said that the Administration Committee and Jay Eagan, the Chief Administrative Officer for the House, jointly made the decision to conduct the review following Ney's plea deal. House officials declined to say whether they were considering taking legal action against the company."

US Charges Pennsylvania Woman In Child Porn Case. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (9/28, LaRussa) reports, "A Washington County woman has been accused of using the Internet to distribute stories that describe children -- some as young as 2 years old -- being kidnapped, sexually molested and murdered." The Tribune-Review continues, "Karen Fletcher, 54, of Meldon Avenue, Donora, was indicted by a federal grand jury Tuesday on six counts of transportation of obscene matters, U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said. … 'This case is a very important part of our efforts to prosecute people who exploit children,' Buchanan said. 'Use of the Internet to distribute obscene stories like these not only violates federal law, they embolden sex offenders who would target children.'" The Tribune-Review adds, "Free speech specialists, however, question whether the charges will stick because there don't appear to be any child victims. … Fletcher is accused of operating a Web site featuring excerpts of "extremely explicit and graphic stories" that could be downloaded by purchasing a $10 monthly subscription, according to investigators. … The indictment against Fletcher alleges that on Aug. 8, 2005, she used an interactive computer service to distribute half a dozen stories about adults having sex with children between 2 and 9 years old. … Fletcher told a pair of FBI agents who interviewed her at her home on Feb. 11, 2005 that she owned what she described as a 'fantasy site' on which she posts 'sexually explicit stories about adults having sex with children,' according to court papers."

Eased Lender Requirements Fueling Surge In Mortgage Fraud. In a front-page story, the Wall Street Journal (9/28, Hagerty, Hudson, 2.03M) reports from Martinsville, Va., "Federal and state authorities are investigating allegations of an elaborate mortgage fraud involving about 100 people living in or near this small factory town who say they unwittingly took out loans to buy houses at inflated prices in Indiana. … Now, many of the loans are in default, the borrowers' credit ratings are in ruins, and lenders are pursuing the organizers of the purported investment group in court. Companies stuck with the defaulting loans include Countrywide Financial Corp." which has filed a lawsuit accusing "the organizers of acquiring homes and then fraudulently selling them for a quick profit to the Virginia borrowers." The Journal notes, "Mortgage fraud…has mushroomed in recent years as lenders have pushed for speedier loan approvals in an effort to remain competitive and milk maximum profits from the now-fading housing boom. The Federal Bureau of Investigation reported that mortgage fraud led to losses of $1 billion in 2005, up from $429 million a year earlier. … Attracted by the ability to obtain large sums quickly, some criminal gangs involved in drug dealing and other street crimes have branched out into mortgage fraud, says Chip Burrus, assistant director of the FBI's criminal investigative division. 'It's more profitable and less risky,' he says."

The New York Times (9/28, Leland, Zeller, 1.21M) reports, "The civil lawsuit…describes an elaborate confidence game in which Martinsville residents with good credit ratings were enlisted last year to join what they believed was a risk-free investment in Indiana real estate. … While no criminal charges have been filed, federal grand jury subpoenas are being prepared in Indiana, and further civil action at the federal level is expected to be filed against the investment group soon." The Times also notes, "The F.B.I. called mortgage fraud an 'epidemic' last December, noting that losses associated with the crime had jumped to more than $1 billion last year from $429 million in 2004. Although the hot housing market that may have at least partly given rise to the fraud boom is cooling, officials say mortgage fraud losses are on pace to increase again this year."

Good Samaritans Keep Watch For ID-Theft Victims. USA Today (9/28, Swartz) reports on "avenging angels" working nationwide ""looking out for the well-being of ID-theft victims. They share a fervent desire to publicize the widespread availability of stolen personal data on the Internet." USA adds, "As phishing continues to escalate, the safest course for consumers may be to warn them over the phone. There is little in the way of software to warn consumers they have been phished." Since May, Steven Peisner "has scoured the Internet forums of cybercrooks, looking for the names of ID-theft victims whose personal information is for sale online. The same day, he informs victims that their names — not to mention Social Security numbers, credit card information and phone numbers — are floating in cyberspace. Peisner calmly tells them he has come across their filched profiles and they should immediately close their credit card and/or bank accounts. To make his point resonate, he reads to victims their stolen information as it appears in the forums. Symantec detected 157,477 unique phishing messages during the first half of 2006, up 81% from the last six months of 2005. Home PCs were targets of 86% of security threats in the first six months of 2006, according to a Symantec report released Monday."

DOJ_NMG_0070234

Blanco Renews Extradition Request For Sportingbet Chairman. The Financial Times (9/28, Ward) reports that Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco has renewed her extradition request for former Sportingbet chairman Peter Dicks. Blanco's "intervention came as Mr Dicks prepared to attend a court hearing in New York to learn whether he will be sent to Louisiana to face illegal gambling charges. Lawyers for Mr Dicks, who was arrested in New York three weeks ago on a Louisiana warrant, had hoped to halt the extradition process before Thursday's hearing. But a spokesman for Ms Blanco said she was still pushing for his extradition as part of efforts to enforce the state's law against online gambling." The Times adds, "Louisiana's Police Gaming Enforcement division told the FT this week that arrest warrants had been issued for four Sportingbet representatives, including Mr Dicks, after state police placed a bet with the company. UK-listed Sportingbet said on Wednesday that it had banned board members from travelling to the US."

DC Officials Consider Extending Anti-Crime Legislation. The Washington Times (9/28, Cella) reports, "D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams' plan to extend emergency anti-crime legislation appears to violate a city statute barring passage of the same law more than once on an emergency basis. City officials are trying to determine whether extending by 90 days anti-crime legislation enacted in July would violate the statute. If it is found to violate the statute, 48 surveillance cameras placed in neighborhoods would have to turned off until permanent anti-crime legislation could be enacted, which would be December at the earliest. In addition, police no longer would have access to criminal juvenile records and would not be able to hold robbery suspects and handgun offenders until the permanent legislation is passed. And the 10 p.m. curfew for minors would revert to 11 p.m. on weeknights and midnight on weekends."

Karr Lawyers Seek Dismissal Of Child Porn Charges. Lawyers for John Mark Karr have asked a judge to dismiss child pornography charges against their client, who was once a suspect in the JonBenet Ramsey murder case, because authorities lost a computer that allegedly contained illegal images of children. USA Today (9/28, Kasindorf) reports, "Sheriff's deputies seized the computer from Karr's home when he was arrested in April 2001. The sheriff's department said it copied the contents of the computer's hard drive and printed out five pornographic photographs. Saying that new technologies might reveal additional photos on the hard drive, deputies launched a two-week search for the computer late last month but didn't find it."

Sex Offender Admits Killing 15-Year Old Boy. The Washington Post (9/28, B2, Klein, Cauvin) reports, "A 51-year-old convicted sex offender admitted that he killed a 15-year-old boy and dumped his body at a construction site in Northeast Washington, telling police the two had fought over a $10 purchase of crack cocaine, according to the prosecution's charging documents. Robert J. Crosby has been charged with second-degree murder in the death of Dominick A. Dixon, who was found at the construction site Monday afternoon wearing only his boxer shorts. Crosby was ordered held without bond yesterday by D.C. Superior Court Magistrate Judge Richard Ringell. The D.C. medical examiner's office said yesterday that Dixon was killed by asphyxiation and ruled the case a homicide."

Navy Midshipman Faces Rape Charges. The Baltimore Sun (9/28, Olson) reports, "The Naval Academy has charged a former football player with drugging and raping two female midshipmen on separate occasions, including at a party attended by at least four teammates. Kenny Ray Morrison, 24, is accused of raping one woman in a Georgetown hotel room at the rowdy, boozy party Feb. 4, and the other in Annapolis on April 21, according to charging documents. The senior had been scheduled to stand trial Tuesday at a special court-martial, a midlevel form of military trial, only on charges of indecent assault and indecent acts in the Georgetown incident. If convicted of those charges, he would receive no jail time. If found guilty in a military court of the new charges of rape, distribution of a controlled substance and assault in both cases, as well as conduct unbecoming an officer in the Feb. 4 incident, he could receive a maximum of life in prison. Such a sentence is unprecedented in recent history, according to military law experts."

US Charges Former National Guardsman With Smuggling Machine Guns. The Army Times (9/28, Tan) reports, "A former North Carolina National Guard soldier has been charged in federal court for smuggling four machine guns into the United States from Iraq and then trying to sell them." The Times continues, "Robert James Clymore, 38, was arraigned in federal court Sept. 21 in Atlanta, Ga. He was indicted June 13 by a federal grand jury on charges of unlawful importation, possession, transportation and transfer of machine guns, according to a press release from the Justice Department." The Times adds, "Clymore, of Wade, N.C., is accused of acquiring four machine guns while on active duty in Iraq and smuggling them home in his gear. … Clymore, who served in the Navy, joined the Guard on Aug. 29, 2003, said Maj. Matt Handley, a spokesman for the North Carolina Guard. … In December 2005, Clymore brought the weapons to a gun dealer in Taylorsville, Ga., and negotiated a deal to trade an all-terrain vehicle and a pistol for the machine guns, according to the Justice Department. The gun dealer informed the FBI about the machine guns, and FBI agents set up surveillance to record the transaction, which was scheduled for the following day, Dec. 15, 2005. When Clymore returned, the FBI seized the four machine guns."

DOJ_NMG_0070235

Judge Sentences Pennsylvania Inmate In Assault Of US Marshal. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (9/28) reports, "A state inmate was sentenced today to nearly 12 years in federal prison for assaulting two deputy U.S. Marshals." The Tribune-Review continues, "Andre L. Jacobs, 24, formerly of Harrisburg, attacked the marshals in March 2005 inside a 9th floor elevator at the federal courthouse, Downtown. After a jury ruled against Jacobs in a civil trial, the inmate struck one marshal with his handcuffs and grabbed the other marshal. The first marshal suffered ligament damage to his wrist, which required surgery. … Jacobs was convicted by a jury in April and was sentenced to 210 months in prison yesterday by U.S. District Judge Gustave Diamond. Jacobs is already serving 5 to 18 years in SCI Fayette on an unrelated conviction."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (9/28, Ward) reports, "In an effort to avoid any repeats of the attack in which Mr. Jacobs slammed his handcuffed arms down onto a marshal's wrist, he was led into Senior U.S. District Judge Gustave Diamond's courtroom by six marshals. … Deputy U.S. Marshal Robert Potter, who was injured in the attack, underwent surgery and was placed on light duty for 47 days while recovering, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen R. Kaufman." The Post-Gazette adds, "Mr. Jacobs' sentence was enhanced by several factors, including that his victim was a federal law enforcement officer; that he caused 'serious bodily injury;' and because he is considered a career offender."

US Charges Man With Defrauding Priests. The New York Times (9/28, Ramirez) reports, "Robert Riggio, 60, of Manhattan, bilked numerous priests around the country of at least $200,000, federal prosecutors said yesterday." The Times continues, "Priests in North Carolina, Texas and Kentucky were victimized, prosecutors said, adding that the priests often drew on personal savings to send money to Mr. Riggio, and that some priests were bilked twice." The Times adds, "The scheme, which began in March 2004 and lasted until this month, involved more than 150 wire transfers from guileless priests to Mr. Riggio and a partner who was not named in court papers. In some cases, Mr. Riggio pretended to be a member of the priest's parish seeking help, the papers said. … The scheme was undone by an undercover agent posing as the niece of a priest, prosecutors said." The Times notes, "Mr. Riggio appeared yesterday at a hearing in Federal District Court in Manhattan, where he was advised of his rights and informed of the charges against him, but not formally arraigned. He has not been indicted. … He is charged with one count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud and one count of wire fraud. If convicted, he faces up to 25 years in prison."

Cost Of Houston Crime Lab Probe To Grow By $1.5 Million. The Houston Chronicle (9/28, Grant) reports, "The (Houston) City Council on Wednesday approved spending an additional $1.5 million to complete an independent investigation of the police crime lab that has already cost the city nearly $4 million." The Chronicle continues, "After months of delay, during which Mayor Bill White, several council members and a high-ranking police official questioned whether more money should be allocated to the project, the panel approved the funding without discussion. … White said after the meeting he is confident this will be the last time the city puts money toward the investigation, which began in March 2005. … 'I wanted to make sure that we were going to get value for what we asked for and that this would not be perpetual,' White said." The Chronicle adds, "The city hired lead investigator Michael Bromwich, a former U.S. Justice Department official, to investigate the crime lab more than two years after problems there came to light. Two men had been released from prison because of inaccurate work on evidence from their cases. … The independent team of lawyers and scientists conducting the project have reviewed about 2,300 cases from the Houston Police Department crime lab. HPD's conclusions about evidence in 93 cases may be inaccurate, they say. … The project initially was expected to cost about $3.2 million. City Council first allocated $2.2 million, then agreed to pay $1.6 million more."

Expert Says Inmates Conscious During Lethal Injections. An anesthesiologist who has reviewed state execution logs testified yesterday that inmates executed by lethal injection in California may have been conscious when they were administered the fatal dose of drugs. The Los Angeles Times (9/28, Weinstein, Dolan, 918K) reports, "Mark

DOJ_NMG_0070236

Heath, a professor of anesthesiology at Columbia University Medical School, said the logs showed that some of those executed were still breathing several minutes after prison personnel administered pancuronium bromide, a paralytic agent and the second of three drugs used in lethal injections in California and three dozen other states." Heath testified during the second day of a hearing before US District Judge Jeremy Fogel on a challenge to California's lethal injection procedures by death row inmate Michael Morales. His attorneys contend that the state procedure violates the U.S. Constitution's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment."

CIVIL LAW:

San Jose Nursing Home Convicted Medicare Fraud. The San Jose Mercury News (9/28, Foo) reports, "An East San Jose nursing home was convicted Tuesday of filing false Medicare claims, and its corporate owner also has agreed to pay $14.7 million to settle a related federal lawsuit instigated by a whistle-blower, prosecutors said." The News continues, "Representatives for Parkview Nursing Center agreed to plead guilty in U.S. District Court in Oakland to two counts of submitting inflated nursing hours related to patients' reports to Medicare. No individuals were charged, U.S. Department of Justice spokesman Luke Macaulay said, only the business entities." The News adds, "The crimes occurred in November 1997 and September 1998, prosecutors said. The complaint against Parkview was filed earlier this month. … Parkview also was ordered to pay a $500,000 fine. The 99-bed nursing home was closed in 1998 by its owner and operator, Horizon West Healthcare, a wholly owned subsidiary of Horizon West, based in Rocklin. … The conviction follows an August agreement by Horizon West to pay $14.7 million to settle a 2000 lawsuit brought by a former employee, Julia Lee, and the Justice Department. The settlement will be paid out over five years, according to the agreement."

House Panel Approves FOIA Reform Bill. The AP (9/28, Kellman) reports a House Government Reform subcommittee "advanced a bill to close gaps in the Freedom of Information Act and speed the release of government documents, but the legislation seemed unlikely to pass this year." The panel "would penalize federal agencies that fail to respond to FOIA requests in a reasonable period of time." But the subcommittee "added a provision not in a similar measure passed last week by the Senate Judiciary Committee. The amendment by Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., would revoke two Bush administration memos that directed agencies to withhold information from FOIA requests when that information would threaten national security." The bill "appears likely to fall victim to Congress' end-of-session rush to recess this week so lawmakers can head home to campaign for re-election."

Court Declines To Intervene In Maine "Electioneering" Dispute. Roll Call (9/28, Murray) reports, "A federal court Wednesday refused to intervene in a dispute between a Maine nonprofit organization and the Federal Election Commission regarding the group's right to air a television advertisement during a federally restricted blackout period. A three-judge panel of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia ruled that the FEC was correct in determining that claims by Christian Civic Life off Maine, Inc., were 'not ripe' and 'too speculative.' The group had sought to run an issue-based advertisement identifying Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) within 30 days of a primary election. Running the ad could have been a violation of the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002. In May, the same court denied the group's request for preliminary injunctive relief. 'We are very pleased that this case has been dismissed, and the 'electioneering communication' provisions of BCRA stand in place as written by Congress and upheld by the Supreme Court,' said Fred Wertheimer, president of the campaign-finance watchdog group Democracy 21."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Ruling Opens Door For ADA Claims Involving Internet Access. The National Law Journal (9/28, Qualters) reports, "A federal judge's decision not to dismiss a discrimination case against retailer Target Corp. for operating a Web site inaccessible to the blind opens the door to Internet-related Americans with Disabilities Act claims." The Journal continues, "The recent order is believed to the first ruling from a judge that the ADA can apply to the Internet, and lawyers from both sides of the bar anticipate more cases. … 'To limit the ADA to discrimination in the provision of services occurring on the premises of a public accommodation would contradict the plain language of that statute,' wrote U.S. District Judge Marilyn Hall Patel, who sits in San Francisco. 'To the extent defendant argues that plaintiffs' claims are not cognizable because they occur away from a "place" of public accommodation, defendant's argument must fail.'" The Journal adds, "Patel declined the National Federation of the Blind's request for a preliminary injunction requiring Target to immediately update its site. She said that there is no emergency to address and that more discovery is needed to investigate Target's claim that the average blind person is able to access its Web site now. National Federation of the Blind v. Target, No. 06-01802

DOJ_NMG_0070237

(N.D. Calif.). … There will be continued exploration of the applicability of the ADA and certain state laws to commercial Web sites, predicted Daniel F. Goldstein of Brown, Goldstein & Levy in Baltimore. Goldstein represents the plaintiff in the case, Baltimore-based National Federation of the Blind. 'It's too important of an economic activity for the blind to be excluded,' Goldstein said."

DOD Strives To Get Ballots To Soldiers In Field Before Election Day. Under the headline "Voting Is Tricky Mission For Troops Waiting For Ballots In Battlefield," USA Today (9/28, 6A, Wolf, 2.27M) reports on what Principal Deputy Undersecretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness Michael Dominguez calls the "special challenge of reaching the deployed warrior on the battlefield" when it is time to vote. Pentagon officials say it is "particularly troublesome" trying to get ballots to "troops in battle, who often are redeployed before mail reaches them," and in some states that held late primaries, ballots are still being prepared. DOD Federal Voting Assistance Program Deputy Director Scott Wiedmann "says at least six states have begun mailing out overseas absentee ballots. The elections are 40 days away."

Voters Abroad Still Face Challenges. USA Today (9/28, Wolf, 2.27M) reports six years "after problems counting overseas votes clouded the 2000 presidential election, U.S. troops and other Americans abroad face tight timetables and emerging technologies that still make it difficult to have their votes counted." Fourteen states "with September primaries risk getting absentee ballots out too late for remote voters to return them in time." Efforts to "speed things by using e-mail and fax machines pose a risk to voters' confidentiality," and Websites "intended to help overseas voters navigate the process are not widely used. A private group's site was taken down earlier this month in a contract dispute." The problems "with timing and technology concern federal election officials, who try to ensure that overseas votes are counted on time. An estimated 29% of troops who wanted to vote did not get absentee ballots in 2000 or received them too late."

Hyde Defends "Federal Election Integrity Act." Rep. Henry Hyde writes in USA Today (9/28, 2.27M), "The integrity of elections is central to our democracy. Because of increasing concern over electoral fraud, the House passed the Federal Election Integrity Act (FEIA) mandating that voters present proof of citizenship and a valid photo ID when registering to vote. A valid photo ID would also be required at the polling place. Not surprisingly, FEIA has met strong opposition from the majority of Democrats, who support amnesty, a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants." Hyde adds, "This proposal would not disenfranchise anyone who wants to vote. Our purpose is to stop fraud and to ensure every citizen the right to vote. … By enacting this bill, we can help restore confidence in our system and thereby encourage voter participation."

ANTITRUST:

Mittal To Sell WV Mill To Settle DOJ Antitrust Concerns. The Baltimore Sun (9/28, Connolly) reports, "Mittal Steel Co. NV said yesterday that it plans to sell its Weirton, W.Va., mill rather than Sparrows Point if it's compelled to dispose of a U.S. property to settle antitrust issues." The Sun continues, "Netherlands-based Mittal said it had identified at least 10 potential buyers for the West Virginia property, easing concerns at the Baltimore County plant, which Mittal acquired in 2005. Sparrows Point employs nearly 2,500 salaried and hourly workers. … Mittal must sell either Weirton, Sparrows Point or Canadian steelmaker Dofasco in the wake of its $38 billion merger with Luxembourg-based Arcelor SA to appease Justice Department officials, who say the combined company, Arcelor Mittal, would have a monopoly on tin production in the United States." The Sun adds, "Mittal has promised to sell Dofasco to German-owned ThyssenKrupp AG, but despite the merger agreement, Arcelor officials refuse to let it go. In one of a series of moves to fend off Mittal's nearly six-month hostile takeover bid, Arcelor transferred Dofasco to a Dutch trust, making a sale without Arcelor's consent impossible. … The Justice Department has given Mittal until Nov. 28 to sell Dofasco, with the option of a 60-day extension. If Mittal is unable to sell Dofasco, the Justice Department will give Mittal 90 days to sell either Sparrows Point or Weirton."

Icahn Eyes Bigger Stake In Federated Stores. Bloomberg (9/28, Timberlake) reports, "Federated Department Stores Inc., owner of Macy's and Bloomingdale's, said billionaire investor Carl Icahn plans to buy $113.4 million to $500 million of additional stock, sending the retailer's shares to a record." Bloomberg continues, "If Icahn purchases $500 million of Federated stock, he would be acquiring about 11.5 million shares at today's price and boosting his stake to 2.5 percent. Icahn, 70, notified Federated of his plans to seek regulatory approval for the purchase, the company said today in a statement." Bloomberg adds, "Icahn is known as a corporate raider, taking stakes in companies and forcing management to take steps to improve stock prices. Federated shares have more than tripled since February 2003. … Federated, the second-biggest U.S. department store company after Sears Holdings Corp., converted more than 400 stores to the Macy's name earlier this month, doubling the total. The stores were acquired as part of last year's $11 billion purchase of May Department Stores Co. … Anyone who purchases more than $58 million in a company must report it to antitrust enforcers at the U.S. Justice Department and Federal Trade Commission. The requirement gives the government an opportunity to determine if the transaction poses any antitrust problems. The government has 30 days to decide whether to open an antitrust investigation."

DOJ_NMG_0070238

Judge Dismisses Key Portion Of AMD Antitrust Suit Against Intel. The AP (9/28, Robertson) reports, "A federal judge dismissed a major portion of Advanced Micro Devices Inc.'s antitrust lawsuit against archrival Intel Corp., ruling that AMD cannot sue in the U.S. for Intel's alleged monopolistic tactics overseas." The AP continues, "The judge also set a trial date of April 27, 2009 for AMD to argue that Intel forced major customers into exclusive deals and offered secret rebates to undercut AMD in the market for microprocessors that act as the brains of computers." The AP adds, "U.S. District Judge Joseph J. Farnan Jr. set the 2009 trial date Wednesday, a day after stripping a key component from AMD's lawsuit, which alleges anticompetitive practices in several countries including Britain, Germany and Japan." The AP notes, "On Tuesday, the Delaware-based judge ruled that AMD failed to prove that Intel's alleged strong-arm tactics abroad had "direct, substantial and foreseeable effects" on AMD's operations in the United States. … Santa Clara-based Intel, the world's largest computer chip maker, argued that AMD should not be able to sue in the U.S. for alleged lost sales of microprocessors that were made and sold in other countries. It also argued that part of AMD's case should be dismissed because AMD was seeking redress abroad for 'foreign commerce claims.' … AMD, which filed its lawsuit in June 2005, maintains that the market for microprocessors is global and that Intel's conduct domestically and abroad are inextricably linked."

Symantec Claims Microsoft Withholding Spyware Technology. CNET News (9/28, Espiner) reports, "Symantec has accused Microsoft of withholding key information about its upcoming Vista operating system in an attempt to gain an advantage in the security market." CNET continues, "The security specialist said this week that Microsoft is refusing to hand over the application programmable interfaces (APIs) for Windows Defender, the spyware product that will be included in Windows Vista. Without the APIs, Symantec contends that it's unable to ensure that its own security products are compatible with the update. … 'Microsoft is affirmatively introducing bottlenecks to funnel customers to their products,' said John Brigden, Symantec senior vice president for Europe. 'It's all about control and dominance. They are deliberately delaying giving us the APIs.'" CNET adds, "Microsoft responded to Symantec's concerns on Wednesday, and said it had made the APIs for Defender available earlier this week. … Microsoft added the functionality to disable Windows Defender in Release Candidate 1 of Vista, or RC1, which came out early this month. There may have been some confusion in the industry because the accompanying information for developers, called a software development kit, or SDK, did not provide details on the functionality, the company said."

Johnson & Johnson Suit Claims Abbott Leak Subverted $24 Billion Deal. The New Jersey Law Journal (9/28, Daks) reports, "Johnson & Johnson has filed suit in federal court against Abbott Laboratories and two medical device manufacturers, seeking at least $5.5 billion for alleged tortious interference and breach of a merger agreement." The Journal continues, "The New Brunswick, N.J.-based health care company charges that a planned $24.2 billion acquisition of Guidant Corp. of Indianapolis was scotched in early January after Guidant leaked confidential information to another manufacturer, Boston Scientific Corp., which ultimately bought Guidant for $27 billion." The Journal adds, "In December 2004, J&J announced it had structured an agreement to buy Guidant, a heart device manufacturer. To ease antitrust regulators' fears, the companies agreed to grant a nonexclusive license for certain Guidant patents to Abbott Labs, a competing health care company based in Columbus, Ohio. … J&J says the terms of the deal prohibited Guidant from providing confidential information to any other company unless the third party was making a superior, unsolicited takeover offer. That caveat was designed to keep Guidant from using its agreement with J&J to shop around for higher offers. .. Last December, Boston Scientific made a $25 billion offer for Guidant, later upped to $27 billion, and, as part of its formal offer on Jan. 8, said it would ease antitrust fears by selling certain Guidant businesses to Abbott. Abbott in turn agreed to make a $700 million loan to Boston Scientific. … J&J alleges that Abbott was induced to cooperate when it received confidential information about Guidant. The complaint contends that J&J was alerted to the alleged breach by a comment Boston Scientific CFO Lawrence Best made during a Jan. 9 conference call about its deal with Guidant."

Endesa Board Expected To Approve E.On Offer. The Wall Street Journal (9/28, Johnson, Singer) reports, "German utility E.On AG's richer offer for Endesa SA is expected to clinch an approval from the Spanish power company's board, according to people close to the matter… ." Should the "$47 billion all-cash offer go through, one of the first effects could be an acceleration of a merger between Iberdrola SA and Union Fenosa SA, Spain's second- and third-biggest electricity companies. That would create another Spanish company big enough to fend off foreign suitors and even make acquisitions abroad. It would also leave smaller regional power companies, such as Spain's Gas Natural SDG SA or Energia de Portugal SA, prey to a second wave of consolidation." The Journal notes, "If completed, E.On's bid for Endesa would be Europe's biggest cross-border electricity deal, and would create one of the Continent's largest power companies."

DOJ_NMG_0070239

Phone Companies Seek To Unload Land Lines In Rural Areas. The New York Times (9/28, Belson, 1.21M) reports that many phone companies are trying to reduce the number of land lines it owns. Big phone and cable companies "are reluctant to upgrade and expand their networks in sparsely populated places where there are not enough customers to justify the investment. Instead, they are funneling billions of dollars into projects in cities and suburbs where the prospects for a decent return are higher. But those projects are unlikely to reach rural areas of Vermont and other states, leaving millions of people in the Internet's slow lane, just as high-speed access is becoming more of a necessity than a luxury. The United States already lags behind much of the industrialized world in broadband access."

Glassman Makes Case For Cable Competition. James Glassman, a resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/28) that California's legislature has "voted overwhelmingly to allow competition into a sector -- cable television -- where prices have been elevated and service depressed by the most pernicious monopoly in America. When Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signs the bill, as expected, companies that want a statewide video franchise can go straight to the Public Utility Commission and get approval to operate within 44 days." Glassman adds, "Yes, Americans can choose satellite TV, but, for reasons of convenience and service, many find it an inadequate substitute. There's a reason that cable families far outnumber satellite families. … But if satellite TV improves and becomes a more attractive alternative, what's wrong with having enhanced cable competition, too? The more the merrier is, apparently, an economic concept that some folks in Congress still don't get."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

US Will Not Charge ConocoPhillips For 2004 Oil Spill. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (9/28, McClure, Shukovsky) reports, "After a mysterious midnight oil spill turned central Puget Sound beaches into a stinky mess, the Coast Guard proudly proclaimed that investigators had tracked down the spiller. The oil's chemical fingerprint clearly implicated a ConocoPhillips tanker, the agency said. … That was more than 1 1/2 years ago. … But now, federal prosecutors in Seattle are declining to press criminal charges against ConocoPhillips, even though the chemical fingerprint showed that the substance spilled was crude oil, which is usually carried by tankers such as ConocoPhillips' Polar Texas." The P-I continues, "The Polar Texas was in the vicinity of the spill in Dalco Passage, near Vashon and Maury islands, on the night of the October 2004 spill. It was the only oil tanker there that night. .. The decision by U.S. Attorney John McKay's office not to prosecute ConocoPhillips, which hasn't acknowledged guilt, doesn't mean the firm is totally off the hook. Federal and state environmental officials are still pushing civil cases against the Houston-based oil company. … And a grand jury in Alaska investigated allegations of criminal conduct by the company in unrelated episodes, including the apparent cover-up of another oil spill. It's unclear whether criminal charges will be brought in that case." The P-I adds, "In Seattle, Assistant U.S. Attorney Jim Oesterle would not elaborate on why McKay's office is declining to prosecute, saying commenting might interfere with ongoing negotiations between the company and environmental officials regarding possible civil penalties. … 'I'm not prepared at this point to give all the reasons for (declining prosecution), and the reason for not providing more information is I don't want to get ahead of the state or the (Department of Justice) on their resolutions, because I know they're in the midst of those negotiations,' Oesterle said."

Schwarzenegger Signs Greenhouse Gas Measure Into Law. The Los Angeles Times (9/28, Finnegan, Lifsher, 918K) reports, "California moved to the front of local government efforts to fight global warming today when Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed legislation calling for a reduction of greenhouse gases." The bill "commits the state to reduce the emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases by 25% by 2020. Greenhouse gases trap heat in the atmosphere and cause global warming." The Times adds, "At an elaborate signing ceremony at Treasure Island in San Francisco Bay, Schwarzenegger put pen to paper, a scene he repeated at a second ceremony at Pepperdine University in Malibu. 'We simply must do everything we can in our power to slow down global warming before it is too late,' Schwarzenegger said at Treasure Island." The New York Times/AP (9/28) runs a brief report on the signing, while the Washington Post (9/28, D1, Mufson, 748K) mentions it in a story about US governors, who "impatient with federal inaction on global warming, are taking matters into their own hands. The result could add impetus to an emerging industry."

DOJ_NMG_0070240

WPost Comments On Global Warming "Policy Crisis." In an editorial titled "Heed This Warning," the Washington Post (9/28, A22, 748K) says "global warming represents a policy crisis responsible politicians can no longer ignore -- one as potentially existential as the threat of global terrorism, only in slow motion. Countering that threat will require regulatory initiatives and societal investments. It will require significant changes in American attitudes toward energy use and conservation." But "these may prove far less wrenching than many people imagine. What it certainly also will require is a great deal of political will -- political will of precisely the type the Bush administration has dedicated to a host of other issues but has assiduously avoided devoting to climate change. Most of all, it will require an end to denial -- denial that the problem exists."

DC Area Has Fewer Smoggy Days But Still Falls Short OF Federal Standards. The Washington Post (9/28, B1, Fahrenthold) reports, "The number of dangerously smoggy days in the Washington area has declined by more than 40 percent since 2003, but the region still does not meet federal standards for healthy air, according to data released yesterday. … Officials said yesterday that they were encouraged, believing the reduction in bad air days was a sign that local and national anti-pollution measures were having an effect. 'The air's cleaner,' said D.C. Council member Phil Mendelson (D-At Large), chairman of COG's air quality committee. 'But not clean enough.'"

Indian Ranchers Await Trial On Suit Against US. The AP (9/28, MacPherson) reports from Mandaree, ND, "American Indian rancher Keith Mandan says he could double the size of his black Angus herd if he had the money -- or if he were white. … Mandan, 53, and his wife, Claryca, 52, say they've struggled financially to keep their ranch in North Dakota's Badlands since the late 1970s because of a pattern of discrimination by the federal government.." The AP continues, "The Mandans are among the plaintiffs in a lawsuit that accuses the U.S. Department of Agriculture of discriminating against American Indians in the granting of loans since 1981. During that time, Claryca Mandan said, the federal government 'wiped out a whole generation of Indian farmers and ranchers because of racism.'" The AP adds, "USDA officials refused to respond to specific questions from The Associated Press about the allegations. In a statement, J. Michael Kelly, an attorney for the USDA, said the case is still ongoing and the agency is working to provide documentation requested by the Indians' attorneys. … Earlier this month, attorneys for the American Indian ranchers and farmers filed a motion to bring the case to trial next year — eight years after the lawsuit was filed. … A hearing on their motion is set for Thursday."

Navajo Teen Aspires To Serve Reservation As FBI Agent. The Deseret Morning News (9/28, Kinkead) reports, "From the northernmost tip of the massive Navajo Nation, 13-year-old Elsha Black surveys the arid expanse of his grandmother's property in San Juan County. … He is one of the few young people who speak fluent Navajo. He learned it living with his grandmother on the land where she was born. He says he'd prefer to live here now and swears he will come back" from New Mexico. "But for now, this young man must live off the reservation. He needs a good education. His mom needs a good job. His family says neither can be found here today." The Morning News notes, "Black wants to be an FBI agent. He wants to work out of the Shiprock, N.M., office to help members of the tribe and solve crimes."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

San Diego Chargers Safety Arrested In Cough Syrup Investigation. There are more than 300 media references to San Diego Chargers safety Terrence Kiel's arrest in connection with the transport and possession of cough syrup. Several stories cited Kiel's reported admission to shipping packages containing cough syrup. For example, ESPN (9/27) reports Kiel "was arrested Tuesday on drug-related charges. Kiel was arrested on two charges of transporting a controlled substance and three charges of possession for sale of a controlled substance — Codeine-based cough syrup. The law enforcement sources told ESPN's Chris Mortensen that several plain clothes DEA agents appeared at the Chargers' facility Tuesday morning with an arrest warrant, searched his locker and car, and took Kiel away." ABC News posted the ESPN story on its Web site.

Bloomberg (9/27) reports the DEA said Kiel "admitted to shipping to Texas two packages containing the substance. He was released on $150,000 bond, said DEA spokesman Dan Simmons, and will be arraigned in District Court on Oct. 3."

The AP (9/27) reports that while Kiel "did not tell the DEA his motive, the agency in Texas has found widespread abuse of codeine-based cough syrup mixed with soft drinks or drugs and referred to as 'lean,' said John S. Fernandes, the special agent in charge of the San Diego office. A pint bottle of 'lean' can cost between $200 and $325 on the street, he said." The DEA "is investigating where Kiel got the cough syrup, who else may be involved and the intent. An arraignment was scheduled for Tuesday." Media outlets that used the AP story include CBS News, MSNBC, Forbes, the New York Times, Washington Post, USA Today, Los Angeles Times, San Francisco Chronicle, Houston Chronicle, and Seattle Post Intelligencer.

DOJ_NMG_0070241

UPI (9/27) writes that federal authorities "say…Kiel has admitted to shipping prescription cough syrup from California to Texas."

The San Diego Union-Tribune (9/27) reports that two federal law enforcement officials, "speaking on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation, said quart bottles full of what appears to be prescription cough syrup were found at Kiel's house. Both officials said Kiel admitted to financial difficulties when interviewed by agents. Kiel first drew attention after FedEx officials…opened a package he shipped June 2 and found 15 pint bottles of codeine-based cough syrup, according to a search warrant affidavit filed in San Diego Superior Court."

On its Web site, KNBC-TV, Los Angeles (9/27) reports two FedEx packages "shipped by…Kiel contained a controlled substance identified as a Codeine-based cough syrup, according to search warrant affidavit released Wednesday. … According to the affidavit, FedEx customers consent to have their parcels opened and examined by the company at any time. On June 2, management at FedEx conducted an audit of a parcel which contained 15 bottles of Prometh with Codeine, considered a controlled substance."

Cable TV Coverage. ESPN (9/28, 1:00 a.m.) reported, "San Diego starting strong safety Terrence Kiel will miss Sunday's game at Baltimore after being arrested on felony drug charges. DEA officials say Kiel admitted to sending two parcels of prescription cough syrup to Texas. He will be arraigned on Tuesday."

Local TV Coverage. KFMB-TV, San Diego (9/27, 6:30 p.m.) reported, "A federal agent alleges that Terrence Kiel tried to cover up his crimes. The San Diego Chargers safety has admitted to shipping two Fed Ex packages including this cough syrup with codeine. … Agents say quart-size bottles were also found. … During an interview with agents he admitted he'd been having financial problems."

KGTV-TV, San Diego (9/27, 6:30 p.m.) reported, "Terrence Kiel is facing drug charges after being arrested…on possession of a controlled substance. They're linked to Fed Ex packages full of cough syrup with codeine. … The codeine-based syrup is commonly diluted and mixed with Sprite or 7-Up or something else with a street value up to $300. Cough syrup seems innocuous in and of itself; when it has codeine, it's a whole different set of problems."

KUSI-TV, San Diego (9/27, 6:30 p.m.) reported, "New details emerging about the arrest of Terrence Kiel, according to a search warrant affidavit released today. Two Fed Ex packages shipped by Kiel contained a controlled substance identified as a codeine-based cough syrup."

KNSD-TV, San Diego (9/28) reports, "JCodeine-based cough syrup is a Schedule V controlled substance, according to the Justice Department. … 'Actions like those of Mr. Kiel simply add fuel to the already raging fire of prescription drug abuse in our country,' said Special Agent in Charge John S. Fernandes of the Drug Enforcement Administration." KNSD-TV adds, "Kiel, a 25-year-old who plays strong safety, admitted to shipping two parcels of prescription cough syrup to Texas, DEA officials said Wednesday. While Kiel did not tell the DEA his motive, the agency in Texas has found widespread abuse of codeine-based cough syrup mixed with soft drinks or drugs. The mixture is referred to as 'lean,' said Fernandes, who is in charge of the San Diego office. A pint bottle of 'lean' can cost between $200 and $325 on the street, he said. … Kiel was arrested on two counts of transporting a controlled substance and three counts of possession for sale of a controlled substance."

Suspected Illegal-Immigrant Drug Dealers Targeted In Colorado Investigation. The Aspen (CO) Daily News (9/28) reports the DEA and ICE "have been targeting suspected illegal-immigrant drug dealers in the Roaring Fork Valley this week. Agents…are not commenting on the roundups except to say they are happening and that more information will be released today. A spokesman with ICE said the DEA was the lead agency on the investigation and that ICE was asked to provide assistance. … Two weeks ago, ICE agents rounded up 34 alleged illegal immigrants throughout the valley as part of a nationwide initiative called Operation Return to Sender that led to thousands of illegals being deported."

Border Tunnel Prevention Act Gains Support. Copley News Service (9/27, Kammer) reports Sen. Dianne Feinstein "is one of the main advocates of a tunnel-criminalization effort that is reaching fruition with the inclusion of the measure in legislation to fund the Department of Homeland Security. The Border Tunnel Prevention Act would impose criminal penalties of up to 20 years in prison for those who construct or finance tunnels, which have proliferated in recent years in San Diego County and other border areas." While officials "suspect the tunnels are primarily used to smuggle drugs, they have raised other concerns about them. 'A tunnel can be used to smuggle drugs, illegal aliens, weapons and possibly weapons of mass destruction into the United States,' said special agent Steve Robertson." The Copley story was used by the San Diego Union-Tribune.

Effectiveness Of Plan Colombia Scrutinized Following Police Unit Killings. The Christian Science Monitor (9/28, Harman) today continues its focus on members of an elite police unit who were killed in May in Jamundí. The Monitor says most of the officers were DEA-trained counternarcotics specialists who "had been killed by a military unit. Colombia's attorney general says the soldiers were on the narcotraffickers payroll." However, the Monitor reports John Walters says progress has been made against narcotraffickers with, as the Monitor puts it, the U.S. and Colombian governments "inexorably bound together in a multibillion dollar war against the drug trade." The Monitor continues by scrutinizing the effectiveness of Plan Colombia and writes that President Uribe said, "It is clear we cannot abandon Plan Colombia. But it is also clear that, in comparison to our efforts, we should be seeing better results."

DOJ_NMG_0070242

IMMIGRATION:

Boehner Says Congress Will Pass An Additional $1.2 Billion For Border Security. House Majority Leader John Boehner was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (9/27) what laws Republicans have passed to stop illegal immigration. Boehner said, "In the Homeland Security Appropriations Conference Report that is finished, will be finished, voted on both the House and Senate this week, we will add $1.2 billion over and above what was already agreed to for additional borders. … It's going to build more fences, more vehicle barriers and more test programs to look at virtual security on the border." Asked if the President will sign the bill, Boehner said, "He'll sign this bill. You look at what's happened this year. The number of incursions of our border has dropped precipitously, and it's happened because we've got the National Guard down there. We've done a lot over the last five years. It's showing real progress. And the Immigration Service has done a better job of cracking down on employers who hire illegal aliens. All of that together has driven down the number of people coming across our borders."

Armey Blasts Conservatives Over Opposition To Bush Immigration Proposals. McClatchy (9/28, Montgomery) reports former House Majority Leader Dick Armey "is now savaging conservatives in his own party for what he calls 'knee-jerk' opposition – 'emphasis on jerk' - to the Bush administration's efforts to create a temporary guest-worker program and overhaul the nation's immigration system." When it "comes to the immigration debate that's raged in Congress for much of the past two years," Armey "takes an almost polar-opposite position from many of his former Republican House colleagues, who are pressing for tough border security measures, including a 700-mile fence along the Southwest border." After appearing with Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, and Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind., "co-sponsors of a proposed immigration compromise that includes a privately managed guest-worker program," Armey said, "This has been rallied up by a lot of people that are very visible, make a lot of noise and have never been guilty of any deep thinking." McClatchy adds, "Unabashedly naming names, Armey described Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., as the 'cheerleader of jerkiness in the immigration debate' and said conservative commentator Pat Buchanan 'is content to be a rock star' for '10 percent of the most militant voters in America.'"

Advocates Hope Congress Takes Up Skilled Immigrant Visas. The Washington Post (9/28, A12, Kalita, 748K) reports that for "technology companies and research institutions that have spent recent autumns lobbying for permission to hire more foreign workers, this was supposed to be the year that ended the annual rite of desperation." A Senate-passed bill "would have doubled the number of visas issued every year for highly skilled professionals, such as scientists and engineers. And it would have helped clear a backlog of applications for permanent residency from such workers." But the "attempt by Congress to rewrite the nation's immigration laws has bogged down in controversy over border security and illegal immigration. That means changes in the skilled-worker programs, while less controversial, are also in limbo." Advocates are now "hoping members of Congress will focus on the issue in the lame-duck session late this year."

Anti-Immigrant Grassroots Groups Having Impact. The Wall Street Journal (9/28, A1, Jordan, 2.03M) reports on the "anti-immigrant brushfire that is gathering force at the grass-roots level around the U.S. Small groups like" Californian Joseph Turner's "Save Our State are cropping up from coast to coast, recruiting members and devising tactics to tackle illegal immigration in their communities. Critics call many of these groups racist, a charge organizers deny. What no one disputes is that they are tapping into widespread frustration over the federal government's failure to adopt a national immigration policy while a deeply divided Congress clashes over how to deal with 12 million illegal immigrants." The Center for New Community, "a Chicago organization that tracks immigration issues, says there are 211 so-called nativist groups -- groups that advocate protecting the interests of native inhabitants against those of immigrants -- across the U.S., up from 37 two years ago." The Southern Poverty Law Center, "which tracks extremist groups, also says nativist groups are on the rise and that several are hate groups, including Mr. Turner's Save Our State. The law center defines a hate group as one that singles out and promotes hatred of another group, based on ethnicity, language, religion, sexual inclination or immigration status. Mr. Turner denies he runs a hate group." These "grass-roots organizations are having an impact."

DOJ_NMG_0070243

Herndon, VA, Moves To Crack Down On Illegal Immigration. A front page story in the Washington Post (9/28, A1, Turque) reports, "Herndon's decision Tuesday night to seek federal training for some of its police officers so they can enforce federal immigration law is part of a long-term effort by a new mayor and Town Council to aggressively curb the presence of residents who are in the country illegally. Two proposals on the draft agenda for next week's council session would intensify the town's scrutiny of private employers. One would require anyone seeking a business license to prove legal immigration status. The other would compel contractors doing business with the town to provide evidence that their employees live in the United States legally." The Post notes, "Illegal immigration has been the dominant issue in town politics since summer 2005, when the council voted, after bitter debate, to open a publicly funded center to help workers connect with employers."

TAX:

IRS Probing Merck's Offshore Partnership. The Wall Street Journal (9/28, A1, Drucker) reports, "Merck & Co.'s medications Zocor and Mevacor have been used by millions of people to help lower their cholesterol. But Merck also used the drugs to lower something else: its U.S. tax bill." The Journal continues, "Thirteen years ago, Merck set up a subsidiary with an address in tax-friendly Bermuda, in partnership with a British bank. Merck quietly transferred patents underlying the blockbuster drugs to the new subsidiary, according to documents and people familiar with the transaction. Merck then paid the subsidiary for use of the patents. … The arrangement in effect allowed some of the profits to disappear into a kind of Bermuda triangle between different tax jurisdictions. The setup helped Merck slash $1.5 billion off its federal tax bills over roughly the next 10 years. … Now, the complicated transaction -- never publicly disclosed -- has sparked one of the largest tax disputes ever involving a U.S. corporation. The Internal Revenue Service is challenging the tax benefits from the arrangement, which the company code-named 'Project Ryland,' after a fancy restaurant near the company's New Jersey headquarters. Merck anticipates it will be ordered to hand over a total of $2.3 billion in back taxes, interest and penalties, according to its filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission, which give the amounts in dispute but virtually no other details." The Journal adds, "Merck says it did nothing wrong and that the deal was simply a way of raising financing for its 1993 acquisition of a pharmacy-benefits management firm, Medco Containment Services Inc. … The IRS won't discuss its objection to the Merck partnership. But it is pursuing actions against Dow Chemical Co. and General Electric Co. over similar arrangements they set up within a few months of the Merck deal. Those, federal tax authorities have argued, weren't real partnerships with foreign banks but just well-disguised loan agreements, designed to avoid taxes by maneuvering between the tax laws of different countries, with no economic substance."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Congress Set To Approve Record-High Defense Budget. In a story somewhat critical of high spending, the Wall Street Journal (9/28, A8, Rogers, 2.03M) says Congress "is poised to send President Bush a record $447 billion Pentagon budget that anticipates defense spending next year will exceed annual expenditures at the height of the Vietnam War." The Journal says the "huge costs weigh heavily on the political landscape this fall and contrast with the more limited Republican domestic agenda before the midterm elections." Meanwhile, McClatchy (9/28, Brown) reports a new Congressional Research Service study concludes the "total cost of military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan and enhanced security at military bases" since 9/11 "could reach $549 billion this year." The report "says war costs are expected to continue to grow in the next decade."

Congress Nears Recess With "Do Nothing" Label Looming. CBS Evening News (9/27, story 3, 2:35, Couric, 7.66M) reported the 109th Congress "might well be remembered more for what it didn't do." CBS (Attkisson) added, "A CBS News/'New York Times' poll finds 75% of voters can't name one thing Congress has accomplished." It is "not as if they've really been sitting around doing nothing. Today's House passage of the bill providing for military tribunals for enemy combatants is evidence of that. But so many big-ticket items are still dangling. Give Congress an incomplete on immigration, port security, lobby reform, even domestic wiretapping. Democrats say, 'Don't blame us.'" Sen. Byron Dorgan: "We don't control the Congress, the majority party does." Attkisson: "Majority party, as in Republicans who control the House and Senate and should be able to pass whatever they want. Problem is, they haven't agreed on much." The President "will be coming back to Capitol Hill tomorrow that's for the second time in two weeks, perhaps to highlight one of the big accomplishments they will be making which is passing the military tribunals. Congress is expected to return here for a short time after the elections, but there's always the question of whether they have the time and the motivation to get much of anything done then."

In the Washington Post's "Washington Sketch" column (9/28, A2), Dana Milbank critiques the visual props used by members of Congress in the final days of the session and

DOJ_NMG_0070244

says, "Measured by days in session or legislative output, this Congress has secured its place as one of the most lethargic of all time. But if historians choose to award points for creativity, the 109th could go down in the books as a most prolific body."

Bush To Rally Senate Republicans Before Recess. The Hill (9/27, Allen) reports President Bush "plans to rally Senate Republicans this morning as they prepare to leave town and hit the campaign trail." A Senate Republican aide "said the president would likely discuss the GOP's accomplishments, particularly in the realm of national security, an issue the White House is trying to draw attention to in the six weeks before the election."

Jeb Bush Offering Public Criticisms Of President's Education Policy. The New York Times (9/28, A1, Dillon, 1.21M) reports, "Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida has long played the dutiful younger brother." He has "mostly held his tongue about" the differences between his education reform plan in Florida and the president's "even as detractors of all stripes have attacked it. But in recent weeks…Governor Bush has been speaking out about the federal law, mixing dollops of praise with measured criticisms -- and taking an occasional potshot." His criticisms "could well provide the president's opponents with ammunition against his signature law." Gov. Bush also said that U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings is "eager to reform, to reauthorize N.C.L.B." Gov. Bush has credited NCLB with making Florida give "increased attention" to "disabled and limited-English students."

Connecticut's Challenge To Bush Education Reforms To Continue Minus Three Of Four Claims. The New York Times (9/28, Dillon, 1.21M) reports Judge Mark R. Kravitz of Federal District Court in New Haven, Connecticut "yesterday dismissed much of Connecticut's closely watched legal challenge to President Bush's education law, No Child Left Behind, but allowed the state to go forward with its claim that Washington treated the state unfairly in negotiations over how to carry out the law." The state claims that the "secretary of education 'acted arbitrarily' in denying Connecticut's request for an exemption from the law, after the state had concluded that it would receive insufficient financing to carry out the law's testing mandates." Afterwards, "both sides expressed satisfaction" with the ruling.

The AP (9/28) reports Judge Kravitz "dismissed three counts, saying state officials can't challenge the law until they have violated it." The U.S. Department of Education "had asked for a dismissal of the entire lawsuit, arguing that the state understood the law when it accepted hundreds of millions of dollars in education funding."

Conrad, Spratt Criticize Bush Tax Cuts, GOP Budget Shortcomings. McClatchy (9/28, Rosen) reports Sen. Kent Conrad, ranking Democrat on the Senate Budget Committee, said "some of the tax cuts enacted under President Bush might get 'trimmed' if his party regains control of Congress." Conrad and Rep. John Spratt, ranking Democrat on the House Budget Committee, "sharply criticized Republicans for failing to adopt a budget or to pass any of the 12 annual appropriations bills." Conrad said, "We face red ink as far as the eye can see, with the nation's debt continuing to grow out of control. The debt is skyrocketing, and there's been a failure among the Republicans themselves to arrive at a budget." McClatchy adds Conrad "responded cautiously when asked whether Democrats would extend the tax cuts that Congress passed in 2001 and 2003 if they gain control of the House of Representatives or the Senate in the Nov. 7 elections." Conrad said Democrats "would likely retain 'middle-class tax cuts' such as the child tax credit started under President Clinton and the repeal of the 'marriage tax penalty' enacted under Bush." But Conrad "added that Democratic lawmakers might have to revisit the broader income tax reductions that Bush pushed through Congress during his first 30 months in office."

House GOP Leaders Announce Date For Leadership Elections. The Hill (9/28, O'Connor) reports Republican aides aid House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) "has set the date for GOP lawmakers to elect their leaders for the next Congress." The "organizing conference" is schedule "for Wednesday, Nov. 15, the week Congress resumes after the hotly contested midterm election." The GOP elected leaders "made their decision earlier this week after wavering on the date of the post-election contest in the face of a potentially devastating midterm, even though the conference was already scheduled to meet that Wednesday." Each of the eight elected leaders "must stand for reelection for the new Congress." Speaker Hastert and Majority Leader John Boehner "should be safe, even if Republicans lose the House by a narrow margin, but other posts could be up for grabs even if the GOP holds the House." The announcement "of leadership elections is part of a coordinated effort to project confidence before members leave town for the stretch run heading into the November election."

Boehner Appears Secure In GOP Leadership. Roll Call (9/28, Davis) reports Rep. Boehner "appears to be on solid ground to keep his seat at the leadership table in the 110th Congress — even if it's in the minority." Boehner has been Majority Leader "for eight months in a session of Congress marked by leadership upheavals, ethical and criminal scandals and few major legislative victories, and yet — in the estimation of his colleagues — he has emerged largely unscathed." Still, a "number of potential leadership shake-ups could present themselves after the results of Election Day come down. Depending on the outcome, there could be surprise retirements, upstart challenges and calls for retribution."

DOJ_NMG_0070245

Liberal Democrats Not Rallying To Murtha For Possible Majority Leader Race. The Hill (9/28, Hearn) reports liberal House Democrats "are not lining up behind Rep. Jack Murtha's (D-Pa.) leadership candidacy in the numbers he had hoped despite his outspoken stance against the Iraq war." Murtha's "failure to line up staunch opponents of the war could prove a blow to his hope of denying the majority leadership to Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (Md.) in the event of a Democratic takeover of the House in the 110th Congress." Rep. Jim Moran (D-Va.), "a friend of Murtha who has been helping him with the race, said tepid support among some progressives was a worry to him." Moran said, "It does concern you when people you think are going to be with you turn out not to be. Some of that's cultural issues, guns and abortion. But we still have the votes." The Hill adds, "Liberal Reps. Maxine Waters (D-Calif.), Barney Frank (D-Mass.), Bill Delahunt (D-Mass.), Tom Lantos (D-Calif.), John Lewis (D-Ga.), Jerry Nadler (D-N.Y.), Lucille Roybal-Allard (D-Calif.), Diane Watson (D-Calif.) and Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) are all backing Hoyer even though many admire Murtha's stance on the war. All but Lewis opposed Hoyer in a 2001 leadership race against House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.)." Some liberals "believe Murtha's record on social issues is too conservative, especially on such topics as gun rights, gay marriage and abortion. Others avow that they are happy with Hoyer's performance as minority whip and want to maintain the status quo in their leadership."

Snow Walking "Fine Line" In Attending GOP Fundraisers. NBC Nightly News (9/27, story 3, 2:40, Gregory, 9.87M) reported that Tony Snow, White House press secretary, "will be doing fundraisers in advance of election day. This was something he acknowledged today. He said the President did not object to him doing it and the political team said you are popular and we want you to do this but he acknowledged it will raise some eyebrows. He says it is unprecedented. For him it will be a fine line. There is no policy against it but it is a real question. He serves the presidency but he acknowledges he also serves the press corps. He wants to stick to the facts about what the President is doing and not attack Democrats individually."

Budget Cuts Seen As Threatening NASA's Aviation Program. USA Today (9/28, 1A, Levin, 2.27M) reports in its main front-page story that "Groups of lawmakers from both parties, academics and aerospace leaders say" steep budget cuts in the NASA's aeronautics research "are hampering NASA's ability to develop new aviation technology." According to USA Today, "the agency is planning to cut $54 million -- or 31% -- from its effort to study emerging technologies required for a new national air traffic system. NASA is the primary agency researching the Next Generation Air Traffic System, an ambitious program to replace radars with satellite-based technology. Without increased capacity from the new system, airlines can expect increasing flight delays, according to government estimates."

Military Officers Group Concerned About Military Pay Raise. Stephen Barr writes in the "Federal Diary" column in the Washington Post (9/28, D6, 748K), "The House approved a fiscal 2007 defense appropriations bill late Tuesday that would raise military pay by 2.2 percent, effective in January," and "Senate negotiators have signed off on the raise." Now, the Military Officers Association of America, known as MOAA, "urged Congress to approve a 2.7 percent across-the-board raise for the armed forces," saying "this is not the time to skimp on a raise," which also "usually spills over into the civil service." Norb Ryan Jr., president of MOAA and a retired vice admiral, said, "that regardless of which proposed raise gets adopted, it would be the smallest military raise in 11 years," and that the low raise "will send the wrong message to military families."

Amendment Would Block Spending On Parts Of National Security Personnel System. Stephen Barr writes in the "Federal Diary" column in the Washington Post (9/28, D6, 748K), "In a move that may be more about symbolism than substance, House and Senate negotiators on the defense spending bill have prohibited the Pentagon from spending money on disputed parts of the new National Security Personnel System (NSPS)." Sponsored by Reps. Jay Inslee, Walter B. Jones Jr., and Chris Van Hollen, it would "prevent the Defense Department from carrying out plans to restrict union rights and revise procedures for disciplining civil service employees." However, "the Pentagon has contended that the Inslee amendment is unnecessary because" a federal district already "blocked those parts of the NSPS" and "NSPS officials are complying with the court's injunction."

Morris Says Frist Has Failed As Majority Leader. Dick Morris writes in The Hill (9/28) reports, "If Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) were still in his former occupation, he could well be sued by his 54 fellow Republicans, 99 senators, and the American people at large for malpractice." As Senate Majority Leader, "Frist performed about as well as a heart surgeon with mittens on. He failed utterly to provide the leadership necessary and managed to so mangle the reputation of the legislative wing of the Republican Party in the process that it may take several elections, and perhaps a Hillary Clinton presidency, to recover."

DOJ_NMG_0070246

Book By Frist's Wife Offers Tribute To Father-Daughter Relationships. The Washington Post (9/28, A21, 748K) reports Karyn McLaughlin Frist, wife of Senate Majority Leader Bill First, "was at the White House, at a small dinner for the king of Spain. President Bush's daughter Jenna walked in late. At first, the president seemed irritated. But one look at Jenna as she hurried into her seat, and Bush 'absolutely melted,' Frist recalled. 'He broke into a big, proud smile.'" The Post adds, "Fathers and daughters captivated Frist, in part because she missed her own father, who had died. Frist invited women -- senators, heads of state, Olympic medalists and a soldier -- to write about their fathers, in a book to be published next week, 'Love You, Daddy Boy: Daughters Honor the Fathers They Love.'" Many of the essays "peek into the foyers of political homes."

Wessel Says Paulson Is "Brightest Bulb" In Bush's Cabinet. David Wessel writes in The Wall Street Journal (9/28, 2.03M), "President Bush faces a big decision in coming weeks: how best to deploy his energetic, impatient new Treasury secretary, Henry Paulson, after November's congressional elections." Paulson "is emerging as the brightest bulb in a Bush cabinet with a few dim ones and a few others (think Don Rumsfeld) who have lost their luster. He has mastered the easy stuff: managed to avoid rattling financial markets, figured out that courting Congress takes as much time and care as courting customers at his former employer, Goldman Sachs, and marched through China triumphantly, greeting old acquaintances and posing for photographs as if he were at a Dartmouth reunion. Now what? … The question now is whether Mr. Bush will use the third corporate chief executive to take the job to get something done or relegate him to making speeches for two years."

NYTimes Praises Advisory Group's Recommendations For FDA. The New York Times (9/28, 1.21M) editorializes, "A prestigious advisory group has put its weight behind criticism that the Food and Drug Administration is pitifully weak when it comes to removing dangerous prescription drugs from the market. Last week, a panel appointed by the Institute of Medicine, part of the National Academy of Sciences, issued a slew of recommendations to strengthen the beleaguered F.D.A. as it struggles to regulate a huge array of medications whose ill effects sometimes show up only after years of wide use. … Although the nation is mired in budget deficits, the institute was wise to call for a large increase in financing and personnel for this crucially important regulator of public health. If Congress is too stingy to ante up more money, it should at least divert some of the drug industry's user fees to surveillance after a drug's approval."

OTHER NEWS:

Dow Jones Edges Closer To All-Time High. NBC Nightly News (9/27, story 8, 2;15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Now to the US economy, all eyes were on Wall Street today, wait to see if perhaps the Dow would set a new all-time stock market record. It turns out that did not happen but it was very close. The Dow was within 2.5 points of that record. By the time the market closed it was up by about 20 points [to close at 11, 689.24] 34 points away from the record. NASDAQ was up two points [to close at 2,263.39] today. What does all of this mean for the economy if anything? Here is Anne Thompson." NBC (Thompson) added, "Wall Street is riding high on a wave of confidence about the economy." Alan Skraninaka, Edward Jones Chief Market Strategist: "We are seeing signs anywhere the economy is not overheating or sinking into recession. It is growing at a nice, steady pace and that is what Wall Street loves to see." Thompson: "With a cooling housing market and still high energy prices, is Wall Street seeing things through rose colored glasses?" Mark Zandi, Moody's Economy.com: "They are seeing things that they like. With a slower growing economy they will get that."

USA Today (9/28, Shell, 2.27M) reports, "Posting its third-straight day of gains, the Dow rose 19.85 points to close at 11,689.24, just 33.74 points shy of its record close of 11,722.98 hit on Jan. 14, 2000. … The celebration was put on hold as one of the main culprits that have put a lid on stock prices the past year -- rising energy prices -- again gave investors a reason to sell. A barrel of crude rose $1.95 to $62.96." The Wall Street Journal (9/28, Browning, 2.03M) says the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "inched up 0.02%, or 0.25 point, to 1336.59, ahead 7.1% this year and up 5.2% for the quarter."

Reports Paint Mixed Picture Of The Economy. USA Today (9/28, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) reports, "More evidence of a slowing economy came Wednesday as the government said orders for costly manufactured goods fell in August while sales of new homes rose, but remained at a subdued level." New orders for durable goods "fell 0.5% in August after adjusting for seasonal fluctuations, the Commerce Department said. That followed a 2.7% plunge in July and marked the first back-to-back monthly drops in the often volatile data since spring 2004."

The Wall Street Journal (9/28, Morales, 2.03M) reports, "The latest readings on business investment and housing muddied the economic picture: Orders for big-ticket goods fell unexpectedly in August as new-home sales rose unexpectedly." The Census Bureau "reported that sales of new homes rose 4.1% in August from a month earlier, to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.050 million. The unexpected jump ran counter to other recent data depicting slowing sales." But "analysts cautioned not to focus too much on a one-month statistic. Indeed, compared with August a year ago, new-home sales were down 17.4%. And earlier this week, the National Association of Realtors said existing-home sales in August fell for the fifth consecutive month, while the national median price fell, year over year, for the first time in 11 years." Likewise, the New York Times (9/28, Peters, 1.21M) runs a story titled "Report Shows Home Sales Rising, But Skeptics Abound."

DOJ_NMG_0070247

Hispanic Unemployment Down Sharply. The Washington Post (9/28, A13, Brulliard, 748K) reports, "Unemployment among Hispanics fell sharply this year, and their wages rose after a two-year decline, according to a national study released yesterday." The Post adds, "Bolstered by immigration, the Hispanic labor force is growing rapidly, and those workers are having little trouble finding jobs -- especially in construction, said the report by the Pew Hispanic Center. … Latinos, who represent 13 percent of the U.S. labor force, accounted for 40 percent of all new workers in the year ending June 30, the report said. Eighty percent of jobs filled by Hispanics went to immigrants, who make up the biggest share of the Latino labor force."

Press Corps Resents Closed Bush Fundraisers. The White House Bulletin/US News (9/27) reported, "Resentment is building within the White House press corps over the increasing number of President Bush's fundraising appearances that are closed to the media. Five such events are on his schedule this week alone, including fundraisers in Connecticut and Ohio on Monday." Reporters, who are "already chafing because of the Administration's penchant for secrecy, complain that the public has a right to know what the President is saying to his supporters. They also argue that their news organizations pay thousands of dollars to cover Bush on the road and then they are shut out of the fundraisers -- which have become a huge part of his itinerary as the November 7 mid-term elections approach." White House Press Secretary Tony Snow "says these events are mostly held in private homes and the owners don't want to allow coverage." In addition, "many hosts are wealthy individuals who feel that coverage would invade their privacy and subject them to snide stories about being fat cats who are isolated from everyday life, the host of a recent fundraiser told US News and the Bulletin." Another factor "is that many GOP candidates want Bush to raise money for them but they don't want to be seen publicly with him because he is unpopular in their districts and states."

Bush-Rove, Hillary Clinton Fundraisers Take Place On Same DC Street. The Washington Post (9/28, Argetsinger, Roberts, 748K) reports, "We knew this would happen sooner or later -- Tuesday night, secluded Whitehaven Street in Northwest was clogged by dueling fundraisers. President Bush and Karl Rove mingled with donors at the home of White House social secretary Lea Berman and husband Wayne, raising $1.5 million for the GOP in Iowa, Arkansas and Wisconsin. Two doors down, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton presided over a low-key event for about 50 $2,000 donors to her senatorial reelection bid. Limo lock!"

Danforth Says GOP Needs To Move Away From Christian Conservative Base. The Christian Science Monitor (9/28, Cook, 58K) reports on the Monitor breakfast with former Sen. John Danforth, who "looks like a quintessential Republican insider but he is calling for a radical change in how his party operates." Beneath his "polished and calm exterior is a man upset with his party. Danforth is traveling the country promoting his new book, 'Faith and Politics: How the Moral Values Debate Divides America and How to Move Forward Together.' The book argues that Republicans have transformed their party into a political arm of conservative Christians." Danforth said, "For the Republican party, the base of our party now is the Christian conservatives.... The Republican party has done everything it can to appeal to that part of the base ... I think this is bad for the country and ultimately it is going to be bad for the Republican party because I think when the American people reflect on this they do not want a sectarian political party in this country. So what I am trying to do is encourage them to reflect on it." Danforth said he would not "leave the party despite his unhappiness with its current course."

The Washington Post (9/28, A4, Slevin, 748K) reports Danforth is "telling audiences this month" that the "potency of the Christian right in the Republican Party is limited." A "lifelong Republican moderate disturbed by his party's direction, he contends that the political center has a future." Danforth is "promoting a new book that describes religion as a divisive force in the United States today and accuses the religious right and its political supporters of creating a sectarian party." The GOP leadership "habitually strives to please its base at the expense of meaningful compromise, he maintains, proving to be neither humble Christians nor effective politicians. His reasoning holds that social conservatives cannot prevail because a majority of Americans do not share their views or appreciate their style."

GOP Open House Seats in Arizona, Colorado, Iowa At Risk. Roll Call (9/28, Drucker) reports while "predictions of a Democratic wave on Nov. 7 may be overblown, Republicans are clearly on the defensive in three open seats that could prove key to their ability to retain the House majority in the 110th Congress." The Republican-held seats "in Arizona, Colorado and Iowa were seen as major battlegrounds. But now they are in serious jeopardy of going Democratic, with the 7th district in Colorado and the 1st district in Iowa, in particular, signifying the decline of the GOP brand name in the eyes of voters this cycle." Democrats are "clearly benefiting from the decision by the GOP incumbents who hold these seats to retire from Congress. But it is telling that the Republicans running in their stead find themselves down significantly in public opinion polls to their Democratic opponents." In AZ8, former state Sen. Gabrielle Giffords (D) "seems poised to easily dispose of former state Rep. Randy Graf (R)." The "eastern Iowa 1st district and Denver-area 7th district of Colorado have repeatedly voted Democrat for president while choosing Republicans to represent them in the House." In the former, "voters appear to be favoring a Democrat, trial attorney Bruce Braley. He led wealthy businessman Mike Whalen (R) by 7 points in the latest independent poll." In CO7, "former state Sen. Ed Perlmutter's (D) early and healthy lead over former state official Rick O'Donnell (R) — despite a bruising Democratic primary — indicates the GOP isn't getting the benefit of the doubt from voters this year, as opposed to the previous two cycles, when Rep. Bob Beauprez (R) won competitive races."

DOJ_NMG_0070248

GOP Effort To Win Ohio's 6th CD Seen As Fizzling. The Washington Post (9/28, A6, Cillizza, VandeHei, 748K) reports that four months ago, Democratic state Sen. Charlie Wilson "was teetering on the edge of defeat in his campaign for Ohio's open 6th District. Today he is strolling toward Nov. 7, when, if current trends continue, he will be elected to Congress." No "television ads for Wilson or his Republican opponent, state Rep. Chuck Blasdel, are airing. For the moment, the national party organizations, which swarm into the most competitive races, are nowhere to be found." The departure of Democratic Rep. Ted Strickland – who is running for governor -- from the 6th CD "once tantalized Republicans, who regarded this seat -- carried narrowly by President Bush in 2004 -- as their most promising chance to take a congressional seat from the Democratic column." But Blasdel's campaign "never gained much traction after Wilson, considered the strongest of three contenders, won the Democratic primary in May."

Democrats' Rejection Of "Contract" To Win House Majority Analyzed. In his Roll Call column (9/28), executive editor Morton Kondracke says, "The 12th anniversary of the Republicans' 1994 'Contract with America' came and went on Wednesday without a 2006 Democratic counterpart. And there won't be one." Despite "repeated urging from various quarters, including from former President Bill Clinton, that the party needs to make clear what it stands for and not just against, Democrats contend that off-year elections are referenda on the party in power and that a Democratic alternative agenda would only provide targets for the GOP to attack." It is "undoubtedly true that the GOP won" the 1994 midterm election largely "because of disgust with Democratic management — the failure of Clinton's health care reform plan and Congressional scandals — but the contract did provide a legislative roadmap for the GOP once it won a 52-seat victory and had to help govern the country." This year, Democrats "have issued a two-page positive agenda, 'New Direction for America,' but there's been no Capitol steps rally, and the document has all the earmarks of being just a handout designed to be an answer to the question, 'But what do Democrats stand for?'" A "positive message of purpose -- saying where they'd lead instead of just how much trouble they'd inflict on Bush -- could push them over the top. Maybe Democrats don't need a Contract, but they could use a plan."

Rothenberg Skeptical Of Unknown Democrats' Poll Performance. In his Roll Call column (9/28), political analyst Stuart Rothenberg says, "Democratic pollsters are pushing lots of polls that show second- and third-tier candidates performing surprisingly well. If most of these challengers win, the Democrats will gain 30 or 40 House seats. Obviously, that's unlikely. Extremely unlikely. So what are we all supposed to make of Democratic polling memos asserting that Paul Hodes (New Hampshire's 2nd), John Hall (New York's 19th), Jason Altmire (Pennsylvania's 4th), Victoria Wulsin (Ohio's 2nd), Charlie Brown (California's 4th), Nancy Skinner (Michigan's 9th) and Dan Maffei (New York's 25th) are breathing down the necks of incumbent Republicans?" Some of "these numbers stem from the fact that the Democratic base has solidified early on and Democratic candidates are getting the vote that normally comes to them only in October. The folks over at Public Opinion Strategies, I believe, coined the term 'premature partisan polarization' to refer to the current tendency of voters to pick their party's Congressional candidates earlier and earlier, even if they know nothing about them." Democratic pollsters "almost always cite Bush's standing. They almost all argue that voters want change or are dissatisfied with the direction of the country. And they are right, but only so far. The problem for Democrats is that in most cases, that won't be enough by itself to get voters to fire GOP incumbents. That's particularly true if Republicans pound away at their challengers, making them the issue in their races and decreasing their appeal as vehicles for change."

Good Economic News Seen As Boosting GOP Chances For Keeping Congress. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (9/27, 2.03M) reported, "Stock market gains and declining gasoline prices are likely helping boost Republican

DOJ_NMG_0070249

odds for holding the House and Senate in some market-style exchanges. In the Iowa Electronics Market, a futures market operated for research purposes by economics professors at the University of Iowa, the latest trading data suggests a 55% probability that Republicans will keep control of the House, up from 37% just a few weeks ago. On the Irish betting exchange Tradesports.com, contracts for Republican retention of the House also are up sharply since the beginning of September. As for the big kahuna -- control of both chambers of Congress --- IEM traders are currently placing a 59% likelihood that Republicans will still be calling the shots in both chambers after the Nov. 7 midterm elections, up from 38% earlier this month."

House Republicans Promote Suburban Agenda. The Washington Times (9/28, Bellantoni, 88K) reports while House Republicans "trumpeted elements of their suburban agenda, Democrats yesterday said Congress will have failed the American people if it adjourns without increasing the minimum wage." Rep. Mark Steven Kirk, chairman of the GOP's Suburban Agenda Caucus, said, "The battleground is in the suburbs, and it is wise policy and wise politics to directly meet the needs of families in those areas." Kirk said "both parties for too long have focused on rural or urban voters. The country now is 54 percent suburbanites who face similar challenges, he said." The Times adds Republicans "outlined seven 'suburban agenda' measures for 2007 aimed at improving education and health care. They also are pushing the Alternative Energy Act of 2006, which funds research for plug-in electric hybrid car technology and studies solar and wind power." Democrats, "meanwhile, tried to force a vote on increasing the minimum wage, a move many centrist Republicans support."

Democrats Said To Have Serious Shot At Senate Majority. The New York Times (9/28, Toner, 1.21M) reports in a front page story, "Six weeks before Election Day, the Democrats suddenly face a map with unexpected opportunities in their battle for control of the Senate." Virginia Sen. George Allen "looks newly vulnerable after a series of controversies over charges of racial insensitivity, strategists in both parties say." In Tennessee, Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., "has run a strong campaign that has kept that state in contention." In other states, Democratic challengers "are either ahead or close in races in five states held by the Republicans: Missouri, Montana, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Rhode Island, according to political strategists in both parties and the latest polls." Democrats "also have their own vulnerabilities, particularly in New Jersey, where Senator Robert Menendez is in a tight race with his Republican challenger, State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr., according to recent polls." Democrats "must win six Republican seats to regain a Senate majority," and "a shift in the Senate was always considered a long shot this year. Some analysts now say, however, that there are enough Republican seats facing serious challenges to make it at least plausible." Political analyst Stuart Rothenberg said, "There's a big difference in talking about six seats in play and not five."

Allen Campaign, Beset By Controversies, Has Difficulty Gaining Traction. ABC World News (9/27, story 6, 2:15, Gibson) reported in the Virginia Senate race, Republican George Allen "was thought to be a shoe-in for re-election. But he's made a series of gaffes that are giving him serious trouble." ABC (Tapper) added Sen. Allen has "had to spend the week denying reports that he regularly used the 'n' word to describe African-Americans." The charge has been "made by at least five Allen acquaintances." However, Democratic challenger Jim Webb "facing no such allegations of his own, seemed to provide Allen with something of a defense." Jim Webb: "I don't think there's anyone who grew up around the South that hasn't had the word pass through their lips one time in their life." Tapper: "For weeks, tough questions for Allen about his sensitivity on racial matters. It began at this campaign stop, where Allen singled out an Indian-American Democratic operative, calling him 'macaca.'" Prof. Mark Rozell: "When you have a campaign that's on the defensive all the time, as is the case with George Allen, there is no possibility of getting a positive, constructive message out there for the voters to respond to."

USA Today (9/28, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports, "'It has been one misstep and meltdown after another' for the Allen campaign, Mark McKinnon, a strategist for President Bush, said Tuesday at a panel discussion on political advertising in New York sponsored by USA TODAY." Democrats, "who need six new seats for a Senate majority, are poised to invest heavily here." Still, the FEC reports "for June 30, the most recent available, showed Allen with a formidable financial edge: $6.6 million on hand vs. $424,000 for Webb."

Webb Amplifies Statement He Has Not Used Racial Epithet. The Washington Post (9/28, B1, Shear, 748K) reports Webb "sought to explain remarks he had made a day earlier, in which he refused to say whether he had used the 'N-word,' but he insisted he has never used it as a racial epithet aimed at anyone." Spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd "said Webb, an author and former Marine, 'did not want to make any blanket statements that he has never, ever uttered the word. Jim has not used the word directed at another person. He's never used it himself as a racial slur.'" The Post adds Webb's comments to the Richmond Times-Dispatch "prompted Allen campaign officials to direct a reporter to Dan Cragg, a former acquaintance of Webb's, who said Webb used the word while describing his own behavior during his freshman year at the University of Southern California in the early 1960s. Webb later transferred to the U.S. Naval Academy." Cragg said Webb "described taking drives through the black neighborhood of Watts, where he and members of his ROTC unit used racial epithets and pointed fake guns at blacks to scare them."

DOJ_NMG_0070250

Barnes Says Allen Campaign Unprepared For Presidential Focus. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (9/28), Fred Barnes says, "The national press hasn't treated Mr. Allen as an ordinary candidate. He's in a different category: Likely Presidential Contender. His re-election bid thus floats beyond local Virginia matters, becoming a test of Mr. Allen's viability as a national candidate for 2008. The media grew still more interested when Mr. Allen got a serious Democratic opponent, James Webb, a well-known novelist, Vietnam veteran and angry ex-Republican." After the "macaca" incident, "Allen was thrown on the defensive, appearing increasingly rattled. He made things worse by giving several confusing, contradictory explanations and declined to apologize for several days. Then he apologized, over and over again. His lead in polls dropped to a slim four-point advantage." Would Allen's "gaffe have become a huge issue absent his presidential ambitions? Probably not, even with attention focused so closely on 2006 congressional races. Would the Post have hyped the macaca story day after day? I doubt it." Allen's campaign has "seemed unprepared for the way that presidential races, with their high visibility, draw out personal information." Allen "needs to remind voters of his success as governor. He abolished parole, reformed welfare and championed education reforms. New voters, many of them in Northern Virginia (which has one-third of the state's voting population), know little of Mr. Allen's impressive political background."

Herbert Says Allen Represents GOP "Bigotry." In his New York Times column (9/28), Bob Herbert says, "George Allen, the clownish, Confederate-flag-loving senator from Virginia, has apparently been scurrying around for many years, spreading his racially offensive garbage like a dog that should be curbed. With harsh new allegations emerging daily, it's fair to ask: Where are the voices of reason in the Republican Party -- the nonbigoted voices? Why haven't we heard from them on this matter?" You "don't hear President Bush or the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, or any other prominent Republicans blowing the whistle on the likes of George Allen and Conrad Burns because Republicans across the board, so-called moderates as well as conservatives, have benefited tremendously from the party's bigotry."

Ford Running Competitive Race For Tennessee Senate Seat. The Washington Times (9/28, DeBose, 88K) reports Tennessee is "living up to its reputation as a battleground state with Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., a Democrat, running neck and neck with Bob Corker, Chattanooga's Republican mayor, in their race for the Senate." Corker's "early double-digit polling lead" has "dwindled into a statistical dead heat, and Democrats now think they can capture the seat in this Republican-leaning state." Emory University political analyst Merle Black said Republicans "have underestimated the effectiveness of Mr. Ford's campaign." Black said, "It just looks like Ford wants this a lot more than Corker does." The Times adds, "The stakes are high for Mr. Ford. A victory by the son of former Rep. Harold Ford Sr. would give Democrats an unexpected victory in their effort to pick up six seats to win back the Senate majority in November." It "also would mark the first time a black person in the South has won an open election to the Senate and could be seen as the first chink in the armor of the Republican's Southern fortress."

Mfume Endorses Cardin, Warns Democrats About Lack Of Diversity. The Washington Post (9/28, A1, Marimow, 748K) reports Democratic Maryland Senate candidate Benjamin L. Cardin "received the critical endorsement yesterday of Democratic primary opponent Kweisi Mfume, whose blessing came with a blunt warning about the lack of diversity among candidates for statewide office in Maryland." The "main attraction at Cardin's campaign rally at the University of Maryland was supposed to be Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.), a rising star in the Democratic Party. But Mfume -- who lost to Cardin on Sept. 12 -- left a stark impression, telling the Baltimore congressman and fellow Democrats, 'We have a problem.'" Mfume "enthusiastically put his arms around Cardin, saying: 'I know what he's done in the past, and I know what he'll do in the future. He's going to make a damn good senator.'" But he "cautioned that the party had much work to do to energize black voters. The Democratic nominees for the top four jobs, he noted, look no different than the ticket 50 years ago."

Obama Said To Have Outshined Cardin At Rally. The Washington Post (9/28, C1, Montgomery, 748K) reports Cardin invited "Mr. Democratic Charisma himself onstage for a rally yesterday in the Cardin quest to become U.S. senator from Maryland. Barack Obama didn't even have to open his mouth to have a crowd of a few hundred under a powerful spell in a grassy outdoor amphitheater at the University of Maryland in College Park. The junior senator from Illinois -- part Kenyan, part Kansan -- stood tall and youthful and bronze in a black suit and a baby-blue tie, his eyes half-closed, studying the audience with a kind of seductive lassitude. His arrival sparked an ovation, and he shot a quick amiable wink to the many pols and hopefuls crammed behind him on the stage, mute witnesses to the magic." Beside Obama "stood Cardin. Comparisons aren't polite, but the Democratic congressman from Maryland was asking for it: He looked older, shorter, pudgier and pinker."

DOJ_NMG_0070251

Crist Leads Davis By 15 Points In Florida Gubernatorial Race. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (9/27, 2.03M) reported, "In Florida, Republican Attorney General Charlie Crist not only got a much-welcome infusion of cash thanks to the fund-raiser in chief but also a poll by Mason-Dixon Polling & Research Inc. gave him a 15-point lead over Democratic nominee Rep. Jim Davis. The survey of 625 likely voters had a margin error of 4 percentage points."

Polls Show Schwarzenegger With Double-Digit Lead Over Angelides. The Washington Times (9/28, Harper, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Just six weeks before the midterms, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger holds a double-digit edge over Democratic nominee Phil Angelides in two independent voter surveys. The Governator held a 17-point lead over Mr. Angelides -- 48 percent to 31 percent -- in a survey released Tuesday by the Public Policy Institute of California. A Field Poll released yesterday put Mr. Schwarzenegger's advantage at 10 points, 44 percent to 34 percent. Another Field survey in February found the rivals tied at 39 percent. … The policy institute's poll of 1,091 likely voters was conducted Sept. 13 to 20. The margin of error was two percentage points. The Field survey of 557 likely voters was conducted Sept. 14 through Sunday, with an error margin of 4.3 percentage points."

David Broder writes in the Washington Post (9/28, A23, 748K), "The Terminator has rescued himself from political ruin by reinventing his approach to government, thus demonstrating in the most dramatic way possible the value of political independence. Just 10 months after California voters rejected all four of the ballot initiatives he put before them and sent his personal approval ratings crashing to dangerous depths…Schwarzenegger is riding high, poised to win a full term come November." Instead of "the partisan assault on public employee unions and Democratic legislators…that marked his rhetoric in 2005, Schwarzenegger has negotiated agreements this year on a minimum-wage increase, higher school spending, curbing air pollution and a mega-bond sale designed to meet overdue highway, flood-control and school-construction needs." Democratic leaders of the legislature "now sing his praises and join him on the platform at bill-signing ceremonies, while the unions debate whether it is worthwhile to put money into the rival campaign of the struggling Democratic nominee, state Treasurer Phil Angelides." This turnaround is "likely to yield a notable Republican victory in a year of widespread GOP losses."

Democrats' Attacks On Fox News Rally Base. The Washington Times (9/28, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports, "Nearly a week after Bill Clinton's angry appearance on 'Fox News Sunday,' Democrats have turned their vitriol on the Fox News Channel, in what some consider a calculated move to boost the left's enthusiasm before midterm elections." Democratic strategist Donna Brazile said, "It fires up our base, because they're glad someone is fighting back and setting the record straight." The Times adds that since Clinton's "interview with Fox's Chris Wallace was taped last Friday, high-profile Democrats, including California Sen. Barbara Boxer and strategist James Carville, have joined Mr. Clinton's criticism of the cable news network. Fox's critics say the persistent questioning of Mr. Clinton's record on terrorism is indicative of what they consider a conservative bias."

Giuliani Defends Former President Clinton's Counter-Terror Efforts. The AP (9/28, Sedensky) reports former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani "defended Bill Clinton on Wednesday over the former president's counterterrorism efforts, saying recent criticism on preventing the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks is wrong." Giuliani, who was in Florida to appear with Republican gubernatorial candidate Charlie Crist, said, "The idea of trying to cast blame on President Clinton is just wrong for many, many reasons, not the least of which is I don't think he deserves it. I don't think President Bush deserves it. The people who deserve blame for Sept. 11, I think we should remind ourselves, are the terrorists - the Islamic fanatics - who came here and killed us and want to come here again and do it."

LA Times Responds To WSJ Op-Ed On "Path To 9/11" Movie. In a statement published in the Wall Street Journal letters to the editor section (9/28), the Los Angeles Times says, "On your Sept. 18 editorial page, Cyrus Nowrasteh wrote 'The Path to Hysteria,' in which he chronicled his experience of the scandal surrounding the television movie he wrote, 'The Path to 9/11.' In his account, Mr. Nowrasteh wrote: 'The L.A. Times, for one, characterized me by race, religion, ethnicity, country-of-origin and political leanings -- wrongly on four of five counts. To them I was an Iranian-American politically conservative Muslim. It is perhaps irrelevant in our brave new world of journalism that I was born in Boulder, Colo. I am not a Muslim or practitioner of any religion, nor am I a political conservative. What am I? I am, most devoutly, an American. I asked the reporter if this kind of labeling was a new policy for the paper. He had no response.'" The Times continues, "He was referring to a front-page article in the L.A. Times ('ABC Stands By Its 9/11 Story -- Almost,' Sept. 9) in which Scott Collins and Tina Daunt described the writer as 'a politically conservative Iranian American Muslim.' We would like to set the record straight, one point at a time." Nowrasteh, "as he wrote in The Wall Street Journal, has Iranian parents. Which would make him Iranian-American. Mr. Nowrasteh's politics have been widely characterized as conservative in the Washington Post and elsewhere. Additionally, last October he appeared on a panel at the Liberty Film Festival that was named "Rebels

DOJ_NMG_0070252

With a Cause: How Conservatives Can Lead Hollywood's Next Paradigm Shift.' In a Q&A interview with Libertas: A Forum for Conservative Thought on Film (http://www.libertyfilmfestival.com/libertas/index.php?p=462), Mr. Nowrasteh identified himself as '"Islamic-American.' And finally, in his piece in the Journal, Mr. Nowrasteh also implied that he contacted the reporter about his complaints, and was ignored. This is not the case: Scott Collins spoke on the phone with Mr. Nowrasteh after the article came out."

Hillary Clinton Faces Quandary On AIDS Funding Bill. The Hill (9/28, Bolton) reports an AIDS funding bill "that has stalled on the Senate floor has put Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) in a difficult position — forcing her to choose between the interests of her home state and those of battleground states in the 2008 presidential election." Elected officials "and AIDS activists from Iowa, South Carolina, and Ohio are urging senators to pass the Ryan White Comprehensive AIDS Resources Emergency Act, which would increase their state's funding for people infected with HIV, the virus that causes AIDS." A group of "activists and officials are focusing their efforts on Clinton because she has the highest profile among the bill's opponents. They may also be calculating that they have most leverage with her because she is expected to run for president." But the bill "would steer money away from major urban areas in New York, New Jersey and California to smaller, more rural states that have seen a dramatic increase in HIV infections in recent years." Clinton and Sen. Charles Schumer "outlined their objections to the new funding formula in a recent letter to Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-N.Y.). 'New York State stands to lose more than $78 million in Ryan White Title II funds over four years,' they wrote." That position "puts Clinton at odds with Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D), who urged for AIDS funding to be restructured in a letter to Sens. Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.), the chairman of the Senate health committee, and Edward Kennedy (Mass.), the panel's ranking Democrat."

Falwell Says Clinton Presidential Candidacy Will Energize People Of Faith. Rev. Jerry Falwell said on CNN's The Situation Room (9/27) that "if the Democrats choose Hillary as their…presidential candidate in '08, this will energize people of faith in this country more than any other person."

Bill Clinton To Celebrate 60th Birthday With Foundation Fundraiser. The Washington Post (9/28, C1, Balz, 748K) reports, "Baby boomer and former president Bill Clinton is laying plans to celebrate his 60th birthday in grand style with a charitable fundraising extravaganza in New York late next month that will include an invitation-only concert by the Rolling Stones and contributor packages that run to $500,000 and higher." Clinton's daughter, Chelsea, "who has generally avoided high-profile participation in her parents' political and philanthropic activities, is serving as co-host of the three-day party. She will host a Saturday brunch on a weekend that also features a golf tournament at the Bayonne (N.J.) Golf Club, multiple receptions and a dinner at the American Museum of Natural History with the former president, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Chelsea." The "2,100 invitations began arriving this week. Weekend packages start at $60,000 (Hint: $1,000 for every year of Clinton's age). Next is the 'Vice Chair Package,' for those who contribute $100,000 or raise $250,000. Those who pledge $500,000 or more will receive the 'Birthday Chair Package,' which includes the 'Backstage Pass' dinner and photo with Clinton and platinum seating at the Saturday dinner and the Stones concert." The proceeds "will go to the William J. Clinton Foundation, the umbrella organization that oversees the Clinton HIV-AIDS initiative, the Clinton Global Initiative and several other programs launched by the former president since he left office almost six years ago."

GOP To Hold 2008 Convention in Twin Cities. ABC World News (9/27, story 5, 0:15, Gibson) reported, "In politics, tonight, the Republicans will hold their convention in 2008 in Minneapolis/St. Paul. Minneapolis last had a national convention in 1892. The Democrats have narrowed their choices to Denver or New York." The GOP choice is being widely reported this morning. The AP (9/28) said it was "a location in the politically pivotal Midwest," while McClatchy (9/28, Hotakainen, Diaz) reports "Minnesota's emergence as a presidential battleground state paid off." The Twin Cities beat three other finalists: New York, Cleveland and Tampa, Fla."

USA Today (9/28, 2.27M) reports, "By picking the Twin Cities, the GOP will ensure plenty of news coverage in Minnesota, Wisconsin and Iowa, all of which were close in the 2004 election, said Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn. 'Whoever wins those states is going to be the next president of the United States.'"

The Hill (9/28, Snyder) reports, "The convention proper will be held in Xcel Energy Center in St. Paul, where the Minnesota Wild National Hockey League team plays," but "Minnesota officials said the decision holds broad economic impact for the region. The convention could bring in as much as $150 million, officials said." Democrats "were also considering holding their convention in 2008 in the Twin Cities. But the Democratic mayors of St. Paul and Minneapolis expressed no regret that their cities would host the showcase event for the rival party."

The New York Times (9/28, Kornblut, 1.21M) says Republicans "insisted their choice had not been politically driven. But in choosing Minneapolis and St. Paul…the party guaranteed itself widespread news media attention in three adjoining swing states, Minnesota, Iowa and Wisconsin. The convention is scheduled for Sept. 1-4, 2008." The Washington Post (9/28, A6, Slevin, Balz, 748K) reports the story in similar terms, under the headline "With Eye On Midwest In '08, GOP Picks Twin Cities For Convention." The Post also reports Steven Schier, "a prominent Minnesota political commentator on the faculty of Carleton College, said the timing and the tactics suggest that the national Republican Party hopes to help its Minnesota candidates this year and appeal to voters in a swath of battleground states in 2008."

DOJ_NMG_0070253

Roll Call (9/28, Newmyer, Weinstein) notes Minnesota, "with a modest 10 electoral votes, hasn't backed a GOP presidential candidate since Richard Nixon in 1972. But margins in the state have narrowed, and it was a key battleground in the 2004 election, with Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) carrying it by just 3 points."

The Washington Times (9/28, Hallow, 88K) reports, "The decision to go with Minnesota also showcases one of the Republican Party's rising young conservative stars, Gov. Tim Pawlenty, 45, who was going to run for the Senate in 2002 until Vice President Dick Cheney persuaded him to run for governor instead so that Mr. Coleman could make his run against Mr. Wellstone without a primary fight." The Times adds, "All smiles yesterday, Mr. Pawlenty, a favorite of [RNC Chairman Ken] Mehlman's for vice president in 2008, called the choice of the Twin Cities 'fantastic.'"

Prominent Scientists Form 527 Group. The New York Times (9/28, Dean, 1.21M) reports several "prominent scientists said yesterday that they had formed an organization dedicated to electing politicians 'who respect evidence and understand the importance of using scientific and engineering advice in making public policy.'" Organizers of Scientists and Engineers for America 'said it would be nonpartisan, but in interviews several said Bush administration science policies had led them to act. The issues they cited included the administration's position on climate change, its restrictions on stem cell research and delays in authorizing the over-the-counter sale of emergency contraception." Organizers "include John H. Gibbons and Neal Lane, who were science advisers in the Clinton administration, the Nobel laureates Peter Agre and Alfred Gilman, and Susan F. Wood, who resigned from the Food and Drug Administration last year to protest the agency's delay in approving over-the-counter sales of the so-called Plan B emergency contraception." Executive director Mike Brown "said it would be a 527 organization under tax laws, meaning that it could be involved in electoral politics, and that contributions to the group would not be tax deductible."

Will Says Taxpayer Financing Of Presidential Elections Will Die In 2008. George Will writes in the Washington Post (9/28, A23, 748K), "The foremost achievement of the political speech regulators -- a.k.a. campaign finance 'reformers' -- is collapsing. Taxpayer financing of presidential campaigns, which was in parlous condition in 2004, will die in 2008. … It is delicious that the McCain-Feingold law, the reformers' most recent handiwork, is helping kill taxpayer financing of presidential campaigns. Before McCain-Feingold, limits on contributions of private money -- set in 1974 and not indexed for inflation -- became steadily more restrictive, so candidates accepted public funding. But McCain-Feingold, by doubling the permissible size of campaign contributions, made it easier for candidates to raise sums far larger than taxpayer funding provides." Will adds, "Reformers desperate to resuscitate taxpayer funding cite the supposedly scandalous fact that each party's 2008 presidential campaign may spend $500 million. If so, Americans volunteering to fund the dissemination of speech about candidates for the nation's most consequential office will contribute $1 billion, which is about half the sum they spend annually on Easter candy. Some scandal."

WPost Says Fairfax County Should Examine Deployment Of Its Vehicles. The Washington Post (9/28, A22, 748K) editorializes, "It began with an eagle-eyed auditor who, glancing at a garage maintained by Fairfax County's government for its huge fleet of official cars, noticed that too many of them spent their days parked, unused and apparently unneeded. The auditor rightly wondered whether the county bureaucracy -- 11,500 strong -- really warranted one vehicle per three employees. … Alas, the road to waste, inefficiency and bureaucratic scheming is paved with good intentions. On the one hand, the mileage minimum has helped prune the county's fleet by 167 vehicles, most of them in the year after the policy took effect. But, as reported by The Post's Lisa Rein, it has also prompted county workers and managers to devise ingenious methods to hang on to their county-owned cars -- by hook or by crook." The Post adds, "A better follow-up would be for the county to scrutinize the deployment of its remaining vehicles, tighten procedures governing their use and encourage more employees to use their own cars when possible (and claim reimbursement by mileage) -- a much more cost-efficient option."

WSJournal Defends Wal-Mart's Drug Discounts. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (9/28, 2.03M) says Wal-Mart's announcement that it will offer many generic drugs for $4 is not winning "applause from its left-wing critics." These are "the same folks who've complained for years about high drug prices, using the issue to argue for government price controls, shorter patent lives on new drugs, and reimportation of drugs from Canada and Mexico." The Journal adds, "Wal-Mart isn't a charity, and its $4 decision is designed to lift its own sales by undercutting prices at competing retailers. But that's the way the market works, driving prices lower with competition. It turns out that Wal-Mart's critics really didn't care about prices; what they want is more union clout, and more government control over health care."

DOJ_NMG_0070254

Ahmadinejad Says Iran Won't Give Up Right To Pursue Nuclear Program. The AP (9/28) reports, "Iran's hard-line president said Wednesday Iran won't give up "one iota" of its right to pursue a peaceful nuclear program." Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "reiterated his uncompromising stance as Iran's top nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani held talks with European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana in Berlin, described by an EU official as 'very intense.'"

Rice Backs This Week's Solana-Larjani Nuclear Talks. The AP (9/28, Graham) reports Solana and Larjani "held five hours of 'very intense' talks Wednesday over Iran's disputed nuclear program and planned to meet again" today. Although not participating in those talks, German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier "said he was optimistic progress could be made." Solana said he "would report back to the six countries" that authored the enrichment suspension incentives package. Secretary Rice "told reporters in Washington that she telephoned Solana on Wednesday and renewed U.S. support for his talks with Iran." She "said if Larijani agreed to a suspension of processing uranium 'we would be on a course for negotiations.' But, Rice told reporters, she had told Solana 'clearly this won't go on very much longer.'" Assistant Secretary McCormack "said whether Iran was agreeable to a temporary and verifiable suspension would not be known until Solana concludes his meetings with Larijani."

The Washington Times (9/28, Kralev, 88K) reports the Bush Administration "yesterday postponed its pursuit of UN sanctions against Iran for 'a few weeks' to allow its European allies time to try to negotiate a suspension of Iran's nuclear fuel production."

NYTimes Praises Buffet's Pledge For Nuclear Fuel Bank. In an editorial, the New York Times (9/28, 1.21M) writes that Warren Buffet "is pledging $50 million for a [nuclear] fuel bank — run by the International Atomic Energy Agency — to be a supplier of last resort for any country that chooses not to get into the risky reactor fuel business and gets the I.A.E.A. seal of approval." US "officials publicly welcomed Mr. Buffett's proposal as one way to persuade countries that they don't need to make their own fuel. But there's no talk of matching his largess." The Times says, "The White House -- which has long criticized the I.A.E.A. for not being tough enough on Iran -- is not eager to give the agency more power. Instead, the administration has joined with Russia and four other major fuel producers to offer overlapping supply guarantees, with each promising to make up for the others' possible shortfall. That's a start. But we suspect that any plan that has governments — rather than the more neutral I.A.E.A. -- offering guarantees won't calm suspicions or take away Iran's excuse." The Times concludes, "More than 50 years ago, President Eisenhower first proposed setting up an international nuclear fuel bank ... . Washington would do well to take a harder look at Mr. Buffett's -- and Mr. Eisenhower's -- excellent idea. And then come up with the cash."

Egypt Working On Nuclear Program. McClatchy (9/28, El Naggar) reports, "Determined to lead the Arab world into the nuclear club, Egypt is working on a nuclear energy program intended to reduce the country's dependency on oil." The program, announced last week by Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, "is expected to cost as much as $2 billion and will take more than a decade before the plants produce electricity. While other Arab nations also are looking into nuclear research and development, Egypt already has two low-level reactors, a half century of research and the remains of a comprehensive plan that was scrapped after the nuclear accident at Chernobyl in 1986."

Hill Says Pyongyang Talks Are Entering "Crucial Phase." The AP (9/28, Klug) reports Assistant Secretary Chris Hill "said Wednesday that negotiators are entering a crucial phase and suggested Washington is stepping up efforts to break a nearly year-long impasse." He "also urged the North to show it was serious about returning to the talks aimed at ridding Pyongyang of its self-professed nuclear weapons production program." Hill told an audience that "the next weeks would be 'critical' and spoke of a 'certain sense of urgency' involved in efforts to resume negotiations that include both Koreas, China, Russia, Japan and the United States." He later added that Washington "would not talk with North Korea 'in the absence of the six-party process.'"

AFP (9/28, Collinson) adds Hill "warned that any nuclear test by North Korea would be viewed by world powers as a 'very serious' escalation of the crisis over the Stalinist state's weapons programs." Testifying before the HIRC, Hill "also said Washington was considering whether to impose new sanctions on Pyongyang, despite warnings by several congressmen such a move would enflame the showdown." Rep. Tom Lantos and colleagues "warned in dire terms that a rumored move by the Bush administration to impose a new set of sanctions on the Stalinist state, could spell further bad news for the stalled six-party talks process."

DOJ_NMG_0070255

Rice Warns Khartoum About Continued Attacks, Opposition To UN Force. The Washington Post (9/28, A20, Kessler, 748K) reports, "The United States is considering a series of punitive steps if the Sudanese government fails to agree to a U.N. peacekeeping force to end the violence in Sudan's Darfur region, U.S. officials said yesterday." Secretary Rice "signaled the new approach in a speech yesterday in which she demanded an immediate cease-fire and warned that Khartoum faces 'a choice between cooperation and confrontation.'" She "demanded yesterday that Khartoum accept the U.N. force. While the Darfur agreement will not be negotiated, she said, 'we are conferring with rebels who want peace.' Rice added: 'We are seeking to address their legitimate concerns, and we will support them if they choose peace. If the rebels refuse, then they will face serious consequences, including targeted U.N. sanctions.'" Rice's "speech to the African Society's National Summit on Africa held out the prospect of improved ties between the two countries," however, "relations have worsened dramatically in recent weeks."

The New York Times (9/28, Cooper, 1.21M) says Rice "raised the threat of more international sanctions against Sudan if the government did not stop military operations in the Darfur region and unconditionally accept a United Nations peacekeeping force." She is quoted saying, "If the Sudanese government chooses confrontation, …then the regime in Khartoum will be held responsible, and it alone will bear the consequences." She "was blunt during her speech, laying the blame for the bloodshed at the feet of [President Omar el-] Bashir's government," and she "challenged Mr. Bashir's authority to refuse the United Nations peacekeeping force."

The AP (9/28, Gearan) reports she said Washington "will not sit still while innocent people are killed in Sudan's Darfur region." Rice "said Sudan's government could cooperate with the United Nations or face a confrontation. She warned of consequences if Sudan chose a fight and hinted at further U.N. penalties against the Khartoum government or rebel groups."

Hezbollah Facing Little Pressure To Disarm. The AP (9/28, Hendawi, Meyer) reports, "Six weeks after the end of the Lebanon war, the militant Hezbollah group is facing little on-the-ground pressure to give up its weapons and disarm -- despite a UN cease-fire resolution demanding just that." The AP adds, "The leaders of a UN peacekeeping force in south Lebanon say the job is not theirs. And Lebanon's ill-equipped army, some of whose soldiers wear tin-pot helmets and carry outdated M-16 rifles, shows no signs of diving into a confrontation with battle-hardened Hezbollah fighters."

Israel Releases Palestinian Deputy Premier After Five Weeks. The New York Times (9/28, Myre, 1.21M) reports, "An Israeli military court today released the Palestinian deputy prime minister, Nasser al-Shaer, one of more than 30 Hamas lawmakers and cabinet ministers who have been detained by the Israelis over the past three months." Shaer, the highest-ranking Palestinian in detention, was arrested on August 19 "but was not charged with any crime, and the court cited a 'lack of evidence' in ordering his release today." He "headed to his hometown of Nablus, in the West Bank, where he was greeted enthusiastically by supporters at a reception hall. However, the court said that for the next two weeks, Mr. Shaer would not be allowed to go to Ramallah, where his office is located and which serves as the Palestinian political headquarters in the West Bank." The Financial Times (9/28, Morris) says Shaer's "release was not viewed as a significant step in securing the freedom of [the kidnapped Israeli soldier]. Egyptian efforts to free the captive soldier have been complicated by internal tensions within the PA." And the AP (9/28, Daraghmeh) says "he detention of much of the Hamas-led government has been a major sore point in rapidly deteriorating relations between Israel and the Palestinians since Hamas took power." Shaer, "who did not run for parliament on the Hamas ticket but joined the government after the Islamic group's election victory, said he refused to talk politics in prison and denied he is a Hamas member."

State Dinner For Kazakh President Said To Highlight Conflicting Foreign Policy Goals. The New York Times (9/28, Myers, Greenberg, 1.21M) previews President Bush's state dinner tomorrow for Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbayez. The recent closure of "the two most prominent American democracy organizations working" in Astana "reflects the delicate balance the administration has struck with a country of growing strategic importance that has a record of corruption, flawed elections and rights violations, including the killings of two opposition leaders in the last year in disputed circumstances." Analysts say "Washington's failure to vocally criticize" such actions "also illustrates the Bush administration's willingness to sacrifice democracy, a centerpiece of its foreign policy, when it conflicts with other foreign policy goals." The Administration "has promoted democratic reforms in Kazakhstan for years, but it also appears eager to mollify a president who has been a comparatively moderate Muslim leader in Central Asia, who has allowed

USA Today (9/28, Slavin, 2.27M), meanwhile, runs a story titled "Kazakh Leader's Visit To Require Diplomatic Finesse," in which it says the visit has been "made awkward by the country's poor human rights record and questions about its commitment to democracy." Nazarbayev and Bush

DOJ_NMG_0070256

"will discuss energy, Kazakhstan's economy and efforts to fight terrorism and narcotics trafficking, the White House says." Bush also "will be 'encouraging Kazakhstan to accelerate progress on democratic reform,' says Frederick Jones, a spokesman for the National Security Council."

Mexico Criticizes Rice's Comments. The AP (9/28, Weissert) reports, "Mexico said Wednesday that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was out of line by suggesting that its democracy was just now maturing, saying it wasn't up to her to voice such opinions publicly." In a Monday interview with The Wall Street Journal's editorial board, Rice "said Mexico was beginning to put its disputed July 2 election behind it. 'Mexico has come through this crisis and I think it's been a real vote of confidence in the Mexican democratic system, which after all, is relatively -- it's just now maturing in a kind of two-party system,' Rice said." Ruben Aguilar, spokesman for President Vicente Fox, "said Wednesday that 'we shouldn't be surprised that other countries salute Mexican institutions,' but said Rice shouldn't comment on Mexican democracy. 'We don't agree with the declaration of the secretary of state because, in accordance with the construction of Mexico's political system, it's only up to Mexicans themselves to voice those opinions,' he said told a briefing for reporters at the presidential residence."

China Asks US Senate To Drop Tariff Bill. The Financial Times (9/28, Beattie, Dickie) reports, "China's foreign ministry on Wednesday called on US senators to drop a bill that would impose 27.5 per cent tariffs on Chinese imports in retaliation for Beijing's alleged undervaluation of the renminbi." The ministry said, "We hope the US senators will view objectively and rationally the problems that have emerged in the process of rapid development of Sino-US trade...and will cease deliberation on a bill harmful to Sino-US economic co-operation.'"

NASA Chief Ends Trip To China, Says Joint Spaceflight Unlikely. The New York Times (9/28, Leary, 1.21M) reports, "Any joint human spaceflights involving China and the United States will have to come in the future when there is more trust and openness between the countries, the NASA administrator, Michael D. Griffin, said Wednesday. Speaking in Shanghai toward the end of the first visit to China by top officials from the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, Mr. Griffin said there were 'no current plans to work with China on the space shuttle and space station programs.' Mr. Griffin, who characterized the five-day visit as enjoyable and informative, said that it was too early to talk about any cooperative programs between the nations, but that the first steps probably would be in data sharing and some type of joint effort with robotic spacecraft."

LATimes Suggests China's Crackdown On Corruption Is Politically Motivated. The Los Angeles Times (9/28, 918K) editorializes, "The Chinese government wants its people to believe that no one is beyond the reach of its sweeping anti-corruption campaign. That is the message behind the sacking and detention of Shanghai's Communist Party leader, Chen Liangyu, on Sunday. But few in China or anywhere else are likely to buy the notion that this is a principled crackdown on corruption." Chen's "real misfortune is to be associated with former President Jiang Zemin's Shanghai power base at a time when President Hu Jintao is trying to consolidate his control, partly by emasculating Shanghai's power within the party." The Times adds, "Never mind that a self-proclaimed campaign against corruption can itself be corrupt if politically driven; it still can reap dividends." China "has an 'anything goes' frontier mentality that Californians of a bygone era might have recognized. That's not sustainable forever. Lawless frontiers are a great place to make a quick buck, but eventually the citizenry gets fed up and starts screaming for a sheriff — one who isn't just going after his political rivals."

Effectiveness Of Plan Colombia Scrutinized Following Police Unit Killings. The Christian Science Monitor (9/28, Harman, 58K) today continues its focus on members of an elite police unit who were killed in May in Jamundí. The Monitor says most of the officers were DEA-trained counternarcotics specialists who "had been killed by a military unit. Colombia's attorney general says the soldiers were on the narcotraffickers payroll." However, the Monitor reports John Walters says progress has been made against narcotraffickers with, as the Monitor puts it, the U.S. and Colombian governments "inexorably bound together in a multibillion dollar war against the drug trade." The Monitor continues by scrutinizing the effectiveness of Plan Colombia and writes that President Uribe said, "It is clear we cannot abandon Plan Colombia. But it is also clear that, in comparison to our efforts, we should be seeing better results."

Decision To Cancel Berlin Opera That Might Offend Muslims Draws Fire. The New York Times (9/28, Landler, 1.21M) reports, "Amid all the issues that divide Germany's Muslims and non-Muslims -- from women's rights to the teaching of Islam in schools -- there was one point on which the 30 participants in a landmark conference held here on Wednesday could agree, according to its organizer. They would like to see the Deutsche Oper of Berlin reinstate the Mozart opera it canceled earlier this week after receiving an anonymous threat that the production — which features a scene with the severed head of the Prophet Muhammad — could put the opera house at risk." The Times adds, "In some ways, the opera affair galvanized the meeting — underlining the urgency and complexity of the issues facing Germany, as it seeks to integrate a Muslim population that is growing in size and, in the view of some, growing farther apart from mainstream German society."

DOJ_NMG_0070257

ABC World News (9/27, story 9, 1:25, Gibson) reported, "The fear in this case concerned how Muslims might respond to a depiction of Mohammed, in a Mozart opera, due to open in Berlin. It has touched off a raging controversy." ABC (Wright) added, "Berlin's Deutsche Opera took one look at protests over the Pope's recent comments about Islam. And the protests, before that, over the Danish cartoons of the prophet Mohammed. And they decided the German police might be right, that staging the opera would pose 'an incalculable security risk."

The Washington Times (9/28, Sands, 88K) reports that German Chancellor Angela Merkel "joined in the near-universal condemnation of Monday's decision by the Deutsche Oper, one of Berlin's three main opera houses, to cancel a planned revival of Mozart's classic 1781 work 'Idomeneo' because the production inserts a scene that displays the severed head of the prophet Muhammad." The Times adds, "The opera incident is just the latest in a string of cultural clashes that have bedeviled Europe in recent years, as the Continent's liberal democracies have struggled to adjust politically and culturally to large and growing Muslim minorities in their midst."

Guatemalans Seek Closure Decades After Civil War. A front page story in the Washington Post (9/28, A1, Aizenman, 748K) reports, "A decade after the conclusion of the long civil war that ravaged this Central American nation, Guatemalans are literally trying to dig up their past." Dozens of forensic anthropologists "have been fanning out across the countryside to search for remains of the 200,000 people -- most of them Mayan Indian civilians -- who were killed or abducted during the 36-year conflict. Many were massacred by military forces and dumped into mass graves. Others were buried hurriedly in unmarked, secret locations by relatives anxious to avoid rampaging troops. … Meanwhile, in a cavernous, damp warehouse in Guatemala's capital, investigators wearing protective masks and surgical gloves are combing through piles upon piles of mildewed documents from a recently discovered secret police archive, hunting for clues to the fate of the disappeared."

Bill Clinton Seeks To Boost Britain's Labour Party. The Washington Times/AP (9/28, Gardiner) reports former President Bill Clinton "sought yesterday to boost Britain's badly divided Labor Party, warning supporters not to let it suffer the same fate as America's defeated Democrats." Delegates at Labor's "annual conference gave a celebrity's welcome to a leader they love far more than President Bush, who is widely despised in the party." Clinton "charmed a packed auditorium with a 40-minute speech in which he lavished praise on Prime Minister Tony Blair and treasury chief Gordon Brown, Mr. Blair's likely successor." In a reference "to the political damage that Mr. Blair suffered at home because of his relationship with Mr. Bush, Mr. Clinton thanked him for maintaining Britain's alliance with the United States 'through quite a lot of storm as well as occasional sunshine.'" The Times adds, "With the departing Mr. Blair, Labor's most successful leader ever, the party faces a perilous future. Infighting has tarnished its image, and the opposition Conservative Party is surging after nearly a decade in the doldrums."

Hoagland Warns US To "Be Careful" In Backing Ban For UN Secretary General. Jim Hoagland writes in the Washington Post (9/28, A23, 748K), "The 15 nations that will gather in New York today to conduct a straw vote on who is to be the next UN secretary general should reflect on a durable lesson of political life: Be careful what you wish for. You may get it. That warning of the dangers of answered prayers applies particularly to President Bush and his support for Ban Ki Moon, South Korea's reliably stolid foreign minister, in the highly competitive race to succeed Kofi Annan at year's end. Bush…may be picking up a lightning rod instead of a shield." Hoagland warns that the Bush team should be "careful in building expectations about what Ban's election would mean for US strategic interests. At a time when the United Nations itself needs defending and explaining to many skeptical audiences throughout the world, traditional diplomacy may not be the best qualification for a new secretary general."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Stubborn Day Fire Defies All Efforts."
"A Plan For Very Civil Disobedience."
"At Church, An 'ATM For Jesus.'"
"Iraq Impeding Efforts To Go After Shiite Militias, U.S. Military Says."
"Convicted As 'Tokyo Rose,' She Later Received Honors."
"In Governor's Race, It's The Democrat Under Attack Over Conservation."

USA Today:

"Big Cuts At NASA Threaten Aviation."
"Overseas Voting A Concern — Again."
"Baltimore Experiment Curbs Dropout Rate."

DOJ_NMG_0070258

New York Times:
"New Hope For Democrats In Bid For Senate."
"U.S. Investigating Pirro's Talk Of Taping Spouse."
"For Kazakh Leader's Visit, U.S. Seeks A Balance."
"For the Third Time, A Jury Fails To Convict Gotti."
"As 2 Bushes Try To Fix Schools, Tools Differ."
"Mortgage Suit Says 'Trust Us' Led To Fleecing."

Washington Post:
"Exhuming The Past In A Painful Quest."
"House Passes Bill On Detainee Interrogation."
"Herndon Zeroing In On Illegal Immigrants."
"In Tribal Pakistan, An Uneasy Quiet."
"Heralded Iraq Police Academy A 'Disaster.'"
"Blessing And Blunt Warning From Mfume."

Washington Times:
"Project For Tysons Corner Would Double Size Of Mall."
"Owens Denies Suicide Attempt."
"U.S. To Wait 'A Few Weeks' On Iran Move."
"Bush Hosts Tense Dinner For Karzai, Musharraf."
"Berlin Opera At Center Of Free –Speech Debate."
"Dirty Birds Wear Out Welcome In Southern California."

Detroit Free Press:
"GM Says It Gets Short End Of Deal."
"'Thank God' For The Verdict."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Ballot Backup Will Cost Millions."
"Jocks' Grad Rates Lag."
"School Siege Leaves 2 Dead."
"Weather Channel Ready To Take Heat On Global Warning."
"Bidders Reap Gens, Junk From 'Dead Letter Office.'"

Houston Chronicle:
"Study: Urgent Action Needed To Cut Air Toxics."
"Astros Pull Out All Stops To Extend Amazing Run."
"A City Pauses To Say Goodbye."
"Hailed By Poor , Brazil's Lula Riding High."
"Few At HISD's Failing Schools Utilize Free Tutor, Transfers."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Insurgent Ambush-Iraq; White House Under Fire-Increased Terrorism; Presidential Dinner; Owens's Hospitalized; 2008 Political Conventions; Allen Under Fire; Transfats Ban; Gunman At Colorado High School; Controversial Opera; Tokyo Rose Obit; Steve Irwin's Widow.
CBS: : White House Under Fire-NIE Report; Presidential Dinner; What Is Congress Doing?; Owens's Hospitalized; Gunman In Colorado High School; California Wildfires; 7 Eleven Drops Citgo; Transfats Ban; Transfats Ban-Analysis; Bob Schieffer-Opinion; Weightless Surgery; Powerball Winners.
NBC: Presidential Dinner; Insurgent Ambush-Iraq; White House Under-NIE Report; Transfats Ban; Transfats Ban-Analysis; Miami Airport Trains; Owens's Hospitalized; Stock Market; Tokyo Rose Obit; Boomeritis.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: CO-School Hostage Situation; House-Detainee Bill.
CBS: Bush-Karzai, Musharraf dinner; Poll Of Iraqis; CO-School Hostage Situation; Daniel Smith Death Investigation; FAA-Commercial Pilot Retirement Age.
NPR: CO-School Hostage Situation; Philippines-Typhoon Milenyo; House-Detainee Bill; Oil Prices; Rice-Iran Nukes; Bush-Karzai, Musharraf Dinner; Northwest-Flight Attendants Contract Talks; Wall Street.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Attends Deborah Pryce for Congress and Ohio Victory 2006 reception, private residence, New Albany, Ohio; receives a briefing on energy, Hoover Public Safety Center, Hoover, Ala.; makes statement on energy. Hoover, Ala.; attends Bob Riley for Governor reception, Birmingham Jefferson Convention Complex, Birmingham, Ala.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Speaks at a Jeff Lamberti for Copngress and Republican Party of Iowa luncheon, Wakonda Club, Des Moines, Iowa; speaks at a Dick DeVos for Governor reception, Oakfield hills Country Club, Bloomfield, Mich.; speaks at a Mike Whelen for Congress and Republican Party of Iowa breakfast, River Center Adler Theatre, Davenport, Iowa.

US Senate: 9:30 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on the Federal Voting Assistance Program. David S. C. Chu, undersecretary of Defense; Deborah L. Markowitz, president, National Association of Secretaries of State; Paul DeGregorio, chairman, U.S. Election Assistance Commission; Derek B. Stewart, GAO. Location: Room 222, Russell.

9:30 a.m. ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS _ Superfund and Waste Management Subcommittee. Hearing on S.3871 - Hazardous Waste Electronic Manifest Establishment Act. Location: Room 406, Dirksen.

9:45 a.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on peace prospects in Darfur. UN Amb. John Bolton. Location: Room 419, Dirksen.

10 a.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

DOJ_NMG_0070259

10 a.m. BUDGET _ Full Committgee. Hearing on the economy and the budget. Council of Economic Advisers Chairman Edward Lazear; Kevin Hassett, AEI; Chris Edwards, Cato Institute; Peter Orszag, Brookings Institution. Location: Room 608, Dirksen.

10 a.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Aviation Subcommittee. Hearing on new aircraft in the national airspace system. Michael Cirillo, FAA; Nicholas Sabatini, FAA; Vern Raburn, Eclipse Aviation Corp.; Edward Iacobucci, DayJet Corp.; Jack Pelton, Cessna Aircraft Co.; Matt Andersson, CRA International. Location: Room 253, Russell.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Oversight of Government Management, the Fedceral Workforce and the District of Columbia Subcommittee. Hearing on terrorism preparedness within the national capital region. Bill Jenkins, GAO; Thomas Lockwood, director, Office of the National Capital Region, DHS; Eward Reiskin, deputy mayor of the District of Columbia for public safety and justice; Robert Crouch, assistant to the governor of Virginia for commonwealth preparedness; Dennis Schrader, director, Governor's Office of Homeland Security, State of Maryland; Fairfax County Executive Anthony Griffin. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. FINANCE _ Long-Term Growth and Debt Reduction Subcommittee. Hearing on how to keep the public debt from rising. Roberft Bixby, Concord Coalition; Peter Orszag, Brookings Institution; Chris Edwards, Cato Institute; former Rep. Charles Stenholm. Location: Room 215, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on pending matters. Closed. Location: Room 219, Hart.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10 a.m. Meets for legislative business. Highlights: H.R. 5825 - Electronic Surveillance Modernization Act.

9 a.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full committee. Closed. Briefing on worldwide problem areas. Location: Room H-405, Capitol.

10 a.m. AGRICULTURE _ Conservation, Credit, Rural Development and Research Subcommittee. Hearing on the EPA pesticide program. James B. Gulliford, Assistant Administrator, EPA; Jim Gray, North Dakota Department of Agriculture; Jay Vroom, President and CEO, CropLife America. Location: Room 1300, Longworth.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee. Hearing on the use of deceptive measure to obtain personal information, a practice called ``pretexting." Mark Hurd, H-P chairman and CEO; Patricia Dunn, former chairman of H-P; Ann Baskins, H-P general counsel; Kevin Hunsaker, H-P senior counsel; Anthony Gentilucci, H-P global security manager; Fred Adler, H-P computer security investigator; Larry Sonsini, H-P outside attorney; Joe Depante, owner of Action Research Group, Melbourne, Fla.; Ron DeLia, operator of Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc., Boston. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

10 a.m. FINANCIAL SERVICES _ Financial Institutions and Consumer Credit Subcommittee. Hearing on improving financial literacy. Elisse B. Walter, NASD; David S. Chernow, JA Worldwide; Ted Beck, National Endowment for Financial Education; Julie Cripe, Omnibank (Houston); David G. Kittle, Principle Wholesale Lending, Inc., Louisville; Carl Sorgatz, Hawthorne Community Credit Union, Napersville, Ill.; Donald D. Kittell, Securities Industry Association; Stephen Brobeck, Consumer Federation of America; Frank Pollack, Pentagon Federal Credit Union. Location: Room 2128, Rayburn.

10 a.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Full Committee. Hearing on reconstruction contracting in Iraq. Katherine Schinasi, GAO; Stuart Bowen, Jr., Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction; Deputy Assistant Army Secretary Tina Ballard; Joseph Tyler, Army Corps of Engineers; Amb. David Satterfield; James Bever, USAID; Ernest Robbins II, Parsons Infrastructure and Technology Group; Cliff Mumm, Bechtel Infrastructure Corp. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY _ Economic Security, Infrastructure Protection and Cybersecurity Subcommittee. Hearing on transit security training procedures. Location: Room 311, Cannon.

10 a.m. HOUSE ADMINISTRATION _ Full Committee. Hearing on electronic voting machines. Edward W. Felten, Princeton University; Gary Smith, election director, Forsyth County, Ga.; Barbara Simons, co-chairwoman, U.S. Public Policy Committee, Association for Computing Machinery; Keith Cunningham, election director, Allen County, Ohio; James Dickson, American Association of People with Disabilities; Michael I. Shamos, Carnegie Mellon University. Location: Room 1310, Longworth.

10 a.m. RESOURCES _ National Parks Subcommittee. Hearing on pending legislation. Location: Room 1324, Longworth.

10 a.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Railroads Subcommittee. Hearing on new directions at Amtrak. Amtrak President Alexander Kummant. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

10 a.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Health Subcommittee. Hearing on trends in force ands veteran health. Location: Room 334, Cannon.

10:30 a.m. EDUCATION AND THE WORKFORCE _ Employer-Employee Relations Subcommittee. Hearing on union representation for guards and national security implications. Janet Boston, organizer, Service Employees International Union; David W. Foley, President, Wackenhut Services, Inc.; David L. Hickey, International President, International Union, Security, Police, and Fire Professionals of

DOJ_NMG_0070260

America; William P. Schurgin, attorney, Seyfarth Shaw LLP, Chicago. Location: Room 2175, Rayburn.

10:30 a.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ International Terrorism and Nonproliferation Subcommittee. Hearing on Hezbollah's reach. Frank C. Urbancic Jr., State Department; John Kavanagh, FBI; Eitan Azani, Herzliya Interdisciplinary Center, Herzliya, Israel; Christopher Hamilton, Washington Institute for Near East Policy; Ilan Berman, American Foreign Policy Council. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

2 p.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Health Subcommittee. Hearing on Medicare physician payments. Dr. Dirk M. Elston, Geisinger Medical Center, Danville, Pa.; Dr. William Golden, American College of Physicians; Dr. Paul A. Martin, Dayton, Ohio; Dr. Albert W. Morris, Jr., President, National Medical Association; Dr. Thomas Russell, American College of Surgeons; Dr. Thomas J. Weida, American Academy of Family Physicians; Dr. Cecil B. Wilson, American Medical Association; Dr. Nicholas Wolter, American Medical Group Association; Dr. Byron Thames, AARP; Dr. Sallie S. Cook, American Health Quality Association. Location: Room 2322, Rayburn.

2 p.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Western Hemisphere Subcommittee. Hearing on Haiti. Thomas A. Shannon, assistant secretary of State; Adolfo A. Franco, USAID; Mark L. Schneider, International Crisis Group. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

2 p.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations Subcommittee. Hearing on the role of faith-based organizations in U.S. African operations. Terri Hasdorff, USAID; Ken Hackett, president, Catholic Relief Services; Edward Phillips, chairman, Eastern Deanery Community-Based Health Care and AIDS Relief Program; Ken Isaacs, Samaritan's Purse. Location: Room 2200, Rayburn.

2 p.m. SCIENCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on development of the Crew Exploration Vehicle. Scott Horowitz, NASA; Allen Li, GAO. Location: Room 2318, Rayburn.

Other: COUNTERFEITING _ The US Chamber of Commerce, others hold the Third Annual Anti-counterfeiting and Piracy Summit. Highlights: 9:35 a.m. USTR Susan Schwab. 3:30 p.m. Commerce Secretary Gutierrez discusses efforts to protect intellectual property. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

JUDICIARY _ Georgetown University Law Center holds a conference on the state of the judiciary. Highlights: 9 a.m. Retired Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. 9:15 a.m. Session on judicial independence, with C. Boyden Gray, others. 10 a.m. Session on judicial selection and removal with California Chief Justice Ronald George, Arizona Chief Justice Ruth McGregor, others. 12:15 p.m. Luncheon with speaker Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer. Law Center's Hotung Building, 550 1st St. NW. Media must use the Tower Green entrance. 1:45 p.m. Session on interbranch relations, with former Sen. Tom Dasachle, former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, former Sen. Warren Rudman, others. 7:30 p.m. Dinner with speaker Supreme Court Chief Justice John Roberts. Mandarin Oriental Hotel, 1330 Marhyland Ave. SW. Location: Georgetown University Law wCenter, 600 New Jersey Ave. NW., unless otherwise noted.

RELIGION _ The Catholic University Columbus School of Law holds a symposium on religion in the public square. Highlights: 1:30 p.m. Sen. Sam Brownback. Location: 2nd floor Slowinski Courtroom, 3600 John McCormack Rd. NE.

WOMEN-DEMOCRATS _ The women's Leadership Forum of the Democratic National Committee holds its 13th Annual National Issues Conference. Highlights: 12:15 p.m. Sen. Hillary Clinton, DNC Chairman Howard Dean and New York congressional candidate Kirsten Gillibranc speak. Location: Renaissance Mayflower Hotel, 1127 Connecticut Ave. NW.

KOSOVO _ 8:30 a.m. - 4:30 p.m. The American Council for Kosovo, Christian Solidarity International, and Religious Freedom Coalition, host a one-day conference, ``Reconsidering Kosovo." Issues to be examined include: Kosovo report card -- Europes ``Black Hole?; Organized crime, jihadism, and Kosovos impact on the War on Terror; 7 Human rights and religious freedom in an independent ``KosovA; Kosovos future status: impact on regional stability, international law, and other disputed regions." There will be a kKeynote address by Bishop Artemije of Raska and Prizren (Kosovo and Metohija), spiritual leader of Kosovos Christian Serbian community. Luncheon remarks by Rep. Trent Franks, R-Ariz. Speakers include: Doug Bandow , commentator; author of ``Foreign Follies: America's New Global Empire"; Former Special Assistant to President Ronald Reagan); Peggy Birchfield, Executive Director, Religious Freedom Coalition; Ambassador James Bissett, the last Canadian ambassador to Yugoslavia, and Julia Gorin, commentator; contributor, Jewish World Review, FrontPageMag.com. Location: Capitol Hill Club, Eisenhower Lounge, 300 First St. SE.

SEX TRAFFICKING SURVIVORS _ 9 a.m. The Department of Health and Human Services Administration for Children and Families sponsors a day-long conference on how to identify and support victims of sex trafficking. Highlights: 9 a.m. HHS Assistant Secretary for children and families Wade F. Horn, Amb. John R. Miller, members of Congress and survivors of human trafficking hold a news conference. Location: Holiday Inn Georgetown, 2101 Wisconsin Ave. NW.

BAUCUS-TRADE POLICY _ 8 a.m. Sen. Max Baucus addresses the Washington International Trade Association on the future of U.S. trade policy. Location: Hotel Washington, 515 15th St. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0070261

KERRY-NATIONAL SECURITY _ 8:30 a.m. Johns Hopkins University's Nitze School of Advanced International Studies hosts briefing on ``National Security: A View from the Senate," with Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass. Location: Nitze School of Advanced International Studies, 1740 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

NO CHILD LEFT BEHIND _ 8:30 a.m. - 10 a.m. The National Journals Policy Council hosts a panel discussion on the impact of the No Child Left Behind Act on schools and recommendations for changes that should be made in next year's Congressional reauthorization. Participants: Keynote address by Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., ranking member, House Committee on Education and the Workforce. Panel discussion moderated by Andy Rotherham, co-founder and co-director, Education Sector, featuring Dr. Michael Cohen, President, Achieve Inc.; Dr. Rick Hess, Director of Education Policy Studies, American Enterprise Institute; Becky Pringle, Executive Committee, National Education Association; Bill Taylor, Chair, Citizens Commission on Civil Rights; and Ross Weiner, Principal Partner, The Education Trust. Location: Phoenix Park Hotel, Ballroom, 520 North Capitol St. NW.

GAS OUTLOOK _ 9:30 a.m. The Natural Gas Supply Association holds its 6th annual Winter Outlook media briefing. Location: Longworth Room, JW Marriott, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave, NW.

MILITARY READINESS _ 9:30 a.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies holds a program with Reps. John Murtha and Neil Abercrombie on the state of U.S. military readiness. Location: B-1 conference level, 1800 K St. NW.

ELECTION-MUSLIMS _ 10 a.m. The Muslim American Society's Freedom Foundation holds a news conference to discuss its campaign for massive Muslim voter registration, education and mobilization for the November elections. Location: National Press Club.

GITMO-DETAINEES _ 10 a.m. David Cynamon, attorney for four remaining Kuwait detainees at Guantanamo Bay, holds a telephone briefing to discuss his trip to see his clients, share declassified notes and discuss the toll the imprisonment has taken on the men. Contacts: Christina Lycke, 202-973-1311. Notes: Callin number: 800-238-9007.

JUSTICE-WAINSTEIN _ 10 a.m. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales will deliver remarks at the swearing-in ceremony of Kenneth L. Wainstein as Assistant Attorney General for the new National Security Division. Location: The Great Hall, Department of Justice, 950 Constitution Ave. NW.

METH-RURAL _ 10 a.m. The Senate Democratic Policy Committee holds a panel discussion on the methamphetamine epidemic in rural America. Location: Room S-211, Capitol.

UNINSURED CHILDREN _ 10 a.m. Ron Pollack, Executive Director, Families USA, others, hold a press briefing to release a report showing that a majority of the more than 9 million children without health insurance in the United States live in two-parent families, and that in most of these two-parent families, both parents work. Location: National Press Club, First Amendment Room.

BOEHNER _ 10:30 a.m. House Majority Leader Rep. John Boehner holds an on-camera news conference. Location: House Radio-TV Gallery.

SMALL BUSINESS _ 10:30 a.m. Democratic members of the House Small Business Committee release their annual end of the year report. Location: House Radio-TV Gallery.

PELOSI _ 10:45 a.m. House Democratic leader Rep. Nancy Pelosi holds her weekly news conference. Location: Room H-206, Capitol.

ANTIWAR-BECHTEL _ 11:30 a.m. Iraq Vets Against the War and the UPRISE Counter-Recruitment Tour host an event during which Iraq veterans and their supporters will serve an ``eviction notice" to Becthel Corporation ordering the to leave Iraq. Organizers say the believe Bechtel has unfairly profited from an immoral and unjust war. Location: Bechtel's corporate office, 1015 15th St. NW.

CHAO _ 11:30 a.m. Labor Secretary Chao addresses a joint meeting of the National Academies of Science and Engineering. Location: NAS Auditorium, 2101 Constitution Ave. NW.

CONGRESSIONAL BLACK CAUCUS _ 11:30 a.m. The Congressional Black Caucus holds a press conference after its meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to discuss Darfur. They will discuss Darfur, Hurricane Katrina next steps, HIV/AIDS, the midterm elections and issues relevant to the African American community, both domestic and international. Location: House Radio-TV Gallery. Notes: 5 minute photo spray at 9:30 a.m. in Room B-338, Rayburn.

LOCKHART-HOUSING _ 12 p.m. James Lockhart III, director, Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight (OFHEO), addresses a National Economists Club luncheon. Topic: ``The Current GSE Regulatory and Economic Environment and the Need for Reform. Lockhart will discuss current regulation of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. In this context, he will discuss the Enterprises role in the financial markets and the US economy. Location: Chinatown Garden Restaurant, 618 H St. NW.

GOVERNMENT SECRECY _ 12 p.m. - 2 p.m. The Association of American Publishers hosts a forum, ``Protecting Privacy, Challenging Secrecy, and Standing up for the First Amendment." Participants are ABC News reporters Brian Ross and Richard Esposito; New York Times reporter James Risen; journalist/author Mark Feldstein; and ``John Doe" librarians from Connecticut. Location: National Press Club.

DOJ_NMG_0070262

NAFTA _ 1 p.m. The Economic Policy Institute holds a telephone briefing with economists from th U.S., Mexico and Canda to discuss the North American Free Trade Agreement at 12 years. Contacts: Nancy Coleman, 202-775-8810.

MINIMUM WAGE _ 1:15 p.m. Reps. Steny Hoyer and George Miller hold a telephone briefing to call on Republicans to have a clean yes or note vote on raising the minimum wage. Contacts: Brad Woodhouse, 202-263-4575. Notes: Call in number: 888-325-3989; passcode: 2139490.

IMMIGRANTS-LITERACY _ 1:30 p.m. US Citizenship and Immigration Services Chief of Citizenship Alfonso Aguilar will participates in a panel on ``Literacy and the New American Immigrant at the 2006 Fall for the Book Festival. Location: Johnson Center, Dewberry Hall, George Mason University, 4400 University Drive, Fairfax, Va.

DEMOCRATS-MINIMUM WAGE _ 2 p.m. Senators Edward M. Kennedy, Dick Durbin, and Hillary Clinton will discuss the failure of this Congress to raise the minimum wage. They will be joined by AFL-CIO President John Sweeney and Julie Smith, a former minimum wage worker from Ohio. Location: Room 430, Dirksen Senate Office Building.

NORTH KOREA _ 4:30 p.m. Journalist Selig Harrison reports on his recent trip to North Korea, sponsored by the School of Advanced International Studies. Location: Auditorium, 1619 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

MOTHERHOOD _ 6 p.m. MomsRising.org group sponsors premiere of new documentary on the state of motherhood in America, with Sens. Hillary Clinton, Barack Obama, Edward Kennedy and Christopher Dodd. Location: Room 562, Dirksen.

RANGEL-FOREIGN SERVICE _ 6 p.m. Congressman Charles Rangel will introduce ten new Foreign Service officers who are graduates of the trail-blazing Charles B. Rangel International Affairs Program to improve diversity in the Department. The program is administered through Howard University. Location: Room 2354, Rayburn House Office Building.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0070263

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

House Passes Detainee Bill 253-168, With Senate Approval Expected Today ... 3
Judge Denies Ashcroft Immunity In Terrorism Case ... 4
Domestic Surveillance Dispute Heads For Detroit Courtroom ... 4
Albany Terrorism Case Defendant Takes Stand ... 4

Patriot Act:

Patriot Act, Real ID Reducing Number Of Refugees Allowed To Enter US ... 4

Homeland Response:

House Democrats' Report Critical Of Administration's Local Anti-Terror Efforts ... 5
DHS Official Who Made Anti-Terror Funding Cuts Is Out ... 5
Suspicious Package Forces Evacuation Of DC Federal Courthouse ... 5
Emergency Room Strain Raises Disaster Preparedness Concerns ... 6
Collins, King Say Chemical Plant Security Agreement Will Protect Americans ... 6
Holt Harshly Criticizes FBI Over Anthrax Probe ... 6
Johanns Says Americans Should Not Discount Agroterrorism Threat ... 6

War News:

White House Refuses To Release Entire NIE ... 6
Bush Dinner Provides Forum For Karzai, Musharraf To Air Differences ... 8
Senior US Commanders Question Maliki's Will To Prevent Civil War ... 10
Poll Finds 61% Of Iraqis Support Attacks In US Troops ... 10
Two Networks Air Excerpts Of Video Showing Attack On Convoy In Iraq ... 10
US Military Spokesman Says Baghdad Violence Increasing With Onset Of Ramadan ... 11
Sadr Said To Have Lost Control Over Parts Of His Militia ... 11
Construction Of $75 Million Baghdad Police College "Grossly Mismanaged." ... 11
Boehner Defers To Generals' Judgment On Troop Levels In Iraq11
Favoring Afghanistan War Over Iraq Conflict Said To Be "Senseless." ... 11
Schieffer Says Pentagon Risks Losing Volunteers' Trust ... 11

DOJ:

New Colorado US Attorney Profiled ... 12

Corporate Scandals:

Dunn Expected To Mount Vigorous Defense Of Her Role In H-P Leak Hunt ... 12
Former Comverse Executive Arrested In Namibia ... 13
Plaintiffs Seek $21.5 Million From Bearing Point Bond Default ... 14
Regulators Urge Borderless Solution To Derivatives Growth Problems ... 14
DOJ, SEC Probing Halliburton Work In Nigeria And Elsewhere . 14
Fastow Sentence Surprises Experts ... 14

Criminal Law:

Pirro Under Federal Probe Over Marital Spy Plot ... 15
Another Mistrial Declared In Gotti Racketeering Case ... 17
Rare Map Thief Sentenced To 42 Months In Prison ... 18
Louisiana Woman Pleads Guilty To FEMA Fraud ... 18
Former Michigan Prosecutor Acquitted Of Corruption Charges .. 18
New Orleans Corruption Probe Defendant Sentenced To Probation ... 19
Prosecutor Seeks Protection Order On Fumo Evidence ... 19
Judge Sets Nov. 21 Cause, Bail Hearing For Jeffs ... 20
Prosecutors Seek To Bar Release Of Intelligence Documents In Libby Trial ... 20
House Suspends License For Firm Linked To Abramoff ... 20
US Charges Pennsylvania Woman In Child Porn Case ... 21
Eased Lender Requirements Fueling Surge In Mortgage Fraud. 21
Good Samaritans Keep Watch For ID-Theft Victims ... 21
Blanco Renews Extradition Request For Sportingbet Chairman. 22
DC Officials Consider Extending Anti-Crime Legislation ... 22
Karr Lawyers Seek Dismissal Of Child Porn Charges ... 22
Sex Offender Admits Killing 15-Year Old Boy ... 22
Navy Midshipman Faces Rape Charges ... 22
US Charges Former National Guardsman With Smuggling Machine Guns ... 22
Judge Sentences Pennsylvania Inmate In Assault Of US Marshal ... 23
US Charges Man With Defrauding Priests ... 23
Cost Of Houston Crime Lab Probe To Grow By $1.5 Million ... 23
Expert Says Inmates Conscious During Lethal Injections ... 23

Civil Law:

San Jose Nursing Home Convicted Medicare Fraud 24
House Panel Approves FOIA Reform Bill 24
Court Declines To Intervene In Maine "Electioneering" Dispute.. 24

Civil Rights:

Ruling Opens Door For ADA Claims Involving Internet Access .. 24
DOD Strives To Get Ballots To Soldiers In Field Before Election Day 24
Voters Abroad Still Face Challenges 25
Hyde Defends "Federal Election Integrity Act." 25

Antitrust:

Mittal To Sell WV Mill To Settle DOJ Antitrust Concerns 25
Icahn Eyes Bigger Stake In Federated Stores..... 25
Judge Dismisses Key Portion Of AMD Antitrust Suit Against Intel25
Symantec Claims Microsoft Withholding Spyware Technology .. 26
Johnson & Johnson Suit Claims Abbott Leak Subverted $24 Billion Deal 26
Endesa Board Expected To Approve E.On Offer 26
Phone Companies Seek To Unload Land Lines In Rural Areas . 26
Glassman Makes Case For Cable Competition 27

Environment/Indian Affairs:

US Will Not Charge ConocoPhillips For 2004 Oil Spill 27
Schwarzenegger Signs Greenhouse Gas Measure Into Law 27
DC Area Has Fewer Smoggy Days But Still Falls Short OF Federal Standards 28
Indian Ranchers Await Trial On Suit Against US..... 28
Navajo Teen Aspires To Serve Reservation As FBI Agent..... 28

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

San Diego Chargers Safety Arrested In Cough Syrup Investigation..... 28
Suspected Illegal-Immigrant Drug Dealers Targeted In Colorado Investigation..... 29
Border Tunnel Prevention Act Gains Support..... 29
Effectiveness Of Plan Colombia Scrutinized Following Police Unit Killings 29

Immigration:

Boehner Says Congress Will Pass An Additional $1.2 Billion For Border Security 30
Herndon, VA, Moves To Crack Down On Illegal Immigration 30

Tax:

IRS Probing Merck's Offshore Partnership..... 31

Congress-Administration:

Congress Set To Approve Record-High Defense Budget..... 31
Congress Nears Recess With "Do Nothing" Label Looming 31
Bush To Rally Senate Republicans Before Recess 31
Jeb Bush Offering Public Criticisms Of President's Education Policy..... 32
Conrad, Spratt Criticize Bush Tax Cuts, GOP Budget Shortcomings 32
House GOP Leaders Announce Date For Leadership Elections 32
Liberal Democrats Not Rallying To Murtha For Possible Majority Leader Race 32
Snow Walking "Fine Line" In Attending GOP Fundraisers 33
Budget Cuts Seen As Threatening NASA's Aviation Program.... 33
Military Officers Group Concerned About Military Pay Raise..... 33
Amendment Would Block Spending On Parts Of National Security Personnel System..... 33
Morris Says Frist Has Failed As Majority Leader..... 33
Wessel Says Paulson Is "Brightest Bulb" In Bush's Cabinet..... 34
NYTimes Praises Advisory Group's Recommendations For FDA34

Other News:

Dow Jones Edges Closer To All-Time High..... 34
Press Corps Resents Closed Bush Fundraisers 35
Bush-Rove, Hillary Clinton Fundraisers Take Place On Same DC Street 35
Danforth Says GOP Needs To Move Away From Christian Conservative Base..... 35
GOP Open House Seats in Arizona, Colorado, Iowa At Risk 35
Good Economic News Seen As Boosting GOP Chances For Keeping Congress 36
Democrats Said To Have Serious Shot At Senate Majority 37
Allen Campaign, Beset By Controversies, Has Difficulty Gaining Traction 37
Ford Running Competitive Race For Tennessee Senate Seat ... 38
Mfume Endorses Cardin, Warns Democrats About Lack Of Diversity 38
Crist Leads Davis By 15 Points In Florida Gubernatorial Race ... 38
Polls Show Schwarzenegger With Double-Digit Lead Over Angelides 38
Democrats' Attacks On Fox News Rally Base..... 39
Hillary Clinton Faces Quandary On AIDS Funding Bill..... 39
GOP To Hold 2008 Convention in Twin Cities..... 40
Prominent Scientists Form 527 Group..... 41
Will Says Taxpayer Financing Of Presidential Elections Will Die In 2008 41
WPost Says Fairfax County Should Examine Deployment Of Its Vehicles 41
WSJournal Defends Wal-Mart's Drug Discounts..... 41
Ahmadinejad Says Iran Won't Give Up Right To Pursue Nuclear Program 41
Egypt Working On Nuclear Program 42
Hill Says Pyongyang Talks Are Entering "Crucial Phase." 42
Rice Warns Khartoum About Continued Attacks, Opposition To UN Force..... 42
Hezbollah Facing Little Pressure To Disarm 43
Israel Releases Palestinian Deputy Premier After Five Weeks... 43
State Dinner For Kazakh President Said To Highlight Conflicting Foreign Policy Goals..... 43
Mexico Criticizes Rice's Comments..... 43
China Asks US Senate To Drop Tariff Bill 44
Effectiveness Of Plan Colombia Scrutinized Following Police Unit Killings 44
Decision To Cancel Berlin Opera That Might Offend Muslims Draws Fire..... 44

DOJ_NMG_0070265

Guatemalans Seek Closure Decades After Civil War 45
Bill Clinton Seeks To Boost Britain's Labour Party 45
Hoagland Warns US To "Be Careful" In Backing Ban For UN Secretary General..... 45

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 45

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington 46

TERRORISM NEWS:

House Passes Detainee Bill 253-168, With Senate Approval Expected Today. Fox News' Special Report (9/27, Hume) reported the House "passed a bill governing the treatment and trial of war on terror detainees. Passage of the measure was expected. What was not expected were the strong objections of Democrats who contend the bill is unfair to detainees and hurts America's standing around the world." The bill passed 253-168, with 160 Democrats opposed. The New York Times (9/28, Hulse, Zernike, 1.21M) notes that most of the 34 Democrats who supported the bill are in "more competitive districts" this fall. USA Today (9/28, 6A, Kiely, 2.27M) says the measure "is headed for Senate approval today, as Congress tries to balance national security needs with the rights of prisoners." It would "permit creation of military tribunals to try terrorism suspects" and would also "allow President Bush to claim a legislative victory on national security 40 days before the Nov. 7 elections." The Hill (9/28, Allen, Tiron) notes that since the Senate is "considering identical but separate legislation," one chamber "would still have to pass the other chamber's version of the bill for it to be sent to the president."

The AP (9/27, Flaherty) says the legislation "also provides extensive definitions of war crimes such as torture, rape and biological experiments -- but gives Bush broad authority to decide which other techniques U.S. interrogators can legally use. The provisions are intended to protect CIA interrogators from being prosecuted for war crimes." AFP (9/27, Raab) says that while the bill "forbids 'cruel and unusual' punishment of detainees," it does not offer "further clarification of what falls in that category."

A straightforward Washington Post (9/28, A1, Babington, 748K) report says the President "is scheduled to meet with GOP senators in the Capitol this morning for a final pep rally before the measure's expected passage. Republicans hope to campaign on the bill as proof of their party's tough stand against terrorists. Many congressional Democrats decided to swallow their misgivings and vote for the bill to avoid being portrayed as less than vigilant against suspects captured in Afghanistan, Iraq and elsewhere."

The Washington Times (9/28, Hurt, 88K) reports that just before the vote, Majority Leader John Boehner "made clear that Republicans will use the vote in the November elections against Democrats who opposed the bill." He said, "Will my Democrat friends work with Republicans to give the president the tools he needs to continue to stop terrorist attacks before they happen, or will they vote to force him to fight the terrorists with one arm tied behind his back?" Later, House Speaker Dennis Hastert said, "Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi and 159 of her Democrat colleagues voted today in favor of more rights for terrorists. So, the same terrorists who plan to harm innocent Americans and their freedom worldwide would be coddled if we followed the Democrat plan."

The Los Angeles Times (9/28, Simon, Barnes, 918K) reports that as the Senate debate began, Majority Leader Bill Frist said, "We must remember that we are fighting a different kind of enemy -- and a different kind of war. To win this war, we must provide our military, intelligence and law enforcement communities the tools they need to keep us safe." But Armed Services ranking Democrat Carl Levin "objected that the measure would be 'used by our terrorist enemies as evidence of U.S. hypocrisy when it comes to proclamations of human rights.'"

Editorial Pages Critical Of Legislation. Newspaper commentary on the measure is markedly negative. Under the headline "Rushing Off A Cliff," the New York Times (9/28, 1.21M) editorializes, "Here's what happens when this irresponsible Congress railroads a profoundly important bill to serve the mindless politics of a midterm election: The Bush administration uses Republicans' fear of losing their majority to push through ghastly ideas about antiterrorism that will make American troops less safe and do lasting damage to our 217-year-old nation of laws -- while actually doing nothing to protect the nation from terrorists. Democrats betray their principles to avoid last-minute attack ads. Our democracy is the big loser."

The Los Angeles Times (9/28, 918K) editorializes that Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter's "warning that the Supreme Court is likely to invalidate pending legislation that would create military commissions to try terrorist suspects deserves a hearing -- in the Senate. The problem with the legislation…is that it would make it impossible for alleged enemy combatants to file what is known as a writ of habeas corpus, which allows them to challenge the legality of their imprisonment. … On Wednesday, the House approved a bill that does not permit detainees to file habeas corpus petitions. That means that it will be up to Specter and his colleagues to preserve the Great Writ when the Senate votes."

DOJ_NMG_0070266

In a Los Angeles Times (9/28, 918K) op-ed, Bruce Ackerman, author of "Before the Next Attack: Preserving Civil Liberties in an Age of Terrorism," writes, "The compromise legislation, which is racing toward the White House, authorizes the president to seize American citizens as enemy combatants, even if they have never left the United States. And once thrown into military prison, they cannot expect a trial by their peers or any other of the normal protections of the Bill of Rights. This dangerous compromise not only authorizes the president to seize and hold terrorists who have fought against our troops 'during an armed conflict,' it also allows him to seize anybody who has 'purposefully and materially supported hostilities against the United States.' This grants the president enormous power over citizens and legal residents."

Judge Denies Ashcroft Immunity In Terrorism Case. The AP (9/28, Boone) reports from Boise, ID, "Former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft could be called to testify in a lawsuit that claims a student was wrongly imprisoned in a computer terrorism case, a federal judge ruled Wednesday." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Edward Lodge rejected Ashcroft's argument to toss out the lawsuit because he was entitled to absolute immunity since his position at the Department of Justice was prosecutorial." The AP adds, "Abdullah al-Kidd, who played football for the University of Idaho, claimed government wrongfully arrested him in the case against a fellow student, Sami Omar Al-Hussayen, in 2003. … They both worked for the Islamic Assembly of North America, a Michigan-based charitable organization that federal investigators said funneled money to activities supporting terrorism and published material advocating suicide attacks on the United States." The AP notes, "A jury acquitted Al-Hussayen of using his computer skills to foster terrorism and of three immigration violations after an eight-week federal trial. But Al-Hussayen — who was only months from finishing his doctorate study at the University of Idaho — was eventually deported to Saudi Arabia. … Al-Kidd was never called to testify, but he spent two weeks in jail as a material witness and was later released to the custody of his wife with strict limitations on where he could travel. … His lawsuit claimed Ashcroft was personally liable for violating his rights because after the terrorist attacks Ashcroft 'created a national policy to improperly seek material witness warrants, oversaw the execution of such warrants, and failed to correct the constitutional violations of conducting such actions,' according court documents. Al-Kidd said the investigation and detainment not only caused him to lose a scholarship to study in Saudi Arabia, but that it cost him employment opportunities. … The ruling also means U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez and others in the Department of Homeland Security could be called to testify in the lawsuit. … 'We are literally reviewing it at this minute and no, we have not made any decisions at this time,' Charles Miller, spokesman for the Justice Department's civil division, said of the ruling."

Domestic Surveillance Dispute Heads For Detroit Courtroom. The Detroit Free Press (9/28, Ashenfelter) reports, "Justice Department lawyers will be back in federal court in Detroit on Thursday to try to persuade a judge to delay enforcement of last month's decision to halt the National Security Agency's domestic spying program until the outcome of the government's appeal. … And ACLU lawyers will be there to try to persuade U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs to order the government to stop the program now." The Free Press continues, "Taylor ruled Aug. 17 that the Bush Administration's program of monitoring international phone calls and emails involving suspected Al Qaeda members is unconstitutional because it violates Americans' free speech and privacy rights and is contrary to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978. … Under that law, the government can eavesdrop for up to a year without a warrant provided the Attorney General certifies that the eavesdropping is legal." The Free Press adds, "The Justice Department appealed Taylor's ruling to the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati."

Albany Terrorism Case Defendant Takes Stand. Capital News 9 Albany (9/27) reported, "The prosecution has rested in the trial of two Albany mosque leaders accused of supporting terrorism, and the defense wasted no time calling their client to the stand. … Prosecutors finished up with a Middle Eastern expert who explained what references in [Mohammed] Aref's journal are terrorist organizations and which ones aren't. Once Aref took the stand, the mood clearly changed in the courtroom as Aref explained his growing up in Northern Iraq where Saddam Hussein killed more than 180,000 fellow Kurds in the late 1980s. That's important because Aref argues that his rhetoric the courtroom previously heard was directed at Saddam's regime and that he's always been peaceful as he spoke out as a student 0- but not a member of any political party which prosecutors accused him of omitting on an immigration document."

PATRIOT ACT:

Patriot Act, Real ID Reducing Number Of Refugees Allowed To Enter US. The New York

DOJ_NMG_0070267

Times (9/28, Swarns, 1.21M) reports State Department officials said Wednesday that the USA Patriot Act and the Real ID Act have led to a 23 percent reduction in the number of refugees admitted to the US this year because "of provisions…that have sharply reduced the number of resettled refugees." The provisions, which "deny entry to anyone who belongs to or has provided material support to armed rebel groups," regardless of circumstances, "have derailed the resettlement of thousands of refugees fleeing the authoritarian government of Myanmar, formerly known as Burma; hundreds of refugees from Vietnam and Laos who fought alongside American troops in the Vietnam War; and dozens of Cubans who supported armed groups opposed to Fidel Castro in the 60's, according to the State Department and the United Nations refugee agency."

Refugees Settling In Non-Traditional Areas. Meanwhile, the Washington Post (9/28, A3, Layton, 748K) a study released today by the Brookings Institution finds more political refugees in the US are "putting down roots in metropolitan areas without large immigrant populations." Brookings "found that while traditional immigrant gateways such as New York, Chicago and Los Angeles still absorb most refugees, that flow has slowed in the past several years, and refugees are increasingly settling in Seattle, Atlanta, Sacramento, Minneapolis-St. Paul and Portland, Ore." Audrey Singer, a Brookings demographer who co-wrote the study, said states "such as Iowa, Pennsylvania and North Dakota, have been lobbying for refugees."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

House Democrats' Report Critical Of Administration's Local Anti-Terror Efforts. The Wall Street Journal (9/28, Block, 2.03M) reports, "Amid the political storm over the intelligence community's report that al Qaeda remains a serious threat to the US homeland, House Democrats plan to release a report Thursday accusing the Bush administration of failing to support local police as the frontline against terrorism. The report says the administration hasn't done enough to reach out to the country's 800,000 state and local police officers to determine their needs in fighting terrorism." DHS "officials said the department is working on ways to improve the information flow to police, and next month expects to roll out initiatives to cooperate more closely with state and local law enforcement." The report, prepared for Rep. Bennie G. Thompson, "follows growing complaints from police departments around the country that federal agencies, especially the Department of Homeland Security, deny local law enforcement access to timely, relevant information about threats and terrorist activity."

DHS Official Who Made Anti-Terror Funding Cuts Is Out. The Long Island Newsday (9/28, Eisenberg) reports, "The political appointee who oversaw 40-percent cuts in anti-terror funding to New York City and Washington, D.C., is being edged out of her job at the Homeland Security Department, according to House and Senate sources." Newsday continues, "Tracy Henke, executive director for grants and training, was responsible for divvying up anti-terror money to cities, ostensibly based on risk. She ignited a firestorm in June after the department slashed funding to New York and Washington while bolstering money for cities such as St. Louis and Kansas City in her home state of Missouri. … 'She didn't do a good job and my understanding is she's not going to be there much longer,' Rep. Peter King, chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, said yesterday. … 'I view her as being primarily responsible for the terrible cuts that were made to New York in June,' the Seaford Republican said. 'She did a poor job in coming up with the numbers. She did a poor job of explaining it to the committee and, quite frankly, a lot of people didn't like her attitude.'" Newsday adds, "That vote of no confidence appears to extend to the White House. This week, White House Homeland Security Adviser Frances Townsend told a group of reporters that she had been 'quite surprised and dismayed' by the grant decisions. … Henke, a backdoor appointment by the White House Jan. 4, had not been confirmed by the Senate before the funding controversy because of concerns about her qualifications, as well as allegations she played politics in her prior job at the Justice Department."

Suspicious Package Forces Evacuation Of DC Federal Courthouse. The Washington Post (9/28, Leonnig, Branigin) reports, "A federal courthouse in downtown Washington was evacuated for about three hours today because of what authorities described as a suspicious package, which was later determined to be harmless." The Post continues, "The evacuation disrupted a hearing in a high-profile case stemming from the leak of a CIA operative's name. The hearing, originally set for 10 a.m., was rescheduled for 1:30 p.m., about an hour after authorities reopened the E. Barrett Prettyman Federal Courthouse." The Post adds, "According to acting chief judge Henry Kennedy, the suspicious item, which was found by a security guard in a construction zone near the courthouse, may have contained the soiled clothing of a homeless person. A bomb-sniffing dog alerted to the item, possibly because of nitrates on the clothing, Kennedy said. Nitrates used as oxidizing agents can be mixed with other compounds to form flammable or explosive material. … In addition to examining the suspicious package, authorities swept the courthouse building for explosives but did not find any, officials said."

DOJ_NMG_0070268

The AP (9/28, Apuzzo) reports, "Evacuation of the courthouse occurred shortly before a hearing was to begin in the CIA leak case. The hearing was reset for 1:30 p.m. … Special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald and about eight of his associates were forced to leave the building and join more than 100 others on the sidewalks nearby." The AP adds, "The defendant in the case, former White House aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby, and his legal team arrived a short time later and joined the throng outside the courthouse."

Emergency Room Strain Raises Disaster Preparedness Concerns. The Washington Post (9/28, A11, Lee, 748K) reports, "Emergency rooms at many hospitals are routinely stretched to the breaking point, raising concerns that they would not be able to handle victims during a terrorist attack or natural disaster, according to congressional testimony yesterday and a new federal study. Between 40 percent and 50 percent of emergency departments experienced crowding during 2003 and 2004, the study by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention found." The findings, which "echo three reports published in June by the Institute of Medicine, a branch of the National Academies," have sparked "interest in Congress, and the Senate Health subcommittee on bioterrorism and public health preparedness convened a panel of experts yesterday to discuss the problems. 'If our emergency rooms are stretched thin now, how will they provide medical care in the event of a disaster?' Sen. Richard Burr…said in a statement."

Collins, King Say Chemical Plant Security Agreement Will Protect Americans. Sen. Susan M. Collins and Rep. Peter T. King, in a letter to the New York Times (9/28, 1.21M) write that the paper's Sept. 25 editorial criticizing an agreement on chemical plant security as weak did "not include some basic facts. The chemical security legislation we negotiated will give the secretary of homeland security new authority to set mandatory standards for high-risk chemical plants and, equally important, to enforce those standards. The bill gives the secretary the strongest possible authority: the power to shut down dangerous plants." Collins and King write that the editorial's assertion "that Congress has done nothing to protect Americans from a terrorist attack on chemical plants is off the mark. We prevailed in including provisions fought by the chemical industry's trade associations. … We also included a three-year sunset to prompt Congress to pass even more extensive legislation."

Holt Harshly Criticizes FBI Over Anthrax Probe. The AP (9/28, de la Cruz) reports New Jersey Democratic Congressman Rush Holt "said Wednesday it should have taken the FBI days, not years, to determine the anthrax used in 2001 that killed a Connecticut woman and four other people was much less sophisticated than believed." Holt "asked FBI Director Robert Mueller for a classified briefing about the status of the bureau's investigation into who was behind the attacks. … In his letter to Mueller, Holt said the FBI's failure to determine what kind of anthrax was used meant that 'resources were diverted and countless agents wasted their time investigating a small pool of suspects, instead of the broader search we now know was needed.'"

Johanns Says Americans Should Not Discount Agroterrorism Threat. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/28, Fisher) reports, "There hasn't been a specific terrorist threat against the U.S. food supply, but Americans should not take the safety of their food for granted, U.S. Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns said Wednesday. … Johanns, who delivered the keynote address to about 1,000 delegates from 21 countries attending the second International Symposium on Agroterrorism, said the recent outbreak of E. coli in spinach shows how quickly food-borne illnesses spread and how tough they can be to trace." The AP notes, "Johanns pointed to steps the government has taken to ensure a safe food supply, including the U.S. Department of Agriculture's animal identification system," and he "said partnering with businesses and coming up with new ways to protect the food supply would be an ongoing concern of the administration."

WAR NEWS:

White House Refuses To Release Entire NIE. The AP (9/28, Shrader) reports, "The White House refused Wednesday to release the rest of a secret intelligence assessment that depicts a growing terrorist threat, as the Bush administration tried to quell election-season criticism that its anti-terror policies are seriously off track." Press secretary Tony Snow "said releasing the full report, portions of which President Bush declassified on Tuesday, would jeopardize the lives of agents who gathered the information." It would also "risk the nation's ability to work with foreign governments and to keep secret its US intelligence-gathering methods, Snow said, and 'compromise the independence of people doing intelligence analysis.'"

Much of the coverage describes the debate over the NIE as having put the White House on the defensive. In political terms, reports suggest the issue could give Democrats an opening in the final weeks of the congressional campaigns. The New York Times (9/28, Nagourney, 1.21M), for example, says "the dispute…has threatened a pre-election script in which the White House had sought to put Democrats on the defensive on national security. As the White House saw it, this was to have been the week in which Republicans seized the advantage by pushing two antiterrorism bills through Congress over the objections of recalcitrant Democrats." Instead, "on Wednesday for the second day in a row, Democrats seized on the intelligence report as confirmation of their case that the Iraq war has in fact compounded the global terrorism threat." However, "Republicans said even if they were momentarily put off course, they were confident that in the end this fight would not help the Democrats. Democrats, they said, lose every time they try to fight Republicans on the issue of security."

DOJ_NMG_0070269

Fox News' Special Report (9/27, Baier) reported that "top Democrats on Capitol Hill, eager to use the report as evidence the Iraq war has made the US less safe, called for the full NIE to be released." CNN's The Situation Room (9/27, Koppel) said "for the third day in a row, Democrats went on the attack. The chairmen of both the Senate and the House Congressional Campaign Committees even called a press conference today to again really put Republicans on the spot and put a question to them." Democrats are "expressing optimism that the NIE's findings could even win them some more votes in November, as they seek to tie Republicans who continue to support U.S. policy in Iraq with President Bush."

All three networks reported on the NIE last night, portraying the controversy as a negative for the White House and Republicans in general. NBC Nightly News (9/27, story 3, 2:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported the parts of the report "that were made public yesterday are creating a major campaign issue." NBC (Gregory) added, "From Afghanistan to Iraq no one questions whether this President has been tough on terror, but what is the result? Mr. Bush says one thing." President Bush: "Five years after September 11th, 2001, America is safer and America is winning the war on terror." Gregory: "This grim intelligence report says another: That 'jihadists…are increasing in both number and geographic dispersion.' Are we really winning? Three years ago that was the question Defense Secretary Rumsfeld asked in this memo to top advisors, 'Are we capturing, killing and deterring more terrorists every day than the Madrassas and the radical clerics are deploying against us?' The report says no. Democrats charge the US is creating more terrorism because of Iraq." Sen. Joseph Biden: "It is not a surprise at all that we have been significantly limited in our ability to deal with worldwide terror because we are tied down and bogged down in Iraq."

ABC World News (9/27, story 2, 1:30, Raddatz) reported, "The White House was under fire today to explain how the President can say we are winning the war on terror when its own intelligence agencies say the global jihadist movement is spreading. Tony Snow had many answers." Snow was shown saying, "Since September 11, 2001, we have not been attacked. Al Qaeda has been significantly degraded. The operational structure has been weakened." Raddatz: "There are more of them. They're more the dispersed. They're harder to find. And yet, the President is saying we're winning the war on terrorism." Tony Snow: "That's right. We're also fighting the war on terrorism." Raddatz: "But Democrats clearly see political opportunity. Little more than 24 hours after the release of the report, the political ads are ready. Connecticut Democrat, Chris Murphy, zeroing in on Republican incumbent Nancy Johnson." Murphy Ad: "A new intelligence report says Johnson's support of President Bush's war in Iraq has increased terrorism." Raddatz: "And in the where are your friends when you need them category, one of America's principal allies in the war, Pakistan's Pervez Musharraf, told comedian John Stewart, the war in Iraq has had a negative impact." President Pervez Musharraf: "It has led to more extremism and terrorism around the world."

CBS Evening News (9/27, 2:40, Martin, 7.66M) led its broadcast with the story, reporting, "Although the White House today called the National Intelligence Estimate on terrorism a snapshot, it is really a forecast. In the words of the document, it analyzes the nature of the threat terrorist groups will pose during the next five years." Paul Pillar, former CIA Counter Intelligence officer: "It lays out the direction we're heading and the direction we can expect to see continue to evolve over the next five years if we don't change course." To the question "do the folks at the Pentagon believe there's anything that might change that bleak forecast," CBS replied, "The estimate singles out two things, one getting bin Laden and Zarqawi, which could cause al Qaeda to break apart and, two, winning in Iraq which could convince some terrorists to give up the fight."

In its analysis of the NIE, the Christian Science Monitor (9/28, Grier, 58K) reports, "Military pressure has had an effect on Al Qaeda, changing it from a centralized organization to more of a diffuse movement, according to the NIE." But "the invasion of Iraq has allowed jihadists a 'cause célèbre,' the document notes." The report also "notes that the jihadists would be further helped by an appearance of success in Iraq -- such as a US pullout. Their cause would be damaged, says the NIE, if 'jihadists leaving Iraq perceive themselves, and be perceived, to have failed.'"

The Wall Street Journal (9/28, Solomon, Lueck, 2.03M) reports Snow said yesterday the report "confirms the importance of the war in Iraq as a bulwark against terrorists. 'Iraq has become, for them, the battleground,' he said. 'If they lose, they lose their bragging rights. They lose their ability to recruit.'"

The New York Times (9/28, Mazzetti, 1.21M) reports, "In mid-August, John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, gave the go-ahead for a National Intelligence Estimate that will address security in Iraq and the potential for civil war there. White House and intelligence officials say the work is still in its early stages and will not be done until next year." But "Democrats contend that the White House is "slow rolling" the document -- that is, deliberately withholding what could be bleak conclusions -- until after the November elections." The Democrats "have intensified those complaints since the White House, under political pressure, on Tuesday released parts of a separate intelligence report, a sober assessment of global terrorism." Yesterday, Rep. Jane Harman, the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, "even said sources had told her that a draft of the document had been finished."

DOJ_NMG_0070270

The Los Angeles Times (9/28, Miller, Wallsten, 918K) reports Frances Townsend, White House domestic security advisor, "said…that the intelligence estimate focusing on Iraq was expected to be finished in January. A senior US intelligence official cautioned, however, that Negroponte's office had not set a timetable for the completion of the work, suggesting it could be delayed beyond the beginning of next year."

Cheney Says Declassifying Intelligence Reports Hurts Efforts In War On Terror. Fox News' Special Report (9/27, Baier) reported, "In an exclusive interview with Fox, Vice President Dick Cheney said declassifying intelligence reports to counter leaks hurts US efforts in the war on terror." Cheney: "It has a corrosive effect inside the bureaucracy. The inability to receive classified information and have it stay classified is devastating."

Intelligence Experts Say NIE Leak Has Damaged War On Terror. CNN's The Situation Room (9/27, Todd) reported, "The White House holds firm, it will not release the bulk of a classified National Intelligence Estimate on terrorism. That would risk the lives of agents, officials say, compromise sources and methods. … But the damage has already been done, say intelligence experts." CNN added, "There's also the spin factor. As one former CIA officer put it, Al-Jazeera will get this material and the jihadists will use it for propaganda. And there's cumulative damage. This is the fifth leak of a major intelligence operation in recent months, after the warrantless wiretapping program, the monitoring of terrorist financing, the collection of phone records, and the CIA secret prisons leak. The result of all those leaks put together, former CIA officers say terrorist networks now know more about how they're monitored than they've ever known before."

Boehner Says NIE Shows Victory In Iraq Will Undercut Terrorists' Ability To Recruit. House Majority Leader John Boehner said on MSNBC's Hardball (9/27) that "if you look at what was leaked out of the National Intelligence Estimate over the weekend by the New York Times, and you read the rest of what was declassified yesterday, you also see in there that they make it clear that winning in Iraq will undercut their ability to recruit new terrorists. Republicans are serious about giving the President the tools to take on the terrorists and to defeat them, while our colleagues across the aisle say all the right words, but when it comes to standing up and voting to give the president the tools, they are never there."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (9/28, A16, 2.03M) editorializes, "National Intelligence Estimates are bland documents that represent the lowest-common-denominator judgment of more than a dozen intelligence agencies. We doubt they're very useful for policy makers, and they certainly aren't suitable for use as political cudgels in a national election." Bush "could do himself, and the country, a favor if he reacted to this latest attempt to politicize NIEs by asking our spy agencies to stop producing them. Their focus should be more and better intelligence. They should leave the policy judgments to elected officials -- and the voters."

The Washington Post (9/28, A22, 748K) editorializes, "Bush was right to declassify and release the intelligence community's most recent estimate of global terrorism." The document's "grim conclusions are hard to square with Mr. Bush's contention that the country is 'safer' today than it was five years ago or that the invasion of Iraq helped rather than hindered the fight against terrorism. In fact, the president seems unwilling to accept the conclusions of the intelligence professionals."

The Los Angeles Times (9/28, 918K) editorializes, "The argument that the US presence in Iraq has exacerbated the international terrorist threat is an important one fully deserving of discussion. So is the NIE's conclusion, more congenial to the Bush administration, that defeating insurgents in Iraq would demoralize other potential jihadists. That debate was going on before the NIE was publicized." And "it should continue after the thrill of declassification is gone."

Fouad Ajami, a professor at the School of Advanced International Studies at Johns Hopkins, writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/28, A16, 2.03M), "Strictly speaking, the National Intelligence Estimate…is not a finding: It is an assessment of Islamic terrorism and its perceived links to Iraq. (It is odd, and ironic, that the intelligence agencies that had been mocked by liberal opinion for their reporting on Iraq before the war have now acquired an aura of infallibility.)"

David Brooks writes in the New York Times (9/28, 1.21M), "The National Intelligence Estimate predicts terror violence will get worse in the years ahead. The scarier estimate was made by a veteran of the 1948 Arab-Israeli war, in conversation with his grandson who now lives in Boston: 'This is forever.'"

Bush Dinner Provides Forum For Karzai, Musharraf To Air Differences. The Washington Post (9/28, A16, Abramowitz, 748K) reports President Bush "welcomed the feuding leaders of Afghanistan and Pakistan to the White House last night for an unusual round of personal diplomacy aimed at forging better relations between two key partners in U.S. efforts to hunt down members of al-Qaeda and other Islamic terrorists." Presidents Hamid Karzai and Pervez Musharraf agreed to join "Bush and his most senior advisers" because the "two have been sniping at each other for months over what Karzai considers Pakistan's tolerance of Taliban militants crossing the border to mount armed attacks in Afghanistan. Musharraf has testily rebutted Karzai's assertions," and Administration "officials are worried that the deteriorating relations between the two men threaten their effort to pacify Afghanistan and hunt down Osama bin Laden." The Post notes, "A White House statement said the three leaders 'committed to supporting moderation and defeating extremism through greater intelligence sharing, coordinated action against terrorists, and common efforts to enhance the prosperity of the people of Afghanistan and Pakistan.'" The Post says the Administration "is confronting a resurgent Taliban," and "tense relations between Pakistan and Afghanistan date back years." The AP (9/28) says that "judging by the body language,… there were plenty of tensions to overcome."

DOJ_NMG_0070271

The New York Times (9/28, Stolberg, 1.21M) reports Musharraf and Karzai "stood glumly -- more like caged cats -- in the Rose Garden." The Washington Times (9/28, Curl, 88K) says "the three men then walked grim-faced down the colonnade, heading to what was expected to be a tense dinner of 'sunchoke' soup, spicy sea bass and endive salad in the Old Family Dining Room of the White House."

The Los Angeles Times (9/28, Richter, 918K) reports the story under the headline "Hold the Vinegar, Bush Urges," noting "aides said Bush hoped" that the leaders "would promise to improve cooperation and intelligence-sharing on their shared border, the site of escalating attacks by Taliban and Al Qaeda fighters." After dinner, Tony Snow "released a statement saying the three leaders had 'committed to supporting moderation and defeating extremism through greater intelligence sharing, coordinated action against terrorists, and common efforts to enhance the prosperity of the people of Afghanistan and Pakistan.'"

All three networks reported on the dinner, which took place after their evening broadcasts. NBC Nightly News (9/27, lead story, 2:55, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "To call this a dinner party would be a big mistake." NBC (Miklaszewski) added, "US officials for years suspected members of Pakistan's intelligence service were aiding the Taliban. And in an interview today for NBC's 'Meet the Press,' Musharraf admits former intelligence officials may be working with the Taliban." President Pervez Musharraf: "We are keeping a very tight watch and we will get all of them if that happens." Miklaszewski: "40,000 US and NATO troops are battling the Taliban in Afghanistan and NATO commanders confirm Taliban leaders conduct the operations from Pakistan." Robert Templer, foreign policy analyst: "As long as they have a refuge in Pakistan this battle will be extremely difficult. If you can escape to a place where you can rearm, train and recruit, it is extremely difficult for NATO and the US forces to get rid of them." Miklaszewski: "Before 9/11 Pakistan relied on the Taliban to keep Afghanistan under control. Some foreign policy experts now fear that old connection may be hard to break, Brian."

ABC World News (9/27, story 3, 0:25, Gibson) reported, "Should be an interesting meal." CBS Evening News (9/27, story 2, 0:55, Axelrod, 7.66M) said "these two men [are] obviously very important in the hunt for Osama bin Laden because bin Laden is thought to be hiding in the borderlands of these two countries."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/27, Roberts) also reported that the stakes are "huge" for Bush, adding that "these are two of the three most important nations when you're talking about that war on terror, perhaps Iraq first, Afghanistan second, and Pakistan third."

Attacks On US Troops Along Pakistani Border Have Tripled Since Truce. The Washington Times/AP (9/28, Krane) reports, "American troops on Afghanistan's eastern frontier have seen a tripling of attacks since a truce between the Pakistani army and pro-Taliban tribesmen that was supposed to stop cross-border raids by militants, a US military officer said yesterday." Pakistan's Foreign Ministry "rejected the US assertion and said home-based insurgents were behind the violence in Afghanistan, where at least 25 militants were reported killed in fighting yesterday." The AP adds, "Raising further questions about the cease-fire, a Pakistani political leader maintained that Taliban leader Mullah Mohammed Omar approved the deal. A government official denied that."

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (9/28, A1, Constable, 748K) reports, "Three weeks after…Musharraf announced a peace pact with Taliban radicals in a tribal area bordering Afghanistan, recent visitors say there is now pin-drop silence in a territory that once shook with artillery and bomb blasts. Religious patrols are enforcing law and order, they say, in place of Pakistan army troops who have withdrawn to their barracks." But "as the toll from violence rises across the border in Afghanistan, with suicide bombings killing 22 people in three cities this week, there are reports that militant Pakistani tribal leaders, while complying with their pledge to reduce the presence of foreign Islamic fighters, intend to defy the peace pact by sending local fighters and suicide bombers into Afghanistan." Musharraf "continues to deny Afghan charges that the Pakistani government is sheltering and encouraging the revived Taliban insurgency from the tribal zones." But "people interviewed in northwest Pakistan said there is widespread support in the tribal region for the Taliban movement's harsh Islamic morality and its war against US forces and their allies in Afghanistan."

Karzai Says Musharraf Isn't Doing Enough. Afghan President Hamid Karzai was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (9/27) about Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf's

DOJ_NMG_0070272

claim that Karzai is turning a blind eye to what is happening in his country. Karzai said, "He is right to say that I know the facts. I indeed know the facts, but I also know a lot of facts in Pakistan. And that's why I am pleading with President Musharraf that, for the sake of security for all of us and for our allies, it is extremely important to place serious attention and take action against some of the places called madrassas that are not madrassas, but are training extremists full of hatred for the rest of the world." Karzai added that Musharraf is "not doing enough." USA Today/AP (9/28) reports, "Musharraf says Karzai has bad information and noted that Pakistan has deployed 80,000 troops along the border." Musharraf also "said Karzai is behaving 'like an ostrich,' refusing to acknowledge the truth and just being political."

UK Defense Minister Says NATO Needs Faster Response To Taliban. The Financial Times (9/28, Fidler) reports, "Nato takes too long to build forces for its missions and needs to be able to respond more rapidly to requests for troops, Des Browne, the UK's defence minister, said on Wednesday." Speaking "the day before a meeting of defence ministers of the 26-member alliance in Slovenia that is set to discuss a military request for more Nato troops in Afghanistan," Browne "said Nato faced a short-term test in getting 'boots on the ground or the equipment in to support them' in Afghanistan."

Senior US Commanders Question Maliki's Will To Prevent Civil War. The Washington Post (9/28, A19, Raghavan, 748K) reports "senior U.S. military commanders" are questioning whether Iraqi PM Nouri al-Maliki "has the political will to weed out official corruption and tackle the brutal militias that are threatening to plunge Iraq into civil war." One official, :who spoke on condition of anonymity at a briefing with reporters" said, "It's going to take time for a government to cleanse itself over time." The Post says the "questions about Maliki are being posed only privately, with U.S. officials in their public statements still voicing cautious confidence in Maliki's ability to recognize and tackle the problems."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (9/28, Oppel, 1.21M) says the officials said the Maliki government must also "purge ministries of corrupt officials who are diverting large sums of money to their own political parties." An unnamed official said Iraqi parties "who were plundering ministries were squandering chances to make progress that could reduce sectarian violence." The Los Angeles Times (9/28, Moore, 918K) says the official said the Maliki government is "thwarting efforts to go after Shiite death squads" in comments that "highlight rising American dissatisfaction" with Maliki and an "increasing willingness to exert pressure on the fledging Iraqi government."

Chiarelli Says US Thinks Maliki Running Out Of Time. McClatchy (9/28, Youssef) reports Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli said the US now believes the Maliki government is "running out of time to prevent Iraq from dissolving into outright civil war." Chiarelli said, "We have to fix this militia issue. We can't have armed militias competing with Iraq's security forces. But I have to trust the prime minister to decide when it is that we do that."

Poll Finds 61% Of Iraqis Support Attacks In US Troops. The AP (9/27, Schweid) reports a poll by the University of Maryland's Program on International Policy Attitudes finds that "about six in 10 Iraqis say they approve of attacks on U.S.-led forces, and slightly more than that want their government to ask U.S. troops to leave within a year." About 61% "approved of the attacks -- up from 47 percent in January. A solid majority of Shiite and Sunni Arabs approved of the attacks, according to the poll. The increase came mostly among Shiite Iraqis." In addition, "three-fourths say they think the U.S. plans to keep military bases in Iraq permanently." The poll, "which included an oversample of 150 Sunni Iraqis, has a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points."

With such dire numbers, the Washington Post (9/28, A19, Pincus, 748K) reports the US military "is looking for ways to achieve stability through opinion polls and public relations." The Multi-National Command is planning to "hire a private firm to conduct polling and focus groups in Iraq 'to assess the effectiveness of operations as they relate to gaining and maintaining popular support,' according to a notice the Department of the Army posted yesterday."

Two Networks Air Excerpts Of Video Showing Attack On Convoy In Iraq. ABC World News (9/27, 3:40, Gibson) opened its broadcast with "an extraordinary view of Iraq that we don't often see: the perspective of the civilian contractors who are a central part of the US mission." Noting that "643 contractors have been killed since the war began," ABC reported on a video of a truck ambush made by Preston Wheeler, a former Halliburton driver. ABC (Ross) added, "It was September, one year ago, as the convoy headed out of Camp Anaconda, near Balad, Iraq. Twelve big trucks and 5 military vehicles make a wrong turn. Residents pelt the convoy with rocks. … A roadside bomb is coming up. … The attack only intensifies. The lead truck, truck number one, is hit and rolls over." Wheeler: "Truck down." Ross: "Wheeler is truck number five. …. The military vehicle in front keeps moving and does not come back." Wheeler: "Truck five cannot move. Please help me. I'm taking fire. 10-4, come back? I'm fixing to get killed. I cannot move." Ross: "You were abandoned?" Wheeler: "Yes, sir. I do not know who the driver was of that humvee. But he abandoned us." Ross concluded by saying Wheeler "says the military vehicles that left the convoy were units of the Virginia National Guard.

DOJ_NMG_0070273

Officials there said the incident had been investigated by the Army, which told us it was unaware about the incident and could not comment. Nor would Halliburton, which says all its employees know the risks before they go to Iraq."

Though ABC claimed its report was an exclusive, NBC Nightly News (9/27, story 2, 1:45, Williams, 9.87M) also reported on the "private contractor working in Iraq whose convoy made a wrong turn and rolled right into an ambush." The report is largely similar to the ABC report, with some of the same excerpts aired. NBC (Myers) said, "Wheeler claims the convoy was not properly equipped or trained by Halliburton. Tonight Halliburton acknowledges the attack occurred but says the convoy was under the control of the US military. The company also says employees receive extensive training and their safety and security is a priority."

US Military Spokesman Says Baghdad Violence Increasing With Onset Of Ramadan. USA Today/AP (9/28) reports, "The top US military spokesman in Iraq said Wednesday that violence in Baghdad had risen, as predicted, with the onset of Ramadan. In Iraq, the Muslim holy month officially started on Monday. Suicide attacks were at their highest level ever, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said. He didn't provide any figures."

Sadr Said To Have Lost Control Over Parts Of His Militia. The New York Times (9/28, Tavernise, 1.21M) reports, "The radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr has lost control of portions of his Mahdi Army militia that are splintering off into freelance death squads and criminal gangs, a senior coalition intelligence official said Wednesday." The Times adds, "The question of how tightly Mr. Sadr holds the militia, one of the largest armed groups in Iraq, is of critical importance to American and Iraqi officials. Seeking to ease the sectarian violence raging across the country, they have pressed him to join the political process and curb his fighters, who see themselves as defenders of Shiism -- and often as agents of vengeance against Sunnis." But "as Mr. Sadr has taken a more active role in the government, as many as a third of his militiamen have grown frustrated with the constraints of compromise and have broken off, often selling their services to the highest bidders, said the official, who spoke to reporters in Baghdad on condition of anonymity because he was not permitted to speak publicly on intelligence issues."

Construction Of $75 Million Baghdad Police College "Grossly Mismanaged." The Washington Post (9/28, A1, Paley, 748K) reports, "A $75 million project to build the largest police academy in Iraq has been so grossly mismanaged that the campus now poses health risks to recruits and might need to be partially demolished, US investigators have found." The Baghdad Police College, "hailed as crucial to US efforts to prepare Iraqis to take control of the country's security, was so poorly constructed that feces and urine rained from the ceilings in student barracks. Floors heaved inches off the ground and cracked apart. Water dripped so profusely in one room that it was dubbed 'the rain forest.'" Stuart W. Bowen Jr., the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, said, "This is the most essential civil security project in the country -- and it's a failure." Bowen's office "plans to release a 21-page report Thursday detailing the most alarming problems with the facility."

Boehner Defers To Generals' Judgment On Troop Levels In Iraq. House Majority Leader John Boehner was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (9/27) if the US has enough troops on the ground in Iraq. Boehner said, "The generals on the ground say we have enough troops. We ought to take their word for it." Boehner added, "Let's let the generals on the ground make that decision."

Favoring Afghanistan War Over Iraq Conflict Said To Be "Senseless." In a Los Angeles Times (9/28, 918K) op-ed, National Review editor Rich Lowry and attorney David B. Rivkin Jr. write, "To critics of the Bush administration, the war in Afghanistan is the 'good' counterinsurgency. Their calls for troop reductions or a timetable to end the 'bad war' in Iraq are matched by demands for more resources and perseverance in Afghanistan. However, this preference is senseless, driven either by sentimentality or partisanship. There is no sound strategic reason to favor the Afghan war over the war in Iraq. In fact, the fates of Baghdad and Kabul are intertwined. … If you put aside how the wars began -- and we realize that many opponents of the Iraq war will never be able to do that -- there is little to differentiate them." In both cases, "we face a vicious insurgency that will take years to defeat," one that is "made more difficult by the overlay of sectarian violence." In both, "the insurgents are aided by infiltration from neighboring countries" and we are "trying to rebuild the army and the police -- with fitful progress -- and fostering a fragile central government whose writ doesn't seem to extend very far across the country. … There is no good reason to favor the Afghan war over the Iraq war. The Afghan war was launched in a brief period of national unity, while the Iraq war helped stoke our current period of political enmity. But one war will not be won without the other."

Schieffer Says Pentagon Risks Losing Volunteers' Trust. The CBS Evening News (9/27, story 10, 2:15, 7.66M) "Free Speech" segment dealt with "the US military and broken promises," in anchor Katie Couric's words. The commentator, Bob Schieffer, then said, "What can those who serve their country do when government breaks its promises to them? Not much, apparently. But that's what happened this week when 4,000 of our soldiers were told they would have to stay in Iraq longer than the government had promised. It's happened over and over. … Our Army is just too small to carry out the mission it has been assigned. We need to fix that or change the mission and find a way out of this war. With an all-volunteer force, we have no choice. If Americans come to believe the Pentagon cannot be trusted to keep its promises to those who join, no one will volunteer. Then where will we be?"

DOJ_NMG_0070274

DOJ:

New Colorado US Attorney Profiled. The Denver Post (9/28, Finley) runs a profile of Troy Eid, the new US Attorney in Denver. The Post reports, "Tommorrow Eid marks the formal start of his service after an ambitious first six weeks on the job as the government's top law enforcement officer for Colorado. The only son of an Egyptian immigrant, Eid, 42, appears to be the the only Arab-American among the 94 U.S. attorneys. … And with enforcement of immigration law his top priority, Eid said he'll draw on this background and a longstanding 'interest in the underdog' to ensure fairness." The Post continues, "The criminals he vows to prosecute most aggressively - deportees who illegally re-enter the United States - often prey on immigrant communities, he said. … And criminals from abroad often drive illegal drug trafficking, his second major priority. Colorado has emerged as one of the busiest drug distribution centers in the country with transnational gangs taking root. … Taken together, immigration and drug-related crime now dominate federal criminal prosecution in Colorado." The Post notes, "Other priorities for Eid: sexual exploitation of children using the Internet, and terrorism cases - the overall top priority of the Justice Department under Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. … 'We get terrorism cases. We take them very seriously. They typically come to us through the JTTF (the FBI-run Joint Terrorism Task Force). ... We have some investigations that have resulted in charges and convictions.' … A symbolic investiture ceremony scheduled for this afternoon marks the formal beginning for Eid, who on Aug. 11 replaced acting U.S. Attorney William Leone. He had served since December 2004, when John Suthers resigned to become Colorado attorney general, after Ken Salazar left that position for the U.S. Senate."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Dunn Expected To Mount Vigorous Defense Of Her Role In H-P Leak Hunt. Ousted Hewlett Packard Chairman Patricia Dunn is expected to mount a vigorous defense of her role in the company's investigation into boardroom leaks. The Financial Times (9/28, Allison) reports that Dunn "is expected to testify on Capitol Hill that she never considered herself the 'supervisor' of the early stages of the company's controversial mole hunt, and that she never 'hired' investigators who were later found to have used legally questionable tactics. In an appearance before members of the House Committee on Energy and Commerce, Ms Dunn is expected to say it was her assumption that Bob Wayman, HP's chief financial officer and former acting chief executive, had authorised the company's leak investigation."

The Wall Street Journal (9/28, A3, Waldman, Clark, Stecklow) reports that Dunn "said she relied on advice from H-P executives, including the company's chief financial officer, before pushing a leak investigation that delved into personal phone records and used tawdry tactics. Ms. Dunn, in testimony prepared for a House committee hearing today on the H-P investigation scandal, said she was informed that using Ronald DeLia, a Boston-area private investigator involved in the affair, constituted 'normal processes' in pursuing investigations at the Palo Alto, Calif., computer company, having been told he had worked for H-P for 'eight or nine years.'"

The New York Times (9/28, Helft, Darlin) reports that in her prepared testimony, Dunn "said she never had reason to believe that illegal methods were used. And she said she repeatedly sought assurances on that point from those directly involved."

The AP (9/28, Gordon) also reports this story.

Hurd To Testify Before House Panel Today. USA Today (9/28, Kessler) reports that as H-P CEO Mark Hurd takes the stand before the House Energy and Commerce committee today, "he will be fighting for his reputation — and possibly his job." Hurd, who "has acknowledged approving at least part of a plan to snoop on journalists, board members, even his own employees," has been asked, along with other key players in the H-P scandal "to defend their actions before the House Energy and Commerce Committee. … But none will face as much scrutiny as Hurd, who as CEO, is ultimately responsible for what happened at HP."

In a separate story, USA Today (9/28, Kessler, Swartz) reports that Hurd "is expected to apologize before Congress for HP's snooping scandal today. … According to prepared remarks released by the House Energy and Commerce Committee, Hurd will tell Congress that a hunt to find out which board member was leaking information to the press

DOJ_NMG_0070275

'became a rogue investigation that violated our own principles.'"

House Panel Issues More Subpoenas In H-P Probe. The House Energy and Commerce Committee has issued five more subpoenas to detectives involved in the leak investigation at H-P. The Hill (9/28, Schor) reports that the new subpoenas set the stage "for two days of hearings that could reveal new details of the tech company's now-infamous spying practices." The Hill adds, "The witness list for today's hearing includes most central players in the widening HP scandal. HP chief executive officer Mark Hurd offered to appear last week to discuss the company's use of pretexting, and Patricia Dunn, who resigned as board chairman last Friday over her role in the affair, also will testify under oath."

H-P Leak Probe Continued Despite Warnings From Security Personnel. The Washington Post (9/28, D1, Nakashima) reports that H-P's leak probe went forward "despite warnings from HP security personnel that the tactics used were 'probably illegal' and should be stopped, according to documents collected for today's congressional hearing on the scandal. In February, HP global security investigator Vince Nye told a Boston colleague working with him on the leak probe that he had 'serious reservations' about how they were obtaining phone-record information in an internal probe to ferret out the source of media leaks." The Post adds, "How and why top management failed to heed the warning are among the questions members of the House Energy and Commerce oversight and investigations subcommittee want answered at today's hearing."

WSJournal Says H-P Scandal Is A Case Of Bad Business Judgment. The Wall Street Journal (9/28) editorializes, "One refreshing aspect of the Hewlett-Packard 'leak' scandal is that it hasn't become an excuse to diagnose some larger sickness in all of corporate America. Today, however, the story heads to Congress, which specializes in false diagnoses, not to mention bad prescriptions. So perhaps it's time to sort out the lessons of this case, prosaic as they are." The Journal adds that "None of this is to say that board leaks aren't a problem. … As for Congress, we understand the impulse to grab some camera time by beating up on H-P witnesses. But even otherwise shrewd Members of Congress have been known to do stupid things from time to time. The last thing the country needs is a new Bureau for the Prevention of Bad Business Judgment, which is at bottom what the H-P saga is all about."

Former Comverse Executive Arrested In Namibia. The Wall Street Journal (9/28, Forelle, Scannell, Davies) reports that Kobi Alexander, former chief executive of Comverse Technology Inc., who was "embroiled in a stock-options scandal and the focus of an international manhunt," was arrested yesterday in Namibia. Namibia's justice minister "filed a special notice with parliament to allow the country to extradite Mr. Alexander to the US, and a magistrate issued an arrest warrant soon after. … Shortly thereafter, the U.S. attorney in Brooklyn, N.Y., unsealed a 32-count indictment against Mr. Alexander for his alleged role in a scheme to backdate stock options at the company he had co-founded."

The New York Times (9/28, Creswell) reports that Alexander "is expected to be brought before a court in Namibia, possibly as soon as today, and the United States intends to seek his extradition to face charges stemming from a scheme to backdate stock option grants at Comverse, according to the United States attorney's office in Brooklyn. Once back in the United States, Mr. Alexander, 54, will face conspiracy, securities fraud and money-laundering charges, according to a 32-count indictment against him that was unsealed yesterday. Prosecutors are also seeking forfeiture of $138 million in bank accounts or other assets held by Mr. Alexander."

The AP (9/28, Hays) reports that "in a statement, U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf credited local officials in the southwest African nation for assisting the FBI in the capture. … 'We are very grateful for the Namibians' swift action and commend them for their vigilance,' she said." The AP adds, "Mauskopf said she would seek Alexander's swift extradition to face charges in federal court in Brooklyn. A call to his defense attorney in New York was not immediately returned. … The manhunt was launched in late July shortly before authorities unsealed a criminal complaint accusing Alexander and two other former top executives of secretly manipulating stock options for personal profit."

Bloomberg (9/28, Frank, Van Voris) reports, "Alexander, the ex-Israeli intelligence officer turned high- technology entrepreneur, will be brought before a court in Windhoek within 48 hours, and the U.S. will seek his extradition, the Justice Department said." Bloomberg adds, "Federal prosecutors charged Alexander, 54, on Aug. 9 with backdating stock options to boost the compensation of executives at New York-based Comverse, the world's largest maker of voicemail software. He is the second CEO charged in the government's probe of illegal stock-option backdating, the largest investigation of corporate wrongdoing since a mutual fund trading scandal three years ago led to $4.3 billion in penalties. … 'Alexander's alleged role in options back-dating victimized Comverse shareholders and deceived prospective investors,' Brooklyn U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf said today in a statement. 'The fraud affected the company's bottom line by misstating earnings.' … Alexander, the wizard of Israel's technology boom, was arrested by Interpol and local police on a Namibian warrant issued at the request of the U.S., said Ray Castillo, a spokesman for the U.S. embassy in Namibia."

DOJ_NMG_0070276

Plaintiffs Seek $21.5 Million From Bearing Point Bond Default. The Washington Post (9/28, D1, Hart, O'Hara) reports, "Plaintiffs who won a bond default ruling against BearingPoint Inc. last week said that they aren't trying to ruin the company and that they don't think the $21.5 million in damages they have requested will hurt the McLean consulting firm's business. A group of bondholders sued BearingPoint for failing to file up-to-date financial reports -- a violation of the bond agreement that has become a common tool used by creditors and most typically hedge funds to extract concessions. A New York court last week agreed that the firm was in default on about $200 million in corporate debt." BearingPoint officials "have appealed the court ruling and asked other creditors to grant waivers to avoid similar suits. The company said it would delay filing its annual report, expected tomorrow, because of the uncertainty that the court ruling has produced for the company."

Regulators Urge Borderless Solution To Derivatives Growth Problems. The Financial Times (9/28, Tett, Gangahar) reports, "Three of the world's most powerful financial regulators have taken the unusual step of issuing a joint warning that individual nations cannot contain some of the risks posed by the explosive growth of derivatives and must collaborate across borders. The dramatic pace of integration and innovation in global markets makes it increasingly difficult to solve problems with 'a local or national solution,' top officials from the UK Financial Services Authority, the Federal Reserve Bank of New York and the US Securities and Exchange Commission write in the Financial Times. 'In a more integrated global market, we will increasingly find ourselves compelled to pursue borderless solutions,' write Timothy Geithner, president of the New York Fed; Sir Callum McCarthy, chairman of the FSA; and Annette Nazareth, a commissioner at the SEC."

DOJ, SEC Probing Halliburton Work In Nigeria And Elsewhere. The Houston Chronicle (9/28, Ivanovich) reports, "Federal investigators, who have been looking into a possible bribery scheme involving Houston's Halliburton Co. and a Nigerian natural gas plant, are scrutinizing 'multiple' projects both within and outside Nigeria, according to company filings." The Chronicle continues, "Recently uncovered information suggests employees at Halliburton's M.W. Kellogg Co. — some time before 1998 — may have planned to funnel payments to government officials to land projects in countries outside Nigeria, Halliburton subsidiary KBR said in a filing with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission. … The SEC has issued subpoenas seeking documents related to multiple projects from the last 20 years in and outside Nigeria, the filing said." The Chronicle adds, "Halliburton officials have been scrutinizing the activities of an unnamed agent who 'has worked with us outside of Nigeria on several current projects and on numerous older projects going back to the early 1980s,' the company said in the filing. … Halliburton officials are trying to determine whether this individual broke the law or violated the company's code of conduct. … The latest inquiries grew out of a long-running investigation into the construction of a $5.5 billion natural gas liquefaction complex at Bonny Island in Nigeria's Rivers State. … The SEC and Justice Department, as well as authorities in France, Nigeria, Switzerland and Britain have all been investigating. Halliburton officials said they do not expect those probes to be wrapped anytime soon."

Fastow Sentence Surprises Experts. The Houston Chronicle (9/28, Hays, Fowler) reports, "Andrew Fastow's six-year prison sentence caught many longtime observers of the case off guard this week, including a former member of the government team that negotiated his 2004 plea agreement." The Chronicle continues, "Fastow had agreed to a 10-year prison sentence in the plea deal with the understanding that he would not ask for a lesser sentence later. … Yet his lawyers asked for just such a break. The government didn't object and instead stressed the critical cooperation Fastow provided in helping the government build criminal cases against former Chairman Ken Lay and former CEO Jeff Skilling." The Chronicle adds, "With no dissenting opinion from prosecutors, U.S. District Judge Kenneth Hoyt cut four years from Fastow's term. … 'The way the government handled it is surprising, given the written terms of the agreement,' said Andrew Weissmann, former director of the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, who was on the team when Fastow's plea was negotiated. Weissmann stepped down from the task force last year and later went into private practice. … Michael Wynne, a former federal prosecutor in Houston, also was surprised. … 'I expected him to receive the full 10 years. The judge even said that there was no way Fastow would be able to repay all the harm that he caused,' Wynne said." The Chronicle notes, "Fastow, 44, has long been considered among the most egregious of Enron's felons, having orchestrated multiple schemes to help Enron manipulate earnings while enriching himself with kickbacks. Some of those unsustainable schemes began crumbling in 2001 and helped fuel the company's failure late that year. … Both Lay and Skilling argued in their fraud and conspiracy trial earlier this year that no fraud occurred at Enron other than Fastow's self-dealing. But Fastow linked both to fraud, either for participating in or approving fraudulent schemes or lying to investors about Enron's financial strength to maintain an illusion of success."

DOJ_NMG_0070277

CRIMINAL LAW:

Pirro Under Federal Probe Over Marital Spy Plot. Jeanine Pirro, the Republican candidate for New York Attorney General, is under federal investigation for allegedly plotting with former New York City Police Commissioner Bernard Kerik to spy on her husband. WNBC-TV, New York (9/28) reports that the "allegations center on whether Pirro illegally spied on her own husband, Albert Pirro, while she held the office of the Westchester District Attorney." Sources gold WNBC-TV "that court authorities wiretapped conversations that appear to show that while preparing for a statewide run for office, Jeanine Pirro was desperate to prove her husband was cheating on her." WNBC-TV adds, "According to documents now in the hands of several defense attorneys, Pirro and the former New York City Police Commissioner Bernard Kerik were apparently talking about planting a hidden device aboard her husband's boat. Her possible motive may have been to see if he was having an affair."

The New York Times (9/28, Healy) reports, "At a hastily arranged news conference yesterday, called because of an imminent television report on the inquiry, Ms. Pirro conceded that she had her husband, Albert, followed in the summer of 2005. She said she had discussed bugging the family's boat with Mr. Kerik, an old friend who was then running his own security business. But Ms. Pirro, who was the district attorney of Westchester County at the time, said she never went through with the plan, and she insisted that she broke no laws." The Times adds, "Seething with anger, and choking up as she laid bare her marital problems, Ms. Pirro said that two federal agents approached her at her home late one recent night and revealed that the United States attorney's office for the Southern District of New York was investigating her surveillance discussions. They had been caught on tape by Bronx authorities who were conducting a separate investigation of Mr. Kerik. … With less than six weeks to go until the Nov. 7 election, Ms. Pirro said she was being hounded by authorities as part of a 'political witch hunt and smear campaign' led by the same federal lawyer who helped convict Mr. Pirro of tax evasion in 2000. But the United States attorney for the Southern District, Michael J. Garcia, a Republican appointee, issued a statement denying that the inquiry was politically motivated."

The AP (9/28, Fouhy) reports, "Pirro…said that any probe into her troubled marriage was 'highly improper' but she had no intention of quitting her campaign, calling the investigation politically motivated and sexist." The AP continues, "She also said that federal prosecutors had no business delving into her union with millionaire lobbyist Albert Pirro, who spent 11 months in prison after being convicted on tax fraud charges in 2000 and fathered an illegitimate daughter after their wedding in 1975. The couple has a 21-year-old daughter and a 17-year-old son. … 'Sometime last year, I came to believe that my husband was seeing another woman,' Pirro said. 'In the midst of matrimonial discord, I was angry and had him followed to see if what I suspected was true. Although I spoke about taping him, there was no taping by me of anyone. There was anger, and frustration, and disappointment.' … Pirro, former district attorney of Westchester County, just outside New York City, said that 'placing a recording device on one's property to intercept a conversation involving one's spouse is not a crime.'"

Newsday (9/29, Riley) called the FBI investigation "a jaw-dropping disclosure that could shatter her campaign" and notes Pirro said at yesterday's press conference, "There is no way, when I have the opportunity to be the first woman attorney general in the history of this state, that I'm going to be pushed out of a race because somebody wants to delve into the personal lives of my husband and myself. I'm standing up for myself and standing up for women." The New York Post (9/28, Lovett, Dicker, 608K) similarly calls the probe "a devastating blow to her campaign" and reports that in the tapes, "Pirro also belittled the AG's office she is now seeking, calling it a 'been-there-done-that kind of thing.' She said she would have been in the governor's mansion if it weren't for her husband." The New York Daily News (9/28, Lucadamo, Smith, 729K) notes, "Kerik's lawyer, Joseph Tacopina, said, 'Bernie spoke to a friend in distress regarding a domestic conflict. Nothing illegal was discussed and nothing illegal was done. I find it extremely troubling that in the midst of a federal investigation, sealed documents were leaked to the media.'"

CBS 2 Chicago (9/28) reports, "Pirro confirmed she had been informed by FBI agents this week that she was under investigation and said she had hired an attorney to represent her in the case. … Pirro noted that one of the U.S. attorneys assigned to the case, Elliott B. Jacobson, had prosecuted her husband's tax evasion case seven years ago."

FNC's Big Story (9/27, 5:29 p.m.) reported, "A prominent former New York D.A running for state attorney general just dropped a bombshell at news conference a couple of minutes ago. Republican candidate Jeanine Pirro says she is under investigation for allegedly plotting to secretly record her husband to find out whether he was having an affair."

CNEWS9-TV Albany, (9/27, 8:00 p.m.) reported, "New explosive allegations reveal that the Republican candidate for Attorney General is the subject of a federal investigation. Jeanine Pirro publicly defends herself in the biggest case of her career. Federal prosecutors are investigating the Republican state Attorney General candidate for allegedly scheming to secretly record her husband Al Pirro. She suspected her millionaire lobbyist husband of having an affair and allegedly talked about catching him with the help of former NYC police commissioner Bernard Kerik. She says she had her husband followed but did not record him. Although Jeanine Pirro's news conference this afternoon was very painful and personal, it will have political implications."

DOJ_NMG_0070278

WXXA-TV Albany, (9/27, 5:02 p.m.) reported, "Republican state attorney general candidate Jeanine Pirro is being investigated by the federal government. According to sources close to Pirro, she allegedly plotted to secretly record her lobbyist husband because she thought he was having an affair. They say she allegedly discussed the plot with former New York City commissioner Bernie Kerik last year."

CNEWS9-TV Albany, (9/27, 6:31 p.m.) reported, "At a news conference, Pirro issued a strong statement saying that the federal government has no right to investigate her personal life. She says the investigation into allegations that she plotted to record her husband are unwarranted. She admitted that she considered recording her husband when she thought he was cheating on her."

CNEWS9-TV Albany, (9/27, 6:59 p.m.) reported, "She says it's a political witch-hunt by one U.S. attorney."

WRGB-TV Albany, (9/27, 6:32 p.m.) reported, "An angry Jeanine Pirro held a press conference late this afternoon blasting what she called overzealous prosecutors, who are looking into whether she tried to secretly record her husband. … She denied ever making any recordings"

WRGB-TV Albany, (9/27, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "Pirro calls it a political move, and says absolutely nothing will come of it."

WTEN-TV Albany, (9/27, 5:33 p.m.) reported, "Two anonymous sources say no recordings were ever actually made, but that they overheard Pirro discussing those plans with the former NYCP Commissioner. They say Pirro suspected her husband, Albert Pirro, was cheating on her. Pirro went on to say she'd like the person who leaked the story brought to justice."

WTEN-TV Albany, (9/27, 5:59 p.m.) reported, "Even if it did (it), Pirro says it would have been lawful and. her personal business."

US Attorney Responds To Allegations Of Impropriety. WNBC-TV (9/28) reports that shortly after Pirro's press conference, US Attorney Garcia "released this statement: … 'This Office is, as Jeanine Pirro said today, investigating allegations recently brought to our attention by other law enforcement agencies, involving possible violations of Title 18, United States Code, Sections 2511(1)(a) and (b). … There are two Assistant United States Attorneys assigned to the case. They are both career prosecutors with experience in public corruption matters. They are working in conjunction with an experienced Assistant District Attorney from the Westchester County District Attorney's Office. … Their actions, and those of the FBI agents with whom they are working, have been approved by several layers of supervisors, including me. Because the investigation is ongoing, we will not comment as to its substance, except to say that we do not take politics into account in deciding either the subject matter or timing of our investigations.'"

Case Highlights Murky World Of Marital Spying. The New York Times (9/28, Eaton) reports, "Ms. Pirro's insistence that she never contemplated doing anything illegal in investigating her husband — including her discussion of placing a recording device on a boat he owned — involves the somewhat murky world of what amounts to marital spying. … Paul Shechtman, the lawyer Ms. Pirro retained recently, said that federal law permitted spouses to eavesdrop on each other in a house they shared. He cited several cases, including one from 1986 in which a federal judge on Long Island dismissed a case brought by a woman whose husband placed a listening device on the family phone in the course of their divorce, but while they were still sharing a house. … And on the specific question of whether it would be legal for Ms. Pirro to place a device on her husband's boat, Mr. Shechtman argued that it would be as well, because the boat was used by the entire family. … But some experts were not so sure. … 'If the boat is registered only in his name, it could be considered unlawful wiretapping,' said Robert Mann, director of global operations for Worldwide Intelligence Network, a private investigation and personal protection company headquartered in Los Angeles."

Kerik No Stranger To Controversy. The New York Times (9/28, Buettner, Rashbaum) reports, "The name of Bernard B. Kerik has already figured in embarrassing moments for the Bush administration and for former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani. … Yesterday, Mr. Kerik's name turned up in yet another uncomfortable place: a federal investigation that threatens to disrupt the race for state attorney general." Pirro's conversations with Kerik "The conversations took place in mid-2005, long after Mr. Kerik's rise to fame in the months after Sept. 11, 2001, had been upended by damaging allegations that emerged after his nomination by President Bush to become the nation's homeland security secretary. … Mr. Kerik had left Mr. Giuliani's consulting business, Giuliani Partners, months earlier and was opening his own security firm, the Kerik Group. But he remained under investigation by the Bronx district attorney's office, which was finding that as New York City corrections commissioner, he had accepted free renovations to his Bronx apartment from a city contractor when the company was under investigation for possible ties to organized crime. … Apparently as part of that investigation, Bronx authorities began listening to Mr. Kerik's conversations, including several in which Ms. Pirro asked him to undertake the grunt work of the average private investigator, marital surveillance."

DOJ_NMG_0070279

Another Mistrial Declared In Gotti Racketeering Case. The AP (9/28, Neumeister) reports, "For the third time in the past 12 months, a judge declared a mistrial Wednesday in the racketeering trial of former mob boss John A. 'Junior' Gotti." The AP continues, "The jury, which deliberated for seven days over two weeks, sent out a second note in as many days indicating it could not reach a unanimous verdict. "Your honor, unfortunately we are deadlocked," said the note, prompting U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin to declare the mistrial shortly after noon. … Two previous juries in the last year wound up deadlocked, with resulting mistrials, after Gotti's lawyers argued the second-generation Mafiosi had years ago severed his ties to organized crime. If convicted, the 42-year-old Gotti had faced up to 30 years in prison. … He is free on $7 million bail, and there was no immediate word on whether the government would mount a fourth prosecution. … 'That's a decision above my pay grade,' said prosecutor Victor Hou when asked about the possibility. The defense made motions to suspend Gotti's current home detention and electric surveillance by the government."

The New York Times (9/28, Williams) notes that this was the third time in just over a year a jury has failed to return a verdict in Gotti's trials. A federal official "said that after three mistrials, the prosecution was unlikely to retry Mr. Gotti unless new evidence turned up, a decision that would all but end an expensive and highly publicized organized crime prosecution in a startling defeat for the government." The Times adds, "Jurors said they believed Mr. Gotti was guilty of orchestrating the 1992 shooting and bungled kidnapping of Curtis Sliwa, the radio talk-show host. But, the jurors said, the government failed to prove that the shooting was part of a pattern of crimes, a necessary part of the racketeering charge, and so they could not convict him." The New York Daily News (9/28, Zambito, 729K) also reports, "The hours of jailhouse tapes…made for some great courtroom drama -- but didn't have much of an impact on the jury deciding his fate. 'The tapes were a very cloudy issue because you couldn't hear them very well,' one juror said yesterday after the panel deadlocked."

The New York Post (9/28, Cornell, Gittens, 608K) reports, "It was strike three for prosecutors…a stunning development that could mean freedom for the mob scion. … 'I'd be better off dead,' said a disgusted Sliwa, who got little consolation from the mixed result. 'This guy got away with a crime…but as God is my witness, God will not forget that he tried to kill me.'" Newsday (9/28, DeStefano) notes, "The mistrial was a clear indication that a revised government presentation, which included prison tapes and financial evidence, failed to sway the jury. … Immediately after the verdict, Manhattan U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia issued a terse statement that expressed disappointment but praised his staff." He added, "We will inform the court in the very near future about how we plan to proceed." The New York Daily News (9/28, Fenner, Martinez, Zambito, 729K) adds, "It appeared unlikely last night that the government would seek a fourth trial, giving the Teflon Son a chance to prove he really has ditched the mob life he inherited from his father, whose specter loomed large over the courthouse."

Legal Experts Say US Should Not Seek Fourth Trial. Newsday (9/28, Mallia, DeStefano) reports, "Legal experts to Gottiprosecutors: Three strikes, you're out. … 'This case is fatally flawed. One could even say that if they bring it again it would be abuse of prosecutorial power,' said Fordham Law School professor Jim Cohen, who specializes in criminal law." Newsday adds, "One thing on which several experts agreed: After the highly visible defeats, prosecutors must balance mounting costs -- by one estimate already exceeding $1 million -- against chances of success. … 'If I were in charge, the kind of question I would ask is, "Can you convince me that, in a subsequent trial, we can be more persuasive?"' New York University Law School professor James Jacobs said. .. Jacobs was skeptical that any new evidence is forthcoming."

Victoria Gotti Praises Judge, Assails NYPost. In a New York Daily News (9/28, 729K) op-ed, Gotti's mother, Victoria Gotti, writes, "I will thank our good fortune every day for a judge like Shira Schiendlin. She is the difference between a fair trial and a railroad job. God bless her. The defense team was second to none and basically worked pro bono. Last, but not least, God bless those jurors for not believing the swill they were being fed daily by government and stories being planted by their government shill at the New York Post." Gotti adds, "It was a government source who tried his best to get my son murdered by circulating that he was a rat. Conveniently, the government source, an FBI agent, gave this garbage to The Post ... We learned that Curtis Sliwa's best friend...is the new publisher of that paper. We didn't expect anything but yellow journalism."

Local Television. WQAD-TV Davenport, (9/27, 10:22 p.m.) reported, "A judge declared another mistrial in the racketeering case against the former mob boss. A jury deliberated for seven days without reaching a verdict. Gotti says he just wants to move on with his life. It's the third mistrial for the son of the notorious John Gotti."

WBRE-TV Wilkes Barre, (9/27, 11:22 p.m.) reported, "A judge in New York City has declared a mistrial in the racketeering case against former mob boss John Gotti Junior. 'I'm going to close by just saying this: My father's dead over four years. It's time to let go, and it's time for us all just to move on.'"

WJZ-TV Baltimore, (9/27, 5:37 p.m.) reported, "A big sigh of relief today from John Jr. Gotti. Today, a New York judge declared a mistrial in his racketeering case."

DOJ_NMG_0070280

WTTO-TV Birmingham, (9/27, 9:00 p.m.) reported, "The son of notorious mob boss John Gotti escapes yet another conviction. John Jr. walked out of court a free man."

WKRN-TV Nashville, (9/27, 4:52 p.m.) reported, "The third time is not the charm for prosecutors in the trail of john Gotti Jr. For the third time in a year, the judge declares a mistrial."

WTNH-TV Hartford, (9/27, 5:33 p.m.) reported, "In the third racketeering trial against former mob boss John junior Gotti. The jury deliberated for seven days before breaking down. … A majority favored acquitting Gotti."

KXJB-TV Fargo, (9/27, 10:03 p.m.) reported, "Gotti says enough is enough, and it's time for the feds to let go."

WNWO-TV Toledo, (9/27, 11:21 p.m.) reported, "Gotti says it's time for the feds to let go."

CNEWS9-TV Albany, (9/27, 10:44 p.m.) reported, "Prosecutors now have the option of attempting a fourth trial or dropping the charges against Gotti."

WRGT-TV Dayton, (9/27, 10:27 p.m.) reported, "No word on whether the feds will try Gotti again."

Rare Map Thief Sentenced To 42 Months In Prison. The New York Times (9/28, Cowan) reports, "A map dealer who stole nearly 100 rare maps valued at $3 million from Yale and other institutions was sentenced to three and a half years in prison on Wednesday after a federal judge credited him for helping the authorities retrieve most of the items taken." The Times continues, "Representatives of the institutions that were looted, who had traveled long distances to lobby for a stiff sentence, left the court saying they were deeply disappointed with the punishment given the map dealer, Edward Forbes Smiley III. Federal sentencing guidelines suggested that Mr. Smiley was looking at a term of 57 to 71 months, although the maximum penalty was 10 years." The Times adds, "Mr. Smiley, 50, was arrested by the Yale police in June 2005, shortly after leaving Yale's rare-book library with seven maps stashed in his briefcase and tweed jacket. … After a year of cooperating with the authorities, he pleaded guilty in federal court in June this year to the theft of a major artwork. As part of the plea agreement, he admitted to removing maps from collections at Harvard, Yale, the New York Public Library, Boston Public Library, the Newberry Library in Chicago and the British Library in London."

The Boston Globe (9/28, Abel) reports that Smiley "admitted that over an eight-year span he stole more than 30 maps from Boston and New York public libraries, eight from Harvard's Houghton Library, and 10 from Yale's Beinecke Rare Book and Manuscript Library in New Haven, prosecutors said. The British Library has said Smiley took centuries-old maps that told the story of the New World. … The judge ordered Smiley to report to prison in January, at a facility to be designated by the Federal Bureau of Prisons."

The AP (9/28, Christoffersen) reports, "U.S. District Judge Janet Bond Arterton said she wanted to send a dual message with the sentence. Prosecutors did not ask for a specific a sentence, but recommended Smiley be given credit for his cooperation with the investigation. … Leaders of the prestigious libraries urged a stiff sentence, saying he took world treasures and left a trail of victims."

Louisiana Woman Pleads Guilty To FEMA Fraud. The Baton Rouge Advocate (9/28) reports, "A Baton Rouge woman pleaded guilty Tuesday in federal court to two counts of fraud related to hurricane disaster relief programs." The Advocate continues, "Keosha Martin, 24, pleaded guilty to making two false and fraudulent claims to the Federal Emergency Management Agency. … According to the indictment, Martin was employed by FEMA between October 2005 and November 2005 as an applicant assistant whose duties included assisting disaster victims in applying for benefits. … At the time, Martin filed a claim on her behalf for damage from Hurricane Katrina and later filed a claim for damage from Hurricane Rita." The Advocate adds, "Martin could be sentenced to 10 years in prison, a $500,000 fine or both, per count. … The number of people who have been charged in the Baton Rouge based Middle District of Louisiana with violations related to hurricane disaster relief funds stands at 74. … In September 2005, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales formed the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force to deter, investigate and prosecute disaster-related crimes such as charity fraud, identity theft, procurement fraud and insurance fraud. The task force includes the FBI, the U.S. Inspectors General community, the U.S. Secret Service, the U.S. Postal Inspection Service, the Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys and others."

Two FEMA Workers Charged With Filing False Claim. The New York Times (9/28, Lipton, 1.21M) reports that two FEMA workers "have been charged with trying to defraud the government by filing a false claim for damage to a houseboat, which resulted in an award of $25,500 in disaster assistance." Duane Adams and Emily Fuqua, who "who worked in clerical administration and disaster recovery programs, have been placed on unpaid leave, a FEMA official said."

Former Michigan Prosecutor Acquitted Of Corruption Charges. The Detroit News (9/28, Egan) reports, "Former Macomb County Prosecutor Carl Marlinga burst into tears, embraced his wife, Barbara, and whispered, 'It's over,' after a federal jury acquitted him Wednesday of public corruption charges." The News continues, "Marlinga, 59, who loudly proclaimed his innocence even before the federal government indicted him on bribery and fraud charges in 2004, was ecstatic but not bitter after the jury forewoman read the words 'not guilty' five times. … 'Marlinga, who was represented by Mark Kriger and N.C. Deday LaRene, said he ignored his lawyers' advice when he repeatedly agreed to be interviewed by investigators and twice testified before a federal grand jury investigating his conduct. At his trial, Marlinga found his own words forming a central part of the government's case." The News adds, "Now a lawyer in private practice, Marlinga would not rule out a return to politics. His future could test whether a politician, once cleared, can cleanse the stain of an indictment and return to public life. … It also represents the latest in a series of setbacks for the federal government in high profile cases in Detroit. … The case is another prominent defeat for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Detroit. … The government does not appeal jury acquittals in criminal cases. 'We respect the jury's decision, I congratulate Mr. Marlinga's attorneys on the defense, and we're moving on,' said U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy."

DOJ_NMG_0070281

The Detroit Free Press (9/28, Hunt, Ashenfelter) reports, "Marlinga…had faced up to 10 years in prison and $250,000 in fines for allegedly swapping prosecutorial favors in two rape cases for contributions to his failed 2002 congressional campaign. The five charges included two counts of bribery, deprivation of honest services, making false statements to the Federal Elections Commission and exceeding campaign contribution limits." The Free Press adds, "The charges derailed Marlinga's political career, causing the popular Macomb County Democrat to step aside shortly after the indictment was issued in April 2004, after 20 years as the county's chief prosecutor. … As they filed out of the courthouse, jurors said federal prosecutors weren't convincing. … 'We felt the government didn't prove its case and Mr. Marlinga's attorneys did,' said jury forewoman Mary Shultz of Rochester. … 'There were way too many loose ends,' said juror Megan Bowman, an Ortonville homemaker. 'There wasn't a whole puzzle.'" The Free Press notes, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Cares, who said during the trial that Marlinga's political ambition caused him to sell his influence, declined comment. His cocounsel, Jonathan Tukel, said later: 'We always respect the jury's verdict." The Free Press notes, "U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy said it was a difficult case and congratulated Marlinga's lawyers. … Although the office had a string of high-visibility losses in the months before Murphy took the helm in 2005, he said: 'No prosecutor's office in America will or should have a 100% batting average. We strive to do the right thing in every case.'"

More Commentary. The Detroit Free Press (9/28) editorializes, "Carl Marlinga may have exercised poor judgment or been naive about how things would look, but a federal court jury decided Wednesday that the former Macomb County prosecutor was not guilty of a crime. The verdict clearing him on five corruption charges rewarded Marlinga's faith in a system that he served pretty well for 20 years." The Free Press adds, "The allegations that he swapped favors in criminal cases for contributions to a failed congressional campaign effectively ended Marlinga's political career. … But he has always been a pretty straight shooter as a public official and took the witness stand to declare his innocence with the same earnest demeanor that made him a favorite of Macomb County voters. This time, Marlinga got all the votes he needed."

New Orleans Corruption Probe Defendant Sentenced To Probation. The AP (9/28) reports, "A figure in a federal investigation targeting corruption in the New Orleans transit authority was put on three years of probation on Wednesday. John S. Keller pleaded guilty in August 2005 to failing to report a felony. U.S. District Judge Ginger Berrigan also ordered him to perform 200 hours of community service and pay $10,000 in restitution to the Regional Transit Authority, along with a $5,000 fine. Keller was the business partner of Glenn Haydel, who pleaded guilty in May to stealing $550,000 from the RTA."

Prosecutor Seeks Protection Order On Fumo Evidence. The AP (9/28, Dale) reports, "The federal grand jury investigating whether state Sen. Vincent Fumo extorted corporate donations for a charity in his district should wrap up its work by February, prosecutors disclosed Wednesday. 'The grand jury is sorting out potential defendants, potential charges,' Assistant U.S. Attorney John Pease said at a hearing in a related case." Yesterday, prosecutors "asked the judge to order defense lawyers to keep under lock and key the e-mails, grand jury transcripts and other evidence that prosecutors must turn over to the defense. … U.S. District Judge William H. Yohn Jr. asked the sides to try to narrow the scope of the documents that would come under a protection order, and scheduled a telephone conference with lawyers on Monday." The AP notes, "Defense lawyers argue that prosecutors themselves have courted the press, with dramatic pre-dawn arrests and the public filing of a 65-page FBI affidavit that spells out the focus on Fumo and includes colorful e-mail excerpts about the senator."

The Philadelphia Daily News (9/28, Hinkelman, 109K) reports, "At issue are summaries of FBI and IRS interviews with witnesses, grand-jury transcripts and two search-warrant affidavits that have been filed under seal. 'We think the defense counsel should have that under discovery obligations,' Pease said, 'but some of it is scandalous, even criminal, and would be extremely embarrassing to the persons involved' if it were made public." The Philadelphia Inquirer (9/28, Shiffman, 399K) also reports on the hearing, under the headline "Prosecutor Says U.S. Probe Of Fumo To End This Year."

DOJ_NMG_0070282

Philadelphia Ad Executive, Consultant Plead Guilty To Fraud Charges. The Philadelphia Inquirer (9/28, Anastasia, 399K) reports, "A former advertising-company executive and a consultant for that company each pleaded guilty to fraud charges yesterday, bringing an end to one phase of an ongoing federal corruption investigation at Philadelphia International Airport. Joseph Evans, 51, the former chief executive officer of Sky Sites Inc., and Joseph Moderski, 69, a consultant, entered their pleas during hearings before U.S. District Judge James T. Giles. Evans, under terms of a plea agreement, pleaded guilty to one count of mail fraud. Moderski pleaded guilty to conspiracy, mail fraud and wire fraud." The Inquirer notes, "Evans and Moderski were charged in a pay-to-play scheme in which they conspired to funnel money out of the company to finance illegal campaign contributions to Mayor Street. The mayor has not been charged with any wrongdoing, but his office was briefly bugged by the FBI as part of a broad corruption probe."

Judge Sets Nov. 21 Cause, Bail Hearing For Jeffs. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/28, Dobner) reports, "Polygamist sect leader Warren Jeffs, a fugitive for nearly two years, appeared in a Utah courtroom Wednesday and said he was willing to wait several weeks for a judge to decide whether to send him to trial on charges of arranging an underage marriage. … The judge set a Nov. 21 probable cause hearing and said he would address Jeffs' bond status at that time." The AP notes, "Defense attorney Walter Bugden said 'absolutely' when reporters asked if this was religious persecution. 'Let's wait until we can have a trial in this matter before we jump to the conclusion that Mr. Jeffs is guilty of anything,' Bugden said." Under the headline "Jeffs' Attorney Says Case Is 'Religious Persecution,'" the St. George Spectrum (9/28, St. Germain) adds that Budgen said outside the court, "We're going to have a preliminary hearing, with one step at a time. We intend to confront the witnesses against us and there will be cross-examination at the preliminary hearing."

The Deseret Morning News (9/28, Winslow) reports, "A representative from the U.S. Attorney's Office in Utah was also in the courtroom Wednesday, observing the proceedings. 'We remain interested in the case. We're preserving the options that we may have,' U.S. Attorney's spokeswoman Melodie Rydalch told the Deseret Morning News as she left the courthouse. Federal prosecutors have refused to drop an unlawful flight to avoid prosecution warrant against Jeffs and have threatened to indict him on it should he be granted bail."

Teen Bride To Testify At Hearing. The Salt Lake Tribune (9/28, Adams) reports, "The state's key witness in the case" will testify at the Nov. 21 hearing, and she "is expected to describe her assigned marriage to an older man she alleges later raped her, as well as Jeffs' alleged instructions that she submit 'mind, body and soul' to her husband. … The woman, who was between 14 and 18 at the time of her spiritual marriage, is looking forward to her day in court, according to Brian Filter, spokesman for the Washington County Attorney's Office. He also said other witnesses and evidence will be presented."

Prosecutors Seek To Bar Release Of Intelligence Documents In Libby Trial. The AP (9/28, Apuzzo) reports Federal prosecutors "went into a private hearing Wednesday to urge a judge not to release sensitive intelligence reports at the upcoming trial" of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff. Libby "wants to use President Bush's daily terrorism briefings as evidence at his obstruction and perjury trial in January." Libby says "the records from 2003 and early 2004 will show he did not lie to investigators about his role in the leak of a CIA officer's identity. He contends he had important things on his mind and may have forgotten details about the leak." Prosecutors and defense lawyers "will not discuss the contents of the classified briefing summaries. But the dates overlap with the military's hunt for Iraq's Saddam Hussein, the death of his two sons, and continuing discussions about nuclear programs in North Korea and Iran."

House Suspends License For Firm Linked To Abramoff. The Washington Post (9/28, D3, Grimaldi, 748K) reports, "House leaders have suspended a multimillion-dollar wireless communications license that federal prosecutors say was corruptly awarded to a Dulles telecommunications firm by Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) in exchange for gifts from lobbyist Jack Abramoff. The award of the license was one of a series of acts that Ney said he performed for Abramoff in exchange for campaign contributions, expensive meals, luxury travel and sports tickets. Ney agreed this month to plead guilty to corruption charges and is set to enter his plea Oct. 13. The license to install antennas for cellular and wireless telephones in House office buildings was awarded in 2002 to MobileAccess, formerly known as Foxcom Wireless, which was based in Israel. The company, now based in Vienna, Va., later paid Abramoff $280,000 in lobbying fees and donated $50,000 to a charity operated by Abramoff that paid for a golf junket to Scotland for Ney."

Roll Call (9/28, Bresnahan) reports, "Ney's alleged influence peddling in granting the license to provide cell phone antennas in House office buildings to Foxcom Wireless, now Mobile Access Networks, was part of the plea agreement that the Ohio Republican recently reached with the Justice Department. Ney admitted to accepting 'things of value' from Abramoff in return for official actions, including granting the Mobile Access license." Roll Call adds, "House insiders said that the Administration Committee and Jay Eagan, the Chief Administrative Officer for the House, jointly made the decision to conduct the review following Ney's plea deal. House officials declined to say whether they were considering taking legal action against the company."

DOJ_NMG_0070283

US Charges Pennsylvania Woman In Child Porn Case. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (9/28, LaRussa) reports, "A Washington County woman has been accused of using the Internet to distribute stories that describe children -- some as young as 2 years old -- being kidnapped, sexually molested and murdered." The Tribune-Review continues, "Karen Fletcher, 54, of Meldon Avenue, Donora, was indicted by a federal grand jury Tuesday on six counts of transportation of obscene matters, U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said. … 'This case is a very important part of our efforts to prosecute people who exploit children,' Buchanan said. 'Use of the Internet to distribute obscene stories like these not only violates federal law, they embolden sex offenders who would target children.'" The Tribune-Review adds, "Free speech specialists, however, question whether the charges will stick because there don't appear to be any child victims. … Fletcher is accused of operating a Web site featuring excerpts of "extremely explicit and graphic stories" that could be downloaded by purchasing a $10 monthly subscription, according to investigators. … The indictment against Fletcher alleges that on Aug. 8, 2005, she used an interactive computer service to distribute half a dozen stories about adults having sex with children between 2 and 9 years old. … Fletcher told a pair of FBI agents who interviewed her at her home on Feb. 11, 2005 that she owned what she described as a 'fantasy site' on which she posts 'sexually explicit stories about adults having sex with children,' according to court papers."

Eased Lender Requirements Fueling Surge In Mortgage Fraud. In a front-page story, the Wall Street Journal (9/28, Hagerty, Hudson, 2.03M) reports from Martinsville, Va., "Federal and state authorities are investigating allegations of an elaborate mortgage fraud involving about 100 people living in or near this small factory town who say they unwittingly took out loans to buy houses at inflated prices in Indiana. … Now, many of the loans are in default, the borrowers' credit ratings are in ruins, and lenders are pursuing the organizers of the purported investment group in court. Companies stuck with the defaulting loans include Countrywide Financial Corp." which has filed a lawsuit accusing "the organizers of acquiring homes and then fraudulently selling them for a quick profit to the Virginia borrowers." The Journal notes, "Mortgage fraud…has mushroomed in recent years as lenders have pushed for speedier loan approvals in an effort to remain competitive and milk maximum profits from the now-fading housing boom. The Federal Bureau of Investigation reported that mortgage fraud led to losses of $1 billion in 2005, up from $429 million a year earlier. … Attracted by the ability to obtain large sums quickly, some criminal gangs involved in drug dealing and other street crimes have branched out into mortgage fraud, says Chip Burrus, assistant director of the FBI's criminal investigative division. 'It's more profitable and less risky,' he says."

The New York Times (9/28, Leland, Zeller, 1.21M) reports, "The civil lawsuit…describes an elaborate confidence game in which Martinsville residents with good credit ratings were enlisted last year to join what they believed was a risk-free investment in Indiana real estate. … While no criminal charges have been filed, federal grand jury subpoenas are being prepared in Indiana, and further civil action at the federal level is expected to be filed against the investment group soon." The Times also notes, "The F.B.I. called mortgage fraud an 'epidemic' last December, noting that losses associated with the crime had jumped to more than $1 billion last year from $429 million in 2004. Although the hot housing market that may have at least partly given rise to the fraud boom is cooling, officials say mortgage fraud losses are on pace to increase again this year."

Good Samaritans Keep Watch For ID-Theft Victims. USA Today (9/28, Swartz) reports on "avenging angels" working nationwide ""looking out for the well-being of ID-theft victims. They share a fervent desire to publicize the widespread availability of stolen personal data on the Internet." USA adds, "As phishing continues to escalate, the safest course for consumers may be to warn them over the phone. There is little in the way of software to warn consumers they have been phished." Since May, Steven Peisner "has scoured the Internet forums of cybercrooks, looking for the names of ID-theft victims whose personal information is for sale online. The same day, he informs victims that their names — not to mention Social Security numbers, credit card information and phone numbers — are floating in cyberspace. Peisner calmly tells them he has come across their filched profiles and they should immediately close their credit card and/or bank accounts. To make his point resonate, he reads to victims their stolen information as it appears in the forums. Symantec detected 157,477 unique phishing messages during the first half of 2006, up 81% from the last six months of 2005. Home PCs were targets of 86% of security threats in the first six months of 2006, according to a Symantec report released Monday."

DOJ_NMG_0070284

Blanco Renews Extradition Request For Sportingbet Chairman. The Financial Times (9/28, Ward) reports that Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco has renewed her extradition request for former Sportingbet chairman Peter Dicks. Blanco's "intervention came as Mr Dicks prepared to attend a court hearing in New York to learn whether he will be sent to Louisiana to face illegal gambling charges. Lawyers for Mr Dicks, who was arrested in New York three weeks ago on a Louisiana warrant, had hoped to halt the extradition process before Thursday's hearing. But a spokesman for Ms Blanco said she was still pushing for his extradition as part of efforts to enforce the state's law against online gambling." The Times adds, "Louisiana's Police Gaming Enforcement division told the FT this week that arrest warrants had been issued for four Sportingbet representatives, including Mr Dicks, after state police placed a bet with the company. UK-listed Sportingbet said on Wednesday that it had banned board members from travelling to the US."

DC Officials Consider Extending Anti-Crime Legislation. The Washington Times (9/28, Cella) reports, "D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams' plan to extend emergency anti-crime legislation appears to violate a city statute barring passage of the same law more than once on an emergency basis. City officials are trying to determine whether extending by 90 days anti-crime legislation enacted in July would violate the statute. If it is found to violate the statute, 48 surveillance cameras placed in neighborhoods would have to turned off until permanent anti-crime legislation could be enacted, which would be December at the earliest. In addition, police no longer would have access to criminal juvenile records and would not be able to hold robbery suspects and handgun offenders until the permanent legislation is passed. And the 10 p.m. curfew for minors would revert to 11 p.m. on weeknights and midnight on weekends."

Karr Lawyers Seek Dismissal Of Child Porn Charges. Lawyers for John Mark Karr have asked a judge to dismiss child pornography charges against their client, who was once a suspect in the JonBenet Ramsey murder case, because authorities lost a computer that allegedly contained illegal images of children. USA Today (9/28, Kasindorf) reports, "Sheriff's deputies seized the computer from Karr's home when he was arrested in April 2001. The sheriff's department said it copied the contents of the computer's hard drive and printed out five pornographic photographs. Saying that new technologies might reveal additional photos on the hard drive, deputies launched a two-week search for the computer late last month but didn't find it."

Sex Offender Admits Killing 15-Year Old Boy. The Washington Post (9/28, B2, Klein, Cauvin) reports, "A 51-year-old convicted sex offender admitted that he killed a 15-year-old boy and dumped his body at a construction site in Northeast Washington, telling police the two had fought over a $10 purchase of crack cocaine, according to the prosecution's charging documents. Robert J. Crosby has been charged with second-degree murder in the death of Dominick A. Dixon, who was found at the construction site Monday afternoon wearing only his boxer shorts. Crosby was ordered held without bond yesterday by D.C. Superior Court Magistrate Judge Richard Ringell. The D.C. medical examiner's office said yesterday that Dixon was killed by asphyxiation and ruled the case a homicide."

Navy Midshipman Faces Rape Charges. The Baltimore Sun (9/28, Olson) reports, "The Naval Academy has charged a former football player with drugging and raping two female midshipmen on separate occasions, including at a party attended by at least four teammates. Kenny Ray Morrison, 24, is accused of raping one woman in a Georgetown hotel room at the rowdy, boozy party Feb. 4, and the other in Annapolis on April 21, according to charging documents. The senior had been scheduled to stand trial Tuesday at a special court-martial, a midlevel form of military trial, only on charges of indecent assault and indecent acts in the Georgetown incident. If convicted of those charges, he would receive no jail time. If found guilty in a military court of the new charges of rape, distribution of a controlled substance and assault in both cases, as well as conduct unbecoming an officer in the Feb. 4 incident, he could receive a maximum of life in prison. Such a sentence is unprecedented in recent history, according to military law experts."

US Charges Former National Guardsman With Smuggling Machine Guns. The Army Times (9/28, Tan) reports, "A former North Carolina National Guard soldier has been charged in federal court for smuggling four machine guns into the United States from Iraq and then trying to sell them." The Times continues, "Robert James Clymore, 38, was arraigned in federal court Sept. 21 in Atlanta, Ga. He was indicted June 13 by a federal grand jury on charges of unlawful importation, possession, transportation and transfer of machine guns, according to a press release from the Justice Department." The Times adds, "Clymore, of Wade, N.C., is accused of acquiring four machine guns while on active duty in Iraq and smuggling them home in his gear. … Clymore, who served in the Navy, joined the Guard on Aug. 29, 2003, said Maj. Matt Handley, a spokesman for the North Carolina Guard. … In December 2005, Clymore brought the weapons to a gun dealer in Taylorsville, Ga., and negotiated a deal to trade an all-terrain vehicle and a pistol for the machine guns, according to the Justice Department. The gun dealer informed the FBI about the machine guns, and FBI agents set up surveillance to record the transaction, which was scheduled for the following day, Dec. 15, 2005. When Clymore returned, the FBI seized the four machine guns."

DOJ_NMG_0070285

Judge Sentences Pennsylvania Inmate In Assault Of US Marshal. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (9/28) reports, "A state inmate was sentenced today to nearly 12 years in federal prison for assaulting two deputy U.S. Marshals." The Tribune-Review continues, "Andre L. Jacobs, 24, formerly of Harrisburg, attacked the marshals in March 2005 inside a 9th floor elevator at the federal courthouse, Downtown. After a jury ruled against Jacobs in a civil trial, the inmate struck one marshal with his handcuffs and grabbed the other marshal. The first marshal suffered ligament damage to his wrist, which required surgery. … Jacobs was convicted by a jury in April and was sentenced to 210 months in prison yesterday by U.S. District Judge Gustave Diamond. Jacobs is already serving 5 to 18 years in SCI Fayette on an unrelated conviction."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (9/28, Ward) reports, "In an effort to avoid any repeats of the attack in which Mr. Jacobs slammed his handcuffed arms down onto a marshal's wrist, he was led into Senior U.S. District Judge Gustave Diamond's courtroom by six marshals. … Deputy U.S. Marshal Robert Potter, who was injured in the attack, underwent surgery and was placed on light duty for 47 days while recovering, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen R. Kaufman." The Post-Gazette adds, "Mr. Jacobs' sentence was enhanced by several factors, including that his victim was a federal law enforcement officer; that he caused 'serious bodily injury;' and because he is considered a career offender."

US Charges Man With Defrauding Priests. The New York Times (9/28, Ramirez) reports, "Robert Riggio, 60, of Manhattan, bilked numerous priests around the country of at least $200,000, federal prosecutors said yesterday." The Times continues, "Priests in North Carolina, Texas and Kentucky were victimized, prosecutors said, adding that the priests often drew on personal savings to send money to Mr. Riggio, and that some priests were bilked twice." The Times adds, "The scheme, which began in March 2004 and lasted until this month, involved more than 150 wire transfers from guileless priests to Mr. Riggio and a partner who was not named in court papers. In some cases, Mr. Riggio pretended to be a member of the priest's parish seeking help, the papers said. … The scheme was undone by an undercover agent posing as the niece of a priest, prosecutors said." The Times notes, "Mr. Riggio appeared yesterday at a hearing in Federal District Court in Manhattan, where he was advised of his rights and informed of the charges against him, but not formally arraigned. He has not been indicted. … He is charged with one count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud and one count of wire fraud. If convicted, he faces up to 25 years in prison."

Cost Of Houston Crime Lab Probe To Grow By $1.5 Million. The Houston Chronicle (9/28, Grant) reports, "The (Houston) City Council on Wednesday approved spending an additional $1.5 million to complete an independent investigation of the police crime lab that has already cost the city nearly $4 million." The Chronicle continues, "After months of delay, during which Mayor Bill White, several council members and a high-ranking police official questioned whether more money should be allocated to the project, the panel approved the funding without discussion. … White said after the meeting he is confident this will be the last time the city puts money toward the investigation, which began in March 2005. … 'I wanted to make sure that we were going to get value for what we asked for and that this would not be perpetual,' White said." The Chronicle adds, "The city hired lead investigator Michael Bromwich, a former U.S. Justice Department official, to investigate the crime lab more than two years after problems there came to light. Two men had been released from prison because of inaccurate work on evidence from their cases. … The independent team of lawyers and scientists conducting the project have reviewed about 2,300 cases from the Houston Police Department crime lab. HPD's conclusions about evidence in 93 cases may be inaccurate, they say. … The project initially was expected to cost about $3.2 million. City Council first allocated $2.2 million, then agreed to pay $1.6 million more."

Expert Says Inmates Conscious During Lethal Injections. An anesthesiologist who has reviewed state execution logs testified yesterday that inmates executed by lethal injection in California may have been conscious when they were administered the fatal dose of drugs. The Los Angeles Times (9/28, Weinstein, Dolan, 918K) reports, "Mark Heath, a professor of anesthesiology at Columbia University Medical School, said the logs showed that some of those executed were still breathing several minutes after prison personnel administered pancuronium bromide, a paralytic agent and the second of three drugs used in lethal injections in California and three dozen other states." Heath testified during the second day of a hearing before US District Judge Jeremy Fogel on a challenge to California's lethal injection procedures by death row inmate Michael Morales. His attorneys contend that the state procedure violates the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0070286

Constitution's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment."

CIVIL LAW:

San Jose Nursing Home Convicted Medicare Fraud. The San Jose Mercury News (9/28, Foo) reports, "An East San Jose nursing home was convicted Tuesday of filing false Medicare claims, and its corporate owner also has agreed to pay $14.7 million to settle a related federal lawsuit instigated by a whistle-blower, prosecutors said." The News continues, "Representatives for Parkview Nursing Center agreed to plead guilty in U.S. District Court in Oakland to two counts of submitting inflated nursing hours related to patients' reports to Medicare. No individuals were charged, U.S. Department of Justice spokesman Luke Macaulay said, only the business entities." The News adds, "The crimes occurred in November 1997 and September 1998, prosecutors said. The complaint against Parkview was filed earlier this month. … Parkview also was ordered to pay a $500,000 fine. The 99-bed nursing home was closed in 1998 by its owner and operator, Horizon West Healthcare, a wholly owned subsidiary of Horizon West, based in Rocklin. … The conviction follows an August agreement by Horizon West to pay $14.7 million to settle a 2000 lawsuit brought by a former employee, Julia Lee, and the Justice Department. The settlement will be paid out over five years, according to the agreement."

House Panel Approves FOIA Reform Bill. The AP (9/28, Kellman) reports a House Government Reform subcommittee "advanced a bill to close gaps in the Freedom of Information Act and speed the release of government documents, but the legislation seemed unlikely to pass this year." The panel "would penalize federal agencies that fail to respond to FOIA requests in a reasonable period of time." But the subcommittee "added a provision not in a similar measure passed last week by the Senate Judiciary Committee. The amendment by Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., would revoke two Bush administration memos that directed agencies to withhold information from FOIA requests when that information would threaten national security." The bill "appears likely to fall victim to Congress' end-of-session rush to recess this week so lawmakers can head home to campaign for re-election."

Court Declines To Intervene In Maine "Electioneering" Dispute. Roll Call (9/28, Murray) reports, "A federal court Wednesday refused to intervene in a dispute between a Maine nonprofit organization and the Federal Election Commission regarding the group's right to air a television advertisement during a federally restricted blackout period. A three-judge panel of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia ruled that the FEC was correct in determining that claims by Christian Civic Life off Maine, Inc., were 'not ripe' and 'too speculative.' The group had sought to run an issue-based advertisement identifying Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) within 30 days of a primary election. Running the ad could have been a violation of the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002. In May, the same court denied the group's request for preliminary injunctive relief. 'We are very pleased that this case has been dismissed, and the 'electioneering communication' provisions of BCRA stand in place as written by Congress and upheld by the Supreme Court,' said Fred Wertheimer, president of the campaign-finance watchdog group Democracy 21."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Ruling Opens Door For ADA Claims Involving Internet Access. The National Law Journal (9/28, Qualters) reports, "A federal judge's decision not to dismiss a discrimination case against retailer Target Corp. for operating a Web site inaccessible to the blind opens the door to Internet-related Americans with Disabilities Act claims." The Journal continues, "The recent order is believed to the first ruling from a judge that the ADA can apply to the Internet, and lawyers from both sides of the bar anticipate more cases. … 'To limit the ADA to discrimination in the provision of services occurring on the premises of a public accommodation would contradict the plain language of that statute,' wrote U.S. District Judge Marilyn Hall Patel, who sits in San Francisco. 'To the extent defendant argues that plaintiffs' claims are not cognizable because they occur away from a "place" of public accommodation, defendant's argument must fail.'" The Journal adds, "Patel declined the National Federation of the Blind's request for a preliminary injunction requiring Target to immediately update its site. She said that there is no emergency to address and that more discovery is needed to investigate Target's claim that the average blind person is able to access its Web site now. National Federation of the Blind v. Target, No. 06-01802 (N.D. Calif.). … There will be continued exploration of the applicability of the ADA and certain state laws to commercial Web sites, predicted Daniel F. Goldstein of Brown, Goldstein & Levy in Baltimore. Goldstein represents the plaintiff in the case, Baltimore-based National Federation of the Blind. 'It's too important of an economic activity for the blind to be excluded,' Goldstein said."

DOD Strives To Get Ballots To Soldiers In Field Before Election Day. Under the headline "Voting Is Tricky Mission For Troops Waiting For Ballots In Battlefield," USA Today (9/28, 6A, Wolf, 2.27M) reports on what Principal

DOJ_NMG_0070287

Deputy Undersecretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness Michael Dominguez calls the "special challenge of reaching the deployed warrior on the battlefield" when it is time to vote. Pentagon officials say it is "particularly troublesome" trying to get ballots to "troops in battle, who often are redeployed before mail reaches them," and in some states that held late primaries, ballots are still being prepared. DOD Federal Voting Assistance Program Deputy Director Scott Wiedmann "says at least six states have begun mailing out overseas absentee ballots. The elections are 40 days away."

Voters Abroad Still Face Challenges. USA Today (9/28, Wolf, 2.27M) reports six years "after problems counting overseas votes clouded the 2000 presidential election, U.S. troops and other Americans abroad face tight timetables and emerging technologies that still make it difficult to have their votes counted." Fourteen states "with September primaries risk getting absentee ballots out too late for remote voters to return them in time." Efforts to "speed things by using e-mail and fax machines pose a risk to voters' confidentiality," and Websites "intended to help overseas voters navigate the process are not widely used. A private group's site was taken down earlier this month in a contract dispute." The problems "with timing and technology concern federal election officials, who try to ensure that overseas votes are counted on time. An estimated 29% of troops who wanted to vote did not get absentee ballots in 2000 or received them too late."

Hyde Defends "Federal Election Integrity Act." Rep. Henry Hyde writes in USA Today (9/28, 2.27M), "The integrity of elections is central to our democracy. Because of increasing concern over electoral fraud, the House passed the Federal Election Integrity Act (FEIA) mandating that voters present proof of citizenship and a valid photo ID when registering to vote. A valid photo ID would also be required at the polling place. Not surprisingly, FEIA has met strong opposition from the majority of Democrats, who support amnesty, a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants." Hyde adds, "This proposal would not disenfranchise anyone who wants to vote. Our purpose is to stop fraud and to ensure every citizen the right to vote. … By enacting this bill, we can help restore confidence in our system and thereby encourage voter participation."

ANTITRUST:

Mittal To Sell WV Mill To Settle DOJ Antitrust Concerns. The Baltimore Sun (9/28, Connolly) reports, "Mittal Steel Co. NV said yesterday that it plans to sell its Weirton, W.Va., mill rather than Sparrows Point if it's compelled to dispose of a U.S. property to settle antitrust issues." The Sun continues, "Netherlands-based Mittal said it had identified at least 10 potential buyers for the West Virginia property, easing concerns at the Baltimore County plant, which Mittal acquired in 2005. Sparrows Point employs nearly 2,500 salaried and hourly workers. … Mittal must sell either Weirton, Sparrows Point or Canadian steelmaker Dofasco in the wake of its $38 billion merger with Luxembourg-based Arcelor SA to appease Justice Department officials, who say the combined company, Arcelor Mittal, would have a monopoly on tin production in the United States." The Sun adds, "Mittal has promised to sell Dofasco to German-owned ThyssenKrupp AG, but despite the merger agreement, Arcelor officials refuse to let it go. In one of a series of moves to fend off Mittal's nearly six-month hostile takeover bid, Arcelor transferred Dofasco to a Dutch trust, making a sale without Arcelor's consent impossible. … The Justice Department has given Mittal until Nov. 28 to sell Dofasco, with the option of a 60-day extension. If Mittal is unable to sell Dofasco, the Justice Department will give Mittal 90 days to sell either Sparrows Point or Weirton."

Icahn Eyes Bigger Stake In Federated Stores. Bloomberg (9/28, Timberlake) reports, "Federated Department Stores Inc., owner of Macy's and Bloomingdale's, said billionaire investor Carl Icahn plans to buy $113.4 million to $500 million of additional stock, sending the retailer's shares to a record." Bloomberg continues, "If Icahn purchases $500 million of Federated stock, he would be acquiring about 11.5 million shares at today's price and boosting his stake to 2.5 percent. Icahn, 70, notified Federated of his plans to seek regulatory approval for the purchase, the company said today in a statement." Bloomberg adds, "Icahn is known as a corporate raider, taking stakes in companies and forcing management to take steps to improve stock prices. Federated shares have more than tripled since February 2003. … Federated, the second-biggest U.S. department store company after Sears Holdings Corp., converted more than 400 stores to the Macy's name earlier this month, doubling the total. The stores were acquired as part of last year's $11 billion purchase of May Department Stores Co. … Anyone who purchases more than $58 million in a company must report it to antitrust enforcers at the U.S. Justice Department and Federal Trade Commission. The requirement gives the government an opportunity to determine if the transaction poses any antitrust problems. The government has 30 days to decide whether to open an antitrust investigation."

Judge Dismisses Key Portion Of AMD Antitrust Suit Against Intel. The AP (9/28, Robertson) reports, "A federal judge dismissed a major portion of Advanced Micro Devices Inc.'s antitrust lawsuit against archrival Intel Corp., ruling that AMD cannot sue in the U.S. for Intel's alleged monopolistic tactics overseas." The AP continues, "The judge also set a trial date of April 27, 2009 for AMD to argue that Intel forced major customers into exclusive deals and offered secret rebates to undercut AMD in the market for microprocessors that act as the brains of computers." The AP adds, "U.S. District Judge Joseph J. Farnan Jr. set the 2009 trial date Wednesday, a day after stripping a key component from AMD's lawsuit, which alleges anticompetitive practices in several countries including Britain, Germany and Japan." The AP notes, "On Tuesday, the Delaware-based judge ruled that AMD failed to prove that Intel's alleged strong-arm tactics abroad had "direct, substantial and foreseeable effects" on AMD's operations in the United States. … Santa Clara-based Intel, the world's largest computer chip maker, argued that AMD should not be able to sue in the U.S. for alleged lost sales of microprocessors that were made and sold in other countries. It also argued that part of AMD's case should be dismissed because AMD was seeking redress abroad for 'foreign commerce claims.' … AMD, which filed its lawsuit in June 2005, maintains that the market for microprocessors is global and that Intel's conduct domestically and abroad are inextricably linked."

DOJ_NMG_0070288

Symantec Claims Microsoft Withholding Spyware Technology. CNET News (9/28, Espiner) reports, "Symantec has accused Microsoft of withholding key information about its upcoming Vista operating system in an attempt to gain an advantage in the security market." CNET continues, "The security specialist said this week that Microsoft is refusing to hand over the application programmable interfaces (APIs) for Windows Defender, the spyware product that will be included in Windows Vista. Without the APIs, Symantec contends that it's unable to ensure that its own security products are compatible with the update. … 'Microsoft is affirmatively introducing bottlenecks to funnel customers to their products,' said John Brigden, Symantec senior vice president for Europe. 'It's all about control and dominance. They are deliberately delaying giving us the APIs.'" CNET adds, "Microsoft responded to Symantec's concerns on Wednesday, and said it had made the APIs for Defender available earlier this week. … Microsoft added the functionality to disable Windows Defender in Release Candidate 1 of Vista, or RC1, which came out early this month. There may have been some confusion in the industry because the accompanying information for developers, called a software development kit, or SDK, did not provide details on the functionality, the company said."

Johnson & Johnson Suit Claims Abbott Leak Subverted $24 Billion Deal. The New Jersey Law Journal (9/28, Daks) reports, "Johnson & Johnson has filed suit in federal court against Abbott Laboratories and two medical device manufacturers, seeking at least $5.5 billion for alleged tortious interference and breach of a merger agreement." The Journal continues, "The New Brunswick, N.J.-based health care company charges that a planned $24.2 billion acquisition of Guidant Corp. of Indianapolis was scotched in early January after Guidant leaked confidential information to another manufacturer, Boston Scientific Corp., which ultimately bought Guidant for $27 billion." The Journal adds, "In December 2004, J&J announced it had structured an agreement to buy Guidant, a heart device manufacturer. To ease antitrust regulators' fears, the companies agreed to grant a nonexclusive license for certain Guidant patents to Abbott Labs, a competing health care company based in Columbus, Ohio. … J&J says the terms of the deal prohibited Guidant from providing confidential information to any other company unless the third party was making a superior, unsolicited takeover offer. That caveat was designed to keep Guidant from using its agreement with J&J to shop around for higher offers. .. Last December, Boston Scientific made a $25 billion offer for Guidant, later upped to $27 billion, and, as part of its formal offer on Jan. 8, said it would ease antitrust fears by selling certain Guidant businesses to Abbott. Abbott in turn agreed to make a $700 million loan to Boston Scientific. … J&J alleges that Abbott was induced to cooperate when it received confidential information about Guidant. The complaint contends that J&J was alerted to the alleged breach by a comment Boston Scientific CFO Lawrence Best made during a Jan. 9 conference call about its deal with Guidant."

Endesa Board Expected To Approve E.On Offer. The Wall Street Journal (9/28, Johnson, Singer) reports, "German utility E.On AG's richer offer for Endesa SA is expected to clinch an approval from the Spanish power company's board, according to people close to the matter… ." Should the "$47 billion all-cash offer go through, one of the first effects could be an acceleration of a merger between Iberdrola SA and Union Fenosa SA, Spain's second- and third-biggest electricity companies. That would create another Spanish company big enough to fend off foreign suitors and even make acquisitions abroad. It would also leave smaller regional power companies, such as Spain's Gas Natural SDG SA or Energia de Portugal SA, prey to a second wave of consolidation." The Journal notes, "If completed, E.On's bid for Endesa would be Europe's biggest cross-border electricity deal, and would create one of the Continent's largest power companies."

Phone Companies Seek To Unload Land Lines In Rural Areas. The New York Times (9/28, Belson, 1.21M) reports that many phone companies are trying to reduce the number of land lines it owns. Big phone and cable companies "are reluctant to upgrade and expand their networks in sparsely populated places where there are not enough customers to justify the investment. Instead, they are funneling billions of dollars into projects in cities and suburbs where the prospects for a decent return are higher. But those projects are unlikely to reach rural areas of Vermont and other states, leaving millions of people in the Internet's slow lane, just as high-speed access is becoming more of a necessity than a luxury. The United States already lags behind much of the industrialized world in broadband access."

DOJ_NMG_0070289

Glassman Makes Case For Cable Competition. James Glassman, a resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/28) that California's legislature has "voted overwhelmingly to allow competition into a sector -- cable television -- where prices have been elevated and service depressed by the most pernicious monopoly in America. When Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signs the bill, as expected, companies that want a statewide video franchise can go straight to the Public Utility Commission and get approval to operate within 44 days." Glassman adds, "Yes, Americans can choose satellite TV, but, for reasons of convenience and service, many find it an inadequate substitute. There's a reason that cable families far outnumber satellite families. … But if satellite TV improves and becomes a more attractive alternative, what's wrong with having enhanced cable competition, too? The more the merrier is, apparently, an economic concept that some folks in Congress still don't get."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

US Will Not Charge ConocoPhillips For 2004 Oil Spill. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (9/28, McClure, Shukovsky) reports, "After a mysterious midnight oil spill turned central Puget Sound beaches into a stinky mess, the Coast Guard proudly proclaimed that investigators had tracked down the spiller. The oil's chemical fingerprint clearly implicated a ConocoPhillips tanker, the agency said. … That was more than 1 1/2 years ago. … But now, federal prosecutors in Seattle are declining to press criminal charges against ConocoPhillips, even though the chemical fingerprint showed that the substance spilled was crude oil, which is usually carried by tankers such as ConocoPhillips' Polar Texas." The P-I continues, "The Polar Texas was in the vicinity of the spill in Dalco Passage, near Vashon and Maury islands, on the night of the October 2004 spill. It was the only oil tanker there that night. .. The decision by U.S. Attorney John McKay's office not to prosecute ConocoPhillips, which hasn't acknowledged guilt, doesn't mean the firm is totally off the hook. Federal and state environmental officials are still pushing civil cases against the Houston-based oil company. … And a grand jury in Alaska investigated allegations of criminal conduct by the company in unrelated episodes, including the apparent cover-up of another oil spill. It's unclear whether criminal charges will be brought in that case." The P-I adds, "In Seattle, Assistant U.S. Attorney Jim Oesterle would not elaborate on why McKay's office is declining to prosecute, saying commenting might interfere with ongoing negotiations between the company and environmental officials regarding possible civil penalties. … 'I'm not prepared at this point to give all the reasons for (declining prosecution), and the reason for not providing more information is I don't want to get ahead of the state or the (Department of Justice) on their resolutions, because I know they're in the midst of those negotiations,' Oesterle said."

Schwarzenegger Signs Greenhouse Gas Measure Into Law. The Los Angeles Times (9/28, Finnegan, Lifsher, 918K) reports, "California moved to the front of local government efforts to fight global warming today when Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed legislation calling for a reduction of greenhouse gases." The bill "commits the state to reduce the emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases by 25% by 2020. Greenhouse gases trap heat in the atmosphere and cause global warming." The Times adds, "At an elaborate signing ceremony at Treasure Island in San Francisco Bay, Schwarzenegger put pen to paper, a scene he repeated at a second ceremony at Pepperdine University in Malibu. 'We simply must do everything we can in our power to slow down global warming before it is too late,' Schwarzenegger said at Treasure Island." The New York Times/AP (9/28) runs a brief report on the signing, while the Washington Post (9/28, D1, Mufson, 748K) mentions it in a story about US governors, who "impatient with federal inaction on global warming, are taking matters into their own hands. The result could add impetus to an emerging industry."

WPost Comments On Global Warming "Policy Crisis." In an editorial titled "Heed This Warning," the Washington Post (9/28, A22, 748K) says "global warming represents a policy crisis responsible politicians can no longer ignore -- one as potentially existential as the threat of global terrorism, only in slow motion. Countering that threat will require regulatory initiatives and societal investments. It will require significant changes in American attitudes toward energy use and conservation." But "these may prove far less wrenching than many people imagine. What it certainly also will require is a great deal of political will -- political will of precisely the type the Bush administration has dedicated to a host of other issues but has assiduously avoided devoting to climate change. Most of all, it will require an end to denial -- denial that the problem exists."

DOJ_NMG_0070290

DC Area Has Fewer Smoggy Days But Still Falls Short OF Federal Standards. The Washington Post (9/28, B1, Fahrenthold) reports, "The number of dangerously smoggy days in the Washington area has declined by more than 40 percent since 2003, but the region still does not meet federal standards for healthy air, according to data released yesterday. … Officials said yesterday that they were encouraged, believing the reduction in bad air days was a sign that local and national anti-pollution measures were having an effect. 'The air's cleaner,' said D.C. Council member Phil Mendelson (D-At Large), chairman of COG's air quality committee. 'But not clean enough.'"

Indian Ranchers Await Trial On Suit Against US. The AP (9/28, MacPherson) reports from Mandaree, ND, "American Indian rancher Keith Mandan says he could double the size of his black Angus herd if he had the money -- or if he were white. … Mandan, 53, and his wife, Claryca, 52, say they've struggled financially to keep their ranch in North Dakota's Badlands since the late 1970s because of a pattern of discrimination by the federal government.." The AP continues, "The Mandans are among the plaintiffs in a lawsuit that accuses the U.S. Department of Agriculture of discriminating against American Indians in the granting of loans since 1981. During that time, Claryca Mandan said, the federal government 'wiped out a whole generation of Indian farmers and ranchers because of racism.'" The AP adds, "USDA officials refused to respond to specific questions from The Associated Press about the allegations. In a statement, J. Michael Kelly, an attorney for the USDA, said the case is still ongoing and the agency is working to provide documentation requested by the Indians' attorneys. … Earlier this month, attorneys for the American Indian ranchers and farmers filed a motion to bring the case to trial next year — eight years after the lawsuit was filed. … A hearing on their motion is set for Thursday."

Navajo Teen Aspires To Serve Reservation As FBI Agent. The Deseret Morning News (9/28, Kinkead) reports, "From the northernmost tip of the massive Navajo Nation, 13-year-old Elsha Black surveys the arid expanse of his grandmother's property in San Juan County. … He is one of the few young people who speak fluent Navajo. He learned it living with his grandmother on the land where she was born. He says he'd prefer to live here now and swears he will come back" from New Mexico. "But for now, this young man must live off the reservation. He needs a good education. His mom needs a good job. His family says neither can be found here today." The Morning News notes, "Black wants to be an FBI agent. He wants to work out of the Shiprock, N.M., office to help members of the tribe and solve crimes."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

San Diego Chargers Safety Arrested In Cough Syrup Investigation. There are more than 300 media references to San Diego Chargers safety Terrence Kiel's arrest in connection with the transport and possession of cough syrup. Several stories cited Kiel's reported admission to shipping packages containing cough syrup. For example, ESPN (9/27) reports Kiel "was arrested Tuesday on drug-related charges. Kiel was arrested on two charges of transporting a controlled substance and three charges of possession for sale of a controlled substance — Codeine-based cough syrup. The law enforcement sources told ESPN's Chris Mortensen that several plain clothes DEA agents appeared at the Chargers' facility Tuesday morning with an arrest warrant, searched his locker and car, and took Kiel away." ABC News posted the ESPN story on its Web site.

Bloomberg (9/27) reports the DEA said Kiel "admitted to shipping to Texas two packages containing the substance. He was released on $150,000 bond, said DEA spokesman Dan Simmons, and will be arraigned in District Court on Oct. 3."

The AP (9/27) reports that while Kiel "did not tell the DEA his motive, the agency in Texas has found widespread abuse of codeine-based cough syrup mixed with soft drinks or drugs and referred to as 'lean,' said John S. Fernandes, the special agent in charge of the San Diego office. A pint bottle of 'lean' can cost between $200 and $325 on the street, he said." The DEA "is investigating where Kiel got the cough syrup, who else may be involved and the intent. An arraignment was scheduled for Tuesday." Media outlets that used the AP story include CBS News, MSNBC, Forbes, the New York Times, Washington Post, USA Today, Los Angeles Times, San Francisco Chronicle, Houston Chronicle, and Seattle Post Intelligencer.

UPI (9/27) writes that federal authorities "say…Kiel has admitted to shipping prescription cough syrup from California to Texas."

The San Diego Union-Tribune (9/27) reports that two federal law enforcement officials, "speaking on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation, said quart bottles full of what appears to be prescription cough syrup were found at Kiel's house. Both officials said Kiel admitted to financial difficulties when interviewed by agents. Kiel first drew attention after FedEx officials…opened a package he shipped June 2 and found 15 pint bottles of codeine-based cough syrup, according to a search warrant affidavit filed in San Diego Superior Court."

DOJ_NMG_0070291

On its Web site, KNBC-TV, Los Angeles (9/27) reports two FedEx packages "shipped by…Kiel contained a controlled substance identified as a Codeine-based cough syrup, according to search warrant affidavit released Wednesday. … According to the affidavit, FedEx customers consent to have their parcels opened and examined by the company at any time. On June 2, management at FedEx conducted an audit of a parcel which contained 15 bottles of Prometh with Codeine, considered a controlled substance."

Cable TV Coverage. ESPN (9/28, 1:00 a.m.) reported, "San Diego starting strong safety Terrence Kiel will miss Sunday's game at Baltimore after being arrested on felony drug charges. DEA officials say Kiel admitted to sending two parcels of prescription cough syrup to Texas. He will be arraigned on Tuesday."

Local TV Coverage. KFMB-TV, San Diego (9/27, 6:30 p.m.) reported, "A federal agent alleges that Terrence Kiel tried to cover up his crimes. The San Diego Chargers safety has admitted to shipping two Fed Ex packages including this cough syrup with codeine. … Agents say quart-size bottles were also found. … During an interview with agents he admitted he'd been having financial problems."

KGTV-TV, San Diego (9/27, 6:30 p.m.) reported, "Terrence Kiel is facing drug charges after being arrested…on possession of a controlled substance. They're linked to Fed Ex packages full of cough syrup with codeine. … The codeine-based syrup is commonly diluted and mixed with Sprite or 7-Up or something else with a street value up to $300. Cough syrup seems innocuous in and of itself; when it has codeine, it's a whole different set of problems."

KUSI-TV, San Diego (9/27, 6:30 p.m.) reported, "New details emerging about the arrest of Terrence Kiel, according to a search warrant affidavit released today. Two Fed Ex packages shipped by Kiel contained a controlled substance identified as a codeine-based cough syrup."

KNSD-TV, San Diego (9/28) reports, "JCodeine-based cough syrup is a Schedule V controlled substance, according to the Justice Department. … 'Actions like those of Mr. Kiel simply add fuel to the already raging fire of prescription drug abuse in our country,' said Special Agent in Charge John S. Fernandes of the Drug Enforcement Administration." KNSD-TV adds, "Kiel, a 25-year-old who plays strong safety, admitted to shipping two parcels of prescription cough syrup to Texas, DEA officials said Wednesday. While Kiel did not tell the DEA his motive, the agency in Texas has found widespread abuse of codeine-based cough syrup mixed with soft drinks or drugs. The mixture is referred to as 'lean,' said Fernandes, who is in charge of the San Diego office. A pint bottle of 'lean' can cost between $200 and $325 on the street, he said. … Kiel was arrested on two counts of transporting a controlled substance and three counts of possession for sale of a controlled substance."

Suspected Illegal-Immigrant Drug Dealers Targeted In Colorado Investigation. The Aspen (CO) Daily News (9/28) reports the DEA and ICE "have been targeting suspected illegal-immigrant drug dealers in the Roaring Fork Valley this week. Agents…are not commenting on the roundups except to say they are happening and that more information will be released today. A spokesman with ICE said the DEA was the lead agency on the investigation and that ICE was asked to provide assistance. … Two weeks ago, ICE agents rounded up 34 alleged illegal immigrants throughout the valley as part of a nationwide initiative called Operation Return to Sender that led to thousands of illegals being deported."

Border Tunnel Prevention Act Gains Support. Copley News Service (9/27, Kammer) reports Sen. Dianne Feinstein "is one of the main advocates of a tunnel-criminalization effort that is reaching fruition with the inclusion of the measure in legislation to fund the Department of Homeland Security. The Border Tunnel Prevention Act would impose criminal penalties of up to 20 years in prison for those who construct or finance tunnels, which have proliferated in recent years in San Diego County and other border areas." While officials "suspect the tunnels are primarily used to smuggle drugs, they have raised other concerns about them. 'A tunnel can be used to smuggle drugs, illegal aliens, weapons and possibly weapons of mass destruction into the United States,' said special agent Steve Robertson." The Copley story was used by the San Diego Union-Tribune.

Effectiveness Of Plan Colombia Scrutinized Following Police Unit Killings. The Christian Science Monitor (9/28, Harman) today continues its focus on members of an elite police unit who were killed in May in Jamundí. The Monitor says most of the officers were DEA-trained counternarcotics specialists who "had been killed by a military unit. Colombia's attorney general says the soldiers were on the narcotraffickers payroll." However, the Monitor reports John Walters says progress has been made against narcotraffickers with, as the Monitor puts it, the U.S. and Colombian governments "inexorably bound together in a multibillion dollar war against the drug trade." The Monitor continues by scrutinizing the effectiveness of Plan Colombia and writes that President Uribe said, "It is clear we cannot abandon Plan Colombia. But it is also clear that, in comparison to our efforts, we should be seeing better results."

DOJ_NMG_0070292

IMMIGRATION:

Boehner Says Congress Will Pass An Additional $1.2 Billion For Border Security. House Majority Leader John Boehner was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (9/27) what laws Republicans have passed to stop illegal immigration. Boehner said, "In the Homeland Security Appropriations Conference Report that is finished, will be finished, voted on both the House and Senate this week, we will add $1.2 billion over and above what was already agreed to for additional borders. … It's going to build more fences, more vehicle barriers and more test programs to look at virtual security on the border." Asked if the President will sign the bill, Boehner said, "He'll sign this bill. You look at what's happened this year. The number of incursions of our border has dropped precipitously, and it's happened because we've got the National Guard down there. We've done a lot over the last five years. It's showing real progress. And the Immigration Service has done a better job of cracking down on employers who hire illegal aliens. All of that together has driven down the number of people coming across our borders."

Armey Blasts Conservatives Over Opposition To Bush Immigration Proposals. McClatchy (9/28, Montgomery) reports former House Majority Leader Dick Armey "is now savaging conservatives in his own party for what he calls 'knee-jerk' opposition – 'emphasis on jerk' - to the Bush administration's efforts to create a temporary guest-worker program and overhaul the nation's immigration system." When it "comes to the immigration debate that's raged in Congress for much of the past two years," Armey "takes an almost polar-opposite position from many of his former Republican House colleagues, who are pressing for tough border security measures, including a 700-mile fence along the Southwest border." After appearing with Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, and Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind., "co-sponsors of a proposed immigration compromise that includes a privately managed guest-worker program," Armey said, "This has been rallied up by a lot of people that are very visible, make a lot of noise and have never been guilty of any deep thinking." McClatchy adds, "Unabashedly naming names, Armey described Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., as the 'cheerleader of jerkiness in the immigration debate' and said conservative commentator Pat Buchanan 'is content to be a rock star' for '10 percent of the most militant voters in America.'"

Advocates Hope Congress Takes Up Skilled Immigrant Visas. The Washington Post (9/28, A12, Kalita, 748K) reports that for "technology companies and research institutions that have spent recent autumns lobbying for permission to hire more foreign workers, this was supposed to be the year that ended the annual rite of desperation." A Senate-passed bill "would have doubled the number of visas issued every year for highly skilled professionals, such as scientists and engineers. And it would have helped clear a backlog of applications for permanent residency from such workers." But the "attempt by Congress to rewrite the nation's immigration laws has bogged down in controversy over border security and illegal immigration. That means changes in the skilled-worker programs, while less controversial, are also in limbo." Advocates are now "hoping members of Congress will focus on the issue in the lame-duck session late this year."

Anti-Immigrant Grassroots Groups Having Impact. The Wall Street Journal (9/28, A1, Jordan, 2.03M) reports on the "anti-immigrant brushfire that is gathering force at the grass-roots level around the U.S. Small groups like" Californian Joseph Turner's "Save Our State are cropping up from coast to coast, recruiting members and devising tactics to tackle illegal immigration in their communities. Critics call many of these groups racist, a charge organizers deny. What no one disputes is that they are tapping into widespread frustration over the federal government's failure to adopt a national immigration policy while a deeply divided Congress clashes over how to deal with 12 million illegal immigrants." The Center for New Community, "a Chicago organization that tracks immigration issues, says there are 211 so-called nativist groups -- groups that advocate protecting the interests of native inhabitants against those of immigrants -- across the U.S., up from 37 two years ago." The Southern Poverty Law Center, "which tracks extremist groups, also says nativist groups are on the rise and that several are hate groups, including Mr. Turner's Save Our State. The law center defines a hate group as one that singles out and promotes hatred of another group, based on ethnicity, language, religion, sexual inclination or immigration status. Mr. Turner denies he runs a hate group." These "grass-roots organizations are having an impact."

Herndon, VA, Moves To Crack Down On Illegal Immigration. A front page story in the Washington Post (9/28, A1, Turque) reports, "Herndon's decision Tuesday night to seek federal training for some of its police officers so they can enforce federal immigration law is part of a long-term effort by a new mayor and Town Council to aggressively curb the presence of residents who are in the country illegally. Two proposals on the draft agenda for next week's council session would intensify the town's scrutiny of private employers. One would require anyone seeking a business license to prove legal immigration status. The other would compel contractors doing business with the town to provide evidence that their employees live in the United States legally." The Post notes, "Illegal immigration has been the dominant issue in town politics since summer 2005, when the council voted, after bitter debate, to open a publicly funded center to help workers connect with employers."

DOJ_NMG_0070293

TAX:

IRS Probing Merck's Offshore Partnership. The Wall Street Journal (9/28, A1, Drucker) reports, "Merck & Co.'s medications Zocor and Mevacor have been used by millions of people to help lower their cholesterol. But Merck also used the drugs to lower something else: its U.S. tax bill." The Journal continues, "Thirteen years ago, Merck set up a subsidiary with an address in tax-friendly Bermuda, in partnership with a British bank. Merck quietly transferred patents underlying the blockbuster drugs to the new subsidiary, according to documents and people familiar with the transaction. Merck then paid the subsidiary for use of the patents. … The arrangement in effect allowed some of the profits to disappear into a kind of Bermuda triangle between different tax jurisdictions. The setup helped Merck slash $1.5 billion off its federal tax bills over roughly the next 10 years. … Now, the complicated transaction -- never publicly disclosed -- has sparked one of the largest tax disputes ever involving a U.S. corporation. The Internal Revenue Service is challenging the tax benefits from the arrangement, which the company code-named 'Project Ryland,' after a fancy restaurant near the company's New Jersey headquarters. Merck anticipates it will be ordered to hand over a total of $2.3 billion in back taxes, interest and penalties, according to its filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission, which give the amounts in dispute but virtually no other details." The Journal adds, "Merck says it did nothing wrong and that the deal was simply a way of raising financing for its 1993 acquisition of a pharmacy-benefits management firm, Medco Containment Services Inc. … The IRS won't discuss its objection to the Merck partnership. But it is pursuing actions against Dow Chemical Co. and General Electric Co. over similar arrangements they set up within a few months of the Merck deal. Those, federal tax authorities have argued, weren't real partnerships with foreign banks but just well-disguised loan agreements, designed to avoid taxes by maneuvering between the tax laws of different countries, with no economic substance."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Congress Set To Approve Record-High Defense Budget. In a story somewhat critical of high spending, the Wall Street Journal (9/28, A8, Rogers, 2.03M) says Congress "is poised to send President Bush a record $447 billion Pentagon budget that anticipates defense spending next year will exceed annual expenditures at the height of the Vietnam War." The Journal says the "huge costs weigh heavily on the political landscape this fall and contrast with the more limited Republican domestic agenda before the midterm elections." Meanwhile, McClatchy (9/28, Brown) reports a new Congressional Research Service study concludes the "total cost of military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan and enhanced security at military bases" since 9/11 "could reach $549 billion this year." The report "says war costs are expected to continue to grow in the next decade."

Congress Nears Recess With "Do Nothing" Label Looming. CBS Evening News (9/27, story 3, 2:35, Couric, 7.66M) reported the 109th Congress "might well be remembered more for what it didn't do." CBS (Attkisson) added, "A CBS News/'New York Times' poll finds 75% of voters can't name one thing Congress has accomplished." It is "not as if they've really been sitting around doing nothing. Today's House passage of the bill providing for military tribunals for enemy combatants is evidence of that. But so many big-ticket items are still dangling. Give Congress an incomplete on immigration, port security, lobby reform, even domestic wiretapping. Democrats say, 'Don't blame us.'" Sen. Byron Dorgan: "We don't control the Congress, the majority party does." Attkisson: "Majority party, as in Republicans who control the House and Senate and should be able to pass whatever they want. Problem is, they haven't agreed on much." The President "will be coming back to Capitol Hill tomorrow that's for the second time in two weeks, perhaps to highlight one of the big accomplishments they will be making which is passing the military tribunals. Congress is expected to return here for a short time after the elections, but there's always the question of whether they have the time and the motivation to get much of anything done then."

In the Washington Post's "Washington Sketch" column (9/28, A2), Dana Milbank critiques the visual props used by members of Congress in the final days of the session and says, "Measured by days in session or legislative output, this Congress has secured its place as one of the most lethargic of all time. But if historians choose to award points for creativity, the 109th could go down in the books as a most prolific body."

Bush To Rally Senate Republicans Before Recess. The Hill (9/27, Allen) reports President Bush "plans to rally Senate Republicans this morning as they prepare to leave town and hit the campaign trail." A Senate Republican aide "said the president would likely discuss the GOP's accomplishments, particularly in the realm of national security, an issue the White House is trying to draw attention to in the six weeks before the election."

DOJ_NMG_0070294

Jeb Bush Offering Public Criticisms Of President's Education Policy. The New York Times (9/28, A1, Dillon, 1.21M) reports, "Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida has long played the dutiful younger brother." He has "mostly held his tongue about" the differences between his education reform plan in Florida and the president's "even as detractors of all stripes have attacked it. But in recent weeks…Governor Bush has been speaking out about the federal law, mixing dollops of praise with measured criticisms -- and taking an occasional potshot." His criticisms "could well provide the president's opponents with ammunition against his signature law." Gov. Bush also said that U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings is "eager to reform, to reauthorize N.C.L.B." Gov. Bush has credited NCLB with making Florida give "increased attention" to "disabled and limited-English students."

Connecticut's Challenge To Bush Education Reforms To Continue Minus Three Of Four Claims. The New York Times (9/28, Dillon, 1.21M) reports Judge Mark R. Kravitz of Federal District Court in New Haven, Connecticut "yesterday dismissed much of Connecticut's closely watched legal challenge to President Bush's education law, No Child Left Behind, but allowed the state to go forward with its claim that Washington treated the state unfairly in negotiations over how to carry out the law." The state claims that the "secretary of education 'acted arbitrarily' in denying Connecticut's request for an exemption from the law, after the state had concluded that it would receive insufficient financing to carry out the law's testing mandates." Afterwards, "both sides expressed satisfaction" with the ruling.

The AP (9/28) reports Judge Kravitz "dismissed three counts, saying state officials can't challenge the law until they have violated it." The U.S. Department of Education "had asked for a dismissal of the entire lawsuit, arguing that the state understood the law when it accepted hundreds of millions of dollars in education funding."

Conrad, Spratt Criticize Bush Tax Cuts, GOP Budget Shortcomings. McClatchy (9/28, Rosen) reports Sen. Kent Conrad, ranking Democrat on the Senate Budget Committee, said "some of the tax cuts enacted under President Bush might get 'trimmed' if his party regains control of Congress." Conrad and Rep. John Spratt, ranking Democrat on the House Budget Committee, "sharply criticized Republicans for failing to adopt a budget or to pass any of the 12 annual appropriations bills." Conrad said, "We face red ink as far as the eye can see, with the nation's debt continuing to grow out of control. The debt is skyrocketing, and there's been a failure among the Republicans themselves to arrive at a budget." McClatchy adds Conrad "responded cautiously when asked whether Democrats would extend the tax cuts that Congress passed in 2001 and 2003 if they gain control of the House of Representatives or the Senate in the Nov. 7 elections." Conrad said Democrats "would likely retain 'middle-class tax cuts' such as the child tax credit started under President Clinton and the repeal of the 'marriage tax penalty' enacted under Bush." But Conrad "added that Democratic lawmakers might have to revisit the broader income tax reductions that Bush pushed through Congress during his first 30 months in office."

House GOP Leaders Announce Date For Leadership Elections. The Hill (9/28, O'Connor) reports Republican aides aid House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) "has set the date for GOP lawmakers to elect their leaders for the next Congress." The "organizing conference" is schedule "for Wednesday, Nov. 15, the week Congress resumes after the hotly contested midterm election." The GOP elected leaders "made their decision earlier this week after wavering on the date of the post-election contest in the face of a potentially devastating midterm, even though the conference was already scheduled to meet that Wednesday." Each of the eight elected leaders "must stand for reelection for the new Congress." Speaker Hastert and Majority Leader John Boehner "should be safe, even if Republicans lose the House by a narrow margin, but other posts could be up for grabs even if the GOP holds the House." The announcement "of leadership elections is part of a coordinated effort to project confidence before members leave town for the stretch run heading into the November election."

Boehner Appears Secure In GOP Leadership. Roll Call (9/28, Davis) reports Rep. Boehner "appears to be on solid ground to keep his seat at the leadership table in the 110th Congress — even if it's in the minority." Boehner has been Majority Leader "for eight months in a session of Congress marked by leadership upheavals, ethical and criminal scandals and few major legislative victories, and yet — in the estimation of his colleagues — he has emerged largely unscathed." Still, a "number of potential leadership shake-ups could present themselves after the results of Election Day come down. Depending on the outcome, there could be surprise retirements, upstart challenges and calls for retribution."

Liberal Democrats Not Rallying To Murtha For Possible Majority Leader Race. The Hill (9/28, Hearn) reports liberal House Democrats "are not lining up behind Rep. Jack Murtha's (D-Pa.) leadership candidacy in the numbers he had hoped despite his outspoken stance against the Iraq war." Murtha's "failure to line up staunch opponents of the war could prove a blow to his hope of denying the majority leadership to Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (Md.) in the event of a Democratic takeover of the House in the 110th Congress." Rep. Jim Moran (D-Va.), "a friend of Murtha who has been helping him with the race, said tepid support among some progressives was a worry to him." Moran said, "It does concern you when people you think are going to be with you turn out not to be. Some of that's cultural issues, guns and abortion. But we still have the votes." The Hill adds, "Liberal Reps. Maxine Waters (D-Calif.), Barney Frank (D-Mass.), Bill Delahunt (D-Mass.), Tom Lantos (D-Calif.), John Lewis (D-Ga.), Jerry Nadler (D-N.Y.), Lucille Roybal-Allard (D-Calif.), Diane Watson (D-Calif.) and Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) are all backing Hoyer even though many admire Murtha's stance on the war. All but Lewis opposed Hoyer in a 2001 leadership race against House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.)." Some liberals "believe Murtha's record on social issues is too conservative, especially on such topics as gun rights, gay marriage and abortion. Others avow that they are happy with Hoyer's performance as minority whip and want to maintain the status quo in their leadership."

DOJ_NMG_0070295

Snow Walking "Fine Line" In Attending GOP Fundraisers. NBC Nightly News (9/27, story 3, 2:40, Gregory, 9.87M) reported that Tony Snow, White House press secretary, "will be doing fundraisers in advance of election day. This was something he acknowledged today. He said the President did not object to him doing it and the political team said you are popular and we want you to do this but he acknowledged it will raise some eyebrows. He says it is unprecedented. For him it will be a fine line. There is no policy against it but it is a real question. He serves the presidency but he acknowledges he also serves the press corps. He wants to stick to the facts about what the President is doing and not attack Democrats individually."

Budget Cuts Seen As Threatening NASA's Aviation Program. USA Today (9/28, 1A, Levin, 2.27M) reports in its main front-page story that "Groups of lawmakers from both parties, academics and aerospace leaders say" steep budget cuts in the NASA's aeronautics research "are hampering NASA's ability to develop new aviation technology." According to USA Today, "the agency is planning to cut $54 million -- or 31% -- from its effort to study emerging technologies required for a new national air traffic system. NASA is the primary agency researching the Next Generation Air Traffic System, an ambitious program to replace radars with satellite-based technology. Without increased capacity from the new system, airlines can expect increasing flight delays, according to government estimates."

Military Officers Group Concerned About Military Pay Raise. Stephen Barr writes in the "Federal Diary" column in the Washington Post (9/28, D6, 748K), "The House approved a fiscal 2007 defense appropriations bill late Tuesday that would raise military pay by 2.2 percent, effective in January," and "Senate negotiators have signed off on the raise." Now, the Military Officers Association of America, known as MOAA, "urged Congress to approve a 2.7 percent across-the-board raise for the armed forces," saying "this is not the time to skimp on a raise," which also "usually spills over into the civil service." Norb Ryan Jr., president of MOAA and a retired vice admiral, said, "that regardless of which proposed raise gets adopted, it would be the smallest military raise in 11 years," and that the low raise "will send the wrong message to military families."

Amendment Would Block Spending On Parts Of National Security Personnel System. Stephen Barr writes in the "Federal Diary" column in the Washington Post (9/28, D6, 748K), "In a move that may be more about symbolism than substance, House and Senate negotiators on the defense spending bill have prohibited the Pentagon from spending money on disputed parts of the new National Security Personnel System (NSPS)." Sponsored by Reps. Jay Inslee, Walter B. Jones Jr., and Chris Van Hollen, it would "prevent the Defense Department from carrying out plans to restrict union rights and revise procedures for disciplining civil service employees." However, "the Pentagon has contended that the Inslee amendment is unnecessary because" a federal district already "blocked those parts of the NSPS" and "NSPS officials are complying with the court's injunction."

Morris Says Frist Has Failed As Majority Leader. Dick Morris writes in The Hill (9/28) reports, "If Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) were still in his former occupation, he could well be sued by his 54 fellow Republicans, 99 senators, and the American people at large for malpractice." As Senate Majority Leader, "Frist performed about as well as a heart surgeon with mittens on. He failed utterly to provide the leadership necessary and managed to so mangle the reputation of the legislative wing of the Republican Party in the process that it may take several elections, and perhaps a Hillary Clinton presidency, to recover."

Book By Frist's Wife Offers Tribute To Father-Daughter Relationships. The Washington Post (9/28, A21, 748K) reports Karyn McLaughlin Frist, wife of Senate Majority Leader Bill First, "was at the White House, at a small dinner for the king of Spain. President Bush's daughter Jenna walked in late. At first, the president seemed irritated. But one look at Jenna as she hurried into her seat, and Bush 'absolutely melted,' Frist recalled. 'He broke into a big, proud smile.'" The Post adds, "Fathers and daughters captivated Frist, in part because she missed her own father, who had died. Frist invited women -- senators, heads of state,

DOJ_NMG_0070296

Olympic medalists and a soldier -- to write about their fathers, in a book to be published next week, 'Love You, Daddy Boy: Daughters Honor the Fathers They Love.'" Many of the essays "peek into the foyers of political homes."

Wessel Says Paulson Is "Brightest Bulb" In Bush's Cabinet. David Wessel writes in The Wall Street Journal (9/28, 2.03M), "President Bush faces a big decision in coming weeks: how best to deploy his energetic, impatient new Treasury secretary, Henry Paulson, after November's congressional elections." Paulson "is emerging as the brightest bulb in a Bush cabinet with a few dim ones and a few others (think Don Rumsfeld) who have lost their luster. He has mastered the easy stuff: managed to avoid rattling financial markets, figured out that courting Congress takes as much time and care as courting customers at his former employer, Goldman Sachs, and marched through China triumphantly, greeting old acquaintances and posing for photographs as if he were at a Dartmouth reunion. Now what? … The question now is whether Mr. Bush will use the third corporate chief executive to take the job to get something done or relegate him to making speeches for two years."

NYTimes Praises Advisory Group's Recommendations For FDA. The New York Times (9/28, 1.21M) editorializes, "A prestigious advisory group has put its weight behind criticism that the Food and Drug Administration is pitifully weak when it comes to removing dangerous prescription drugs from the market. Last week, a panel appointed by the Institute of Medicine, part of the National Academy of Sciences, issued a slew of recommendations to strengthen the beleaguered F.D.A. as it struggles to regulate a huge array of medications whose ill effects sometimes show up only after years of wide use. … Although the nation is mired in budget deficits, the institute was wise to call for a large increase in financing and personnel for this crucially important regulator of public health. If Congress is too stingy to ante up more money, it should at least divert some of the drug industry's user fees to surveillance after a drug's approval."

OTHER NEWS:

Dow Jones Edges Closer To All-Time High. NBC Nightly News (9/27, story 8, 2;15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Now to the US economy, all eyes were on Wall Street today, wait to see if perhaps the Dow would set a new all-time stock market record. It turns out that did not happen but it was very close. The Dow was within 2.5 points of that record. By the time the market closed it was up by about 20 points [to close at 11, 689.24] 34 points away from the record. NASDAQ was up two points [to close at 2,263.39] today. What does all of this mean for the economy if anything? Here is Anne Thompson." NBC (Thompson) added, "Wall Street is riding high on a wave of confidence about the economy." Alan Skraninaka, Edward Jones Chief Market Strategist: "We are seeing signs anywhere the economy is not overheating or sinking into recession. It is growing at a nice, steady pace and that is what Wall Street loves to see." Thompson: "With a cooling housing market and still high energy prices, is Wall Street seeing things through rose colored glasses?" Mark Zandi, Moody's Economy.com: "They are seeing things that they like. With a slower growing economy they will get that."

USA Today (9/28, Shell, 2.27M) reports, "Posting its third-straight day of gains, the Dow rose 19.85 points to close at 11,689.24, just 33.74 points shy of its record close of 11,722.98 hit on Jan. 14, 2000. … The celebration was put on hold as one of the main culprits that have put a lid on stock prices the past year -- rising energy prices -- again gave investors a reason to sell. A barrel of crude rose $1.95 to $62.96." The Wall Street Journal (9/28, Browning, 2.03M) says the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "inched up 0.02%, or 0.25 point, to 1336.59, ahead 7.1% this year and up 5.2% for the quarter."

Reports Paint Mixed Picture Of The Economy. USA Today (9/28, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) reports, "More evidence of a slowing economy came Wednesday as the government said orders for costly manufactured goods fell in August while sales of new homes rose, but remained at a subdued level." New orders for durable goods "fell 0.5% in August after adjusting for seasonal fluctuations, the Commerce Department said. That followed a 2.7% plunge in July and marked the first back-to-back monthly drops in the often volatile data since spring 2004."

The Wall Street Journal (9/28, Morales, 2.03M) reports, "The latest readings on business investment and housing muddied the economic picture: Orders for big-ticket goods fell unexpectedly in August as new-home sales rose unexpectedly." The Census Bureau "reported that sales of new homes rose 4.1% in August from a month earlier, to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.050 million. The unexpected jump ran counter to other recent data depicting slowing sales." But "analysts cautioned not to focus too much on a one-month statistic. Indeed, compared with August a year ago, new-home sales were down 17.4%. And earlier this week, the National Association of Realtors said existing-home sales in August fell for the fifth consecutive month, while the national median price fell, year over year, for the first time in 11 years." Likewise, the New York Times (9/28, Peters, 1.21M) runs a story titled "Report Shows Home Sales Rising, But Skeptics Abound."

Hispanic Unemployment Down Sharply. The Washington Post (9/28, A13, Brulliard, 748K) reports, "Unemployment among Hispanics fell sharply this year, and

DOJ_NMG_0070297

their wages rose after a two-year decline, according to a national study released yesterday." The Post adds, "Bolstered by immigration, the Hispanic labor force is growing rapidly, and those workers are having little trouble finding jobs -- especially in construction, said the report by the Pew Hispanic Center. … Latinos, who represent 13 percent of the U.S. labor force, accounted for 40 percent of all new workers in the year ending June 30, the report said. Eighty percent of jobs filled by Hispanics went to immigrants, who make up the biggest share of the Latino labor force."

Press Corps Resents Closed Bush Fundraisers. The White House Bulletin/US News (9/27) reported, "Resentment is building within the White House press corps over the increasing number of President Bush's fundraising appearances that are closed to the media. Five such events are on his schedule this week alone, including fundraisers in Connecticut and Ohio on Monday." Reporters, who are "already chafing because of the Administration's penchant for secrecy, complain that the public has a right to know what the President is saying to his supporters. They also argue that their news organizations pay thousands of dollars to cover Bush on the road and then they are shut out of the fundraisers -- which have become a huge part of his itinerary as the November 7 mid-term elections approach." White House Press Secretary Tony Snow "says these events are mostly held in private homes and the owners don't want to allow coverage." In addition, "many hosts are wealthy individuals who feel that coverage would invade their privacy and subject them to snide stories about being fat cats who are isolated from everyday life, the host of a recent fundraiser told US News and the Bulletin." Another factor "is that many GOP candidates want Bush to raise money for them but they don't want to be seen publicly with him because he is unpopular in their districts and states."

Bush-Rove, Hillary Clinton Fundraisers Take Place On Same DC Street. The Washington Post (9/28, Argetsinger, Roberts, 748K) reports, "We knew this would happen sooner or later -- Tuesday night, secluded Whitehaven Street in Northwest was clogged by dueling fundraisers. President Bush and Karl Rove mingled with donors at the home of White House social secretary Lea Berman and husband Wayne, raising $1.5 million for the GOP in Iowa, Arkansas and Wisconsin. Two doors down, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton presided over a low-key event for about 50 $2,000 donors to her senatorial reelection bid. Limo lock!"

Danforth Says GOP Needs To Move Away From Christian Conservative Base. The Christian Science Monitor (9/28, Cook, 58K) reports on the Monitor breakfast with former Sen. John Danforth, who "looks like a quintessential Republican insider but he is calling for a radical change in how his party operates." Beneath his "polished and calm exterior is a man upset with his party. Danforth is traveling the country promoting his new book, 'Faith and Politics: How the Moral Values Debate Divides America and How to Move Forward Together.' The book argues that Republicans have transformed their party into a political arm of conservative Christians." Danforth said, "For the Republican party, the base of our party now is the Christian conservatives.... The Republican party has done everything it can to appeal to that part of the base ... I think this is bad for the country and ultimately it is going to be bad for the Republican party because I think when the American people reflect on this they do not want a sectarian political party in this country. So what I am trying to do is encourage them to reflect on it." Danforth said he would not "leave the party despite his unhappiness with its current course."

The Washington Post (9/28, A4, Slevin, 748K) reports Danforth is "telling audiences this month" that the "potency of the Christian right in the Republican Party is limited." A "lifelong Republican moderate disturbed by his party's direction, he contends that the political center has a future." Danforth is "promoting a new book that describes religion as a divisive force in the United States today and accuses the religious right and its political supporters of creating a sectarian party." The GOP leadership "habitually strives to please its base at the expense of meaningful compromise, he maintains, proving to be neither humble Christians nor effective politicians. His reasoning holds that social conservatives cannot prevail because a majority of Americans do not share their views or appreciate their style."

GOP Open House Seats in Arizona, Colorado, Iowa At Risk. Roll Call (9/28, Drucker) reports while "predictions of a Democratic wave on Nov. 7 may be overblown, Republicans are clearly on the defensive in three open seats that could prove key to their ability to retain the House majority in the 110th Congress." The Republican-held seats "in Arizona, Colorado and Iowa were seen as major battlegrounds. But now they are in serious jeopardy of going Democratic, with the 7th district in Colorado and the 1st district in Iowa, in particular, signifying the decline of the GOP brand name in the eyes of voters this cycle." Democrats are "clearly benefiting from the decision by the GOP incumbents who hold these seats to retire from Congress. But it is telling that the Republicans running in their stead find themselves down significantly in public opinion polls to their Democratic opponents." In AZ8, former state Sen. Gabrielle Giffords (D) "seems poised to easily dispose of former state Rep. Randy Graf (R)." The "eastern Iowa 1st district and Denver-area 7th district of Colorado have repeatedly voted Democrat for president while choosing Republicans to represent them in the House." In the former, "voters appear to be favoring a Democrat, trial attorney Bruce Braley. He led wealthy businessman Mike Whalen (R) by 7 points in the latest independent poll." In CO7, "former state Sen. Ed Perlmutter's (D) early and healthy lead over former state official Rick O'Donnell (R) — despite a bruising Democratic primary — indicates the GOP isn't getting the benefit of the doubt from voters this year, as opposed to the previous two cycles, when Rep. Bob Beauprez (R) won competitive races."

DOJ_NMG_0070298

GOP Effort To Win Ohio's 6th CD Seen As Fizzling. The Washington Post (9/28, A6, Cillizza, VandeHei, 748K) reports that four months ago, Democratic state Sen. Charlie Wilson "was teetering on the edge of defeat in his campaign for Ohio's open 6th District. Today he is strolling toward Nov. 7, when, if current trends continue, he will be elected to Congress." No "television ads for Wilson or his Republican opponent, state Rep. Chuck Blasdel, are airing. For the moment, the national party organizations, which swarm into the most competitive races, are nowhere to be found." The departure of Democratic Rep. Ted Strickland – who is running for governor -- from the 6th CD "once tantalized Republicans, who regarded this seat -- carried narrowly by President Bush in 2004 -- as their most promising chance to take a congressional seat from the Democratic column." But Blasdel's campaign "never gained much traction after Wilson, considered the strongest of three contenders, won the Democratic primary in May."

Democrats' Rejection Of "Contract" To Win House Majority Analyzed. In his Roll Call column (9/28), executive editor Morton Kondracke says, "The 12th anniversary of the Republicans' 1994 'Contract with America' came and went on Wednesday without a 2006 Democratic counterpart. And there won't be one." Despite "repeated urging from various quarters, including from former President Bill Clinton, that the party needs to make clear what it stands for and not just against, Democrats contend that off-year elections are referenda on the party in power and that a Democratic alternative agenda would only provide targets for the GOP to attack." It is "undoubtedly true that the GOP won" the 1994 midterm election largely "because of disgust with Democratic management — the failure of Clinton's health care reform plan and Congressional scandals — but the contract did provide a legislative roadmap for the GOP once it won a 52-seat victory and had to help govern the country." This year, Democrats "have issued a two-page positive agenda, 'New Direction for America,' but there's been no Capitol steps rally, and the document has all the earmarks of being just a handout designed to be an answer to the question, 'But what do Democrats stand for?'" A "positive message of purpose -- saying where they'd lead instead of just how much trouble they'd inflict on Bush -- could push them over the top. Maybe Democrats don't need a Contract, but they could use a plan."

Rothenberg Skeptical Of Unknown Democrats' Poll Performance. In his Roll Call column (9/28), political analyst Stuart Rothenberg says, "Democratic pollsters are pushing lots of polls that show second- and third-tier candidates performing surprisingly well. If most of these challengers win, the Democrats will gain 30 or 40 House seats. Obviously, that's unlikely. Extremely unlikely. So what are we all supposed to make of Democratic polling memos asserting that Paul Hodes (New Hampshire's 2nd), John Hall (New York's 19th), Jason Altmire (Pennsylvania's 4th), Victoria Wulsin (Ohio's 2nd), Charlie Brown (California's 4th), Nancy Skinner (Michigan's 9th) and Dan Maffei (New York's 25th) are breathing down the necks of incumbent Republicans?" Some of "these numbers stem from the fact that the Democratic base has solidified early on and Democratic candidates are getting the vote that normally comes to them only in October. The folks over at Public Opinion Strategies, I believe, coined the term 'premature partisan polarization' to refer to the current tendency of voters to pick their party's Congressional candidates earlier and earlier, even if they know nothing about them." Democratic pollsters "almost always cite Bush's standing. They almost all argue that voters want change or are dissatisfied with the direction of the country. And they are right, but only so far. The problem for Democrats is that in most cases, that won't be enough by itself to get voters to fire GOP incumbents. That's particularly true if Republicans pound away at their challengers, making them the issue in their races and decreasing their appeal as vehicles for change."

Good Economic News Seen As Boosting GOP Chances For Keeping Congress. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (9/27, 2.03M) reported, "Stock market gains and declining gasoline prices are likely helping boost Republican odds for holding the House and Senate in some market-style exchanges. In the Iowa Electronics Market, a futures market operated for research purposes by economics professors at the University of Iowa, the latest trading data suggests a 55% probability that Republicans will keep control of the House, up from 37% just a few weeks ago. On the Irish betting exchange Tradesports.com, contracts for Republican retention of the House also are up sharply since the beginning of September. As for the big kahuna -- control of both chambers of Congress --- IEM traders are currently placing a 59% likelihood that Republicans will still be calling the shots in both chambers after the Nov. 7 midterm elections, up from 38% earlier this month."

House Republicans Promote Suburban Agenda. The Washington Times (9/28, Bellantoni, 88K) reports while House Republicans "trumpeted elements of their suburban agenda, Democrats yesterday said Congress will have failed the American people if it adjourns without increasing the minimum wage." Rep. Mark Steven Kirk, chairman of the GOP's Suburban Agenda Caucus, said, "The battleground is in the suburbs, and it is wise policy and wise politics to directly meet the needs of families in those areas." Kirk said "both parties for too long have focused on rural or urban voters. The country now is 54 percent suburbanites who face similar challenges, he said." The Times adds Republicans "outlined seven 'suburban agenda' measures for 2007 aimed at improving education and health care. They also are pushing the Alternative Energy Act of 2006, which funds research for plug-in electric hybrid car technology and studies solar and wind power." Democrats, "meanwhile, tried to force a vote on increasing the minimum wage, a move many centrist Republicans support."

DOJ_NMG_0070299

Democrats Said To Have Serious Shot At Senate Majority. The New York Times (9/28, Toner, 1.21M) reports in a front page story, "Six weeks before Election Day, the Democrats suddenly face a map with unexpected opportunities in their battle for control of the Senate." Virginia Sen. George Allen "looks newly vulnerable after a series of controversies over charges of racial insensitivity, strategists in both parties say." In Tennessee, Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., "has run a strong campaign that has kept that state in contention." In other states, Democratic challengers "are either ahead or close in races in five states held by the Republicans: Missouri, Montana, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Rhode Island, according to political strategists in both parties and the latest polls." Democrats "also have their own vulnerabilities, particularly in New Jersey, where Senator Robert Menendez is in a tight race with his Republican challenger, State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr., according to recent polls." Democrats "must win six Republican seats to regain a Senate majority," and "a shift in the Senate was always considered a long shot this year. Some analysts now say, however, that there are enough Republican seats facing serious challenges to make it at least plausible." Political analyst Stuart Rothenberg said, "There's a big difference in talking about six seats in play and not five."

Allen Campaign, Beset By Controversies, Has Difficulty Gaining Traction. ABC World News (9/27, story 6, 2:15, Gibson) reported in the Virginia Senate race, Republican George Allen "was thought to be a shoe-in for re-election. But he's made a series of gaffes that are giving him serious trouble." ABC (Tapper) added Sen. Allen has "had to spend the week denying reports that he regularly used the 'n' word to describe African-Americans." The charge has been "made by at least five Allen acquaintances." However, Democratic challenger Jim Webb "facing no such allegations of his own, seemed to provide Allen with something of a defense." Jim Webb: "I don't think there's anyone who grew up around the South that hasn't had the word pass through their lips one time in their life." Tapper: "For weeks, tough questions for Allen about his sensitivity on racial matters. It began at this campaign stop, where Allen singled out an Indian-American Democratic operative, calling him 'macaca.'" Prof. Mark Rozell: "When you have a campaign that's on the defensive all the time, as is the case with George Allen, there is no possibility of getting a positive, constructive message out there for the voters to respond to."

USA Today (9/28, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports, "'It has been one misstep and meltdown after another' for the Allen campaign, Mark McKinnon, a strategist for President Bush, said Tuesday at a panel discussion on political advertising in New York sponsored by USA TODAY." Democrats, "who need six new seats for a Senate majority, are poised to invest heavily here." Still, the FEC reports "for June 30, the most recent available, showed Allen with a formidable financial edge: $6.6 million on hand vs. $424,000 for Webb."

Webb Amplifies Statement He Has Not Used Racial Epithet. The Washington Post (9/28, B1, Shear, 748K) reports Webb "sought to explain remarks he had made a day earlier, in which he refused to say whether he had used the 'N-word,' but he insisted he has never used it as a racial epithet aimed at anyone." Spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd "said Webb, an author and former Marine, 'did not want to make any blanket statements that he has never, ever uttered the word. Jim has not used the word directed at another person. He's never used it himself as a racial slur.'" The Post adds Webb's comments to the Richmond Times-Dispatch "prompted Allen campaign officials to direct a reporter to Dan Cragg, a former acquaintance of Webb's, who said Webb used the word while describing his own behavior during his freshman year at the University of Southern California in the early 1960s. Webb later transferred to the U.S. Naval Academy." Cragg said Webb "described taking drives through the black neighborhood of Watts, where he and members of his ROTC unit used racial epithets and pointed fake guns at blacks to scare them."

Barnes Says Allen Campaign Unprepared For Presidential Focus. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (9/28), Fred Barnes says, "The national press hasn't treated Mr. Allen as an ordinary candidate. He's in a different category: Likely Presidential Contender. His re-election bid thus floats beyond local Virginia matters, becoming a test of Mr. Allen's viability as a national candidate for 2008. The media grew still more interested when Mr. Allen got a serious Democratic opponent, James Webb, a well-known novelist, Vietnam veteran and angry ex-Republican." After the "macaca" incident, "Allen was thrown on the defensive, appearing increasingly rattled. He made things worse by giving several confusing, contradictory explanations and declined to apologize for several days. Then he apologized, over and over again. His lead in polls dropped to a slim four-point advantage." Would Allen's "gaffe have become a huge issue absent his presidential ambitions? Probably not, even with attention focused so closely on 2006 congressional races. Would the Post have hyped the macaca story day after day? I doubt it." Allen's campaign has "seemed unprepared for the way that presidential races, with their high visibility, draw out personal information." Allen "needs to remind voters of his success as governor. He abolished parole, reformed welfare and championed education reforms. New voters, many of them in Northern Virginia (which has one-third of the state's voting population), know little of Mr. Allen's impressive political background."

DOJ_NMG_0070300

Herbert Says Allen Represents GOP "Bigotry." In his New York Times column (9/28), Bob Herbert says, "George Allen, the clownish, Confederate-flag-loving senator from Virginia, has apparently been scurrying around for many years, spreading his racially offensive garbage like a dog that should be curbed. With harsh new allegations emerging daily, it's fair to ask: Where are the voices of reason in the Republican Party -- the nonbigoted voices? Why haven't we heard from them on this matter?" You "don't hear President Bush or the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, or any other prominent Republicans blowing the whistle on the likes of George Allen and Conrad Burns because Republicans across the board, so-called moderates as well as conservatives, have benefited tremendously from the party's bigotry."

Ford Running Competitive Race For Tennessee Senate Seat. The Washington Times (9/28, DeBose, 88K) reports Tennessee is "living up to its reputation as a battleground state with Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., a Democrat, running neck and neck with Bob Corker, Chattanooga's Republican mayor, in their race for the Senate." Corker's "early double-digit polling lead" has "dwindled into a statistical dead heat, and Democrats now think they can capture the seat in this Republican-leaning state." Emory University political analyst Merle Black said Republicans "have underestimated the effectiveness of Mr. Ford's campaign." Black said, "It just looks like Ford wants this a lot more than Corker does." The Times adds, "The stakes are high for Mr. Ford. A victory by the son of former Rep. Harold Ford Sr. would give Democrats an unexpected victory in their effort to pick up six seats to win back the Senate majority in November." It "also would mark the first time a black person in the South has won an open election to the Senate and could be seen as the first chink in the armor of the Republican's Southern fortress."

Mfume Endorses Cardin, Warns Democrats About Lack Of Diversity. The Washington Post (9/28, A1, Marimow, 748K) reports Democratic Maryland Senate candidate Benjamin L. Cardin "received the critical endorsement yesterday of Democratic primary opponent Kweisi Mfume, whose blessing came with a blunt warning about the lack of diversity among candidates for statewide office in Maryland." The "main attraction at Cardin's campaign rally at the University of Maryland was supposed to be Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.), a rising star in the Democratic Party. But Mfume -- who lost to Cardin on Sept. 12 -- left a stark impression, telling the Baltimore congressman and fellow Democrats, 'We have a problem.'" Mfume "enthusiastically put his arms around Cardin, saying: 'I know what he's done in the past, and I know what he'll do in the future. He's going to make a damn good senator.'" But he "cautioned that the party had much work to do to energize black voters. The Democratic nominees for the top four jobs, he noted, look no different than the ticket 50 years ago."

Obama Said To Have Outshined Cardin At Rally. The Washington Post (9/28, C1, Montgomery, 748K) reports Cardin invited "Mr. Democratic Charisma himself onstage for a rally yesterday in the Cardin quest to become U.S. senator from Maryland. Barack Obama didn't even have to open his mouth to have a crowd of a few hundred under a powerful spell in a grassy outdoor amphitheater at the University of Maryland in College Park. The junior senator from Illinois -- part Kenyan, part Kansan -- stood tall and youthful and bronze in a black suit and a baby-blue tie, his eyes half-closed, studying the audience with a kind of seductive lassitude. His arrival sparked an ovation, and he shot a quick amiable wink to the many pols and hopefuls crammed behind him on the stage, mute witnesses to the magic." Beside Obama "stood Cardin. Comparisons aren't polite, but the Democratic congressman from Maryland was asking for it: He looked older, shorter, pudgier and pinker."

Crist Leads Davis By 15 Points In Florida Gubernatorial Race. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (9/27, 2.03M) reported, "In Florida, Republican Attorney General Charlie Crist not only got a much-welcome infusion of cash thanks to the fund-raiser in chief but also a poll by Mason-Dixon Polling & Research Inc. gave him a 15-point lead over Democratic nominee Rep. Jim Davis. The survey of 625 likely voters had a margin error of 4 percentage points."

Polls Show Schwarzenegger With Double-Digit Lead Over Angelides. The Washington Times (9/28, Harper, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Just six weeks before the midterms, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger holds a double-digit edge over Democratic nominee Phil Angelides in two independent voter surveys. The Governator held a 17-point lead over Mr. Angelides -- 48 percent to 31 percent -- in a survey released Tuesday by the Public Policy Institute of California. A Field Poll released yesterday put Mr. Schwarzenegger's advantage at 10 points, 44 percent to 34 percent. Another Field survey in February found the rivals tied at 39 percent. … The policy institute's poll of 1,091 likely voters was conducted Sept. 13 to 20. The margin of error was two percentage points. The Field survey of 557 likely voters was conducted Sept. 14 through Sunday, with an error margin of 4.3 percentage points."

DOJ_NMG_0070301

David Broder writes in the Washington Post (9/28, A23, 748K), "The Terminator has rescued himself from political ruin by reinventing his approach to government, thus demonstrating in the most dramatic way possible the value of political independence. Just 10 months after California voters rejected all four of the ballot initiatives he put before them and sent his personal approval ratings crashing to dangerous depths…Schwarzenegger is riding high, poised to win a full term come November." Instead of "the partisan assault on public employee unions and Democratic legislators…that marked his rhetoric in 2005, Schwarzenegger has negotiated agreements this year on a minimum-wage increase, higher school spending, curbing air pollution and a mega-bond sale designed to meet overdue highway, flood-control and school-construction needs." Democratic leaders of the legislature "now sing his praises and join him on the platform at bill-signing ceremonies, while the unions debate whether it is worthwhile to put money into the rival campaign of the struggling Democratic nominee, state Treasurer Phil Angelides." This turnaround is "likely to yield a notable Republican victory in a year of widespread GOP losses."

Democrats' Attacks On Fox News Rally Base. The Washington Times (9/28, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports, "Nearly a week after Bill Clinton's angry appearance on 'Fox News Sunday,' Democrats have turned their vitriol on the Fox News Channel, in what some consider a calculated move to boost the left's enthusiasm before midterm elections." Democratic strategist Donna Brazile said, "It fires up our base, because they're glad someone is fighting back and setting the record straight." The Times adds that since Clinton's "interview with Fox's Chris Wallace was taped last Friday, high-profile Democrats, including California Sen. Barbara Boxer and strategist James Carville, have joined Mr. Clinton's criticism of the cable news network. Fox's critics say the persistent questioning of Mr. Clinton's record on terrorism is indicative of what they consider a conservative bias."

Giuliani Defends Former President Clinton's Counter-Terror Efforts. The AP (9/28, Sedensky) reports former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani "defended Bill Clinton on Wednesday over the former president's counterterrorism efforts, saying recent criticism on preventing the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks is wrong." Giuliani, who was in Florida to appear with Republican gubernatorial candidate Charlie Crist, said, "The idea of trying to cast blame on President Clinton is just wrong for many, many reasons, not the least of which is I don't think he deserves it. I don't think President Bush deserves it. The people who deserve blame for Sept. 11, I think we should remind ourselves, are the terrorists - the Islamic fanatics - who came here and killed us and want to come here again and do it."

LA Times Responds To WSJ Op-Ed On "Path To 9/11" Movie. In a statement published in the Wall Street Journal letters to the editor section (9/28), the Los Angeles Times says, "On your Sept. 18 editorial page, Cyrus Nowrasteh wrote 'The Path to Hysteria,' in which he chronicled his experience of the scandal surrounding the television movie he wrote, 'The Path to 9/11.' In his account, Mr. Nowrasteh wrote: 'The L.A. Times, for one, characterized me by race, religion, ethnicity, country-of-origin and political leanings -- wrongly on four of five counts. To them I was an Iranian-American politically conservative Muslim. It is perhaps irrelevant in our brave new world of journalism that I was born in Boulder, Colo. I am not a Muslim or practitioner of any religion, nor am I a political conservative. What am I? I am, most devoutly, an American. I asked the reporter if this kind of labeling was a new policy for the paper. He had no response.'" The Times continues, "He was referring to a front-page article in the L.A. Times ('ABC Stands By Its 9/11 Story -- Almost,' Sept. 9) in which Scott Collins and Tina Daunt described the writer as 'a politically conservative Iranian American Muslim.' We would like to set the record straight, one point at a time." Nowrasteh, "as he wrote in The Wall Street Journal, has Iranian parents. Which would make him Iranian-American. Mr. Nowrasteh's politics have been widely characterized as conservative in the Washington Post and elsewhere. Additionally, last October he appeared on a panel at the Liberty Film Festival that was named "Rebels With a Cause: How Conservatives Can Lead Hollywood's Next Paradigm Shift.' In a Q&A interview with Libertas: A Forum for Conservative Thought on Film (http://www.libertyfilmfestival.com/libertas/index.php?p=462), Mr. Nowrasteh identified himself as '"Islamic-American.' And finally, in his piece in the Journal, Mr. Nowrasteh also implied that he contacted the reporter about his complaints, and was ignored. This is not the case: Scott Collins spoke on the phone with Mr. Nowrasteh after the article came out."

Hillary Clinton Faces Quandary On AIDS Funding Bill. The Hill (9/28, Bolton) reports an AIDS funding bill "that has stalled on the Senate floor has put Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) in a difficult position — forcing her to choose between the interests of her home state and those of battleground states in the 2008 presidential election." Elected officials "and AIDS activists from Iowa, South Carolina, and Ohio are urging senators to pass the Ryan White Comprehensive AIDS Resources Emergency Act, which would increase their state's funding for people infected with HIV, the virus that causes AIDS." A group of "activists and officials are focusing their efforts on Clinton because she has the highest profile among the bill's opponents. They may also be calculating that they have most leverage with her because she is expected to run for president." But the bill "would steer money away from major urban areas in New York, New Jersey and California to smaller, more rural states that have seen a dramatic increase in HIV infections in recent years." Clinton and Sen. Charles Schumer "outlined their objections to the new funding formula in a recent letter to Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-N.Y.). 'New York State stands to lose more than $78 million in Ryan White Title II funds over four years,' they wrote." That position "puts Clinton at odds with Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D), who urged for AIDS funding to be restructured in a letter to Sens. Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.), the chairman of the Senate health committee, and Edward Kennedy (Mass.), the panel's ranking Democrat."

DOJ_NMG_0070302

Falwell Says Clinton Presidential Candidacy Will Energize People Of Faith. Rev. Jerry Falwell said on CNN's The Situation Room (9/27) that "if the Democrats choose Hillary as their…presidential candidate in '08, this will energize people of faith in this country more than any other person."

Bill Clinton To Celebrate 60th Birthday With Foundation Fundraiser. The Washington Post (9/28, C1, Balz, 748K) reports, "Baby boomer and former president Bill Clinton is laying plans to celebrate his 60th birthday in grand style with a charitable fundraising extravaganza in New York late next month that will include an invitation-only concert by the Rolling Stones and contributor packages that run to $500,000 and higher." Clinton's daughter, Chelsea, "who has generally avoided high-profile participation in her parents' political and philanthropic activities, is serving as co-host of the three-day party. She will host a Saturday brunch on a weekend that also features a golf tournament at the Bayonne (N.J.) Golf Club, multiple receptions and a dinner at the American Museum of Natural History with the former president, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Chelsea." The "2,100 invitations began arriving this week. Weekend packages start at $60,000 (Hint: $1,000 for every year of Clinton's age). Next is the 'Vice Chair Package,' for those who contribute $100,000 or raise $250,000. Those who pledge $500,000 or more will receive the 'Birthday Chair Package,' which includes the 'Backstage Pass' dinner and photo with Clinton and platinum seating at the Saturday dinner and the Stones concert." The proceeds "will go to the William J. Clinton Foundation, the umbrella organization that oversees the Clinton HIV-AIDS initiative, the Clinton Global Initiative and several other programs launched by the former president since he left office almost six years ago."

GOP To Hold 2008 Convention in Twin Cities.

ABC World News (9/27, story 5, 0:15, Gibson) reported, "In politics, tonight, the Republicans will hold their convention in 2008 in Minneapolis/St. Paul. Minneapolis last had a national convention in 1892. The Democrats have narrowed their choices to Denver or New York." The GOP choice is being widely reported this morning. The AP (9/28) said it was "a location in the politically pivotal Midwest," while McClatchy (9/28, Hotakainen, Diaz) reports "Minnesota's emergence as a presidential battleground state paid off." The Twin Cities beat three other finalists: New York, Cleveland and Tampa, Fla."

USA Today (9/28, 2.27M) reports, "By picking the Twin Cities, the GOP will ensure plenty of news coverage in Minnesota, Wisconsin and Iowa, all of which were close in the 2004 election, said Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn. 'Whoever wins those states is going to be the next president of the United States.'"

The Hill (9/28, Snyder) reports, "The convention proper will be held in Xcel Energy Center in St. Paul, where the Minnesota Wild National Hockey League team plays," but "Minnesota officials said the decision holds broad economic impact for the region. The convention could bring in as much as $150 million, officials said." Democrats "were also considering holding their convention in 2008 in the Twin Cities. But the Democratic mayors of St. Paul and Minneapolis expressed no regret that their cities would host the showcase event for the rival party."

The New York Times (9/28, Kornblut, 1.21M) says Republicans "insisted their choice had not been politically driven. But in choosing Minneapolis and St. Paul…the party guaranteed itself widespread news media attention in three adjoining swing states, Minnesota, Iowa and Wisconsin. The convention is scheduled for Sept. 1-4, 2008." The Washington Post (9/28, A6, Slevin, Balz, 748K) reports the story in similar terms, under the headline "With Eye On Midwest In '08, GOP Picks Twin Cities For Convention." The Post also reports Steven Schier, "a prominent Minnesota political commentator on the faculty of Carleton College, said the timing and the tactics suggest that the national Republican Party hopes to help its Minnesota candidates this year and appeal to voters in a swath of battleground states in 2008."

Roll Call (9/28, Newmyer, Weinstein) notes Minnesota, "with a modest 10 electoral votes, hasn't backed a GOP presidential candidate since Richard Nixon in 1972. But margins in the state have narrowed, and it was a key battleground in the 2004 election, with Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) carrying it by just 3 points."

The Washington Times (9/28, Hallow, 88K) reports, "The decision to go with Minnesota also showcases one of the Republican Party's rising young conservative stars, Gov.

DOJ_NMG_0070303

Tim Pawlenty, 45, who was going to run for the Senate in 2002 until Vice President Dick Cheney persuaded him to run for governor instead so that Mr. Coleman could make his run against Mr. Wellstone without a primary fight." The Times adds, "All smiles yesterday, Mr. Pawlenty, a favorite of [RNC Chairman Ken] Mehlman's for vice president in 2008, called the choice of the Twin Cities 'fantastic.'"

Prominent Scientists Form 527 Group. The New York Times (9/28, Dean, 1.21M) reports several "prominent scientists said yesterday that they had formed an organization dedicated to electing politicians 'who respect evidence and understand the importance of using scientific and engineering advice in making public policy.'" Organizers of Scientists and Engineers for America 'said it would be nonpartisan, but in interviews several said Bush administration science policies had led them to act. The issues they cited included the administration's position on climate change, its restrictions on stem cell research and delays in authorizing the over-the-counter sale of emergency contraception." Organizers "include John H. Gibbons and Neal Lane, who were science advisers in the Clinton administration, the Nobel laureates Peter Agre and Alfred Gilman, and Susan F. Wood, who resigned from the Food and Drug Administration last year to protest the agency's delay in approving over-the-counter sales of the so-called Plan B emergency contraception." Executive director Mike Brown "said it would be a 527 organization under tax laws, meaning that it could be involved in electoral politics, and that contributions to the group would not be tax deductible."

Will Says Taxpayer Financing Of Presidential Elections Will Die In 2008. George Will writes in the Washington Post (9/28, A23, 748K), "The foremost achievement of the political speech regulators -- a.k.a. campaign finance 'reformers' -- is collapsing. Taxpayer financing of presidential campaigns, which was in parlous condition in 2004, will die in 2008. … It is delicious that the McCain-Feingold law, the reformers' most recent handiwork, is helping kill taxpayer financing of presidential campaigns. Before McCain-Feingold, limits on contributions of private money -- set in 1974 and not indexed for inflation -- became steadily more restrictive, so candidates accepted public funding. But McCain-Feingold, by doubling the permissible size of campaign contributions, made it easier for candidates to raise sums far larger than taxpayer funding provides." Will adds, "Reformers desperate to resuscitate taxpayer funding cite the supposedly scandalous fact that each party's 2008 presidential campaign may spend $500 million. If so, Americans volunteering to fund the dissemination of speech about candidates for the nation's most consequential office will contribute $1 billion, which is about half the sum they spend annually on Easter candy. Some scandal."

WPost Says Fairfax County Should Examine Deployment Of Its Vehicles. The Washington Post (9/28, A22, 748K) editorializes, "It began with an eagle-eyed auditor who, glancing at a garage maintained by Fairfax County's government for its huge fleet of official cars, noticed that too many of them spent their days parked, unused and apparently unneeded. The auditor rightly wondered whether the county bureaucracy -- 11,500 strong -- really warranted one vehicle per three employees. … Alas, the road to waste, inefficiency and bureaucratic scheming is paved with good intentions. On the one hand, the mileage minimum has helped prune the county's fleet by 167 vehicles, most of them in the year after the policy took effect. But, as reported by The Post's Lisa Rein, it has also prompted county workers and managers to devise ingenious methods to hang on to their county-owned cars -- by hook or by crook." The Post adds, "A better follow-up would be for the county to scrutinize the deployment of its remaining vehicles, tighten procedures governing their use and encourage more employees to use their own cars when possible (and claim reimbursement by mileage) -- a much more cost-efficient option."

WSJournal Defends Wal-Mart's Drug Discounts. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (9/28, 2.03M) says Wal-Mart's announcement that it will offer many generic drugs for $4 is not winning "applause from its left-wing critics." These are "the same folks who've complained for years about high drug prices, using the issue to argue for government price controls, shorter patent lives on new drugs, and reimportation of drugs from Canada and Mexico." The Journal adds, "Wal-Mart isn't a charity, and its $4 decision is designed to lift its own sales by undercutting prices at competing retailers. But that's the way the market works, driving prices lower with competition. It turns out that Wal-Mart's critics really didn't care about prices; what they want is more union clout, and more government control over health care."

Ahmadinejad Says Iran Won't Give Up Right To Pursue Nuclear Program. The AP (9/28) reports, "Iran's hard-line president said Wednesday Iran won't give up "one iota" of its right to pursue a peaceful nuclear program." Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "reiterated his uncompromising stance as Iran's top nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani held talks with European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana in Berlin, described by an EU official as 'very intense.'"

Rice Backs This Week's Solana-Larjani Nuclear Talks. The AP (9/28, Graham) reports Solana and Larjani "held five hours of 'very intense' talks Wednesday over Iran's disputed nuclear program and planned to meet again" today. Although not participating in those talks, German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier "said he was optimistic progress could be made." Solana said he "would report back to the six countries" that authored the enrichment suspension incentives package. Secretary Rice "told reporters in Washington that she telephoned Solana on Wednesday and renewed U.S. support for his talks with Iran." She "said if Larijani agreed to a suspension of processing uranium 'we would be on a course for negotiations.' But, Rice told reporters, she had told Solana 'clearly this won't go on very much longer.'" Assistant Secretary McCormack "said whether Iran was agreeable to a temporary and verifiable suspension would not be known until Solana concludes his meetings with Larijani."

DOJ_NMG_0070304

The Washington Times (9/28, Kralev, 88K) reports the Bush Administration "yesterday postponed its pursuit of UN sanctions against Iran for 'a few weeks' to allow its European allies time to try to negotiate a suspension of Iran's nuclear fuel production."

NYTimes Praises Buffet's Pledge For Nuclear Fuel Bank. In an editorial, the New York Times (9/28, 1.21M) writes that Warren Buffet "is pledging $50 million for a [nuclear] fuel bank — run by the International Atomic Energy Agency — to be a supplier of last resort for any country that chooses not to get into the risky reactor fuel business and gets the I.A.E.A. seal of approval." US "officials publicly welcomed Mr. Buffett's proposal as one way to persuade countries that they don't need to make their own fuel. But there's no talk of matching his largess." The Times says, "The White House -- which has long criticized the I.A.E.A. for not being tough enough on Iran -- is not eager to give the agency more power. Instead, the administration has joined with Russia and four other major fuel producers to offer overlapping supply guarantees, with each promising to make up for the others' possible shortfall. That's a start. But we suspect that any plan that has governments — rather than the more neutral I.A.E.A. -- offering guarantees won't calm suspicions or take away Iran's excuse." The Times concludes, "More than 50 years ago, President Eisenhower first proposed setting up an international nuclear fuel bank ... . Washington would do well to take a harder look at Mr. Buffett's -- and Mr. Eisenhower's -- excellent idea. And then come up with the cash."

Egypt Working On Nuclear Program. McClatchy (9/28, El Naggar) reports, "Determined to lead the Arab world into the nuclear club, Egypt is working on a nuclear energy program intended to reduce the country's dependency on oil." The program, announced last week by Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, "is expected to cost as much as $2 billion and will take more than a decade before the plants produce electricity. While other Arab nations also are looking into nuclear research and development, Egypt already has two low-level reactors, a half century of research and the remains of a comprehensive plan that was scrapped after the nuclear accident at Chernobyl in 1986."

Hill Says Pyongyang Talks Are Entering "Crucial Phase." The AP (9/28, Klug) reports Assistant Secretary Chris Hill "said Wednesday that negotiators are entering a crucial phase and suggested Washington is stepping up efforts to break a nearly year-long impasse." He "also urged the North to show it was serious about returning to the talks aimed at ridding Pyongyang of its self-professed nuclear weapons production program." Hill told an audience that "the next weeks would be 'critical' and spoke of a 'certain sense of urgency' involved in efforts to resume negotiations that include both Koreas, China, Russia, Japan and the United States." He later added that Washington "would not talk with North Korea 'in the absence of the six-party process.'"

AFP (9/28, Collinson) adds Hill "warned that any nuclear test by North Korea would be viewed by world powers as a 'very serious' escalation of the crisis over the Stalinist state's weapons programs." Testifying before the HIRC, Hill "also said Washington was considering whether to impose new sanctions on Pyongyang, despite warnings by several congressmen such a move would enflame the showdown." Rep. Tom Lantos and colleagues "warned in dire terms that a rumored move by the Bush administration to impose a new set of sanctions on the Stalinist state, could spell further bad news for the stalled six-party talks process."

Rice Warns Khartoum About Continued Attacks, Opposition To UN Force. The Washington Post (9/28, A20, Kessler, 748K) reports, "The United States is considering a series of punitive steps if the Sudanese government fails to agree to a U.N. peacekeeping force to end the violence in Sudan's Darfur region, U.S. officials said yesterday." Secretary Rice "signaled the new approach in a speech yesterday in which she demanded an immediate cease-fire and warned that Khartoum faces 'a choice between cooperation and confrontation.'" She "demanded yesterday that Khartoum accept the U.N. force. While the Darfur agreement will not be negotiated, she said, 'we are conferring with rebels who want peace.' Rice added: 'We are seeking to address their legitimate concerns, and we will support them if they choose peace. If the rebels refuse, then they will face serious consequences, including targeted U.N. sanctions.'" Rice's "speech to the African Society's National Summit on Africa held out the prospect of improved ties between the two countries," however, "relations have worsened dramatically in recent weeks."

The New York Times (9/28, Cooper, 1.21M) says Rice "raised the threat of more international sanctions against Sudan if the government did not stop military operations in the Darfur region and unconditionally accept a United Nations peacekeeping force." She is quoted saying, "If the Sudanese government chooses confrontation, …then the regime in Khartoum will be held responsible, and it alone will bear the consequences." She "was blunt during her speech, laying the blame for the bloodshed at the feet of [President Omar el-] Bashir's government," and she "challenged Mr. Bashir's authority to refuse the United Nations peacekeeping force."

DOJ_NMG_0070305

The AP (9/28, Gearan) reports she said Washington "will not sit still while innocent people are killed in Sudan's Darfur region." Rice "said Sudan's government could cooperate with the United Nations or face a confrontation. She warned of consequences if Sudan chose a fight and hinted at further U.N. penalties against the Khartoum government or rebel groups."

Hezbollah Facing Little Pressure To Disarm. The AP (9/28, Hendawi, Meyer) reports, "Six weeks after the end of the Lebanon war, the militant Hezbollah group is facing little on-the-ground pressure to give up its weapons and disarm -- despite a UN cease-fire resolution demanding just that." The AP adds, "The leaders of a UN peacekeeping force in south Lebanon say the job is not theirs. And Lebanon's ill-equipped army, some of whose soldiers wear tin-pot helmets and carry outdated M-16 rifles, shows no signs of diving into a confrontation with battle-hardened Hezbollah fighters."

Israel Releases Palestinian Deputy Premier After Five Weeks. The New York Times (9/28, Myre, 1.21M) reports, "An Israeli military court today released the Palestinian deputy prime minister, Nasser al-Shaer, one of more than 30 Hamas lawmakers and cabinet ministers who have been detained by the Israelis over the past three months." Shaer, the highest-ranking Palestinian in detention, was arrested on August 19 "but was not charged with any crime, and the court cited a 'lack of evidence' in ordering his release today." He "headed to his hometown of Nablus, in the West Bank, where he was greeted enthusiastically by supporters at a reception hall. However, the court said that for the next two weeks, Mr. Shaer would not be allowed to go to Ramallah, where his office is located and which serves as the Palestinian political headquarters in the West Bank." The Financial Times (9/28, Morris) says Shaer's "release was not viewed as a significant step in securing the freedom of [the kidnapped Israeli soldier]. Egyptian efforts to free the captive soldier have been complicated by internal tensions within the PA." And the AP (9/28, Daraghmeh) says "he detention of much of the Hamas-led government has been a major sore point in rapidly deteriorating relations between Israel and the Palestinians since Hamas took power." Shaer, "who did not run for parliament on the Hamas ticket but joined the government after the Islamic group's election victory, said he refused to talk politics in prison and denied he is a Hamas member."

State Dinner For Kazakh President Said To Highlight Conflicting Foreign Policy Goals. The New York Times (9/28, Myers, Greenberg, 1.21M) previews President Bush's state dinner tomorrow for Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbayez. The recent closure of "the two most prominent American democracy organizations working" in Astana "reflects the delicate balance the administration has struck with a country of growing strategic importance that has a record of corruption, flawed elections and rights violations, including the killings of two opposition leaders in the last year in disputed circumstances." Analysts say "Washington's failure to vocally criticize" such actions "also illustrates the Bush administration's willingness to sacrifice democracy, a centerpiece of its foreign policy, when it conflicts with other foreign policy goals." The Administration "has promoted democratic reforms in Kazakhstan for years, but it also appears eager to mollify a president who has been a comparatively moderate Muslim leader in Central Asia, who has allowed

USA Today (9/28, Slavin, 2.27M), meanwhile, runs a story titled "Kazakh Leader's Visit To Require Diplomatic Finesse," in which it says the visit has been "made awkward by the country's poor human rights record and questions about its commitment to democracy." Nazarbayev and Bush "will discuss energy, Kazakhstan's economy and efforts to fight terrorism and narcotics trafficking, the White House says." Bush also "will be 'encouraging Kazakhstan to accelerate progress on democratic reform,' says Frederick Jones, a spokesman for the National Security Council."

Mexico Criticizes Rice's Comments. The AP (9/28, Weissert) reports, "Mexico said Wednesday that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was out of line by suggesting that its democracy was just now maturing, saying it wasn't up to her to voice such opinions publicly." In a Monday interview with The Wall Street Journal's editorial board, Rice "said Mexico was beginning to put its disputed July 2 election behind it. 'Mexico has come through this crisis and I think it's been a real vote of confidence in the Mexican democratic system, which after all, is relatively -- it's just now maturing in a kind of two-party system,' Rice said." Ruben Aguilar, spokesman for President Vicente Fox, "said Wednesday that 'we shouldn't be surprised that other countries salute Mexican institutions,' but said Rice shouldn't comment on Mexican democracy. 'We don't agree with the declaration of the secretary of state because, in accordance with the construction of Mexico's political system, it's only up to Mexicans themselves to voice those opinions,' he said told a briefing for reporters at the presidential residence."

DOJ_NMG_0070306

China Asks US Senate To Drop Tariff Bill. The Financial Times (9/28, Beattie, Dickie) reports, "China's foreign ministry on Wednesday called on US senators to drop a bill that would impose 27.5 per cent tariffs on Chinese imports in retaliation for Beijing's alleged undervaluation of the renminbi." The ministry said, "We hope the US senators will view objectively and rationally the problems that have emerged in the process of rapid development of Sino-US trade...and will cease deliberation on a bill harmful to Sino-US economic co-operation.'"

NASA Chief Ends Trip To China, Says Joint Spaceflight Unlikely. The New York Times (9/28, Leary, 1.21M) reports, "Any joint human spaceflights involving China and the United States will have to come in the future when there is more trust and openness between the countries, the NASA administrator, Michael D. Griffin, said Wednesday. Speaking in Shanghai toward the end of the first visit to China by top officials from the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, Mr. Griffin said there were 'no current plans to work with China on the space shuttle and space station programs.' Mr. Griffin, who characterized the five-day visit as enjoyable and informative, said that it was too early to talk about any cooperative programs between the nations, but that the first steps probably would be in data sharing and some type of joint effort with robotic spacecraft."

LATimes Suggests China's Crackdown On Corruption Is Politically Motivated. The Los Angeles Times (9/28, 918K) editorializes, "The Chinese government wants its people to believe that no one is beyond the reach of its sweeping anti-corruption campaign. That is the message behind the sacking and detention of Shanghai's Communist Party leader, Chen Liangyu, on Sunday. But few in China or anywhere else are likely to buy the notion that this is a principled crackdown on corruption." Chen's "real misfortune is to be associated with former President Jiang Zemin's Shanghai power base at a time when President Hu Jintao is trying to consolidate his control, partly by emasculating Shanghai's power within the party." The Times adds, "Never mind that a self-proclaimed campaign against corruption can itself be corrupt if politically driven; it still can reap dividends." China "has an 'anything goes' frontier mentality that Californians of a bygone era might have recognized. That's not sustainable forever. Lawless frontiers are a great place to make a quick buck, but eventually the citizenry gets fed up and starts screaming for a sheriff — one who isn't just going after his political rivals."

Effectiveness Of Plan Colombia Scrutinized Following Police Unit Killings. The Christian Science Monitor (9/28, Harman, 58K) today continues its focus on members of an elite police unit who were killed in May in Jamundí. The Monitor says most of the officers were DEA-trained counternarcotics specialists who "had been killed by a military unit. Colombia's attorney general says the soldiers were on the narcotraffickers payroll." However, the Monitor reports John Walters says progress has been made against narcotraffickers with, as the Monitor puts it, the U.S. and Colombian governments "inexorably bound together in a multibillion dollar war against the drug trade." The Monitor continues by scrutinizing the effectiveness of Plan Colombia and writes that President Uribe said, "It is clear we cannot abandon Plan Colombia. But it is also clear that, in comparison to our efforts, we should be seeing better results."

Decision To Cancel Berlin Opera That Might Offend Muslims Draws Fire. The New York Times (9/28, Landler, 1.21M) reports, "Amid all the issues that divide Germany's Muslims and non-Muslims -- from women's rights to the teaching of Islam in schools -- there was one point on which the 30 participants in a landmark conference held here on Wednesday could agree, according to its organizer. They would like to see the Deutsche Oper of Berlin reinstate the Mozart opera it canceled earlier this week after receiving an anonymous threat that the production — which features a scene with the severed head of the Prophet Muhammad — could put the opera house at risk." The Times adds, "In some ways, the opera affair galvanized the meeting — underlining the urgency and complexity of the issues facing Germany, as it seeks to integrate a Muslim population that is growing in size and, in the view of some, growing farther apart from mainstream German society."

ABC World News (9/27, story 9, 1:25, Gibson) reported, "The fear in this case concerned how Muslims might respond to a depiction of Mohammed, in a Mozart opera, due to open in Berlin. It has touched off a raging controversy." ABC (Wright) added, "Berlin's Deutsche Opera took one look at protests over the Pope's recent comments about Islam. And the protests, before that, over the Danish cartoons of the prophet Mohammed. And they decided the German police might be right, that staging the opera would pose 'an incalculable security risk."

The Washington Times (9/28, Sands, 88K) reports that German Chancellor Angela Merkel "joined in the near-universal condemnation of Monday's decision by the Deutsche Oper, one of Berlin's three main opera houses, to cancel a planned revival of Mozart's classic 1781 work 'Idomeneo' because the production inserts a scene that displays the severed head of the prophet Muhammad." The Times adds, "The opera incident is just the latest in a string of cultural clashes that have bedeviled Europe in recent years, as the Continent's liberal democracies have struggled to adjust politically and culturally to large and growing Muslim minorities in their midst."

DOJ_NMG_0070307

Guatemalans Seek Closure Decades After Civil War. A front page story in the Washington Post (9/28, A1, Aizenman, 748K) reports, "A decade after the conclusion of the long civil war that ravaged this Central American nation, Guatemalans are literally trying to dig up their past." Dozens of forensic anthropologists "have been fanning out across the countryside to search for remains of the 200,000 people -- most of them Mayan Indian civilians -- who were killed or abducted during the 36-year conflict. Many were massacred by military forces and dumped into mass graves. Others were buried hurriedly in unmarked, secret locations by relatives anxious to avoid rampaging troops. … Meanwhile, in a cavernous, damp warehouse in Guatemala's capital, investigators wearing protective masks and surgical gloves are combing through piles upon piles of mildewed documents from a recently discovered secret police archive, hunting for clues to the fate of the disappeared."

Bill Clinton Seeks To Boost Britain's Labour Party. The Washington Times/AP (9/28, Gardiner) reports former President Bill Clinton "sought yesterday to boost Britain's badly divided Labor Party, warning supporters not to let it suffer the same fate as America's defeated Democrats." Delegates at Labor's "annual conference gave a celebrity's welcome to a leader they love far more than President Bush, who is widely despised in the party." Clinton "charmed a packed auditorium with a 40-minute speech in which he lavished praise on Prime Minister Tony Blair and treasury chief Gordon Brown, Mr. Blair's likely successor." In a reference "to the political damage that Mr. Blair suffered at home because of his relationship with Mr. Bush, Mr. Clinton thanked him for maintaining Britain's alliance with the United States 'through quite a lot of storm as well as occasional sunshine.'" The Times adds, "With the departing Mr. Blair, Labor's most successful leader ever, the party faces a perilous future. Infighting has tarnished its image, and the opposition Conservative Party is surging after nearly a decade in the doldrums."

Hoagland Warns US To "Be Careful" In Backing Ban For UN Secretary General. Jim Hoagland writes in the Washington Post (9/28, A23, 748K), "The 15 nations that will gather in New York today to conduct a straw vote on who is to be the next UN secretary general should reflect on a durable lesson of political life: Be careful what you wish for. You may get it. That warning of the dangers of answered prayers applies particularly to President Bush and his support for Ban Ki Moon, South Korea's reliably stolid foreign minister, in the highly competitive race to succeed Kofi Annan at year's end. Bush…may be picking up a lightning rod instead of a shield." Hoagland warns that the Bush team should be "careful in building expectations about what Ban's election would mean for US strategic interests. At a time when the United Nations itself needs defending and explaining to many skeptical audiences throughout the world, traditional diplomacy may not be the best qualification for a new secretary general."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Stubborn Day Fire Defies All Efforts."
"A Plan For Very Civil Disobedience."
"At Church, An 'ATM For Jesus.'"
"Iraq Impeding Efforts To Go After Shiite Militias, U.S. Military Says."
"Convicted As 'Tokyo Rose,' She Later Received Honors."
"In Governor's Race, It's The Democrat Under Attack Over Conservation."

USA Today:
"Big Cuts At NASA Threaten Aviation."
"Overseas Voting A Concern — Again."
"Baltimore Experiment Curbs Dropout Rate."

New York Times:
"New Hope For Democrats In Bid For Senate."
"U.S. Investigating Pirro's Talk Of Taping Spouse."
"For Kazakh Leader's Visit, U.S. Seeks A Balance."
"For the Third Time, A Jury Fails To Convict Gotti."
"As 2 Bushes Try To Fix Schools, Tools Differ."
"Mortgage Suit Says 'Trust Us' Led To Fleecing."

Washington Post:
"Exhuming The Past In A Painful Quest."
"House Passes Bill On Detainee Interrogation."
"Herndon Zeroing In On Illegal Immigrants."
"In Tribal Pakistan, An Uneasy Quiet."
"Heralded Iraq Police Academy A 'Disaster.'"
"Blessing And Blunt Warning From Mfume."

Washington Times:
"Project For Tysons Corner Would Double Size Of Mall."
"Owens Denies Suicide Attempt."
"U.S. To Wait 'A Few Weeks' On Iran Move."
"Bush Hosts Tense Dinner For Karzai, Musharraf."
"Berlin Opera At Center Of Free –Speech Debate."
"Dirty Birds Wear Out Welcome In Southern California."

Detroit Free Press:
"GM Says It Gets Short End Of Deal."
"'Thank God' For The Verdict."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Ballot Backup Will Cost Millions."

DOJ_NMG_0070308

"Jocks' Grad Rates Lag."
"School Siege Leaves 2 Dead."
"Weather Channel Ready To Take Heat On Global Warning."
"Bidders Reap Gens, Junk From 'Dead Letter Office.'"

Houston Chronicle:
"Study: Urgent Action Needed To Cut Air Toxics."
"Astros Pull Out All Stops To Extend Amazing Run."
"A City Pauses To Say Goodbye."
"Hailed By Poor , Brazil's Lula Riding High."
"Few At HISD's Failing Schools Utilize Free Tutor, Transfers."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Insurgent Ambush-Iraq; White House Under Fire-Increased Terrorism; Presidential Dinner; Owens's Hospitalized; 2008 Political Conventions; Allen Under Fire; Transfats Ban; Gunman At Colorado High School; Controversial Opera; Tokyo Rose Obit; Steve Irwin's Widow.
CBS: : White House Under Fire-NIE Report; Presidential Dinner; What Is Congress Doing?; Owens's Hospitalized; Gunman In Colorado High School; California Wildfires; 7 Eleven Drops Citgo; Transfats Ban; Transfats Ban-Analysis; Bob Schieffer-Opinion; Weightless Surgery; Powerball Winners.
NBC: Presidential Dinner; Insurgent Ambush-Iraq; White House Under-NIE Report; Transfats Ban; Transfats Ban-Analysis; Miami Airport Trains; Owens's Hospitalized; Stock Market; Tokyo Rose Obit; Boomeritis.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: CO-School Hostage Situation; House-Detainee Bill.
CBS: Bush-Karzai, Musharraf dinner; Poll Of Iraqis; CO-School Hostage Situation; Daniel Smith Death Investigation; FAA-Commercial Pilot Retirement Age.
NPR: CO-School Hostage Situation; Philippines-Typhoon Milenyo; House-Detainee Bill; Oil Prices; Rice-Iran Nukes; Bush-Karzai, Musharraf Dinner; Northwest-Flight Attendants Contract Talks; Wall Street.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Attends Deborah Pryce for Congress and Ohio Victory 2006 reception, private residence, New Albany, Ohio; receives a briefing on energy, Hoover Public Safety Center, Hoover, Ala.; makes statement on energy. Hoover, Ala.; attends Bob Riley for Governor reception, Birmingham Jefferson Convention Complex, Birmingham, Ala.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Speaks at a Jeff Lamberti for Copngress and Republican Party of Iowa luncheon, Wakonda Club, Des Moines, Iowa; speaks at a Dick DeVos for Governor reception, Oakfield hills Country Club, Bloomfield, Mich.; speaks at a Mike Whelen for Congress and Republican Party of Iowa breakfast, River Center Adler Theatre, Davenport, Iowa.

US Senate: 9:30 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on the Federal Voting Assistance Program. David S. C. Chu, undersecretary of Defense; Deborah L. Markowitz, president, National Association of Secretaries of State; Paul DeGregorio, chairman, U.S. Election Assistance Commission; Derek B. Stewart, GAO. Location: Room 222, Russell.

9:30 a.m. ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS _ Superfund and Waste Management Subcommittee. Hearing on S.3871 - Hazardous Waste Electronic Manifest Establishment Act. Location: Room 406, Dirksen.

9:45 a.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on peace prospects in Darfur. UN Amb. John Bolton. Location: Room 419, Dirksen.

10 a.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

10 a.m. BUDGET _ Full Committgee. Hearing on the economy and the budget. Council of Economic Advisers Chairman Edward Lazear; Kevin Hassett, AEI; Chris Edwards, Cato Institute; Peter Orszag, Brookings Institution. Location: Room 608, Dirksen.

10 a.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Aviation Subcommittee. Hearing on new aircraft in the national airspace system. Michael Cirillo, FAA; Nicholas Sabatini, FAA; Vern Raburn, Eclipse Aviation Corp.; Edward Iacobucci, DayJet Corp.; Jack Pelton, Cessna Aircraft Co.; Matt Andersson, CRA International. Location: Room 253, Russell.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Oversight of Government Management, the Fedceral Workforce and the District of Columbia Subcommittee. Hearing on terrorism preparedness within the national capital region. Bill Jenkins, GAO; Thomas Lockwood, director, Office of the National Capital Region, DHS; Eward Reiskin, deputy mayor of the District of Columbia for public safety and justice; Robert Crouch, assistant to the governor of Virginia for commonwealth preparedness; Dennis Schrader, director, Governor's Office of Homeland Security, State of Maryland; Fairfax County Executive Anthony Griffin. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. FINANCE _ Long-Term Growth and Debt Reduction Subcommittee. Hearing on how to keep the public debt from rising. Roberft Bixby, Concord Coalition; Peter Orszag, Brookings Institution; Chris Edwards, Cato Institute; former Rep. Charles Stenholm. Location: Room 215, Dirksen.

DOJ_NMG_0070309

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on pending matters. Closed. Location: Room 219, Hart.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10 a.m. Meets for legislative business. Highlights: H.R. 5825 - Electronic Surveillance Modernization Act.

9 a.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full committee. Closed. Briefing on worldwide problem areas. Location: Room H-405, Capitol.

10 a.m. AGRICULTURE _ Conservation, Credit, Rural Development and Research Subcommittee. Hearing on the EPA pesticide program. James B. Gulliford, Assistant Administrator, EPA; Jim Gray, North Dakota Department of Agriculture; Jay Vroom, President and CEO, CropLife America. Location: Room 1300, Longworth.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee. Hearing on the use of deceptive measure to obtain personal information, a practice called ``pretexting." Mark Hurd, H-P chairman and CEO; Patricia Dunn, former chairman of H-P; Ann Baskins, H-P general counsel; Kevin Hunsaker, H-P senior counsel; Anthony Gentilucci, H-P global security manager; Fred Adler, H-P computer security investigator; Larry Sonsini, H-P outside attorney; Joe Depante, owner of Action Research Group, Melbourne, Fla.; Ron DeLia, operator of Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc., Boston. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

10 a.m. FINANCIAL SERVICES _ Financial Institutions and Consumer Credit Subcommittee. Hearing on improving financial literacy. Elisse B. Walter, NASD; David S. Chernow, JA Worldwide; Ted Beck, National Endowment for Financial Education; Julie Cripe, Omnibank (Houston); David G. Kittle, Principle Wholesale Lending, Inc., Louisville; Carl Sorgatz, Hawthorne Community Credit Union, Napersville, Ill.; Donald D. Kittell, Securities Industry Association; Stephen Brobeck, Consumer Federation of America; Frank Pollack, Pentagon Federal Credit Union. Location: Room 2128, Rayburn.

10 a.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Full Committee. Hearing on reconstruction contracting in Iraq. Katherine Schinasi, GAO; Stuart Bowen, Jr., Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction; Deputy Assistant Army Secretary Tina Ballard; Joseph Tyler, Army Corps of Engineers; Amb. David Satterfield; James Bever, USAID; Ernest Robbins II, Parsons Infrastructure and Technology Group; Cliff Mumm, Bechtel Infrastructure Corp. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY _ Economic Security, Infrastructure Protection and Cybersecurity Subcommittee. Hearing on transit security training procedures. Location: Room 311, Cannon.

10 a.m. HOUSE ADMINISTRATION _ Full Committee. Hearing on electronic voting machines. Edward W. Felten, Princeton University; Gary Smith, election director, Forsyth County, Ga.; Barbara Simons, co-chairwoman, U.S. Public Policy Committee, Association for Computing Machinery; Keith Cunningham, election director, Allen County, Ohio; James Dickson, American Association of People with Disabilities; Michael I. Shamos, Carnegie Mellon University. Location: Room 1310, Longworth.

10 a.m. RESOURCES _ National Parks Subcommittee. Hearing on pending legislation. Location: Room 1324, Longworth.

10 a.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Railroads Subcommittee. Hearing on new directions at Amtrak. Amtrak President Alexander Kummant. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

10 a.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Health Subcommittee. Hearing on trends in force ands veteran health. Location: Room 334, Cannon.

10:30 a.m. EDUCATION AND THE WORKFORCE _ Employer-Employee Relations Subcommittee. Hearing on union representation for guards and national security implications. Janet Boston, organizer, Service Employees International Union; David W. Foley, President, Wackenhut Services, Inc.; David L. Hickey, International President, International Union, Security, Police, and Fire Professionals of America; William P. Schurgin, attorney, Seyfarth Shaw LLP, Chicago. Location: Room 2175, Rayburn.

10:30 a.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ International Terrorism and Nonproliferation Subcommittee. Hearing on Hezbollah's reach. Frank C. Urbancic Jr., State Department; John Kavanagh, FBI; Eitan Azani, Herzliya Interdisciplinary Center, Herzliya, Israel; Christopher Hamilton, Washington Institute for Near East Policy; Ilan Berman, American Foreign Policy Council. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

2 p.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Health Subcommittee. Hearing on Medicare physician payments. Dr. Dirk M. Elston, Geisinger Medical Center, Danville, Pa.; Dr. William Golden, American College of Physicians; Dr. Paul A. Martin, Dayton, Ohio; Dr. Albert W. Morris, Jr., President, National Medical Association; Dr. Thomas Russell, American College of Surgeons; Dr. Thomas J. Weida, American Academy of Family Physicians; Dr. Cecil B. Wilson, American Medical Association; Dr. Nicholas Wolter, American Medical Group Association; Dr. Byron Thames, AARP; Dr. Sallie S. Cook, American Health Quality Association. Location: Room 2322, Rayburn.

2 p.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Western Hemisphere Subcommittee. Hearing on Haiti. Thomas A. Shannon, assistant secretary of State; Adolfo A. Franco, USAID; Mark L. Schneider, International Crisis Group. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

2 p.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations Subcommittee. Hearing on the role of faith-based organizations in U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0070310

African operations. Terri Hasdorff, USAID; Ken Hackett, president, Catholic Relief Services; Edward Phillips, chairman, Eastern Deanery Community-Based Health Care and AIDS Relief Program; Ken Isaacs, Samaritan's Purse. Location: Room 2200, Rayburn.

2 p.m. SCIENCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on development of the Crew Exploration Vehicle. Scott Horowitz, NASA; Allen Li, GAO. Location: Room 2318, Rayburn.

Other: COUNTERFEITING _ The US Chamber of Commerce, others hold the Third Annual Anti-counterfeiting and Piracy Summit. Highlights: 9:35 a.m. USTR Susan Schwab. 3:30 p.m. Commerce Secretary Gutierrez discusses efforts to protect intellectual property. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

JUDICIARY _ Georgetown University Law Center holds a conference on the state of the judiciary. Highlights: 9 a.m. Retired Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. 9:15 a.m. Session on judicial independence, with C. Boyden Gray, others. 10 a.m. Session on judicial selection and removal with California Chief Justice Ronald George, Arizona Chief Justice Ruth McGregor, others. 12:15 p.m. Luncheon with speaker Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer. Law Center's Hotung Building, 550 1st St. NW. Media must use the Tower Green entrance. 1:45 p.m. Session on interbranch relations, with former Sen. Tom Dasachle, former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, former Sen. Warren Rudman, others. 7:30 p.m. Dinner with speaker Supreme Court Chief Justice John Roberts. Mandarin Oriental Hotel, 1330 Marhyland Ave. SW. Location: Georgetown University Law wCenter, 600 New Jersey Ave. NW., unless otherwise noted.

RELIGION _ The Catholic University Columbus School of Law holds a symposium on religion in the public square. Highlights: 1:30 p.m. Sen. Sam Brownback. Location: 2nd floor Slowinski Courtroom, 3600 John McCormack Rd. NE.

WOMEN-DEMOCRATS _ The women's Leadership Forum of the Democratic National Committee holds its 13th Annual National Issues Conference. Highlights: 12:15 p.m. Sen. Hillary Clinton, DNC Chairman Howard Dean and New York congressional candidate Kirsten Gillibranc speak. Location: Renaissance Mayflower Hotel, 1127 Connecticut Ave. NW.

KOSOVO _ 8:30 a.m. - 4:30 p.m. The American Council for Kosovo, Christian Solidarity International, and Religious Freedom Coalition, host a one-day conference, ``Reconsidering Kosovo." Issues to be examined include: Kosovo report card -- Europes ``Black Hole?; Organized crime, jihadism, and Kosovos impact on the War on Terror; 7 Human rights and religious freedom in an independent ``KosovA; Kosovos future status: impact on regional stability, international law, and other disputed regions." There will be a kKeynote address by Bishop Artemije of Raska and Prizren (Kosovo and Metohija), spiritual leader of Kosovos Christian Serbian community. Luncheon remarks by Rep. Trent Franks, R-Ariz. Speakers include: Doug Bandow , commentator; author of ``Foreign Follies: America's New Global Empire"; Former Special Assistant to President Ronald Reagan); Peggy Birchfield, Executive Director, Religious Freedom Coalition; Ambassador James Bissett, the last Canadian ambassador to Yugoslavia, and Julia Gorin, commentator; contributor, Jewish World Review, FrontPageMag.com. Location: Capitol Hill Club, Eisenhower Lounge, 300 First St. SE.

SEX TRAFFICKING SURVIVORS _ 9 a.m. The Department of Health and Human Services Administration for Children and Families sponsors a day-long conference on how to identify and support victims of sex trafficking. Highlights: 9 a.m. HHS Assistant Secretary for children and families Wade F. Horn, Amb. John R. Miller, members of Congress and survivors of human trafficking hold a news conference. Location: Holiday Inn Georgetown, 2101 Wisconsin Ave. NW.

BAUCUS-TRADE POLICY _ 8 a.m. Sen. Max Baucus addresses the Washington International Trade Association on the future of U.S. trade policy. Location: Hotel Washington, 515 15th St. NW.

KERRY-NATIONAL SECURITY _ 8:30 a.m. Johns Hopkins University's Nitze School of Advanced International Studies hosts briefing on ``National Security: A View from the Senate," with Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass. Location: Nitze School of Advanced International Studies, 1740 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

NO CHILD LEFT BEHIND _ 8:30 a.m. - 10 a.m. The National Journals Policy Council hosts a panel discussion on the impact of the No Child Left Behind Act on schools and recommendations for changes that should be made in next year's Congressional reauthorization. Participants: Keynote address by Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., ranking member, House Committee on Education and the Workforce. Panel discussion moderated by Andy Rotherham, co-founder and co-director, Education Sector, featuring Dr. Michael Cohen, President, Achieve Inc.; Dr. Rick Hess, Director of Education Policy Studies, American Enterprise Institute; Becky Pringle, Executive Committee, National Education Association; Bill Taylor, Chair, Citizens Commission on Civil Rights; and Ross Weiner, Principal Partner, The Education Trust. Location: Phoenix Park Hotel, Ballroom, 520 North Capitol St. NW.

GAS OUTLOOK _ 9:30 a.m. The Natural Gas Supply Association holds its 6th annual Winter Outlook media briefing. Location: Longworth Room, JW Marriott, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave, NW.

MILITARY READINESS _ 9:30 a.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies holds a program with Reps. John Murtha and Neil Abercrombie on the state of U.S. military readiness. Location: B-1 conference level, 1800 K St. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0070311

ELECTION-MUSLIMS _ 10 a.m. The Muslim American Society's Freedom Foundation holds a news conference to discuss its campaign for massive Muslim voter registration, education and mobilization for the November elections. Location: National Press Club.

GITMO-DETAINEES _ 10 a.m. David Cynamon, attorney for four remaining Kuwait detainees at Guantanamo Bay, holds a telephone briefing to discuss his trip to see his clients, share declassified notes and discuss the toll the imprisonment has taken on the men. Contacts: Christina Lycke, 202-973-1311. Notes: Callin number: 800-238-9007.

JUSTICE-WAINSTEIN _ 10 a.m. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales will deliver remarks at the swearing-in ceremony of Kenneth L. Wainstein as Assistant Attorney General for the new National Security Division. Location: The Great Hall, Department of Justice, 950 Constitution Ave. NW.

METH-RURAL _ 10 a.m. The Senate Democratic Policy Committee holds a panel discussion on the methamphetamine epidemic in rural America. Location: Room S-211, Capitol.

UNINSURED CHILDREN _ 10 a.m. Ron Pollack, Executive Director, Families USA, others, hold a press briefing to release a report showing that a majority of the more than 9 million children without health insurance in the United States live in two-parent families, and that in most of these two-parent families, both parents work. Location: National Press Club, First Amendment Room.

BOEHNER _ 10:30 a.m. House Majority Leader Rep. John Boehner holds an on-camera news conference. Location: House Radio-TV Gallery.

SMALL BUSINESS _ 10:30 a.m. Democratic members of the House Small Business Committee release their annual end of the year report. Location: House Radio-TV Gallery.

PELOSI _ 10:45 a.m. House Democratic leader Rep. Nancy Pelosi holds her weekly news conference. Location: Room H-206, Capitol.

ANTIWAR-BECHTEL _ 11:30 a.m. Iraq Vets Against the War and the UPRISE Counter-Recruitment Tour host an event during which Iraq veterans and their supporters will serve an ``eviction notice'' to Becthel Corporation ordering the to leave Iraq. Organizers say the believe Bechtel has unfairly profited from an immoral and unjust war. Location: Bechtel's corporate office, 1015 15th St. NW.

CHAO _ 11:30 a.m. Labor Secretary Chao addresses a joint meeting of the National Academies of Science and Engineering. Location: NAS Auditorium, 2101 Constitution Ave. NW.

CONGRESSIONAL BLACK CAUCUS _ 11:30 a.m. The Congressional Black Caucus holds a press conference after its meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to discuss Darfur. They will discuss Darfur, Hurricane Katrina next steps, HIV/AIDS, the midterm elections and issues relevant to the African American community, both domestic and international. Location: House Radio-TV Gallery. Notes: 5 minute photo spray at 9:30 a.m. in Room B-338, Rayburn.

LOCKHART-HOUSING _ 12 p.m. James Lockhart III, director, Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight (OFHEO), addresses a National Economists Club luncheon. Topic: ``The Current GSE Regulatory and Economic Environment and the Need for Reform. Lockhart will discuss current regulation of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. In this context, he will discuss the Enterprises role in the financial markets and the US economy. Location: Chinatown Garden Restaurant, 618 H St. NW.

GOVERNMENT SECRECY _ 12 p.m. - 2 p.m. The Association of American Publishers hosts a forum, ``Protecting Privacy, Challenging Secrecy, and Standing up for the First Amendment.'' Participants are ABC News reporters Brian Ross and Richard Esposito; New York Times reporter James Risen; journalist/author Mark Feldstein; and ``John Doe'' librarians from Connecticut. Location: National Press Club.

NAFTA _ 1 p.m. The Economic Policy Institute holds a telephone briefing with economists from th U.S., Mexico and Canda to discuss the North American Free Trade Agreement at 12 years. Contacts: Nancy Coleman, 202-775-8810.

MINIMUM WAGE _ 1:15 p.m. Reps. Steny Hoyer and George Miller hold a telephone briefing to call on Republicans to have a clean yes or note vote on raising the minimum wage. Contacts: Brad Woodhouse, 202-263-4575. Notes: Call in number: 888-325-3989; passcode: 2139490.

IMMIGRANTS-LITERACY _ 1:30 p.m. US Citizenship and Immigration Services Chief of Citizenship Alfonso Aguilar will participates in a panel on ``Literacy and the New American Immigrant at the 2006 Fall for the Book Festival. Location: Johnson Center, Dewberry Hall, George Mason University, 4400 University Drive, Fairfax, Va.

DEMOCRATS-MINIMUM WAGE _ 2 p.m. Senators Edward M. Kennedy, Dick Durbin, and Hillary Clinton will discuss the failure of this Congress to raise the minimum wage. They will be joined by AFL-CIO President John Sweeney and Julie Smith, a former minimum wage worker from Ohio. Location: Room 430, Dirksen Senate Office Building.

NORTH KOREA _ 4:30 p.m. Journalist Selig Harrison reports on his recent trip to North Korea, sponsored by the School of Advanced International Studies. Location: Auditorium, 1619 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

MOTHERHOOD _ 6 p.m. MomsRising.org group sponsors premiere of new documentary on the state of motherhood in America, with Sens. Hillary Clinton, Barack Obama, Edward Kennedy and Christopher Dodd. Location: Room 562, Dirksen.

RANGEL-FOREIGN SERVICE _ 6 p.m. Congressman Charles Rangel will introduce ten new Foreign Service officers who are graduates of the trail-blazing Charles B.

DOJ_NMG_0070312

Rangel International Affairs Program to improve diversity in the Department. The program is administered through Howard University. Location: Room 2354, Rayburn House Office Building.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Thursday, September 28, 2006 8:27 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Thursday, September 28, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips060928.pdf; dojclips060928.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

House Passes Detainee Bill As It Clears Senate Hurdle (NYT) 5
Rules For Terror Detainees Near Final Passage (USAT) 6
House Clears Way For Passage Of Military-tribunal Legislation (HILL) 7
House Approves Bill On Terror Detainees (AP) 8
US House Passes Controversial Bill On Terror Suspects (AFP) 10
House Approves Bill On Detainees (WP) 10
House Approves Bush Proposal On Tribunals For Gitmo Suspects (WT) 12
Detainee Bill Now Goes To Senate (LAT) 13
Rushing Off A Cliff (NYT) 15
Don't Suspend Habeas Corpus (LAT) 16
The White House Warden (LAT) 16
Judge Rejects Ashcroft's Immunity Claim (AP) 17
Domestic Spying Showdown Set For Detroit Court (FREEP) 18
Yassin Aref Takes The Stand (CAP9) 18

Patriot Act:

Terror Laws Cut Resettlement Of Refugees (NYT) 19
More Refugees Are Settling In Mid-Size Cities, Study Finds (WP) 20

Homeland Response:

Report To Criticize White House Over Local Effort In Terror Fight (WSJ) 21
Sources: Homeland Agent Who Made Cuts Is Out (NSDY) 22
Package Prompted D.C. Courthouse Evacuation (WP) 23
D.C. Courthouse Reopens After Bomb Scare (AP) 23
Crowded ERs Raise Concerns On Readiness (WP) 24
Chemical Plant Security (1 Letter) (NYT) 25
N.J. Congressman Asks For FBI Briefing Over 2001 Anthrax Scare (AP) 25
Johanns: Americans Shouldn't Take Safe Food Supply For Granted (BVND) 26

War News:

White House Refuses To Release Full NIE (AP-Y) 27
Dispute On Intelligence Report Disrupts Republicans' Game Plan (NYT) 28
Iraq And Jihad: A Consensus Surfaces (CSM) 29
White House Refuses To Release Full Report On Iraq, Terrorism (WSJ) 30
Iraq Report Is Due In '07; Skeptics Want To See It Now (NYT) 32
White House Holds Ground On Terror Study (LAT) 33
Lessons Of The NIE (WSJ) 34
A Good Estimate (WP) 35
Declassifying The Obvious (LAT) 36
Infidel Documents (WSJ) 37
The Grand Delusion (NYT) 39
At Dinner Table, Bush Plays Role Of Mediator (WP) 40
Bush Urges Karzai, Musharraf To Unite To Defeat Terrorism (WSJ) 41
Bush Plays Chaperon For Awkward Encounter (NYT) 42
Bush Hosts Tense Dinner For Karzai, Musharraf (WT) 43
Hold The Vinegar, Bush Urges (LAT) 45
Taliban Strikes On U.S. Troops Triple After Truce (WT/AP) ..46
In Tribal Pakistan, An Uneasy Quiet (WP) 48
Bush Urges Karzai, Musharraf To Put Terror Fight Before Feud (USAT/AP) 49
Nato 'must Speed Up Reaction' To Taliban (FT) 50
American Commanders Question Political Will Of Iraqi Prime Minister (WP) 50
Military Officials Add To U.S. Criticism Of Iraq's Government (NYT) 52
Iraq Impeding Efforts To Go After Shiite Militias, U.S. Military Says (LAT) 53

U.S. General Warns That Iraq Is Close To Dissolving Into Civil War (MCT) 55
Poll: Iraqis Back Attacks On U.S. Troops (AP) 56
U.S. To Gauge Iraqi Support For Operations (WP) 57
Rise In Violence Accompanies Ramadan (USAT/AP) 57
Cleric Said To Lose Reins Over Part Of Iraqi Militia (NYT) 58
Heralded Iraq Police Academy A 'Disaster' (WP) 60
Two Wars, One Mission (LAT) 61

DOJ:

Eid's Ethnicity An Asset, Not An Issue (DENP) 62

Corporate Scandals:

Dunn Suggests She Was Unaware Of Probe Tactics (WSJ) 63
Ex-H.P. Officer To Say She Knew Of No Illegality (NYT) 65
Ousted HP Chairwoman Says She Consulted Others In Leak Probe, Was Certain Methods Were Legal (FINDLAW/AP) 67
CEO Faces Gantlet At Hearings (USAT) 68
HP Leader Hurd Expected To Apologize At Hearing (USAT) 70
House Panel Expands Probe Of Hewlett-Packard Spying (HILL) 71
Between The Lines Of HP's Spy Scandal (WP) 72
Dunn And Dumber (WSJ) 73
A Fugitive's Haven In Africa Turned Out To Be Anything But (WSJ) 74
Former Chief Of Comverse Is Arrested In Namibia (NYT) 76
Fugitive CEO, Sought In Brooklyn, Captured In Namibia (FINDLAW/AP) 77
Former Comverse Chief Alexander Arrested In Namibia (Update5) (BLOOM) 78
Bondholders Seek $21.5 Million In Damages From BearingPoint Default (WP) 79
Regulators Urge Joint Action On Derivatives (FT) 80
Projects Under Scrutiny (HC) 81
Some Shocked At Sentence (HC) 82

Criminal Law:

Jeanine Pirro Under Criminal Investigation (WNBC-TV) 83
U.S. Investigating Pirro's Talk Of Taping Spouse (NYT) 84
AG Candidate Focus Of FBI Investigation (AP) 87
Gifted School Teacher Arrested On Pornography Charges (NSDY) 87
PIRRO'S FURY AT CHEATING AL (NYPOST) 88
Uh, Jeanine, Hope You Had Career Plan B (NYDN) 90
Pirro: Feds' Probe Is 'Highly Improper' (CBS2CHI) 91
U.S. Attorney's Office Fires Back At Pirro Accusations (WNBC-TV) 92
In The Murky World Of Marital Spying, Legal Pitfalls Await Those Who Tape A Spouse (NYT) 93
Kerik Is Again A Figure In An Official Investigation (NYT) 94
Judge Declares Another Mistrial In Gotti Racketeering Case (FINDLAW/AP) 95
For The Third Time, A Jury Fails To Convict Gotti (NYT) 96
Jury Tunes Out Tapes (NYDN) 98
MISTRIAL TEARS OF JOY FOR 'JR.' (NYPOST) 98
A THIRD MISTRIAL (NSDY) 99
Fuhgeddaboud Me Stayin' Here (NYDN) 100
Will Prosecutors Throw In Towel? (NSDY) 102
Thank Goodness For Fair Judge (NYDN) 103
For Theft Of Rare Maps, A Sentence Of 42 Months (NYT) 103
Map Dealer Dealt Prison Term In Thefts (BOS) 104
Antique Map Thief Gets 3 1/2-Year Jail Term (AP) 105
Baton Rouge Woman Pleads Guilty In FEMA Fraud Counts (BRADV) 105
FEMA Workers Charged With Fraud (NYT) 106
'It's Over,' Says Ex-prosecutor (DEN) 106
MARLINGA ACQUITTED: 'Thank God' For The Verdict (FREEP) 107
Judgment For Marlinga (FREEP) 109
Figure In New Orleans Corruption Probe Avoids Prison (AP) 109
Feds Ask Judge To Shield Evidence In Probe Of Fumo, Nonprofit (SCCD) 110
Judge Bars Full Gag On Fumo Case Info (PHI) 111
Prosecutor Says U.S. Probe Of Fumo To End This Year (PHI) 112
2 Ad Men Admit Pay-to-play Scheme (PHI) 112
Polygamist Sect Leader Will Stay Jailed (AP) 113
Jeffs' Attorney Says Case Is 'religious Persecution' (SGS) 114
Jeffs In Jail Until November (DESERET) 115
Warren Jeffs Trial: Witness Set To Testify In Rape Case (SLT) 116
Judge Urged Not To Release Intel Reports (AP) 117
House Suspends Hill Telecom License (WP) 117
House Reviews Foxcom License (RC) 118
Woman Charged In Porn Case (PTR) 119
Town's Residents Say They Were Targets Of Big Mortgage Fraud (WSJ) 120
Mortgage Suit Says 'Trust Us' Led To Fleecing (NYT) 122
Good Cybercitizens Keep Watch Over ID-theft Victims (USAT) 124
Louisiana Renews Call For Dicks' Extradition (FT) 126
2nd Emergency Crime Law Eyed (WT) 127
Karr Lawyers Ask To Have Porn Charges Dropped (USAT) 128

DOJ_NMG_0070316

Sex Offender Admits Killing Teen In NE (WP).....128
Mid Now Faces Rape Charges (BSUN).....129
Former Soldier Charged With Smuggling Machine Guns (ARMYT).....131
Prison For Man Who Assaulted Feds (PTR).....131
Inmate Who Assaulted Federal Deputy Gets 17-year Prison Sentence (PPG).....131
Man Helped By Priests Is Charged With Fraud (NYT).....132
Crime Lab Probe Tab To Grow By $1.5 Million (HC).....133
Some Lethal Injections May Have Been 'Excruciating' (LAT)133

Civil Law:

S.J. Nursing Home Guilty Of Defrauding Medicare (MERCN)134
House Panel Moves FOIA Bill Forward (AP-Y).....135
Court Doesn't Intervene In 'Electioneering' Case (RC).....135

Civil Rights:

Discrimination Case Opens Door To Internet ADA Claims (LAW).....136
Voting Is Tricky Mission For Troops Waiting For Ballots In Battlefield (USAT).....137
Overseas Voting A Concern — Again (USAT).....138
Restore Voter Confidence (USAT).....138

Antitrust:

Mittal Prefers To Sell Weirton (BSUN).....139
Federated Stores Says Icahn Plans To Increase Stake (Update4) (BLOOM).....140
Judge Dismisses Key Part Of AMD Antitrust Lawsuit Against Intel, Sets Trial Date (FINDLAW/AP).....141
Symantec: Microsoft Won't Give Us Key Vista Tech (CNET)142
Johnson & Johnson Charges Leak To Competitor Subverted $24B Acquisition (LAW).....143
E.On Closes In On Endesa Deal (WSJ).....144
Rural Areas Left In Slow Lane Of High-Speed Data Highway (NYT).....145
Cable Guys (WSJ).....147

Environment/Indian Affairs:

No Charges In Sound Oil Spill (SEAPI).....148
State's Greenhouse Gas Bill Signed (LAT).....150
California: Schwarzenegger Signs Gas Emissions Act (NYT/AP).....151
Warming Trend Is Hatching A Business (WP).....151
Heed This Warning (WP).....153
Number Of Smoggy Days Falls, Study Says (WP).....154
American Indians Await Trial On Lawsuit (AP-Y).....154
FBI Agent (DESERET).....155

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Chargers Safety Kiel Arrested On Drug-Related Charges (ESPN).....156
Chargers' Kiel Arrested For Trafficking Of Prescription Drugs (BLOOM).....156
Kiel Is Arrested In Cough Syrup Case (AP).....157
Charger Kiel Admits Shipping Illegal Drugs (UPI).....157
DEA: Kiel Arrest Linked To Codeine Diversion (SDUT).....158
Feds Arrest Chargers Safety During PracticeInvestigators Say Packages Shipped By Kiel Contained Controlled Substance (KNBC).....159
Feds Reveal Details About Charger Drug Arrest (KNSD-TV)160
Feds Rounding Up Suspected Immigrant Drug Dealers (ADN).....161
Bill To Criminalize Border Tunneling Easily Finds Support (SDUT).....161
Plan Colombia: Big Gains, But Cocaine Still Flows (CSM)..162

Immigration:

Armey Blasts Republicans Over Opposition To Guest-worker Plan (MCT).....165
Visas For Skilled Workers Still Frozen (WP).....166
In Immigrant Fight, Grass-Roots Groups Boost Their Clout (WSJ).....167
Herndon Zeroing In On Illegal Immigrants (WP).....170

Tax:

How Merck Saved $1.5 Billion Paying Itself For Drug Patents (WSJ).....171

Congress-Administration:

Congress To Approve Defense Bill Rivaling Vietnam-Era Spending (WSJ).....174
Costs Of The Wars In Iraq And Afghanistan Could Reach $549 Billion (MCT).....175
109th Congress Gets Props For Creativity, If Nothing Else (WP).....176
Bush Visits Hill To Rally Senate Troops Before Election (HILL).....177
As 2 Bushes Try To Fix Schools, Tools Differ (NYT).....177
Connecticut Lawsuit Is Cut Back (NYT).....179
Judge Dismisses Most Of No Child Lawsuit (AP).....180
Key Democrats Blast GOP For Failure To Rein In Budget (MCT).....180
Nov. 15 Set For Vote On House GOP Leaders (HILL).....181
Boehner Looks Secure In 110th (RC).....183
'Concern' In Murtha Camp (HILL).....184
Big Cuts At NASA Threaten Aviation (USAT).....185

DOJ_NMG_0070317

Veterans' Group Wants Larger Raise For Military (WP).....186
Goodbye, Dr. Frist (HILL).....187
With Love To Dear Ol' Dad (WP).....188
How To Deploy Paulson Might Be Bush's Biggest Economic Policy Decision (WSJ).....190
Prescription For A Stronger F.D.A. (NYT).....192

Other News:

11,722.98 (USAT).....192
Blue Chips Inch Closer To Record (WSJ).....193
Orders For Big-ticket Items Fall, Indicating Cooling Economy (USAT).....194
Durable-Goods Orders Fall But New-Home Sales Rise; A Hard Or Soft Landing? (WSJ).....195
Report Shows Home Sales Rising, But Skeptics Abound (NYT).....196
Hispanic Unemployment Down, Study Finds (WP).....197
The Reliable Source (WP).....198
John Danforth (CSM).....199
Danforth Warns Of Christian Right But Says Tide Will Turn (WP).....200
Big Openings For Democrats (RC).....201
A Forfeited Battleground District (WP).....202
Democrats Decide They Don't Need 'Contract' To Win (RC)204
Warning: Races May Not Be As Close As They Appear (RC)205
Calls Grow For Release Of Intelligence Report (WSJ).....206
House GOP Pushes Its 'Suburban Agenda' (WT).....207
New Hope For Democrats In Bid For Senate (NYT).....208
Controversy Clouds Allen's Re-election Bid (USAT).....209
Webb Denies Ever Using Word As Epithet (WP).....210
Is There Life After 'Macaca'? (WSJ).....212
A Platform Of Bigotry (NYT).....213
Tennessee Battles For Senate (WT).....214
Mfume Endorses Cardin, But Adds Caveat (WP).....215
The Democrats' Charisma Doctor (WP).....217
Inside Politics (WT).....218
Arnold's Turnaround (WP).....220
Democrats Follow Clinton's Lead In Ripping Fox News (WT)221
Giuliani Comes To Clinton's Defense Over Terrorism Preparedness (BRAH).....222
Is There Life After 'Macaca'? (WSJ).....222
AIDS Bill Is Dilemma For Clinton (HILL).....224
Bill Clinton's 60th Birthday Benefit Blowout (WP).....226
Twin Cities To Host 2008 GOP Convention (AP).....226
Republicans Pick Twin Cities For 2008 Presidential Convention (MCT).....228
GOP Picks Minnesota For 2008 Convention (USAT).....229
GOP To Go To Minnesota (HILL).....230
G.O.P. Picks Twin Cities As '08 Site Of Convention (NYT)...230
With Eye On Midwest In '08, GOP Picks Twin Cities For Convention (WP).....231
GOP Will Convene In Battleground (RC).....232
RNC Picks Twin Cities For 2008 (WT).....233
Scientists Form Group To Support Science-Friendly Candidates (NYT).....233
Checkout For An Undemocratic Checkoff (WP).....234
The Road To Inefficiency (WP).....235
Oh, No, Low Prices (WSJ).....236
Ahmadinejad: We Won't Forgo Nuke Rights (AP).....236
Iran, EU Negotiators Hold Nuclear Talks (AP).....237
U.S. To Wait 'A Few Weeks' On Iran Move (WT).....238
Mr. Buffett's Excellent Idea (NYT).....238
Egypt Developing Nuclear Energy Program (MCT).....239
Envoy: Nuclear Talks Enter Crucial Phase (AP).....240
US Warns Against North Korea Nuclear Test (AFP).....241
U.S. Weighs Moves Against Sudan Over U.N. Force (WP)...242
Rice Says Sudan Could Face More Sanctions Over Darfur (NYT).....243
Rice Calls For Cease-fire In Darfur (AP).....244
Little Pressure On Hezbollah To Disarm (AP-Y).....244
Israel Releases High-Ranking Hamas Official (NYT).....246
Israeli Military Court Frees Hamas Deputy PM (FT).....247
Israel Releases Palestinian Deputy PM (AP).....247
For Kazakh Leader's Visit, U.S. Seeks A Balance (NYT).....249
Kazakh Leader's Visit To Require Diplomatic Finesse (USAT).....250
Mexico Chides Rice For Political Remarks (AP-Y).....251
China Asks US To Drop Tariff Bill (FT).....252
NASA Chief, On First China Trip, Says Joint Spaceflight Is Unlikely (NYT).....253
Chinese Corruption Or Competition? (LAT).....253
At German Conference On Muslim Relations, One Vote Is Unanimous: Mozart Must Go On (NYT).....254
Exhuming The Past In A Painful Quest (WP).....255
Clinton Warns Divided Labor (WT/AP).....257
Risky Wishes At The U.N. (WP).....258

DOJ_NMG_0070318

TERRORISM NEWS:

House Passes Detainee Bill As It Clears Senate Hurdle (NYT)

By Carl Hulse, Kate Zernike

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 27 — Congress took major steps on Wednesday toward establishing a new system for interrogating and trying terror suspects as the House approved legislation sought by President Bush and the Senate defeated efforts to alter the measure.

The House, in a politically charged decision, voted 253 to 168 in favor of extensive new rules governing the questioning of terror suspects and bringing them before military tribunals. The Senate was expected to follow suit on Thursday, which would deliver Republicans a major national security victory before the elections.

"The time to act is now," said Senator Bill Frist, the majority leader, as he opened Senate debate after reaching a deal with Democrats who agreed not to stand in the way of a final vote on the bill in exchange for consideration of amendments.

In the House, 219 Republicans and 34 Democrats, many in more competitive districts, supported the bill; 160 Democrats and 7 Republicans opposed it; the opponents included the Democratic leadership and major party voices on the military and intelligence issues.

Republicans immediately sought to portray the vote as a defining one between the two parties. "It is outrageous that House Democrats, at the urging of their leaders, continue to oppose giving President Bush the tools he needs to protect our country," said Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the majority leader.

But Democrats said the legislation would reverse fundamental American values by allowing seizure of evidence in this country without a search warrant, allowing evidence obtained through cruel and inhuman treatment, and denying relief or appeal to people like Maher Arar, whom the United States sent to Syria for interrogation that included torture even after the Canadian government told American officials he was not a terrorist.

"This is un-American, this is unconstitutional, this is contrary to American interests, this is not what a great and good and powerful nation should be doing," said Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont.

Backers of the measure said the legislation, which was sought by Mr. Bush after the Supreme Court in June struck down the administration's system for trying detainees, would guarantee terror suspects adequate rights while not hindering interrogations.

"We are dealing with the enemy in war, not defendants in our criminal justice system," said Representative Duncan Hunter, Republican of California and chairman of the Armed Services Committee. "In time of war it is not practical to apply the same rules of evidence that we apply in civil trials or courts martial for our troops."

Leading Democrats said the approach would result in government-sanctioned mistreatment of detainees. They predicted it would be again thrown out by the Supreme Court, leaving the United States remaining without a system to try terrorists after a wait that has already extended five years beyond Sept. 11, 2001.

"If you want to be tough on terrorists, let's not pass something that rushes to judgment and has legal loopholes that will reverse a conviction," said Representative Ike Skelton of Missouri, senior Democrat on the Armed Services Committee.

Fellow Democrats said the measure could be interpreted by other nations as reducing America's commitment to the rights of prisoners of war.

"When our moral standing is eroded, our international credibility is diminished as well," said Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the No. 2 Democrat in the House.

Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the senior Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, characterized the bill as the product of an administration that "has been relentless in its determination to legitimize the abuse of detainees."

But Republicans argued repeatedly that the nation is facing a faceless and brutal enemy that lurks in the shadows, requiring a new way of thinking on the part of the United States and giving new importance to the ability to freely interrogate them.

"Information is the key weapon we have to prevent them from killing us and prevent them from attacking others in the future," said Representative Mac Thornberry, Republican of Texas, who said he worried the measure might go too far in tying the hands of American operatives.

The House debate was interrupted repeatedly by protesters in the gallery, who were removed by security workers.

The bill was a compromise worked out between the White House and three Senate Republicans who for weeks had resisted the administration's approach. They contended the White House's initial bill would violate the Constitution and redefine the nation's obligations under the Geneva Conventions, signaling to other nations that they too could rewrite the rules on dealing with combatants seized in wartime.

The intraparty rift had threatened to derail Republican hopes to champion theirs as the party of national security, but before the debate began, Mr. Frist smilingly declared, "Republicans united." Mr. Bush accepted Mr. Frist's invitation to meet with Republican senators on Thursday morning as they prepared to vote to rally their support and build their spirits before Republicans hit the campaign trail.

Democrats had stayed mainly on the sidelines during the fight among Republicans, but the pending votes in the House and Senate have forced them to take firm positions on the bill. Senate Democrats did allow a vote to go forward, escaping criticism that they were obstructing the measure, and thus denying Republicans a potential political hammer.

House Democrats were prevented from offering any amendments. Under the Senate agreement, Democrats were allowed four proposed amendments. One, by Mr. Levin, would have adopted the approach endorsed by the Armed Services Committee and the three Republicans who resisted the Bush administration: Senators John Warner of Virginia, John McCain of Arizona, and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina. It failed on a 54-to-43 vote, with two Democrats, Senators Mary L. Landrieu of Louisiana and Ben Nelson of Nebraska, crossing party lines.

Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and chairman of the Judiciary Committee, pressed an amendment that would strike a provision from the bill that prohibits terror suspects from challenging their detention in the courts. "What the bill seeks to do is set back basic rights by some 900 years," said Mr. Specter, who traced the ability to challenge one's detention to the Magna Carta.

Concerned the legislation was being rushed through before an election without most senators understanding what was in the final version, Democratic Senators Robert C. Byrd of Virginia and Barack Obama of Illinois planned to offer a sunset provision that would require Congress to review the military commissions, as the trials are known, in five years.

Republicans said they were confident they could hold off any changes when the remaining amendments come up for a vote on Thursday.

While Republicans were nearing success on a key element of their agenda with the terrorism bill, disputes among top Republicans in the House and Senate were threatening other measures they hoped to pass, particularly a domestic security spending bill and a Pentagon policy bill. Lawmakers were scrambling to resolve the differences to avoid leaving the bills on the shelf. They have already abandoned efforts to strike a final agreement on a measure governing a National Security Agency surveillance program, though the House is scheduled to consider the bill on Thursday.

Rules For Terror Detainees Near Final Passage (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — Legislation setting rules for the interrogation and trial of terrorism suspects passed the House on Wednesday and is headed for Senate approval today, as Congress tries to balance national security needs with the rights of prisoners.

The bill would permit creation of military tribunals to try terrorism suspects such as alleged 9/11 mastermind Khalid Sheikh Mohammed and others now held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. It also would allow President Bush to claim a legislative victory on national security 40 days before the Nov. 7 elections.

Bush hailed the 253-168 House vote as an important step to "help keep the country safe."

DOJ_NMG_0070320

The legislation was required after the Supreme Court ruled in June that Bush's previous plan for trials was unconstitutional. It reflects a compromise between the White House and three prominent Republican senators — John Warner of Virginia, John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina — who forced key changes.

Final action on another measure that Bush says he needs to fight terrorism, legislation authorizing a telephone surveillance program, has been delayed until after Election Day because of disagreements among Republicans.

Proponents of the bill the House passed Wednesday said it will provide CIA interrogators with clear rules and foreign detainees with a chance to appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court. "It gives more rights to these people than they get under any other regime in the world," said Rep. Dan Lungren, R-Calif.

Critics said it does not put enough checks on the power of the military and the White House to detain foreign terrorism suspects indefinitely, without having to present evidence of their guilt.

"From my family's personal experience, I know what can happen to the rights of Americans when an administration overreaches in time of war," said Rep. Doris Matsui, D-Calif. She was born at an internment camp where her parents and other Japanese-Americans were confined during World War II.

The bill classifies nine serious offenses against prisoners, including torture, as war crimes. McCain has said the legislation will ban extreme tactics such as "water boarding," in which a person is made to believe he is about to be drowned.

Rep. Jane Harman of California, the top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, said the bill doesn't give Congress adequate authority to monitor the CIA's interrogation program. "I remain very skeptical," she said.

In the Senate, Democrats were pushed back in their first attempt Wednesday to alter the bill. They plan to offer more amendments today. Bill opponents conceded that many lawmakers will be leery of casting a vote that could be criticized as soft on terrorism by their campaign opponents. "I think the closeness of the election has an effect," said Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the top Democrat on the Armed Services Committee.

House Clears Way For Passage Of Military-tribunal Legislation (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen, Roxana Tiron

The Hill, September 28, 2006

Republicans and Democrats in the Senate struck a deal yesterday that appeared to clear the way for the enactment of a controversial military-tribunal bill. The agreement positions the GOP to claim a significant legislative achievement, and perhaps an important political victory, before lawmakers leave town to campaign for reelection.

"If the Democrats oppose it, it will be to their political detriment," Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) said.

The House yesterday passed the bill, 252-168, with 34 Democrats voting for it and seven Republicans voting against it. The Senate was considering identical but separate legislation, meaning that one chamber would still have to pass the other chamber's version of the bill for it to be sent to the president.

Senate Democrats agreed to expedite consideration of the measure, which would establish a trial system for unlawful enemy combatants and provide more-detailed definitions of war crimes in order to protect nonmilitary intelligence officials from being prosecuted for using certain techniques to interrogate terror suspects.

"We are trying to pass a good bill and we worked on a good bill," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.).

In return, Republicans agreed to allow five amendments to be offered on the floor, four by Democrats and one by Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.).

The bill itself is the product of a compromise between the White House and a band of recalcitrant Senate Republicans led by John Warner (Va.), John McCain (Ariz.) and Lindsey Graham (S.C.), who initially differed from the president on the use of classified evidence against terrorism suspects, the treatment of detainees under the Geneva Conventions and the War Crimes Act, and other issues.

The administration ended its program for trying unlawful enemy combatants in June when the Supreme Court deemed it to be unconstitutional.

House Democrats warned that the new legislation, written by Republicans, could also be challenged in the courts.

DOJ_NMG_0070321

"Our nation cannot afford to have any terrorist convictions overturned on judicial appeal," said Rep. Ike Skelton (Mo.), the top Democrat on the Armed Services Committee. "We should be taking the time to get this done right, not rushing through the process in an election-year frenzy."

They also said the measure could endanger American troops by giving the administration too much latitude to interrogate terror suspects.

"Agreeing to such an ambiguous compromise would allow the president to define torture when and how he sees fit and would undoubtedly put our armed forces at risk of abuse while doing little to obtain the intelligence we need from terrorists currently detained," said Rep. Ellen Tauscher (D-Calif.).

Republicans argued that the legislation is an important piece of the administration's arsenal for combating terrorism.

"By formally establishing terrorist tribunals, the bill provides another critical tool in fighting the war on terror. And it provides a measure of justice to the victims of 9/11," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said.

"The American people can't afford to wait. Even though we are in the midst of an election year, this issue – the safety and security of the American people – should transcend partisan politics. The time to act is now," he said.

In the Senate, Democrats were expected to seek votes on their amendments, including one offered by Carl Levin (Mich.), the ranking Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, that would substitute a version of the bill approved by that panel, and one offered by Sen. Robert Byrd (D- W.Va.), that would end the president's authority to conduct the tribunals after five years. The Senate turned back the Levin amendment late yesterday afternoon.

Frist confidently predicted that none of the amendments would pass.

"We'll be able to defeat those," he said.

"We wanted to keep it as clean as possible," Frist spokeswoman Carolyn Weyforth said.

House Approves Bill On Terror Detainees (AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, September 27, 2006

The House approved legislation Wednesday giving the Bush administration authority to interrogate and prosecute terrorism detainees, moving President Bush to the edge of a pre-election victory with a key piece of his anti-terror plan.

The mostly party-line 253-168 vote in the Republican-run House prompted bitter charges afterward by House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., that opposition Democrats were coddling terrorists, perhaps foreshadowing campaign attack ads to come. Democrats responded that the GOP leader was trying to provoke fear.

Even as the House debated the bill, senators of the two parties agreed to limit debate on their own nearly identical measure, all but ensuring its passage on Thursday.

Republican leaders are hoping to work out differences and send Bush a final version before leaving Washington this weekend to campaign for the Nov. 7 congressional elections.

The legislation would establish a military court system to prosecute terror suspects, a response to the Supreme Court ruling in June that Congress' blessing was necessary. While the bill would grant defendants more legal rights than they had under the administration's old system, it nevertheless would eliminate rights usually granted in civilian and military courts.

The measure also provides extensive definitions of war crimes such as torture, rape and biological experiments — but gives Bush broad authority to decide which other techniques U.S. interrogators can legally use. The provisions are intended to protect CIA interrogators from being prosecuted for war crimes.

For nearly two weeks, the GOP has been embarrassed as the White House and rebellious Republican senators have fought publicly over whether Bush's plan would give him too much authority. But they struck a compromise last Thursday, and Republicans are hoping approval will bolster their effort to cast themselves as strong on national security, a marquee issue this election year.

In a statement issued after the vote, Bush, who will visit GOP senators Thursday morning, urged the Senate to approve the measure and congratulated the House for its "commitment to strengthening our national security."

DOJ_NMG_0070322

Hastert's comments were biting. He said in a statement that Democrats supporting the measure "voted today in favor of MORE rights for terrorists."

He added, "So the same terrorists who plan to harm innocent Americans and their freedom worldwide would be coddled, if we followed the Democrat plan."

In response, Pelosi, D-Calif., said Democrats feared the House-passed measure could endanger U.S. soldiers by encouraging other countries to limit the rights of captured American troops. She said the bill would be vulnerable to being overturned by the Supreme Court.

"Speaker Hastert's false and inflammatory rhetoric is yet another desperate attempt to mislead the American people and provoke fear," she said, adding that Democrats "have an unshakable commitment to catching, convicting and punishing terrorists who attack Americans."

During the debate, House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, all but dared Democrats to vote against the legislation.

"Will my Democrat friends work with Republicans to give the president the tools he needs to continue to stop terrorist attacks before they happen, or will they vote to force him to fight the terrorists with one arm tied behind his back?" Boehner asked just before members cast their ballots.

Democrats said they wanted to tone down the powers the bill would give to Bush and the limits it would impose on terror-war suspects' abilities to defend themselves during trials.

Said Dennis Kucinich, D-Ohio: "This bill is everything we don't believe in."

Overall, 219 Republicans and 34 Democrats vote for the legislation while 160 Democrats, seven Republicans and one independent voted against it.

During the often partisan debate, some Democrats contended the bill would approve torture.

"All Americans want to hold terrorists accountable, but if we try to redefine the nature of torture, whisk people into secret detention facilities and use secret evidence to convict them in special courts, our actions do in fact embolden our enemies," said Rep. Jim Moran, D-Va.

Others vehemently opposed language that would give the president wide latitude to interpret international standards of prisoner treatment and bar detainees from going to federal court to protest their treatment and detention under the right of habeas corpus. Supporters of the bill have said eliminating habeas corpus was intended to keep detainees from flooding federal courts with appeals.

The bill also gives the president the ability to interpret international standards for prisoner treatment when an act does not fall under the definition of a war crime, such as rape and torture.

"It gives too much leeway to the president," said Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa. "And I think when you tamper with the Geneva Conventions ... you hurt our ability to protect the troops."

Republicans defended the measure as sound.

"Is it perfect? No," said Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart, R-Fla. "Do we have an obligation to pass it? Yes."

Republicans said time was critical so that terrorists could be brought to justice.

Lawmakers shrugged off multiple disruptions from citizens watching the floor debate from inside the Capitol.

As the House finished its bill, Senate leaders agreed to limit debate on their version of the measure. Four Democrats and Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., were given opportunities to offer amendments in the Senate, but all were expected to be rejected.

"Until Congress passes this legislation, terrorists ... cannot be tried for war crimes in the United States and the United States risks fighting a blind war without adequate intelligence," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn. "That's simply unacceptable."

One amendment by Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., defeated 54-43, would have replaced the Senate measure with the version maverick GOP senators pushed through the Armed Services Committee two weeks ago before striking a deal with Bush. The White House had promised to block that committee bill, which was written by GOP Sens. John McCain of Arizona, John Warner of Virginia and others, contending it would force an end to the CIA interrogation program.

Specter's amendment would strike the provision in the bill barring detainees from filing habeas corpus petitions.

DOJ_NMG_0070323

US House Passes Controversial Bill On Terror Suspects (AFP)

By Charlotte Raab

AFP, September 27, 2006

The US House of Representatives passed a controversial bill setting out the rules for the detention, treatment and prosecution of "war on terror" suspects, virtually assuring it will become law.

After a few hours of debate, the bill, which critics say violates human and constitutional rights, was passed in a 253-168 vote. The Republican majority had blocked opposition Democrats from presenting any amendment.

The proposed law, which US President George W. Bush calls a critical tool for the battle against terrorism, was headed for swift passage by the Senate, expected by Thursday at the latest.

The hard-fought House victory was crucial for the Bush administration six weeks ahead of legislative elections, where his Republican Party risks losing control of both chambers of Congress.

Bush administration officials have pushed approval of the deal before Congress recesses at the end of this week.

The sweeping legislation sets guidelines to interrogate war-on-terror suspects and would send several hundred inmates held at the US naval base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba to trial after years of detention.

Since the detention camp opened in 2001, after the September 11 terrorist attacks, not one of the several hundred prisoners has been afforded a trial.

The draft law authorizes special tribunals to prosecute the Guantanamo detainees, allows for secret CIA-run prisons and forbids "cruel and unusual" punishment of detainees -- without further clarification of what falls in that category.

Detainees would be deprived of all legal recourse to protest the conditions of their detention.

Critics charge that Bush merely wants legal cover to allow interrogators to continue using "alternative" methods of questioning that reportedly include a simulated drowning technique known as "waterboarding," sleep deprivation, and subjecting suspects to extreme temperatures.

"This bill is a drastic step backwards for human rights," said Caroline Frederickson, a director of the American Civil Liberties Union.

House Minority leader Nancy Pelosi argued against the measure, saying "permitting indefinite detention under conditions that cannot be challenged in court is contrary to our history and values."

The California Democrat predicted the US Supreme Court would strike down the almost-certain new law.

But Republicans praised the effort.

"House Republicans have worked hard to create a system that will protect our troops on the battlefield, while also conforming to international laws and treaty obligations," said House Speaker Dennis Hastert.

The bill, a compromise reached after bitter debate between the White House and a handful of Republican senators opposed to torture, was expected to be approved late Wednesday or Thursday in the Senate, where the opposition has pledged not to interfere.

The Senate debate was expected to last 10 hours at most, according to the terms of an agreement reached early Wednesday between Republican and opposition lawmakers.

Only five amendments were to be presented, but they almost certainly would be rejected, which would mean the text would be signed into law just weeks ahead of the November 7 legislative elections.

House Approves Bill On Detainees (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

The House approved an administration-backed system of questioning and prosecuting terrorism suspects yesterday, setting clearer limits on CIA interrogation techniques but denying access to courts for detainees seeking to challenge their imprisonment at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and elsewhere.

DOJ_NMG_0070324

The 253 to 168 vote was a victory for President Bush and fellow Republicans. Bush had yielded some ground during weeks of negotiations, but he fully embraced the language that the House approved with support from 34 Democrats and all but seven Republicans.

Senators also began debating the measure yesterday and defeated, along party lines, a Democratic-sponsored amendment that would have expanded detainees' legal rights. Senators predicted that their chamber will approve the legislation today, which would enable Bush to hold a signing ceremony on a high-profile and intensely debated bill about a month before the Nov. 7 elections.

Barring a last-minute snag, the House and Senate action will conclude three months of debate that began in late June, after the Supreme Court struck down the military commissions Bush had established to try people suspected of being members of al-Qaeda. Designated as enemy combatants, such suspects enjoy fewer rights than prisoners of war, and much of the congressional debate centered on which, if any, rudimentary legal rights should apply to them.

The administration was also eager to protect CIA officers from possible prosecution or from lawsuits stemming from their use of aggressive interrogation techniques such as extended sleep deprivation, hypothermia and "waterboarding," which simulates drowning.

Bush is scheduled to meet with GOP senators in the Capitol this morning for a final pep rally before the measure's expected passage. Republicans hope to campaign on the bill as proof of their party's tough stand against terrorists. Many congressional Democrats decided to swallow their misgivings and vote for the bill to avoid being portrayed as less than vigilant against suspects captured in Afghanistan, Iraq and elsewhere. Thirty-four Democrats joined 219 Republicans in supporting the legislation.

"It is outrageous that House Democrats, at the urging of their leaders, continue to oppose giving President Bush the tools he needs to protect our country," said House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

Such comments infuriated Democrats, who said they stand second to no one in fighting terrorists but fear the United States is abandoning fundamental principles of fairness. The bill "is really more about who we are as a people than it is about those who seek to harm us," said House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.). "Defending America requires us to marshal the full range of our power: diplomatic and military, economic and moral. And when our moral standing is eroded, our international credibility is diminished as well."

After the June 29 Supreme Court ruling, the White House proposed legislation to address the high court's criticisms and still embrace much of its military commission setup and interrogation practices. But a trio of Republican senators forced Bush to modify several points.

The compromise legislation does not seek to narrow U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions in the treatment of prisoners, as Bush had hoped. But it would give the executive branch substantial leeway in deciding how to comply with treaty obligations in actions that fall short of "grave breaches" of the conventions.

It would bar military commissions from considering testimony obtained through interrogation techniques that involve "cruel, unusual or inhumane treatment or punishment," which is proscribed by the 5th, 8th and 14th amendments to the U.S. Constitution. But the bar would be retroactive only to Dec. 30, 2005, when Congress adopted the Detainee Treatment Act, sponsored by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), to protect CIA operatives from being prosecuted over interrogation tactics used before then.

Yesterday, Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) condemned the loophole, accusing administration officials of trying "to legitimize the mistreatment of detainees and to undermine some of the cornerstone principles of our legal system."

But GOP sponsors said the language is essential to protect well-intentioned CIA officers from vague guidelines. "The Constitution says we will provide for the common defense, not provide for the criminal defense" of enemy combatants, Rep. Louie Gohmert (R-Tex.) said during a rare instance in which both houses debated the same legislation simultaneously.

Some of the fiercest debates focused on whether foreign terrorism suspects should have access to U.S. courts for challenging the legality of their detention, a right known as habeas corpus.

House Republicans blocked Democrats from offering amendments, including one that would have extended the habeas corpus right to detainees. House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.) said terrorism suspects have enough rights without habeas corpus, including the right to a lawyer, to be presumed innocent, to cross-examine witnesses and to collect evidence. "Let's bring justice before the eyes of the children and widows of Sept. 11," he implored on the House floor.

DOJ_NMG_0070325

But Rep. Jerrold Nadler (D-N.Y.) said: "This is how a nation loses its moral compass, its identity, its values and, eventually, its freedom. . . . We rebelled against King George III for less restrictions on liberty than this." Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) said the habeas corpus right is so fundamental that it "is un-American" to deny it to detainees held by U.S. forces.

The Senate will vote today on an amendment to grant the habeas corpus right to detainees. Supporters say the Supreme Court would rule the legislation unconstitutional without a habeas corpus provision, but opponents say the House would balk at the amendment.

The legislation loosely defines "cruel or inhuman treatment" of detainees, which would constitute a war crime. The administration said the term should apply to techniques resulting in "severe" physical or mental pain, but lawmakers set the standard at "serious." The abused detainee's symptoms would have to include "serious and non-transitory mental harm, which need not be prolonged."

For lesser offenses barred by the Geneva Conventions -- those falling between cruelty and minor abuse -- the legislation would authorize the president to interpret "the meaning and application" of relevant provisions of the Geneva Conventions. The administration's language would have to be published rather than provided in secret to some lawmakers.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) praised the legislation, saying Americans should not give foreigners suspected of being enemy combatants the rights that U.S. citizens enjoy. "The Global War on Terror is different from any war we have ever known," he said in a statement. "As a country we must understand that adaptation to these new situations is critical in order to achieve victory over those who seek to hurt us as a nation."

But the Center for Constitutional Rights condemned the bill, saying it would "authorize the indefinite detention of non-citizens without access to courts -- even if they are not charged with any crime."

Staff writers Jonathan Weisman and R. Jeffrey Smith contributed to this report.

House Approves Bush Proposal On Tribunals For Gitmo Suspects (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 28, 2006

The House yesterday approved President Bush's proposal for the handling of terrorism suspects held at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba, bringing the administration one step closer to having the legal authority to interrogate and prosecute the detainees.

"These terrorist tribunals will allow the suspected terrorists to address the charges against them with legal defense provided by the U.S. government," House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, said after the vote.

In a mostly party-line 253-168 vote, Republicans backed the bill by a 219-7 margin and Democrats opposed it by a 160-34 margin. The House's one independent voted "no." The measure now goes to the Senate.

Just before voting, Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, made clear that Republicans will use the vote in the November elections against Democrats who opposed the bill.

"Will my Democrat friends work with Republicans to give the president the tools he needs to continue to stop terrorist attacks before they happen, or will they vote to force him to fight the terrorists with one arm tied behind his back?" he said.

Republican leaders were quick to criticize Democrats who voted against the legislation.

"Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi and 159 of her Democrat colleagues voted today in favor of more rights for terrorists," Mr. Hastert said. "So, the same terrorists who plan to harm innocent Americans and their freedom worldwide would be coddled if we followed the Democrat plan."

Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider decried "Speaker Hastert's false and inflammatory rhetoric," calling it "yet another desperate attempt to mislead the American people and provoke fear.

"Democrats will not be swift-boated," she said, referring to ads that hurt Democrats' 2004 presidential candidate, Sen. John Kerry. "We want [terrorists] punished, whatever that punishment is, and don't want it overturned by the Supreme Court. This bill may make it more likely the Supreme Court will overturn those convictions and may put our troops at greater risk."

DOJ_NMG_0070326

The proposal would grant terror suspects more legal rights than they had under the system of military tribunals set up by the administration after the September 11 attacks, which the Supreme Court struck down in June. Nevertheless, the new courts would not grant many of the basic rights Americans usually have in civilian and military courts, a point Democrats protested.

"This bill is everything we don't believe in," said Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich, Ohio Democrat.

Rep. Barney Frank, Massachusetts Democrat, said the proposal doesn't provide enough checks and balances to prevent erroneous convictions.

Other provisions opposed by Democrats give the president broad authority to decide which techniques U.S. interrogators can use legally.

American interrogators and prosecutors, Mr. Frank said, "are the good guys, but they're not the perfect guys."

During the debate, U.S. Capitol Police had to remove several hecklers from the chamber who were protesting the legislation.

The House vote took place shortly after Democrats and Republicans in the Senate reached an agreement to take up the measure with only a handful of amendments. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist told reporters that he hoped to pass the bill today without any of the amendments being approved, so it could go directly to Mr. Bush's desk for his signature.

Mr. Frist said voters will side with those who support the tribunals.

"People realize it's a new world," said Mr. Frist, Tennessee Republican. "We need to have appropriate tools."

Democrats said they expect the bill to be overwhelmingly approved on a bipartisan basis. But, they said, they will continue to work to get amendments added.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, said he opposes the bill no matter what. He also said the haste to pass the measure was politically motivated.

"By failing to renounce torture, it inflames an already dangerous world and makes for America new enemies in our war against terror," he said. "This puts our cause, our people and our troops at greater risk."

"There is no question that the rush to pass this bill -- which is the product of secret negotiations with the White House -- is about serving a political agenda," Mr. Kennedy said. "That is no way to produce careful and thoughtful legislation on profound issues of national security."

Detainee Bill Now Goes To Senate (LAT)

By Richard Simon, Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — The House on Wednesday approved administration-backed rules for interrogating and trying terrorism suspects, a key component of the national security agenda that Republicans aim to showcase in their fight to hold onto Congress.

The Senate is expected to follow suit today, making passage of the military tribunal bill one of Congress' final acts before lawmakers recess this weekend to hit the campaign trail. Barring complications, the legislation will reach President Bush's desk for a high-profile signing ceremony in the run-up to the November elections.

The measure, approved by the House 253 to 168, would preserve tough interrogation tactics that the White House has credited with helping thwart terrorist plots. It also would pave the way for trials of at least two dozen terrorism suspects, including self-proclaimed Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, who are being held at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

"We must remember that we are fighting a different kind of enemy — and a different kind of war," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said as the chamber opened debate on the measure Wednesday. "To win this war, we must provide our military, intelligence and law enforcement communities the tools they need to keep us safe."

But Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the top Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, objected that the measure would be "used by our terrorist enemies as evidence of U.S. hypocrisy when it comes to proclamations of human rights."

DOJ_NMG_0070327

The bill is one of several that GOP lawmakers have rushed to pass to spotlight an issue they consider their party's strength: national security. Another measure, authorizing Bush's once secret warrantless surveillance program, is unlikely to clear Congress until after the election.

Final action on the tribunal bill will bring to a close the wrangling that began in June, when the Supreme Court struck down the administration's earlier rules for trying terrorism suspects before military commissions. The legislation didn't fall into place until the White House and a group of Senate Republicans worked out a compromise last week.

As passed by the House, the measure would allow the administration to use interrogation methods tougher than those employed by the military; it does not specify precisely what would be permitted or explicitly banned.

Water boarding, in which a prisoner is strapped to a board and made to believe he is going to drown, would be banned, according to those who helped broker the deal. Some human rights advocates said the language of the bill would ban sleep deprivation and exposing detainees to extreme temperatures.

The approval came despite warnings from human rights groups that provisions such as prohibiting detainees from challenging their imprisonment in court and permitting the use of coerced evidence in trials under certain circumstances put the bill on questionable legal footing.

A bipartisan effort led by Republican Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania to strip out the provision preventing detainees from filing habeas corpus petitions — demands for legal justification for their imprisonment — is expected to come before the Senate today.

If that amendment passes, the overall bill would have to go to a House-Senate conference committee, which would delay its passage.

Previewing GOP plans to use the tribunal measure in the campaign, House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) challenged Democrats on Wednesday to vote against it. "Will my Democrat friends work with Republicans to give the president the tools he needs to continue to stop terrorist attacks before they happen — or will they again vote to force him to fight the terrorists with one arm tied behind his back?" he asked.

Thirty-four Democrats joined 219 Republicans in voting for the bill, while 160 Democrats, seven Republicans and one independent voted against it.

California House members voted along party lines, with all Republicans supporting the bill and Democrats opposing it. Reps. George P. Radanovich (R-Mariposa) and Juanita Millender-McDonald (D-Carson) did not vote.

"Let me be very clear. I believe that there is a special place in hell reserved for the planners and perpetrators of 9/11," said Rep. Ellen O. Tauscher (D-Alamo). But, she said, the bill would "do nothing but put us in further legal limbo."

"This bill is practically begging to be overturned by the court," added House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco).

Democrats accused Republicans of rushing to pass a legally suspect bill to score political points. Within an hour of the vote, the House GOP leadership put out a statement accusing Democrats of being weak on national security.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) issued a statement after the vote accusing Democrats of voting in favor of "more rights for terrorists."

"So the same terrorists who plan to harm innocent Americans and their freedom worldwide would be coddled, if we followed the Democrat plan," he said.

Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-El Cajon), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, expressed confidence that the bill would withstand court challenge. He also disputed contentions that detainees weren't being given enough rights.

Once trials begin, Americans can "watch all those rights being accorded to people who designed the attack against the United States and decide whether or not they agree with the Democrats that there weren't enough rights given to the defendants," Hunter said. "My instincts are that they will probably … come to the conclusion that … we gave them too many rights."

The measure that passed the House is the product of a compromise between the White House and a group of Senate Republicans led by Sen. John McCain of Arizona, a former POW who was tortured in Vietnam and who advocates that the United States must adhere to the Geneva Convention in its treatment of terrorism suspects.

DOJ_NMG_0070328

But Jumana Musa, an advocacy director of Amnesty International, said Wednesday that the administration has a track record of interpreting congressional laws creatively and permissively. Under the compromise, she said, there was no way to ensure that the CIA would treat its detainees humanely.

"This bill doesn't say what techniques are prohibited," Musa said. "That is the problem with a system that has no check and an administration with a long and colorful record of broad interpretations of the law."

The measure would define as illegal under the War Crimes Act "grave breaches" of the Geneva Convention, such as torture, cruel or inhuman treatment and intentionally causing "serious bodily injury."

It also would give the president authority to interpret the Geneva Convention by an executive order made public and subject to congressional review. The order will not list specific techniques, and no one knows for sure what exactly the order will say.

Said Tom Malinowski, Washington advocacy director of Human Rights Watch:

"I don't think that the CIA will be comfortable going back to those [tougher interrogation] techniques if McCain, the chief architect of the compromise, believes those techniques are against the law."

Rushing Off A Cliff (NYT)

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

Here's what happens when this irresponsible Congress railroads a profoundly important bill to serve the mindless politics of a midterm election: The Bush administration uses Republicans' fear of losing their majority to push through ghastly ideas about antiterrorism that will make American troops less safe and do lasting damage to our 217-year-old nation of laws — while actually doing nothing to protect the nation from terrorists. Democrats betray their principles to avoid last-minute attack ads. Our democracy is the big loser.

Republicans say Congress must act right now to create procedures for charging and trying terrorists — because the men accused of plotting the 9/11 attacks are available for trial. That's pure propaganda. Those men could have been tried and convicted long ago, but President Bush chose not to. He held them in illegal detention, had them questioned in ways that will make real trials very hard, and invented a transparently illegal system of kangaroo courts to convict them.

It was only after the Supreme Court issued the inevitable ruling striking down Mr. Bush's shadow penal system that he adopted his tone of urgency. It serves a cynical goal: Republican strategists think they can win this fall, not by passing a good law but by forcing Democrats to vote against a bad one so they could be made to look soft on terrorism.

Last week, the White House and three Republican senators announced a terrible deal on this legislation that gave Mr. Bush most of what he wanted, including a blanket waiver for crimes Americans may have committed in the service of his antiterrorism policies. Then Vice President Dick Cheney and his willing lawmakers rewrote the rest of the measure so that it would give Mr. Bush the power to jail pretty much anyone he wants for as long as he wants without charging them, to unilaterally reinterpret the Geneva Conventions, to authorize what normal people consider torture, and to deny justice to hundreds of men captured in error.

These are some of the bill's biggest flaws:

Enemy Combatants: A dangerously broad definition of "illegal enemy combatant" in the bill could subject legal residents of the United States, as well as foreign citizens living in their own countries, to summary arrest and indefinite detention with no hope of appeal. The president could give the power to apply this label to anyone he wanted.

The Geneva Conventions: The bill would repudiate a half-century of international precedent by allowing Mr. Bush to decide on his own what abusive interrogation methods he considered permissible. And his decision could stay secret — there's no requirement that this list be published.

Habeas Corpus: Detainees in U.S. military prisons would lose the basic right to challenge their imprisonment. These cases do not clog the courts, nor coddle terrorists. They simply give wrongly imprisoned people a chance to prove their innocence.

Judicial Review: The courts would have no power to review any aspect of this new system, except verdicts by military tribunals. The bill would limit appeals and bar legal actions based on the Geneva Conventions, directly or indirectly. All Mr. Bush would have to do to lock anyone up forever is to declare him an illegal combatant and not have a trial.

DOJ_NMG_0070329

Coerced Evidence: Coerced evidence would be permissible if a judge considered it reliable — already a contradiction in terms — and relevant. Coercion is defined in a way that exempts anything done before the passage of the 2005 Detainee Treatment Act, and anything else Mr. Bush chooses.

Secret Evidence: American standards of justice prohibit evidence and testimony that is kept secret from the defendant, whether the accused is a corporate executive or a mass murderer. But the bill as redrafted by Mr. Cheney seems to weaken protections against such evidence.

Offenses: The definition of torture is unacceptably narrow, a virtual reprise of the deeply cynical memos the administration produced after 9/11. Rape and sexual assault are defined in a retrograde way that covers only forced or coerced activity, and not other forms of nonconsensual sex. The bill would effectively eliminate the idea of rape as torture.

•There is not enough time to fix these bills, especially since the few Republicans who call themselves moderates have been whipped into line, and the Democratic leadership in the Senate seems to have misplaced its spine. If there was ever a moment for a filibuster, this was it.

We don't blame the Democrats for being frightened. The Republicans have made it clear that they'll use any opportunity to brand anyone who votes against this bill as a terrorist enabler. But Americans of the future won't remember the pragmatic arguments for caving in to the administration.

They'll know that in 2006, Congress passed a tyrannical law that will be ranked with the low points in American democracy, our generation's version of the Alien and Sedition Acts.

Don't Suspend Habeas Corpus (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 28, 2006

EVEN IF HE SAYS SO HIMSELF, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, is an expert on constitutional law. So his warning that the Supreme Court is likely to invalidate pending legislation that would create military commissions to try terrorist suspects deserves a hearing — in the Senate.

The problem with the legislation — even with the improvements forced on the White House by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) — is that it would make it impossible for alleged enemy combatants to file what is known as a writ of habeas corpus, which allows them to challenge the legality of their imprisonment.

In 2004, the Supreme Court rejected the Bush administration's position and ruled that detainees at the U.S. facility at Guantanamo Bay were entitled to file such petitions. In its decision, the high court cited a statute giving federal courts the authority to review habeas petitions. But in his majority opinion, Justice John Paul Stevens also quoted a 1945 case in which the court noted that habeas corpus is "a writ antecedent to statute … throwing its root deep into the genius of our common law." In fact, the "Great Writ" can be traced back to the Magna Carta. And although the Constitution allows Congress to suspend habeas corpus in "cases of rebellion or invasion," Specter rightly noted that "we don't have either."

The argument for allowing detainees to file habeas petitions goes beyond avoiding the embarrassment of a rebuke from the Supreme Court, which has already twice rebuffed the administration's legal strategy in the war against terrorism. Thirty-three former U.S. diplomats have sent a letter to Congress warning that "to deny habeas corpus to our detainees can be seen as prescription for how the captured members of our own military, diplomatic and NGO [nongovernmental organization] personnel stationed abroad may be treated."

On Wednesday, the House approved a bill that does not permit detainees to file habeas corpus petitions. That means that it will be up to Specter and his colleagues to preserve the Great Writ when the Senate votes, as early as today.

The White House Warden (LAT)

By Bruce Ackerman

The Los Angeles Times, September 28, 2006

BURIED IN THE complex Senate compromise on detainee treatment is a real shocker, reaching far beyond the legal struggles about foreign terrorist suspects in the Guantanamo Bay fortress. The compromise legislation, which is racing toward the White House, authorizes the president to seize American citizens as enemy combatants, even if they have never left the United States. And once thrown into military prison, they cannot expect a trial by their peers or any other of the normal protections of the Bill of Rights.

DOJ_NMG_0070330

This dangerous compromise not only authorizes the president to seize and hold terrorists who have fought against our troops "during an armed conflict," it also allows him to seize anybody who has "purposefully and materially supported hostilities against the United States." This grants the president enormous power over citizens and legal residents. They can be designated as enemy combatants if they have contributed money to a Middle Eastern charity, and they can be held indefinitely in a military prison.

Not to worry, say the bill's defenders. The president can't detain somebody who has given money innocently, just those who contributed to terrorists on purpose.

But other provisions of the bill call even this limitation into question. What is worse, if the federal courts support the president's initial detention decision, ordinary Americans would be required to defend themselves before a military tribunal without the constitutional guarantees provided in criminal trials.

Legal residents who aren't citizens are treated even more harshly. The bill entirely cuts off their access to federal habeas corpus, leaving them at the mercy of the president's suspicions.

We are not dealing with hypothetical abuses. The president has already subjected a citizen to military confinement. Consider the case of Jose Padilla. A few months after 9/11, he was seized by the Bush administration as an "enemy combatant" upon his arrival at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport. He was wearing civilian clothes and had no weapons. Despite his American citizenship, he was held for more than three years in a military brig, without any chance to challenge his detention before a military or civilian tribunal. After a federal appellate court upheld the president's extraordinary action, the Supreme Court refused to hear the case, handing the administration's lawyers a terrible precedent.

The new bill, if passed, would further entrench presidential power. At the very least, it would encourage the Supreme Court to draw an invidious distinction between citizens and legal residents. There are tens of millions of legal immigrants living among us, and the bill encourages the justices to uphold mass detentions without the semblance of judicial review.

But the bill also reinforces the presidential claims, made in the Padilla case, that the commander in chief has the right to designate a U.S. citizen on American soil as an enemy combatant and subject him to military justice. Congress is poised to authorized this presidential overreaching. Under existing constitutional doctrine, this show of explicit congressional support would be a key factor that the Supreme Court would consider in assessing the limits of presidential authority.

This is no time to play politics with our fundamental freedoms. Even without this massive congressional expansion of the class of enemy combatants, it is by no means clear that the present Supreme Court will protect the Bill of Rights. The Korematsu case — upholding the military detention of tens of thousands of Japanese Americans during World War II — has never been explicitly overruled. It will be tough for the high court to condemn this notorious decision, especially if passions are inflamed by another terrorist incident. But congressional support of presidential power will make it much easier to extend the Korematsu decision to future mass seizures.

Though it may not feel that way, we are living at a moment of relative calm. It would be tragic if the Republican leadership rammed through an election-year measure that would haunt all of us on the morning after the next terrorist attack.

Judge Rejects Ashcroft's Immunity Claim (AP)

By Rebecca Boone, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 28, 2006

BOISE, Idaho — Former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft could be called to testify in a lawsuit that claims a student was wrongly imprisoned in a computer terrorism case, a federal judge ruled Wednesday.

U.S. District Judge Edward Lodge rejected Ashcroft's argument to toss out the lawsuit because he was entitled to absolute immunity since his position at the Department of Justice was prosecutorial.

Abdullah al-Kidd, who played football for the University of Idaho, claimed government wrongfully arrested him in the case against a fellow student, Sami Omar Al-Hussayen, in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0070331

They both worked for the Islamic Assembly of North America, a Michigan-based charitable organization that federal investigators said funneled money to activities supporting terrorism and published material advocating suicide attacks on the United States.

A jury acquitted Al-Hussayen of using his computer skills to foster terrorism and of three immigration violations after an eight-week federal trial. But Al-Hussayen — who was only months from finishing his doctorate study at the University of Idaho — was eventually deported to Saudi Arabia.

Al-Kidd was never called to testify, but he spent two weeks in jail as a material witness and was later released to the custody of his wife with strict limitations on where he could travel.

His lawsuit claimed Ashcroft was personally liable for violating his rights because after the terrorist attacks Ashcroft "created a national policy to improperly seek material witness warrants, oversaw the execution of such warrants, and failed to correct the constitutional violations of conducting such actions," according court documents. Al-Kidd said the investigation and detainment not only caused him to lose a scholarship to study in Saudi Arabia, but that it cost him employment opportunities.

The ruling also means U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez and others in the Department of Homeland Security could be called to testify in the lawsuit.

"We are literally reviewing it at this minute and no, we have not made any decisions at this time," Charles Miller, spokesman for the Justice Department's civil division, said of the ruling.

Al-Kidd's attorney, Lee Gelernt with the ACLU's national headquarters in New York, called the ruling a "vindication" for al-Kidd.

"It will hopefully deter the government from using the material witness statute in the future in the way they did after Sept. 11," Gelernt said.

Al-Kidd is asking the judge to declare that the federal government's actions were unconstitutional, to order the FBI and other agencies to expunge any records relating to the unlawful detention of al-Kidd and others, and for unspecified damages.

Domestic Spying Showdown Set For Detroit Court (FREEP)

By David Ashenfelter, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, September 28, 2006

Justice Department lawyers will be back in federal court in Detroit on Thursday to try to persuade a judge to delay enforcement of last month's decision to halt the National Security Agency's domestic spying program until the outcome of the government's appeal.

And ACLU lawyers will be there to try to persuade U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs to order the government to stop the program now.

Taylor ruled Aug. 17 that the Bush Administration's program of monitoring international phone calls and emails involving suspected Al Qaeda members is unconstitutional because it violates Americans' free speech and privacy rights and is contrary to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978.

Under that law, the government can eavesdrop for up to a year without a warrant provided the Attorney General certifies that the eavesdropping is legal.

The Justice Department appealed Taylor's ruling to the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati.

The ACLU sued the administration in January on behalf of scholars, lawyers, non-profit groups and journalists, who said the program had disrupted their ability to confer with sources, locate witnesses, conduct research and advocate causes

Contact DAVID ASHENFELTER at 313-223-4490 or ashenf@freepress.com.

Yassin Aref Takes The Stand (CAP9)

Capital News 9, September 28, 2006

The prosecution has rested in the trial of two Albany mosque leaders accused of supporting terrorism, and the defense wasted no time calling their client to the stand.

Mohammed Hossain and Yassin Aref are charged with laundering money to support terrorism. On Wednesday, Aref denied those charges while on the stand.

Prosecutors finished up with a Middle Eastern expert who explained what references in Aref's journal are terrorist organizations and which ones aren't.

Once Aref took the stand, the mood clearly changed in the courtroom as Aref explained his growing up in Northern Iraq where Saddam Hussein killed more than 180,000 fellow Kurds in the late 1980s.

The prosecution has rested in the trial of two Albany mosque leaders accused of supporting terrorism, and the defense wasted no time calling their client to the stand.

That's important because Aref argues that his rhetoric the courtroom previously heard was directed at Saddam's regime and that he's always been peaceful as he spoke out as a student - but not a member of any political party which prosecutors accused him of omitting on an immigration document.

Aref also contends that the government mistranslated some journal entries as well as some speeches he gave, making him look a lot worse than he really is.

PATRIOT ACT:

Terror Laws Cut Resettlement Of Refugees (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 27 — The number of refugees admitted to the United States fell 23 percent this year because of provisions in two antiterrorism laws that have sharply reduced the number of resettled refugees, State Department officials said Wednesday.

The laws, the USA Patriot Act and the Real ID Act, deny entry to anyone who belongs to or has provided material support to armed rebel groups, even if that support was coerced and even if the armed groups fought alongside American troops or opposed authoritarian governments criticized by the Bush administration.

The provisions have derailed the resettlement of thousands of refugees fleeing the authoritarian government of Myanmar, formerly known as Burma; hundreds of refugees from Vietnam and Laos who fought alongside American troops in the Vietnam War; and dozens of Cubans who supported armed groups opposed to Fidel Castro in the 60's, according to the State Department and the United Nations refugee agency.

Many of the refugees were barred from the United States because, under the new laws, they are deemed supporters of terrorist groups, even though the organizations that they support do not appear on the State Department list of designated terrorist groups.

The statutes have broadened the definition of terrorist groups to include any group of two or more people who take up arms against a state, even if the group supports the aims of American foreign policy.

A result, State Department officials say, is that administration officials will resettle 41,200 of the 54,000 refugees whom they had expected to admit by the end of the current fiscal year, which ends on Sept. 30. That figure is the lowest since refugee admissions plunged for nearly two years after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

The State Department can grant waivers for specific populations that have supported armed groups, if they pose no threat to the United States. In May and August, the department issued waivers for Burmese refugees who have supported the Karen National Union, a group that opposes the government in Myanmar.

But the laws do not allow waivers for refugees who were combatants, received military training from groups deemed to be terrorist organizations or were members of such groups. State Department officials say a change in the law is required to address those populations. In recent weeks, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has met with lawmakers in the House and Senate to discuss such changes.

Ellen R. Sauerbrey, an assistant secretary of state, told senators on Wednesday that the antiterrorism provisions had prevented the United States from resettling 9,500 Burmese this fiscal year. Of that group, 1,500 are expected to enter by Sept. 30 under issued waivers.

DOJ_NMG_0070333

"We had anticipated bringing the majority, if not all of those, to the United States," Ms. Sauerbrey said at a hearing of the Immigration Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

She said the limited waivers meant that the resettlement of many refugees had been indefinitely delayed. In addition to the Burmese, Ms. Sauerbrey pointed to the Cubans and Vietnamese Montagnards.

"We are eagerly looking forward to expanding resettlement," she said, "to the degree that we can resolve some of these difficulties."

Refugee advocacy groups, including Human Rights First and Human Rights Watch, and conservative groups like Concerned Women for America, the National Association of Evangelicals and American Values, say officials are not moving swiftly enough.

Representative Joe Pitts, Republican of Pennsylvania, has proposed legislation that would bar only members and supporters of groups designated as terrorist organizations by the State Department.

But State Department officials say they do not expect any movement on such legislation before Nov. 7.

Many refugee advocates fear that administration officials and members of Congress are delaying action because they do not want to be viewed as easing up on terrorism during an election year.

Michael J. Horowitz, a neoconservative who worked in the White House of President Ronald Reagan and testified at the hearing on Wednesday, said in a statement that it was "inexcusable that for more than two years the administration has dragged its feet" in finding a solution for the refugees who fought alongside Americans in Vietnam.

The antiterrorism provisions have also affected 500 asylum seekers in the United States, whose cases have been delayed and has prevented 700 people, who have already been deemed refugees or granted asylum, from becoming permanent residents here for the time being.

Senator Sam Brownback, Republican of Kansas, urged the administration to redouble its efforts on behalf of the Burmese refugees and others who desperately need to resettle. "I know we have a lot security concerns to watch for," Mr. Brownback said at the hearing. "But there are huge populations that are absolutely persecuted and have no other option."

More Refugees Are Settling In Mid-Size Cities, Study Finds (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

Political refugees coming to the United States are increasingly putting down roots in metropolitan areas without large immigrant populations, according to a study being released today by the Brookings Institution.

The study, the first of its kind to analyze refugee settlement patterns in metropolitan regions, found that while traditional immigrant gateways such as New York, Chicago and Los Angeles still absorb most refugees, that flow has slowed in the past several years, and refugees are increasingly settling in Seattle, Atlanta, Sacramento, Minneapolis-St. Paul and Portland Ore., said Audrey Singer, a Brookings demographer who co-wrote the study.

"These are places that are taking on more refugees proportionally than they have in the past, and it's helping to change the face of these cities," Singer said.

The State Department determines the first settling place for refugees, whose ranks are limited by annual caps set by the president and Congress. The ceiling for 2006 is 70,000, with 30,000 allotted to Africa.

About two-thirds of refugees are settled in places where they have a relative or friend. The remaining third are sent to communities based on availability of social services, housing and jobs.

Some states, such as Iowa, Pennsylvania and North Dakota, have been lobbying for refugees, Singer said. "Iowa is experiencing population decline and looking into its future and sees refugee resettlement as a vital way of keeping up population," she said.

In Los Angeles, Vietnamese and Cambodian refugees of Chinese ethnic origins are credited with revitalizing Chinatown. As older Chinese immigrants left the city for the suburban San Gabriel Valley, the newly arrived refugees moved into the city and now run Chinatown businesses once owned by the older generation, the study found.

But there have been problems as well.

DOJ_NMG_0070334

The researchers point to Wausau, Wis., where church groups helped Hmong refugees from Laos and Thailand resettle over the past two decades. About 1,600 came to the Wausau area from 1983 to 2004. Public services were strained, and tensions were high. Property taxes were raised to help pay for welfare programs for the Hmong, and schools had to scramble to try to meet the needs of children who did not speak English.

But as the Hmong assimilated, stresses on the local government abated. State officials report that 96 percent of the Hmong in Wausau are now employed and 60 percent own homes.

More than 2 million refugees have arrived in the United States since 1980, when Congress passed the Refugee Act. Those fleeing war or other trauma in their countries have arrived in three waves: from Southeast Asia and the Soviet Union during the Cold War in the 1970s and 1980s, from Europe during the Kosovo conflict in the 1990s, and from Africa during the current decade of civil conflict.

Refugees make up about 7 percent of foreign-born residents in the United States, but the federal government spends more money integrating them into American life than any other immigrant group. Qualifying refugees are entitled to Social Security, food stamps, state child health insurance, Medicaid benefits and other assistance for their first seven years. Those who do not meet income eligibility requirements for those benefits can get cash and medical care for the first eight months. In addition, private agencies can tap federal money for a variety of social services for refugees.

More than half the refugees admitted from 1983 to 2004 came from the former Soviet Union. The next biggest group was Vietnamese, totaling about 400,000. Refugees from other countries registered in much smaller numbers. A total of 125 countries were represented during the 20-year period.

The metropolitan areas that received the largest number of refugees over the past 20 years are also the country's two largest immigrant gateways -- New York and Los Angeles. Most of the newcomers to New York were from the former Soviet Union, and those who moved to Los Angeles came from Southeast Asia, Russia, Iran, Iraq and Afghanistan.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Report To Criticize White House Over Local Effort In Terror Fight (WSJ)

By Robert Block

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Amid the political storm over the intelligence community's report that al Qaeda remains a serious threat to the U.S. homeland, House Democrats plan to release a report Thursday accusing the Bush administration of failing to support local police as the frontline against terrorism.

The report says the administration hasn't done enough to reach out to the country's 800,000 state and local police officers to determine their needs in fighting terrorism. The report1 -- entitled the Law Enforcement Assistance and Partnership Strategy -- proposes seven steps to "fulfill some of the key needs that police and sheriffs" officers are experiencing across the country," ranging from establishing a National Center for Intelligence-Led Policing to a grant program aimed at building understanding of how terrorists operate by sending local police liaison officers overseas to work with foreign law enforcement agencies.

Within the Department of Homeland Security, the Law Enforcement Terrorism Prevention Program focuses on using local law enforcement to support intelligence gathering and information sharing, but legislation funding the department for the new fiscal year that starts Sunday cuts the program by $50 million to $350 million.

Homeland Security officials said the department is working on ways to improve the information flow to police, and next month expects to roll out initiatives to cooperate more closely with state and local law enforcement.

The report, prepared for Rep. Bennie G. Thompson (D., Miss.), the ranking Democrat on the House Homeland Security Committee, argues that local police, not federal agents, are best positioned to observe criminal activity that could portend a terrorist attack. But "five years after 9/11, critical failures of imagination continue to leave these 'first preventers' as a largely untapped resource in the war on terror," it said.

DOJ_NMG_0070335

The report follows growing complaints from police departments around the country that federal agencies, especially the Department of Homeland Security, deny local law enforcement access to timely, relevant information about threats and terrorist activity. The charges were repeated Tuesday at a meeting of national police chiefs in Charlotte, N.C.

Key among the Democrats' recommendations is a National Center for Intelligence-Led Policing that would help police understand how to integrate traditional policing methods with counterterrorism.

The Los Angeles Police Department recently said it wanted to create a national anti-terrorism academy in Los Angeles where law enforcement officers from around the country could learn to identify threats and prevent attacks. Commander Michael Downing, the assistance police chief in charge of LAPD counterterrorism bureau, said while he has not seen the Democrat's final report, he welcomed for federal support.

House Democratic staffers said they expect legislation on the matter will be introduced early next year.

Sources: Homeland Agent Who Made Cuts Is Out (NSDY)

By Carol Eisenberg, Newsday Washington Bureau

Long Island Newsday, September 28, 2006

The political appointee who oversaw 40-percent cuts in anti-terror funding to New York City and Washington, D.C., is being edged out of her job at the Homeland Security Department, according to House and Senate sources.

WASHINGTON -- The political appointee who oversaw 40-percent cuts in anti-terror funding to New York City and Washington, D.C., is being edged out of her job at the Homeland Security Department, according to House and Senate sources.

Tracy Henke, executive director for grants and training, was responsible for divvying up anti-terror money to cities, ostensibly based on risk. She ignited a firestorm in June after the department slashed funding to New York and Washington while bolstering money for cities such as St. Louis and Kansas City in her home state of Missouri.

"She didn't do a good job and my understanding is she's not going to be there much longer," Rep. Peter King, chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, said yesterday.

"I view her as being primarily responsible for the terrible cuts that were made to New York in June," the Seaford Republican said. "She did a poor job in coming up with the numbers. She did a poor job of explaining it to the committee and, quite frankly, a lot of people didn't like her attitude."

That vote of no confidence appears to extend to the White House. This week, White House Homeland Security Adviser Frances Townsend told a group of reporters that she had been "quite surprised and dismayed" by the grant decisions.

Henke, 37, did not return calls for comment yesterday. Asked whether she was being forced out of the post, a Homeland Security Department spokesman, William Knocke, replied, "I've got no reason to say that."

Henke, a backdoor appointment by the White House Jan. 4, had not been confirmed by the Senate before the funding controversy because of concerns about her qualifications, as well as allegations she played politics in her prior job at the Justice Department.

House and Senate sources said she was unlikely to be confirmed in the session's remaining weeks, and that the White House would not resubmit her name to the next Congress. The White House has submitted her name for Senate confirmation three times to date -- July 14, 2005, Feb. 10 and Sept. 5.

"We were told that she was renominated by the White House [Sept. 5] to soften the landing," said a House source. "But the confirmation is not going anywhere. And the White House does not intend to renominate her ... which means the nomination will automatically expire at the end of this session."

White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore said yesterday she could not say whether the White House would renominate Henke in the next Congress.

Questions about Henke's qualifications date to her nomination. Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, the ranking member of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, asked about an incident in which she reportedly demanded changes to a release about a study that found police were more likely to handcuff or arrest minorities during traffic stops.

DOJ_NMG_0070336

There also were questions about her experience. She worked for Missouri senators Christopher "Kit" Bond and John Danforth before being tapped by another Missouri politician, Attorney General John Ashcroft, to work in the Justice Department.

King said he believed it was "no coincidence" that Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff recently announced dramatic increases to New York City. "I look upon that as a vote of no confidence in her," he said.

Package Prompted D.C. Courthouse Evacuation (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And William Branigin, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

A federal courthouse in downtown Washington was evacuated for about three hours today because of what authorities described as a suspicious package, which was later determined to be harmless.

The evacuation disrupted a hearing in a high-profile case stemming from the leak of a CIA operative's name. The hearing, originally set for 10 a.m., was rescheduled for 1:30 p.m., about an hour after authorities reopened the E. Barrett Prettyman Federal Courthouse.

According to acting chief judge Henry Kennedy, the suspicious item, which was found by a security guard in a construction zone near the courthouse, may have contained the soiled clothing of a homeless person. A bomb-sniffing dog alerted to the item, possibly because of nitrates on the clothing, Kennedy said. Nitrates used as oxidizing agents can be mixed with other compounds to form flammable or explosive material.

In addition to examining the suspicious package, authorities swept the courthouse building for explosives but did not find any, officials said.

This morning, police blocked off streets surrounding the courthouse as bomb-disposal experts, hazardous materials specialists and canine units with bomb-sniffing dogs were dispatched to the scene.

Officers in protective suits moved the package from the construction area where it was found to a waiting vehicle the size of a large SUV and picked up other materials around the construction site to be analyzed.

A court security officer found the package around 9:30 a.m., and the courthouse was evacuated about 10 minutes later. Among the evacuees were prosecutors in the case of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, the former chief of staff of Vice President Cheney. Libby has been charged with perjury and obstruction of justice in a federal investigation of the 2003 leak of the identity and CIA employment of Valerie Plame.

The suspicious item was found next to a construction trailer in an area where a courthouse annex was recently built.

Starting at about 10:30 a.m., U.S. marshals asked that the entire block around the courthouse be closed off and that passersby be cleared from the courthouse plaza in front of the building. As a result, a three-block area from 3rd St. SW to 6th St. SW between Constitution Ave. and C St. was evacuated.

As the evacuation of the courthouse was underway, Justice Department officials quickly removed a trove of highly secret national security documents, including numerous Presidential Daily Briefs, from a security courtroom facility where they were being kept for use in the Libby case. The documents were the subject of today's hearing, in which defense attorneys and prosecutors were set to pursue their arguments over whether the material should be admitted in Libby's trial.

The special counsel in the case, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, and about eight of his associates were forced to leave the building and join more than 100 others on the sidewalks nearby, the Associated Press reported. Libby, accompanied by members of his legal team, arrived shortly after the evacuation and joined the throng outside the courthouse, AP said.

The judges of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia were moved across the street to the D.C. Superior Courthouse.

D.C. Courthouse Reopens After Bomb Scare (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, The Associated Press

AP, September 28, 2006

Police dog alerts authorities to package as CIA leak hearing begins

WASHINGTON -- A federal courthouse within sight of the Capitol was set to reopen early this afternoon after authorities determined that an abandoned suitcase at the building entrance did not contain a bomb.

DOJ_NMG_0070337

The building had been evacuated this morning when a police dog trained to detect explosives alerted to the softsided suitcase found near a construction trailer outside the E. Barrett Prettyman Federal Courthouse.

U.S. Marshals were to brief reporters on the incident before the building reopened.

Sheldon Snook, chief of staff to Chief Judge Thomas Hogan, said fire alarms were sounded and the building was cleared shortly after 9:30 a.m. as a precaution.

Law enforcement officials reopened Constitution Avenue, which runs next to the courthouse, after shutting it to traffic for two hours.

Evacuation of the courthouse occurred shortly before a hearing was to begin in the CIA leak case. The hearing was reset for 1:30 p.m.

Special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald and about eight of his associates were forced to leave the building and join more than 100 others on the sidewalks nearby.

The defendant in the case, former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, and his legal team arrived a short time later and joined the throng outside the courthouse.

The judges of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia were moved across the street to the Superior Courthouse.

Crowded ERs Raise Concerns On Readiness (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

Emergency rooms at many hospitals are routinely stretched to the breaking point, raising concerns that they would not be able to handle victims during a terrorist attack or natural disaster, according to congressional testimony yesterday and a new federal study.

Between 40 percent and 50 percent of emergency departments experienced crowding during 2003 and 2004, the study by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention found. It deemed an emergency room to be crowded if so many patients flooded in that ambulances had to be diverted to other hospitals; if people in urgent need of care had to wait an average of more than an hour; or if at least 3 percent of patients simply gave up and left before being seen.

The problem is more dramatic in metropolitan areas, where almost two-thirds of emergency departments experienced crowding conditions, the study found.

The crunch springs from a problem of supply and demand. The annual number of visits to emergency departments rose 18 percent, to 110 million, from 1994 to 2004. At the same time, the number of hospitals operating 24-hour emergency departments declined by 12 percent.

The problem is exacerbated by a shortage of nurses. More than 5 percent of nursing staff positions were vacant at half of all emergency departments in metropolitan areas, the CDC reported.

The findings echo three reports published in June by the Institute of Medicine, a branch of the National Academies, which concluded that the nation's emergency medical system is "overburdened, underfunded, and highly fragmented," and is not equipped to cope with disasters such as hurricanes, disease outbreaks and terrorist strikes.

The findings are stirring interest in Congress, and the Senate Health subcommittee on bioterrorism and public health preparedness convened a panel of experts yesterday to discuss the problems.

"If our emergency rooms are stretched thin now, how will they provide medical care in the event of a disaster?" Sen. Richard Burr (R-N.C.), the subcommittee chairman, said in a statement. "Our emergency care safety net is at risk. We must identify ways to reduce overcrowding and improve coordination."

Panelist Frederick C. Blum, president of the American College of Emergency Physicians, said policymakers and emergency departments must find ways to reduce "boarding." That is the practice in which emergency patients who are admitted to a hospital are left in the emergency department because no regular beds are available, reducing the hospital's ability to handle new emergency patients. Blum said reductions in reimbursement from Medicare and Medicaid in recent years are part of the reason some hospitals have reduced the number of inpatient beds.

DOJ_NMG_0070338

"We currently have no surge capacity to deal with the next big thing that comes along, be it a terrorist attack or a natural disaster," Blum said.

Leon L. Haley Jr., chief of emergency medicine for Grady Health System in Atlanta, suggested providing financial incentives for primary care physicians to see patients after hours so that fewer people with non-emergency conditions seek treatment at hospitals.

Nancy M. Bonalumi, president of the Emergency Nurses Association, said the federal government should invest more in nursing education programs. About 147,000 qualified applicants to nursing programs were turned away in 2004 because of faculty shortages, Bonalumi said.

Robert R. Bass, executive director of the Maryland Institute of EMS Systems, said experts believe that the federal government should help fund the development of a network of regional, coordinated emergency care systems. The government also should designate a lead federal agency for emergency care and should better integrate the resources of the Department of Veterans Affairs into civilian disaster planning, he said.

"Strong measures must be taken . . . to achieve the level of response that Americans expect and deserve," Bass said.

Chemical Plant Security (1 Letter) (NYT)

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

To the Editor:

Your Sept. 25 editorial "Chemical Plants, Still Unprotected" does not include some basic facts. The chemical security legislation we negotiated will give the secretary of homeland security new authority to set mandatory standards for high-risk chemical plants and, equally important, to enforce those standards.

The bill gives the secretary the strongest possible authority: the power to shut down dangerous plants.

Current law leaves dangerous gaps in our security because it does not empower the secretary to set standards or to close noncompliant plants. Our legislation closes those gaps.

For your editorial to assert that Congress has done nothing to protect Americans from a terrorist attack on chemical plants is off the mark.

We prevailed in including provisions fought by the chemical industry's trade associations. These provisions ensure that high-risk plants would be subject to mandatory standards, regular inspections and tough enforcement measures. We also included a three-year sunset to prompt Congress to pass even more extensive legislation.

Susan M. Collins

Peter T. King

Washington, Sept. 25, 2006

The writers are chairmen of the Senate and House Homeland Security Committees, respectively.

N.J. Congressman Asks For FBI Briefing Over 2001 Anthrax Scare (AP)

By Donna De La Cruz

AP, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A New Jersey congressman said Wednesday it should have taken the FBI days, not years, to determine the anthrax used in 2001 that killed a Connecticut woman and four other people was much less sophisticated than believed.

Democratic Rep. Rush Holt asked FBI Director Robert Mueller for a classified briefing about the status of the bureau's investigation into who was behind the attacks.

Several published reports this week said the FBI had acknowledged the anthrax used in the attacks was commonly available and not weapons-grade.

In his letter to Mueller, Holt said the FBI's failure to determine what kind of anthrax was used meant that "resources were diverted and countless agents wasted their time investigating a small pool of suspects, instead of the broader search we now know was needed."

The FBI has conducted 9,100 interviews and issued 6,000 subpoenas.

DOJ_NMG_0070339

Holt asked Mueller to have Douglas Beecher, a scientist in the FBI's Hazardous Materials Response Unit, testify before the House Intelligence Committee.

Beecher recently wrote an article in a scientific journal saying there was "a widely circulated misconception" that the anthrax spores were made using additives and sophisticated engineering akin to military weapons production.

FBI spokesman Bill Carter said he did not know if Mueller had received Holt's letter.

The anthrax attacks, in the days after Sept. 11, 2001, killed five people across the country and sickened 17. There were five confirmed anthrax infections and two suspected cases in New Jersey but no fatalities. Among the victims was Ottilie Lundgren, 94, of Oxford, Conn.

Johanns: Americans Shouldn't Take Safe Food Supply For Granted (BVND)

By Maria Sudekum Fisher

The Belleville News Democrat, September 28, 2006

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - There hasn't been a specific terrorist threat against the U.S. food supply, but Americans should not take the safety of their food for granted, U.S. Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns said Wednesday.

"Agricultural goods pass quickly from one nation to another nation, from state to state," Johanns said. "But diseases and pathogens can travel just as quickly and as easily as trade, and they have no respect for borders."

Johanns, who delivered the keynote address to about 1,000 delegates from 21 countries attending the second International Symposium on Agroterrorism, said the recent outbreak of E. coli in spinach shows how quickly food-borne illnesses spread and how tough they can be to trace.

"The bacterium that has infected some of our fresh spinach was not, to the best of our knowledge, the result of an intentional contamination," Johanns said. "But it illustrates how much damage can be inflicted by an intentional act on our food supply."

Johanns said there was no "specific or current threat" to the agriculture or food sectors in the United States at this time, but preparation remained important.

"We know that there are individuals who want to harm us, and we are aware there are people with the knowledge and the capability of sabotaging our food supply," Johanns said. "And so you see we have no choice, we must be prepared."

Johanns pointed to steps the government has taken to ensure a safe food supply, including the U.S. Department of Agriculture's animal identification system. He said more than 300,000 U.S. premises have been voluntarily registered for the animal identification system.

The Department of Agriculture wants to identify and tag each of the country's more than 9 billion cows, pigs, chickens and other livestock by 2009 so it can track them within 48 hours of a report of disease.

The plan, which is now voluntary, has been opposed in Missouri by U.S. Sen. Jim Talent and U.S. Rep. Jo Ann Emerson, who introduced a bill that would prevent the animal identification system from becoming mandatory, largely because of concerns over costs and disclosure of farmers' records to competitors.

Johanns also said the government was taking steps to keep overseas diseases and pathogens out of the United States and that the government was spending about $20 million to combat Avian Influenza worldwide.

He also pointed to an offshore pest information system and to a partnership with the Department of Human Services to develop an automated inspection system that would screen imported ag products in high-risk cargo.

"This would include remote digital imaging to quickly identify pests as well as a nationwide database of regulation violators."

Johanns said partnering with businesses and coming up with new ways to protect the food supply would be an ongoing concern of the administration.

"`We are absolutely committed to listen to the private sector," he said. "And we are committed to opening our imagination to innovations to protect our food and ag system."

WAR NEWS:

DOJ_NMG_0070340

White House Refuses To Release Full NIE (AP-Y)

By Katherine Shrader

AP, September 28, 2006

The White House refused Wednesday to release the rest of a secret intelligence assessment that depicts a growing terrorist threat, as the Bush administration tried to quell election-season criticism that its anti-terror policies are seriously off track.

Press secretary Tony Snow said releasing the full report, portions of which President Bush declassified on Tuesday, would jeopardize the lives of agents who gathered the information.

It would also risk the nation's ability to work with foreign governments and to keep secret its U.S. intelligence-gathering methods, Snow said, and "compromise the independence of people doing intelligence analysis."

"If they think their work is constantly going to be released to the public they are going to pull their punches," Snow said.

In the bleak National Intelligence Estimate, the government's top analysts concluded Iraq has become a "cause celebre" for jihadists, who are growing in number and geographic reach. If the trend continues, the analysts found, the risks to the U.S. interests at home and abroad will grow.

Peppered with questions Wednesday about the report, he said the NIE report was "not designed to draw judgments about success or failure, it's an intelligence document, it's a snapshot."

Snow said the report confirms the importance of the war in Iraq as a bulwark against terrorists. "Iraq has become, for them, the battleground," he said. "If they lose, they lose their bragging rights. They lose their ability to recruit."

He said that a bleak intelligence assessment depicting a growing terrorist threat was only a "snapshot" — not a conclusion

The document has given both political parties new ammunition leading up to November's midterm elections.

For Republicans, the report provides more evidence that Iraq is central to the war on terrorism and can't be abandoned without giving jihadists a crucial victory.

For Democrats, the report furthers their argument that the 2003 Iraq invasion has inflamed anti-U.S. sentiments in the Muslim world and left the U.S. less safe. Democrats continued their push Wednesday for release of the rest of the report.

"The American people deserve the full story, not those parts of it that the Bush administration selects," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass.

Rep. Peter Hoekstra, R-Mich., chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, warned, however, that releasing more of the intelligence assessment could aid terrorists. "We are very cautious and very restrained about the kind of information we want to give al-Qaida," Hoekstra said.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, in Tirana, Albania for a meeting of defense ministers, said Bush had declassified the report's key judgments, after parts of it were leaked to the news media, so that "the American people and the world will be able to see the truth and precisely what that document says."

The NIE report, compiled by leading analysts across 16 U.S. spy agencies, says the "global jihadist movement — which includes al-Qaida, affiliated and independent terrorist groups, and emerging networks and cells — is spreading and adapting to counterterrorism efforts."

A separate high-level assessment focused solely on Iraq may be coming soon. At least two House Democrats — Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California and Rep. Jane Harman of California — have questioned whether that report has been stamped "draft" and shelved until after the Nov. 7 elections.

An intelligence official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the process, said National Intelligence Director John Negroponte told lawmakers in writing only one month ago that he ordered a new Iraq estimate to be assembled. The estimate on terrorism released Tuesday took about a year to produce.

The broad assessment on global terror trends, completed in April, escalated an election-year battle over which party is the best steward of national security.

At a news conference Tuesday, Bush said critics who believe the Iraq war has worsened terrorism are naive and mistaken, noting that al-Qaida and other groups have found inspiration to attack for more than a decade. "My judgment is, if we weren't in Iraq, they'd find some other excuse, because they have ambitions," the president said.

DOJ_NMG_0070341

But Sen. Joe Biden, the top Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee, said Wednesday that Bush has allowed Iraq to fester as a training ground for terrorists, and U.S. voters are worried about it.

"On Election Day, that morning, if there's still the carnage in the streets of Iraq, then it will be clear that they have concluded that this administration's policy has failed and there will be a political price for it," Biden, D-Del., predicted on CBS' "The Early Show."

Sen. Jay Rockefeller of West Virginia, the intelligence committee's top Democrat, said the decision to invade Iraq shifted focus away from U.S. counterterrorism efforts.

"There is no question that many of our policies have inflamed our enemies' hatred toward the U.S. and allowed violence to flourish," he said. "But it is the mistakes we made in Iraq — the lack of planning, the mismanagement and the complete incompetence of our leadership — that has done the most damage to our security."

Dispute On Intelligence Report Disrupts Republicans' Game Plan (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 27 — The dispute over a newly disclosed National Intelligence Estimate has threatened a pre-election script in which the White House had sought to put Democrats on the defensive on national security.

As the White House saw it, this was to have been the week in which Republicans seized the advantage by pushing two antiterrorism bills through Congress over the objections of recalcitrant Democrats.

Instead, on Wednesday for the second day in a row, Democrats seized on the intelligence report as confirmation of their case that the Iraq war has in fact compounded the global terrorism threat.

Republicans responded by saying Democrats were distorting the findings or were exploiting important intelligence information for political gain. In Congress, the Republicans appeared to give up on passing one of the two antiterrorism bills, the one on surveillance.

Republicans said even if they were momentarily put off course, they were confident that in the end this fight would not help the Democrats. Democrats, they said, lose every time they try to fight Republicans on the issue of security.

"This debate is bringing Republicans back into the political process," said Representative Tom Cole of Oklahoma, who is a contender to be the next leader of the Republican Congressional campaign committee. "If we're going to have an election where swing voters are the main concern, I'll be happy to talk about national security."

Republican leaders also criticized the 160 House Democrats, including Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the minority leader, who voted Wednesday against a measure sought by President Bush to change the conditions for trying and questioning terrorism suspects.

The House speaker, J. Dennis Hastert, Republican of Illinois, said, "The same terrorists who plan to harm innocent Americans and their freedoms would be coddled, if we followed the Democratic plan."

Democrats made clear that even though many of them opposed the bill, they would not block it from becoming law, a distinction that they believe will make it more difficult for the White House to use this vote against them.

If anything this week, the back-and-forth between the parties — on the intelligence report, on the bills and on the war itself — seemed to produce at best a muddled result, rather than the sharp contrast that the White House had sought.

Democrats have watched with concern as Mr. Bush hammered his arguments on Iraq and terrorism.

There are new indications that Democrats regard the intelligence report as an opportunity to undercut what had been a main argument of Mr. Bush.

It took Democrats barely three days to seize on the intelligence findings in a new television advertisement in one of the most contested races in the country, the challenge to Representative Nancy L. Johnson, Republican of Connecticut, who supports the war. The campaign of Ms. Johnson's opponent, Christopher Murphy, began broadcasting the commercial, which says, "President Bush's war in Iraq has increased the threat of terrorism and made us less secure here at home."

Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who is leading the Democrats' campaign to win Congress, said the intelligence assessment undercut the White House attempt to move the election from Iraq and to stronger Republican ground, terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0070342

"They had a strategy for this fall to be about national security, and the entire debate this week has turned into the president's failure in Iraq," Mr. Emanuel said. "That is not where they want to be right now."

Republicans disputed the argument that the events were as significant or damaging as Democrats said. Nevertheless, the events were the latest indication that Democrats now see the war in Iraq as an issue that can help them win critical districts and that candidates and party leaders would, unlike in the elections of 2002 and 2004, challenge any attempt by the White House to claim primacy on the issue of terrorism.

Jim Jordan, a Democratic analyst, argued that Republicans were paying a price for having linked the Iraq war to terrorism in previous campaigns.

"They would rather talk about terrorism than Iraq," Mr. Jordan said. "The problem they have got is they formed a linkage between the two that helped them in '04 and hurt them in '06."

In pushing back and trying to gain dominance in the debate, Republicans made two arguments. The first was that Democrats were purposely mischaracterizing what the report said.

"The key passage in the National Intelligence Estimate declassified and released yesterday was that for us to cut and run in Iraq would simply embolden our enemy in a way that they were emboldened when we left Somalia," said Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas.

The second was to suggest that Democrats were trying to exploit intelligence for political gain and to insinuate that they were responsible for leaking the information.

"The purpose of the leak was to distort the premise of the National Intelligence Estimate to try to lend weight to the Democratic argument that the war in Iraq does not really matter, we are losing the war in Iraq, and it doesn't have anything to do with the war on terror," said Senator Christopher S. Bond, Republican of Missouri.

It was too soon to tell, aides to both parties said Wednesday, whether the arguments will hold much sway with voters, much less break through all the arguments occurring here and in Congressional campaigns at home.

Yet one thing was clear. Republicans were not talking about what they wanted to be talking about. And at a time when Democrats are trying to turn the debate from national security, where they are not strong, to the war, which is Mr. Bush's weakness, the intelligence reports provided what Democrats said was a weapon that they very much needed.

"We are less safe today because of the Iraq war," said Senator Charles E. Schumer, the New York Democrat who is Mr. Emanuel's Senate counterpart. "That is a very trenchant argument."

Iraq And Jihad: A Consensus Surfaces (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON

The bleak conclusions of a just-declassified intelligence assessment on terrorism are unlikely to push the Bush administration to change its policies in the fight against Al Qaeda. The report's finding - that Islamist terrorism continues to spread around the world - is far from new, say experts. The White House has known of its contents for months.

But the disclosure of the assessment's main points could put the White House on the political defensive at a crucial moment, with midterm elections only weeks away. It also reveals a depth of pessimism in the US government about near-term prospects for the fight against Al Qaeda that surprised some terrorism analysts.

National Intelligence Estimates, after all, represent the thinking of a wide range of US intelligence agencies. It is not as if the CIA alone has decided that the Iraq war is an underlying factor increasing Al Qaeda's appeal in the Arab world.

"It's not the assumptions that surprised me. It's the fact that this was a consensus document," says Jessica Stern, a lecturer in public policy at Harvard's John F. Kennedy School of Government and a terrorism expert.

The existence of the terrorist NIE, along with some of its conclusions, were first revealed Sunday by the The New York Times. On Tuesday, President Bush ordered portions of the document declassified, saying that its contents were being distorted in the media. He said Wednesday he would not release the full report. Terrorists adapt to damaged Al Qaeda

DOJ_NMG_0070343

Among the document's key findings is the conclusion that US-led counterterrorism efforts have seriously damaged the leadership of Al Qaeda and disrupted its operations.

But the report goes on to say that global Islamist terrorism - by which it means Al Qaeda, associated groups, and independent operators - is "spreading and adapting to counterterrorism efforts."

In addition, the report judges that fighting in Iraq is shaping a new generation of terrorist leaders and operatives. "Perceived jihadist success there would inspire more fighters to continue the struggle elsewhere," says the NIE.

Four factors are underlying the continued spread of Islamist terrorism, according to the document. They are entrenched grievances and a feeling of powerlessness among some in the Arab world; the Iraqi "jihad;" the slow pace of political reform in many Muslim nations; and pervasive anti-US sentiment.

"We assess that the underlying factors fueling the spread of the movement outweigh its vulnerabilities and are likely to do so for the [five-year] time frame of this Estimate," concludes the NIE.

Some experts find the NIE a less-than-compelling document. Its hedging and passive voice reflect an analysis-by-committee approach that isn't all that helpful to policymakers, says William Martel, associate professor of international security studies at Tufts University's Fletcher School of International Diplomacy.

One of its conclusions, Professor Martel points out, is that the global jihadist movement is now using the Internet to communicate and to promote its ideology.

"No kidding!" says Martel. "I was stunned at how pedestrian it was."

The report emphasizes that the fight against terrorism will be a long-term endeavor, and that it will require reforms in Muslim societies to be effective.

"It's unavoidable that we're involved in a war on terror," says Martel. "I prefer that we play offense and not defense," he adds, referring to the debate over the Iraq war.

Others say the bleak tone of some parts of the NIE belie Mr. Bush's optimistic assessments of progress, particularly in Iraq. The political calculus

With elections that will determine which party controls Congress now less than six weeks away, Democrats have pressed to make "Iraq" the word that pops into voters' minds when they think about Republicans. The GOP, for its part, does better when "terrorism" is the security issue voters most care about.

Thus Democrats have highlighted the NIE's conclusion that the invasion and occupation of Iraq have inflamed anti-US sentiments. Some in the party have pressed for the release of the full NIE document, not just its main findings.

"The American people deserve the full story, not those parts of it that the Bush administration selects," said Sen. Edward Kennedy (D) of Massachusetts.

Military pressure has had an effect on Al Qaeda, changing it from a centralized organization to more of a diffuse movement, according to the NIE.

But the invasion of Iraq has allowed jihadists a "cause célèbre," the document notes. They can pose as liberators of the oppressed, increasing their appeal in the Muslim world.

"The intelligence community has concluded that we did what they wanted us to do, for the reasons they wanted us to do it, and that the result they wanted has happened," says Ms. Stern of the Kennedy School of Government.

But the report also notes that the jihadists would be further helped by an appearance of success in Iraq - such as a US pullout. Their cause would be damaged, says the NIE, if "jihadists leaving Iraq perceive themselves, and be perceived, to have failed...."

For this and other reasons, "I don't think we have good choices in Iraq," says Stern.

White House Refuses To Release Full Report On Iraq, Terrorism (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon and Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070344

The White House refused Wednesday to release the rest of a government-intelligence report on terrorism that found the Iraq war is actually spurring the proliferation of terrorism, saying that doing so would jeopardize the lives of agents who gathered the information.

Press secretary Tony Snow said releasing the full report, portions of which President Bush declassified on Tuesday, would also risk the nation's ability to keep secret its U.S. intelligence-gathering methods and "compromise the independence" of those charged with analyzing intelligence. "If they think their work is constantly going to be released to the public they are going to pull their punches," Mr. Snow said.

Mr. Snow said the report confirms the importance of the war in Iraq as a bulwark against terrorists. "Iraq has become, for them, the battleground," he said. "If they lose, they lose their bragging rights. They lose their ability to recruit."

INSIDE THE REPORT

• The increased role of Iraqis in opposing al Qaeda in Iraq might lead the terror group's veteran foreign fighters to focus their efforts outside the country.

• While Iran and Syria are the most active state sponsors of terror, many other countries will be unable to prevent their resources from being exploited by terrorists.

• The underlying factors that are fueling the spread of the extremist Muslim movement outweigh its vulnerabilities. These factors are entrenched grievances and a slow pace of reform in home countries, rising anti-U.S. sentiment and the Iraq war.

• Groups "of all stripes" will increasingly use the Internet to communicate, train, recruit and obtain support.

• PDF1 | Plain text2

The White House had released four pages of findings from the National Intelligence Estimate, representing the input of 16 government agencies, amid mounting pressure from Congress after four pages were leaked last week.

The report concludes that the Iraq war is a "cause célèbre" shaping a new generation of militant Islamists and terrorists. It also suggests that, while the leadership of al Qaeda has suffered serious damage in Iraq and the wider war on terror, the threat from Islamic extremists has spread in numbers and geographic reach.

The flap over whether to release the full report or not comes in the run-up to midterm elections, in which the conflict has become a defining issue. Leaders from both parties immediately seized on the findings to argue that their position on the Iraq war would better secure the U.S.

President Bush called those who believe the war has worsened terrorism "naïve," and said to withdraw from Iraq could only further embolden militant groups to spread their influence across the Middle East and the Islamic world.

Sen. Jay Rockefeller (D., W.Va.) senior Democrat on the Senate Intelligence Committee, countered that, "The reality is, the war in Iraq has inflamed Islamic extremism ... and it has created a training ground for the next generation of terrorists."

The White House initially sought to dismiss the NIE's leaked portions on Iraq as being mischaracterized, but ultimately agreed to release the report's "Key Judgments." None of the conclusions about Iraq had been redacted, said Francis Fragos Townsend, Mr. Bush's top counter-terrorism official.

The NIE seeks to assess the near-term capabilities of al Qaeda and other militant Islamist groups. It said U.S.-led counter-terrorism operations have "seriously damaged" al Qaeda's senior leadership, but the group continues to spread its ideology by breaking into more diffuse cells and communicating through the Internet. The NIE said Islamists have made particular gains in spreading their influence into Europe, and warned that non-Muslim groups in Latin America and Asia who share al Qaeda's anti-American agenda could also resort to terrorist activities.

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

3

President George Bush and Afghan President4 Hamid Karzai hold a joint press conference to discuss the Iraq policy and the leaking of classified information for political purposes.

On Iraq, the report said the war has aided al Qaeda's efforts to recruit globally by "breeding a deep resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world." It said U.S. success in stabilizing Iraq and promoting democracy, however, could ultimately bring fewer fighters into the fight. "We assess that the underlying factors fueling the spread of the movement outweigh its vulnerabilities" in the near term, the report said.

DOJ_NMG_0070345

As the White House and its critics traded charges over the findings, Congress was poised to approve rules for interrogating and prosecuting suspected foreign combatants, as Democrats eager to avoid political fallout before the elections said they aren't likely to block the measure. The House will take up its bill today and the Senate could follow today or tomorrow.

Some critics of the legislation, which would set up military commissions to try "enemy combatants," want to propose changes. But even without those revisions, Democrats aren't likely to filibuster and many might decide to vote for it, Senate aides said.

One sticking point is a change made in recent days that expands the definition of "enemy combatant." Sen. Carl Levin (D., Mich.) called it "much broader than anyone simply caught in terrorist activity." Another is a provision that would prevent suspects held at Guantanamo Bay from challenging their detention with a habeas corpus petition. Human-rights groups have said this would invite abuse of prisoners and allow the government to hold suspects indefinitely.

In related action, the House approved a $447 billion Pentagon budget for the new fiscal year that begins Oct. 1, including $70 billion in emergency funding for military operations overseas. But a companion defense authorization bill remains stymied by a standoff between Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) and the Senate.

--David Rogers and the Associated Press contributed to this article.

Iraq Report Is Due In '07; Skeptics Want To See It Now (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 27 — In the fall of 2002, weeks before the midterm elections, American intelligence agencies were racing to complete an assessment of Iraq as the Senate prepared to vote on a resolution sought by the White House to prepare the groundwork for war.

Four years later, in the shadow of another midterm campaign, the agencies are again drafting a formal assessment on Iraq. But this time, the document is one that the White House might prefer to see finished later rather than sooner.

In mid-August, John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, gave the go-ahead for a National Intelligence Estimate that will address security in Iraq and the potential for civil war there. White House and intelligence officials say the work is still in its early stages and will not be done until next year.

But Democrats contend that the White House is "slow rolling" the document — that is, deliberately withholding what could be bleak conclusions — until after the November elections. The Democrats have intensified those complaints since the White House, under political pressure, on Tuesday released parts of a separate intelligence report, a sober assessment of global terrorism.

On Wednesday, Representative Jane Harman of California, the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, even said sources had told her that a draft of the document had been finished.

"I have heard that it's complete, and that it's grim," Ms. Harman said.

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, fired back, calling Ms. Harman's assertion "flat wrong."

"There is not a waiting Iraq document that reflects the National Intelligence Estimate that's sitting around gathering dust waiting until after the election," Mr. Snow said.

The intelligence estimate is being done at the behest of members of Congress, including Senator Pat Roberts, Republican of Kansas and chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee. It will be the American intelligence community's first comprehensive assessment on the state of the Iraqi insurgency and the sectarian violence in the country since the summer of 2004.

Intelligence analysts are supposed to keep political calculations out of their work. At the same time, those who have worked at the National Intelligence Council, the group in charge of producing the intelligence estimates, say the sometimes politically charged nature of the reports' conclusions make it impossible to operate in a political vacuum.

"The challenge for intelligence officers is how to walk a fine line, not only with regard to judgments, but with regard to timing," said Paul R. Pillar, who until a year ago oversaw American intelligence assessments about the Middle East.

DOJ_NMG_0070346

Alan Pino, Mr. Pillar's successor at the National Intelligence Council, is now the one walking the fine line. As the national intelligence officer for assessments about the Middle East, Mr. Pino is in charge of a process that usually lasts several months: from first deciding what specific subjects a National Intelligence Estimate will examine to ensuring that the government's 16 intelligence agencies sign off on the final draft.

The clock on the current report started running with Mr. Negroponte's approval in August, and on Tuesday, Frances Fragos Townsend, the president's domestic security adviser, said it would probably be completed in January.

In a letter to Mr. Negroponte on Wednesday, Ms. Harman called the timetable "unacceptable," and suggested that he might be trying to hold the report until after Election Day.

"N.I.E.'s have been produced in as little as several weeks, as in the case of the 2002 report on Iraqi W.M.D.," Ms. Harmon wrote.

Republicans counter that the 2002 Iraq assessment was hardly a model to emulate. Several government investigations have discredited the conclusions of that report, which asserted that Saddam Hussein had stockpiles of chemical and biological weapons. That estimate was hastily assembled in the fall of 2002, requested by lawmakers who said they wanted the intelligence community's best judgments about Iraq before they voted to authorize the invasion.

But after American troops invaded Iraq in March 2003, Iraq became the primary focus of American intelligence agencies. They have produced volumes of analysis on the insurgency and sectarian violence in Iraq, and on the political and economic situation there.

This, some experts say, already gives intelligence officials the building blocks for a National Intelligence Estimate that could be completed in a relatively short time.

"There's not a lot of basic research that needs to be done, that's for sure," Mr. Pillar said.

White House Holds Ground On Terror Study (LAT)

By Greg Miller And Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — The White House defended its interpretation of declassified intelligence findings Wednesday, saying they back President Bush's rationale for sticking with his strategy in Iraq, while Democrats and others said the document proved that the U.S. invasion had increased the terrorist threat.

The administration refused to release the full 30-page report, saying that doing so would endanger the lives of U.S. operatives and possibly reveal surveillance methods. The White House also rebuffed calls for the quick completion and release of a new intelligence report underway that focuses even more closely on conditions in Iraq. That report will not be finished before next year, the White House said.

The five-page portion of the report declassified and released Tuesday concluded that terrorism was growing and spreading worldwide, fueled by the war in Iraq, and that the "Iraq jihad" was shaping "a new generation of terrorist leaders and operatives." The report is known as a National Intelligence Estimate, a consensus view of the CIA and all of the other 15 U.S. intelligence agencies.

White House spokesman Tony Snow, facing questions about how Bush's views that the U.S. is winning the war against terrorism square with the considerably bleaker findings of the intelligence report, fiercely defended the president's stance.

"Let's start with the obvious: Since Sept. 11, 2001, we have not been attacked," Snow said, adding that aggressive American tactics had made it difficult for terrorist organizations to mobilize and strike the United States.

A chorus of Democrats, however, countered that the report showed that the U.S.-led war in Iraq was inspiring, training and equipping militants to launch attacks elsewhere. "Iraq has become a breeding ground for terrorists," Sen. Ken Salazar (D-Colo.) said. "The world is a much more dangerous place today."

The debate over the intelligence findings comes as national security dominates the midterm election campaigns that will determine control of Congress, and as U.S. forces in Iraq struggle to establish order in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0070347

U.S. military officials in Iraq said Wednesday that the number of suicide attacks this week was the highest of any week since the war began. Without giving numbers, they said that attacks overall had risen in the last two weeks, especially in and around Baghdad, despite an ongoing U.S.-led crackdown on militants in the capital.

American intelligence officials said they did not expect any other portions of the intelligence estimate to be declassified. Officials from both parties who have read the document said the remaining pages provided far more detail on the complexion of the spread of Islamic radicalism, but were consistent with the "key judgments" that had been declassified.

"It just expands on those key judgments," said a senior U.S. intelligence official who spoke on condition of anonymity. "It's not like there's a Version A and a Version B. They are the underpinning or basis for the statements" that were released.

Rep. Jane Harman (D-Venice), the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, said the complete report had "more information on Iraq, more nuance, more detail."

"But I'm not telling you these key judgments are an unfair representation of the report," she said.

The document was delivered to the House and Senate intelligence committees after its completion in April, but few members not on those panels have seen the entire report. Congressional officials said that Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte's office had informed members this week that it planned to make the entire classified document available to all lawmakers.

The impact of the intelligence estimate prompted new calls Wednesday for faster completion of the second report in the works that is to focus exclusively on the situation in Iraq.

Frances Townsend, White House domestic security advisor, said Wednesday that the intelligence estimate focusing on Iraq was expected to be finished in January. A senior U.S. intelligence official cautioned, however, that Negroponte's office had not set a timetable for the completion of the work, suggesting it could be delayed beyond the beginning of next year.

Harman called that "unacceptable" in a letter to Negroponte on Wednesday, and questioned whether there were political reasons for putting the report off until next year.

Work on the new intelligence estimate on Iraq was begun in August, after Democrats on the Senate Intelligence Committee requested a new, thorough intelligence examination of the state of the conflict there.

Meanwhile, the White House moved aggressively Wednesday to counter arguments from Democrats that the intelligence report painted a dismal picture of Bush's policies and challenged administration descriptions of terrorist groups reeling under the U.S.-led assault.

"The critical judgment here is Iraq has become for [terrorists] the battleground," Snow said. "If they lose, they lose their bragging rights. They lose their ability to recruit.... The president has made the point over and over."

Snow said Bush's position that Americans were safer now was not undermined by the intelligence estimate's assertion that the number of jihadists had grown. Instead, Snow argued that militants were less organized than before, and that, as a result, the U.S. was less likely to be hit.

Bush "has not tried to say there are fewer," Snow said. "He has not tried to say that they haven't been winning propaganda victories. What he has said is: We've got a different kind of enemy, and we have kept America safe, and we will continue to do it."

Snow said that the report, along with additional information about how terrorists were doing business, had prompted changes in U.S. strategy.

"It does, in fact, talk about a more dispersed terror network; it does talk about [how] people are communicating over the Internet; it does talk about the necessity of approaching this from a number of different angles," he said. "So the answer is, yes, there has been a much more nuanced approach to doing this. And this is what happens as the war against terror continues. As they adjust, we adjust."

Lessons Of The NIE (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

National Intelligence Estimates are bland documents that represent the lowest-common-denominator judgment of more than a dozen intelligence agencies. We doubt they're very useful for policy makers, and they certainly aren't suitable for use as political cudgels in a national election.

DOJ_NMG_0070348

But we now know that's exactly what a few leaking spooks, the New York Times and credulous Democrats just tried to do. Sunday's Times led with a story sourced to anonymous "intelligence officials" and headlined "Spy Agencies Say Iraq War Worsens Terrorism Threat." Democratic critics of the Iraq war promptly seized on the report. But now that President Bush has declassified the "Key Findings" of the April 2006 NIE on "Trends in Global Terrorism," we know this scoop was largely political spin. A more accurate headline would have been: "Spy Agencies Say Abandoning Iraq Would Worsen Terror Threat."

True, the NIE says post-Saddam Iraq has become a "cause celebre" for jihadists. But that's merely stating the obvious. Any U.S. intervention in the Mideast was going to provoke an extremist response. The more important statement in that same bullet point is: "Should jihadists leaving Iraq perceive themselves, and be perceived, to have failed, we judge fewer fighters will be inspired to carry on the fight."

In other words, it's abandoning Iraq that would be the huge mistake -- while success would be a major antiterror victory. This is a blunt rebuke of Democratic Representative Jack Murtha and his House allies, who want to replace U.S. troops in Iraq with an "over-the-horizon" force -- in Okinawa, as he once put it.

And what about the larger Democratic theme that the war in Iraq has been a "distraction" from the fight against al Qaeda? In its very first sentence, the NIE says "United States-led counterterrorism efforts have seriously damaged the leadership of al Qaeda and disrupted its operations." It also suggests dwelling on the failure to capture or kill Osama bin Laden is a mistake: "Countering the spread of the jihadist movement will require coordinated multilateral efforts that go well beyond operations to capture or kill terrorist leaders."

More broadly, the NIE seems to endorse addressing the root causes of terrorism through democracy promotion: "If democratic reform efforts in Muslim majority nations progress over the next five years, political participation probably would drive a wedge between intransigent extremists and groups willing to use the political process."

And: "Greater pluralism and more responsive political systems in Muslim majority nations would alleviate some of the grievances jihadists exploit. Over time, such progress, together with sustained, multifaceted programs targeting the vulnerabilities of the jihadist movement and continued pressure on al Qaeda, could erode support for the jihadists."

This is hardly earth-shattering stuff, we grant. But it sure sounds more like an affirmation of the Bush Administration's general approach to the war on terror than what the Times described when it quoted an unnamed "intelligence official" that "the Iraq war has made the overall terrorism problem worse."

But then anyone who understood the process of producing NIEs would never have made such a big deal about the document. President Bush could do himself, and the country, a favor if he reacted to this latest attempt to politicize NIEs by asking our spy agencies to stop producing them. Their focus should be more and better intelligence. They should leave the policy judgments to elected officials -- and the voters.

A Good Estimate (WP)

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

THOUGH IT undermined some of his rhetoric, President Bush was right to declassify and release the intelligence community's most recent estimate of global terrorism. The three-page summary of "key judgments," originally delivered to the White House in April, provides a clear, reasoned and sobering account of the state of the Islamic extremist threat five years after Sept. 11, 2001. Its release ought to deepen rather than inflame the debate in Washington -- if only because the assessment is far superior to that being retailed to the country by the president or by most Democrats.

The bad news in the report -- and there is a lot of it -- is that U.S. intelligence agencies believe that the number of Islamic "jihadists" is growing and that the threat is spreading to more countries, particularly in Europe. The Iraq conflict, it says, "has become the 'cause celebre' " for such militants, and "the Iraq jihad is shaping a new generation of terrorist leaders and operatives." If current trends continue, the report predicts "increasing attacks worldwide."

These grim conclusions are hard to square with Mr. Bush's contention that the country is "safer" today than it was five years ago or that the invasion of Iraq helped rather than hindered the fight against terrorism. In fact, the president seems unwilling to accept the conclusions of the intelligence professionals. On Tuesday he said it is naive to think that terrorism would be less pervasive if the invasion of Iraq had not taken place.

DOJ_NMG_0070349

Democrats are citing the intelligence estimate as proof that Iraq has been a catastrophe. Those among them who prophesied four years ago that an invasion would provide new recruits for al-Qaeda's cause can justifiably claim some vindication. But the report also poses problems for Democratic leaders such as House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.), who say the solution in Iraq is an early withdrawal of U.S. troops. The report supports Mr. Bush's contention that Iraq is now a central front in the war on terrorism; it says "perceived jihadist success there would inspire more fighters to continue the struggle elsewhere," while defeat would mean that "fewer fighters will be inspired to carry on the fight."

The larger thrust of the report goes well beyond Iraq or the cacophony of the midterm election campaign. It says "the most powerful weapon in the war on terror" over time will be not military success in Iraq or the capturing and killing of al-Qaeda leaders, but "the Muslim mainstream." The vast majority of Muslims are likely to reject the extreme political solutions proposed by al-Qaeda and its allies, and they will be more likely to do so if "democratic reform efforts in Muslim-majority nations progress" and entrenched problems of "corruption, injustice, and fear of Western domination" are alleviated.

The U.S. mission in Iraq since the overthrow of Saddam Hussein has been largely aimed at those goals, in one of the Muslim world's most important countries. It should be little wonder that the effort, like U.S. promotion of democracy in Lebanon and within the Palestinian Authority, has provoked an extremist backlash. Were it to retreat altogether from the Middle East, the United States could probably reduce the number of Islamic extremist recruits in the next five years. Yet any careful reader of the intelligence estimate will find it hard to conclude that the war can be won that way.

Declassifying The Obvious (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 28, 2006

THE JUDGMENT OF THE National Intelligence Estimate partly made public this week — that "the Iraq conflict has become the 'cause celebre' for jihadists" — did not unveil an especially novel viewpoint or theory. So why has the report, assembled by U.S. intelligence agencies in April, caused such a sensation?

Partly it's the official pedigree of the document; partly it's the unconvincing attempt by President Bush to explain it away. In announcing Tuesday that he would declassify parts of the report, he testily suggested that the actual language would discredit "speculation" that it had linked the war in Iraq to a heightened terrorist threat. But the material released to the public came to essentially that conclusion (though it also backed Bush's contention that if jihadists failed in Iraq, they would recruit "fewer fighters" in the future).

Yet even before Bush declassified parts of the report, the document exerted a fascination that cannot be explained solely by its conclusions. Some of the report's mystique stems from the fact that, until Tuesday, it had been a secret.

Several of its observations — not just about the relationship between the U.S. presence in Iraq and the growth of "a deep resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world" — are by now conventional wisdom: Jihadism is fostered not only by the Iraq war but also by corruption and repression in Muslim societies; countering the movement will require more than a military response; greater political participation in Muslim societies could drive a wedge between jihadists and political reformers, though it might also cause "destabilizing transitions." Yet because these conclusions were pried from a classified document, there is a frisson that would have been missing if the administration had made them public last spring.

Remember the "Downing Street memo," a once-secret document from 2002 recording a British intelligence official's view that "intelligence and facts were being fixed" by the Bush administration to support its long-standing intention to topple Saddam Hussein? The publication of the memo in 2005 created a sensation in Britain and the United States, even though it reflected one man's view (albeit one long held by critics of the war in both countries) and was far from a smoking gun.

Government officials often are accused of belonging to a cult of classification, and officials in the Bush administration have a particular fetish about secrecy. But they aren't the only ones to ascribe special importance to a secret, whether it's "The Da Vinci Code" or the Downing Street memo. Forbidden fruits of intelligence analysis always will be more tantalizing than the ones put on public view.

The argument that the U.S. presence in Iraq has exacerbated the international terrorist threat is an important one fully deserving of discussion. So is the NIE's conclusion, more congenial to the Bush administration, that defeating insurgents in Iraq would demoralize other potential jihadists. That debate was going on before the NIE was publicized. And it should continue after the thrill of declassification is gone.

DOJ_NMG_0070350

Infidel Documents (WSJ)

By Fouad Ajami

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

The scaffolding of the Iraq war is under renewed attack. So there had been no meeting between Mohamed Atta and Iraqi intelligence operative Ahmad al-Ani in Prague; and Saddam's regime was "intensely secular" while al Qaeda was steeped in religious doctrine. Tariq Aziz, once Goebbels to his master, now in captivity, says that Saddam had only "negative sentiments" about Osama bin Laden, and that the despot had issued a decree "outlawing Wahhabism in Iraq and threatening offenders with execution."

The case against the Iraq war now has a new canonical document: a report by the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, released on Sept. 8. Opponents of the war -- to use their own language against the Bush administration -- now "cherry pick" this report, and they find in it the damning evidence that had been their conviction all along. In their eyes, the case for this war was a willful hoax. And on the heels of this report, it was revealed that the National Intelligence Estimate now depicts Iraq as the breeding ground of a new generation of terrorists.

Intended or not, the release of the Senate report, around the fifth anniversary of 9/11, has been read as definitive proof that the Iraq war stands alone, that the terrors that came America's way on 9/11 had nothing to do with the origins of the war. Few will read this report; fewer still will ask why a virtually incomprehensible Arab-Islamic world that has eluded us for so long now yields its secrets to a congressional committee. On the face of it, and on the narrowest of grounds, the report maintains that the link between the war on terror and the invasion of Iraq cannot stand in a Western court of inquiry.

But this brutal drawn-out struggle between American power and the furies of the Arab-Islamic world was never a Western war. Our enemies were full of cunning and expert at dissimulation, hunkering down when needed. No one in the coffeehouses of the Arab world (let alone in the safe houses of the terrorists) would be led astray by that distinction between "secular" and "religious" movements emphasized by the Senate Intelligence Committee. They live in a world where the enemies of order move with remarkable ease from outward religious piety to the most secular of appearances. It is no mystery to them that Saddam, once the most secular of despots, fell back on religious symbols after the first Gulf War, added Allahu Akbar (God is great) to Iraq's flag, and launched a mosque-building campaign whose remnants -- half-finished mosques all over Baghdad -- now stand mute.

No Iraqi agents had to slip into hotel rooms in Prague for meetings with jihadists to plot against America. The plot sprang out of the deep structure of Arab opinion. We waged a war against Saddam in 1991 and then spared him. We established a presence in the Arabian Peninsula to monitor him, only to help radicalize a population with religious phobias about the "infidel" presence on Arabian soil. The most devout and the most religiously lapsed of the Arabs alike could see the feebleness of America's response to a decade of subversion and terror waged by Arab plotters and bankrolled by Arab financiers. The American desire to launch out of Iraq a broader campaign of deterrence against the radical forces of the region may not have been successful in every way, but the effort was driven by a shrewd reading that, after Kabul, the war had to be taken deep into the Arab world itself. * * *

Strictly speaking, the National Intelligence Estimate -- another "canonical" document -- is not a finding: It is an assessment of Islamic terrorism and its perceived links to Iraq. (It is odd, and ironic, that the intelligence agencies that had been mocked by liberal opinion for their reporting on Iraq before the war have now acquired an aura of infallibility.) Islamic terror did not wait on the Iraq war. The assertion that Islamic terrorism has "metastasized and spread across the globe" because of Iraq takes at face value what the jihadists themselves proclaim. It would stand to reason that their Web sites, and the audiotapes of their leaders, would trumpet their attachment to the cause of Iraq. It is inevitable that American analysts glued to jihadist cyberspace, and lacking intimate knowledge of Arab ways, would take the jihadists at their word. But Islamic radicals have not lacked for grievances. The anti-Americanism and antimodernism that brought them onto American soil five years ago predated Iraq. For the good part of two decades, jihadist terror blew at will, driven by the conviction in the lands of Islam and its diaspora communities that America was a pampered land with little zeal for bloody struggles.

DOJ_NMG_0070351

The declassified portions of the NIE are not particularly profound in the reading of Islamism. Their sociologese is of a piece with a big body of writing on Islamist movements -- that the resentments of these movements arise out of "anger, humiliation and a sense of powerlessness" in the face of the West. I dare guess that were Ayman al-Zawahiri to make his way through this report, he would marvel at the naïveté of those who set out to read him and his fellow warriors of the faith. Ayoob al-Masri (Zarqawi's successor in Iraq) would not find himself and his phobias and his will to power in this "infidel document." These warriors have a utopia -- an Islamic world ruled by their own merciless brand of the faith. With or without Iraq, the work of "cleansing" Islam's world would continue to rage on.

It was inevitable that the Arabs would regard this American project in Iraq through the prism of their own experience. We upended an order of power in Baghdad, dominated as it had been by the Sunni Arabs; and we emancipated the Shiite stepchildren of the Arab world, as well as the Kurds. Our innocence was astounding. We sinned against the order of the universe, but called on the region to celebrate, to bless our work. More to the point, we set the Shia on their own course. We did for them what they could not have done on their own. For our part, we were ambivalent about the coming of age of the Shia. We had battled radical Shiism in Iran and in Lebanon in the 1980s. The symbols of Shiism we associated with political violence -- radical mullahs, martyrology, suicide bombers. True, in the interim, we had had a war -- undeclared, but still a war -- with Sunni jihadists. But there lingered in us an aversion to radical Shiism, an understandable residue of the campaign that Ayatollah Khomeini had waged against American power in the '80s. We were susceptible as well to the representations made to us by rulers in the Sunni-ruled states about the dangers of radical Shiism.

The case against the war makes much of Iran's new power in Iraq. To the war critics, President Bush has midwifed a second Islamic republic in Iraq, next door to Iran. But Iran cannot run away with Iraq, and talk of an ascendant Iran in Iraqi affairs is overblown. We belittle the Iraqi Shiites -- their sense of home, and of a tradition so thoroughly Iraqi and Arab -- when we write them off as instruments of Iran. Inevitably, there is Iranian money in Iraq, and there are agents, but this is the logic of the 900-mile Iranian-Iraqi border.

True, in the long years of Tikriti/Saddamist dominion, Shiite political men persecuted by the regime sought sanctuary in Iran; a political party, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, and its military arm, the Badr Brigade, rose in those years with Iranian patronage. But the Iraqi exiles are not uniform in their attitudes toward Iran. Exile was hard, and the Iranian hosts were given to arrogance and paternalism. Iraqi exiles were subordinated to the strategic needs of the Iranian regime. Much is made, and appropriately, of the way the Americans who prosecuted the first Gulf War called for rebellions by the Shiites (and the Kurds), only to walk away in indifference as the Saddam regime struck back with vengeance. But the Iranians, too, averted their gaze from the slaughter. States are merciless, the Persian state no exception to that rule.

We should not try to impose more order and consensus on the world of Shiite Iraq than is warranted by the facts. In recent days a great faultline within the Shiites could be seen: The leader of the Supreme Council for the Revolution in Iraq, Sayyid Abdulaziz al-Hakim, has launched a big campaign for an autonomous Shiite federated unit that would take in the overwhelmingly Shiite provinces in the south and the middle Euphrates, but this project has triggered the furious opposition of Hakim's nemesis, the young cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. Hakim's bid was transparent. He sought to be the uncrowned king of a Shiite polity. But he was rebuffed. Sadr was joined in opposition to that scheme by the Daawa Party of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, by the Virtue Party, and by those secular Shiites who had come into the national assembly with former Prime Minister Iyad Allawi. A bitter struggle now plays out in the Shiite provinces between the operatives of the Badr Brigade and Sadr's Mahdi Army. The fight is draped in religious colors -- but it is about the spoils of power.

The truculence of the Sunni Arabs has brought forth the Shiite vengeance that a steady campaign of anti-Shiite terror was bound to trigger. Sunni elements have come into the government, but only partly so. President Jalal Talabani put it well when he said that there are elements in Iraq that partake of government in the daytime, and of terror at night. This is as true of the Sunni Arabs as it is of the Shiites. The (Sunni) insurgents were relentless: In the most recent of events, they have taken terror deep into Sadr City. The results were predictable: The death squads of the Mahdi Army struck back.

DOJ_NMG_0070352

It is idle to debate whether Iraq is in a state of civil war. The semantics are tendentious, and in the end irrelevant. There is mayhem, to be sure, but Iraq has arrived at a rough balance of terror. The Sunni Arabs now know, as they had never before, that their tyranny is broken for good. And the most recent reports from Anbar province speak of a determination of the Sunni tribes to be done with the Arab jihadists.

It is not a rhetorical flourish to say that the burden of rescuing Iraq lies with its leaders. No script had America staying indefinitely, fighting Iraq's wars, securing Iraq's peace. The best we can do for Iraq is grant it time to develop the military and political capabilities that would secure it against insurgencies at home and subversion from across its borders. No one can say with confidence how long the American body politic will tolerate the expense in blood and treasure. It would be safe to assume that this president will stay with this war, that its burden is likely to be passed onto his successor. The Iraqis are approaching reckoning time, for America's leaders are under pressure to force history's pace. The political process here at home is not likely to impose a precise deadline for withdrawal. But the Iraqis should not be lulled into complacency, for the same political process is more likely to place limits on this commitment in Iraq.

For their part, the Iranians will press on: The spectacle of power they display is illusory. It is a broken society over which the mullahs rule. A society that throws on the scene a leader of Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's derangement is not an orderly land; foreigners may not be able to overthrow that regime, but countries can atrophy as their leaders -- armed, here, by an oil windfall of uncertain duration -- strut on the world stage. Iran's is a deeper culture than Iraq's, possessed of a keen sense of Persia's primacy in the region around it. What Iranians make of their own history will not wait on the kind of society that will emerge in Iraq. On the margins, a scholarly tradition in Najaf given to moderation could be a boon to the clerics of Iran. But the Iranians will not know deliverance from the sterility of their world if Iraq were to fail. Their schadenfreude over an American debacle in Iraq will have to be brief. A raging fire next door to them would not be pretty. And, crafty players, the Iranians know what so many in America who guess at such matters do not: that Iraq is an unwieldy land, that the Arab-Persian divide in culture, language and temperament is not easy to bridge.

We needn't give credence to the assertion of President Bush -- that the jihadists would turn up in our cities if we pulled up stakes from Baghdad -- to recognize that a terrible price would be paid were we to opt for a hasty and unseemly withdrawal from Iraq. This is a region with a keen eye for the weakness of strangers. The heated debate about the origins of our drive into Iraq would surely pale by comparison to the debate that would erupt -- here and elsewhere -- were we to give in to despair and cast the Iraqis adrift.

Mr. Ajami, a professor at the School of Advanced International Studies at Johns Hopkins, is the author, most recently, of "The Foreigner's Gift" (Free Press, 2006). He is a recipient of the 2006 Bradley Prize.

The Grand Delusion (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

You probably know Daniel Defoe as the author of "Robinson Crusoe," but he was also a journalist, and in 1705, he noticed a gigantic change occurring around him. "The Power of Nations," he wrote, "is not now measur'd, as it has been, by Prowess, Gallantry, and Conduct. 'Tis the Wealth of Nations that makes them Great."

In other words, nations had begun measuring themselves not by whom they conquered, but by how they fared in the competition for economic success. This was a major shift in consciousness, and as the great historian of nationalism, Liah Greenfeld, observes, today you can see a wide variety of societies — the U.S., Japan, China, India, Europe — that define their national greatness in this way.

The Arab world, though famous for its bazaars, has not defined national glory economically, Greenfeld adds. Instead, the rising radical groups today define greatness negatively through acts of anti-Western defiance.

Superseding market entrepreneurs, there are terror entrepreneurs competing to see who can issue the most militant call and perform the most galvanizing act of violence. They are driven by resentment toward the West, but also by the internal competition for prestige and standing.

DOJ_NMG_0070353

To his eternal credit, after 9/11 George Bush quickly understood that the terror threat was fundamentally an ideological threat, a product of deep historical consciousness. To his eternal discredit, he didn't commit enough resources to successfully defeat and discredit that ideology. The chance to deliver the sort of blow that the Six Day War delivered to an earlier version of Arab nationalism may now be lost.

As a result, as the National Intelligence Estimate makes clear, the West now faces a diverse and metastasizing set of foes. The report also makes clear that while the Iraq war has so far enhanced the prestige of the terrorists, Iraq remains the crucial battleground where they will either gain glory or face humiliation.

If we lived in a serious political culture, we'd be discussing what we've learned from Iraq and how to proceed. Instead, all of Washington is involved in a juvenile game of gotcha. Bill Clinton is fighting about what did or didn't happen 10 years ago. The White House is still exaggerating the positive. Democratic senators purr like happy kittens as retired generals slam Donald Rumsfeld, and then stop up their ears when those same generals call for more troops and a longer war.

Voters now confront a Republican Party that understands the breadth of the threat but has bungled the central campaign, and a Democratic Party that is quick to criticize but lacks an understanding of the jihadists and a strategy for confronting them.

Worse, more and more people are falling for the Grand Delusion — the notion that if we just leave the extremists alone, they will leave us alone. On the right, some believe that if we just stop this Wilsonian madness of trying to introduce democracy into the Arab world, we can return to an age of stability and balance. On the left, many people can't seem to fathom an enemy the U.S. isn't somehow responsible for. Others think the entire threat has been exaggerated by Karl Rove for the sake of political scaremongering.

Perhaps it's understandable that many Americans would fall for this Grand Delusion. The Israelis, who have more experience with Islamic extremism, recently did. They imagined that they could build a security barrier and unilaterally withdraw from their historical reality. It took the war in south Lebanon to make them see there is no way to unilaterally withdraw. There is no way to become a normal society. Even if they pulled out of Lebanon, Gaza and the West Bank, they would still have to confront an existential foe, so long as the forces of political Islam continued to wage their competition for anti-Semitic glory all around.

The blunt fact is that groups of Islamic extremists will continue to compete and grow until mainstream Islamic moderates can establish a more civilized set of criteria for prestige and greatness. Today's extremists are not the product of short-term historical circumstances, but of consciousness and culture. They are not the fault of the United States, but have roots stretching back centuries. They will not suddenly ignore their foe — us — when their hatred of us is the core of their identity.

The National Intelligence Estimate predicts terror violence will get worse in the years ahead. The scarier estimate was made by a veteran of the 1948 Arab-Israeli war, in conversation with his grandson who now lives in Boston: "This is forever."

At Dinner Table, Bush Plays Role Of Mediator (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

President Bush welcomed the feuding leaders of Afghanistan and Pakistan to the White House last night for an unusual round of personal diplomacy aimed at forging better relations between two key partners in U.S. efforts to hunt down members of al-Qaeda and other Islamic terrorists.

Dining on spicy sea bass and pumpkin cake with Bush and his most senior advisers were Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, and his Afghan counterpart, Hamid Karzai. The two have been sniping at each other for months over what Karzai considers Pakistan's tolerance of Taliban militants crossing the border to mount armed attacks in Afghanistan.

Musharraf has testily rebutted Karzai's assertions, but U.S. officials are worried that the deteriorating relations between the two men threaten their effort to pacify Afghanistan and hunt down Osama bin Laden, who is believed to be hiding in the mountainous region of Pakistan bordering Afghanistan.

"They really get under each other's skin," said one senior U.S. official who was not authorized to speak publicly about the White House dinner before it got started last night.

DOJ_NMG_0070354

Administration officials said they hoped at the very least the two men would find less public forums to express their annoyance with each other. Shortly before going into the White House last night, Bush told reporters in the Rose Garden that the dinner was "a chance for us to strategize together, to talk about the need to cooperate."

"These two men are personal friends of mine," Bush said, with Karzai and Musharraf standing by his side, not looking at each other. "They are strong leaders who have a understanding of the world in which we live. They understand that the forces of moderation are being challenged by extremists and radicals."

The dinner lasted about 2 1/2 hours, and the White House offered only a vague indication of what occurred. A White House statement said the three leaders "committed to supporting moderation and defeating extremism through greater intelligence sharing, coordinated action against terrorists, and common efforts to enhance the prosperity of the people of Afghanistan and Pakistan."

The three-way summit came as the Bush administration, already grappling with crises over the Iraq war and over Iran's nuclear ambitions, is confronting a resurgent Taliban.

Although toppled five years ago in a U.S.-led invasion, the Taliban now controls swaths of southern Afghanistan and has fought increasingly violent battles with NATO troops patrolling the border regions. The number of U.S. troops in Afghanistan in recent months has swelled to more than 20,000.

Tense relations between Pakistan and Afghanistan date back years. Pakistan was one of three countries to recognize the previous Taliban government that sheltered bin Laden. Pakistan broke with the Taliban after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, and the leaders have blamed each other in recent months for insufficient zeal in fighting Islamic militants along the countries' long border.

Answering questions last week at the Council on Foreign Relations in New York, Karzai said Taliban leader Mullah Omar is hiding out in the Pakistani provincial capital of Quetta and suggested that Musharraf is not interested in hunting him down.

For his part, Musharraf has suggested that Karzai has bad information and, as he said in an interview on CNN this week, is not telling the truth about circumstances in Afghanistan. "He knows everything, but he's purposely denying -- turning a blind eye, like an ostrich," Musharraf said.

Musharraf has also been using his visit to the United States to promote his new memoirs, which offer provocative statements about his battle with Islamic militants. U.S. officials believe that bin Laden is in Pakistan, but Musharraf speculates that because of the large number of Saudis living in the Konar province of Afghanistan, the al-Qaeda leader is probably hiding there.

Bush Urges Karzai, Musharraf To Unite To Defeat Terrorism (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush appealed to the bickering presidents of Pakistan and Afghanistan on Wednesday to put aside their differences and "strategize together" over dinner on ways to defeat the common enemy of terrorism.

Standing between Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf and Afghan President Hamid Karzai, Mr. Bush emphasized "the need to cooperate, to make sure that people have got a hopeful future" in both countries.

Mr. Karzai calls Mr. Musharraf "my brother," but after months of sniping that put the White House in the middle of a spat between two of its closest allies, Mr. Bush decided it was time to bring the leaders together.

Judging by the body language Mr. Bush himself had said he would be watching, there were plenty of tensions to overcome over a light dinner of soup, sea bass and salad. The meal was billed as an "iftar," a meal that breaks the daytime fast during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan. Messrs. Musharraf and Karzai are Muslims.

The Afghan and Pakistani leaders stood stiffly on either side of Mr. Bush during a brief Rose Garden appearance before they ate. "I look forward to having dinner with friends of mine who don't happen to share the same faith I do but nevertheless share the same outlook for a more hopeful world," Mr. Bush said in the brief remarks before dinner.

"It's very important for the people in Pakistan and in Afghanistan to know that America respects religion, and we respect the right for people to worship the way they see fit," he said.

"Today's dinner is a chance for us to strategize together" and find common solutions, Mr. Bush said.

DOJ_NMG_0070355

Neither Messrs. Musharraf nor Karzai, both key U.S. allies in the region, spoke.

Mr. Musharraf remained expressionless during his host's brief remarks, while Mr. Karzai repeatedly nodded agreeably. Messrs. Karzai and Musharraf never touched, each taking Bush's hand before turning to go inside, but not each other's.

"These two men are personal friends of mine," Mr. Bush said. "They are strong leaders who have an understanding of the world in which we live. They understand that the forces of moderation are being challenged by extremists and radicals."

For months, Messrs. Karzai and Musharraf have been trading barbs and criticizing each other's efforts to fight terrorists along their long, remote, mountainous border.

Afghan officials allege that Pakistan lets Taliban militants hide out and launch attacks into Afghanistan. Mr. Musharraf says Mr. Karzai has bad information and notes that Pakistan has deployed 80,000 troops along the porous border.

Mr. Karzai says Mr. Musharraf turns a blind eye to hatred and extremism being bred at Islamic schools in Pakistan. At one point, Mr. Musharraf said Mr. Karzai is behaving "like an ostrich," refusing to acknowledge the truth and trying to shore up his political standing at home.

Right up to Wednesday night's White House dinner, they also have pointed fingers at one another over al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden and other terror leaders. Each says Mr. bin Laden isn't hiding in his country and suggests the other might do more to help find him.

Mr. Musharraf wants Mr. Karzai to agree to "a verbal cease-fire" and stepped-up intelligence cooperation to fight terrorism and bring peace to both countries, Pakistan's Foreign Minister Khurshid Kasuri said Wednesday in an Associated Press interview.

All this comes as Afghanistan suffers its worst reversals since the U.S.-led ouster of the extremist Taliban regime nearly five years ago.

The Taliban militants have regrouped and launched an offensive earlier this year whose strength and organization took Afghan and U.S. officials by surprise. They have adopted methods commonly used by militants in Iraq: suicide bombings, ambushes and beheadings. Illegal opium production has risen yearly despite billions spent to suppress it, and Afghanistan is now the source of more than 90% of the world's supply.

The White House clearly thinks that enough is enough.

"The president has made it clear that they've got a shared interest, and the shared interest is combating terrorism," White House press secretary Tony Snow told reporters. "He will remind them of the fact, and I think both men understand that."

Mr. Bush's three-way dinner party, just weeks before the November congressional elections, comes as he is working to convince voters that Republicans are best able to guide the U.S.-led war against terrorism. He faces declining American support for both the U.S.-led war in Iraq and the U.S. military commitment in Afghanistan.

Bush administration officials say that Messrs. Karzai and Musharraf, along with the influential and relatively moderate Iraqi Shiite cleric Ali al-Sistani, are the "indispensable men" of post-Sept. 11 foreign policy for their ability to hold Islamic extremism at bay.

Mr. Musharraf faces little political opposition within Pakistan, but he lives under constant threat of assassination. Mr. Karzai is increasingly embattled, hard-pressed to extend his political control into many regions of Afghanistan and facing a loss of popular support.

Bush Plays Chaperon For Awkward Encounter (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 27 — For the past week, the presidents of Afghanistan and Pakistan have been in the United States, circling one another like wary cats as they lobbed insults across the airwaves from a distance.

On Wednesday night, they stood glumly — more like caged cats — in the Rose Garden with President Bush, who had invited them to the White House for dinner and a little talking-to.

DOJ_NMG_0070356

"We've got a lot of challenges facing us," Mr. Bush said, with President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan on his right and President Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan a safe distance away on his left. "All of us must protect our countries, but at the same time we all must work to make the world a more hopeful place."

Having already met separately with the two men — he received General Musharraf on Friday and President Karzai on Tuesday — Mr. Bush used his three-minute speech to proclaim them both "personal friends of mine" and describe the intimate dinner as "a chance for us to strategize together."

Peter Brookes, a national security expert at the Heritage Foundation, put it another way. "They're looking for marriage counseling," he said, "and maybe President Bush will provide some of that."

The strains in their relationship — each blames the other for the resurgence of the Taliban in Afghanistan — are so obvious that Mr. Bush openly joked about the breach in the East Room of the White House on Tuesday, with Mr. Karzai at his side.

"It will be interesting for me to watch the body language of these two leaders to determine how tense things are," Mr. Bush told reporters then, though he insisted later he was only teasing.

"I'll be good," Mr. Karzai responded.

Though Mr. Karzai politely referred to General Musharraf as "my brother," that has been pretty much the extent of the politesse this week. As General Musharraf toured about, promoting his new autobiography on television programs as varied as "60 Minutes" and "The Daily Show With Jon Stewart," he has made clear his disdain for Mr. Karzai, whom he accuses of "turning a blind eye" to his own deteriorating political situation.

"He is like an ostrich with his head buried in the sand," the general said.

Mr. Karzai was a tad more muted; asked by Wolf Blitzer of CNN on Friday whether he thought General Musharraf was himself "an ostrich," he did not take the bait. But he has made no bones about the fact that he sees the Pakistani leader as giving the Taliban safe haven across the border.

Complicating matters is a deal General Musharraf recently signed with tribal chiefs along the Afghanistan border; Mr. Karzai views it as a pact to cede control to the Taliban.

"Terrorism has only enemies and knows no boundaries," Mr. Karzai told the Council on Foreign Relations last week. "The only course is to kill it. You cannot train a snake to bite someone else."

Whether Mr. Bush can tame the war of words is unclear, but foreign policy experts across the political spectrum give him credit for trying.

"You do have two leaders who want to have a good relationship with the United States and particularly George Bush," said Ivo H. Daalder, a scholar at the Brookings Institution, "so that does provide Bush an opportunity to say, 'You guys need to cooperate. We have a common enemy.' I admire him for doing this. It's the right thing to do."

Richard N. Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, said Mr. Bush's primary challenge was "not only to broker a verbal cease-fire," but also to get the two men to "deal with the core issue" of their dispute over the Taliban.

"What's ironic is these two leaders need each other," he said. "Their personal futures as well as their countries' futures are very much intertwined, yet there is tremendous mistrust and bad blood."

That much was evident Wednesday in the Rose Garden body language, which was as interesting as Mr. Bush had predicted. Although the two foreign leaders were handshake-distance apart — and some thought the president might prod them into one — no hands were extended.

Instead, both stood stiff and expressionless as the president spoke, their hands clasped tightly in front of them. When Mr. Bush ended the awkwardness by announcing, "Let's go eat dinner," General Musharraf gave a quick salute to the press corps. President Karzai extended his arms, palms up, in an empty embrace of the sky.

Bush Hosts Tense Dinner For Karzai, Musharraf (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070357

President Bush joked that he planned to "watch the body language" of Afghan President Hamid Karzai and Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf when he presided over a White House dinner with the two adversaries last night, but if he did, what he saw was grim.

As the president stood between the two leaders, Gen. Musharraf remained expressionless and Mr. Karzai nodded. But neither man looked at the other.

At the end of a brief statement, in which Mr. Bush said with understatement, "We've got a lot of challenges facing us," he shook hands with Gen. Musharraf, then Mr. Karzai. But the two neighbors neither shook hands, nor looked at each other.

The three men then walked grim-faced down the colonnade, heading to what was expected to be a tense dinner of "sunchoke" soup, spicy sea bass and endive salad in the Old Family Dining Room of the White House.

"All of us must protect our countries, but at the same time, we all must work to make the world a more hopeful place," Mr. Bush said in the Rose Garden. "And so today's dinner is a chance for us to strategize together, to talk about the need to cooperate."

"We're proud to have you here, Mr. President," Mr. Bush said to Gen. Musharraf, who replied quietly, "My pleasure."

"Proud to have you here, Mr. President," Mr. Bush said to Mr. Karzai. "Thanks very much," the Afghan leader said.

Mr. Bush offered words of praise for the two leaders, who have been engaged in an increasingly belligerent exchange of words.

"These two men are personal friends of mine; they are strong leaders who have an understanding of the world in which we live; they understand that the forces of moderation are being challenged by extremists and radicals."

Joining the three leaders at dinner -- billed an "iftar," a meal that breaks the dawn-to-dusk fast during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, because Gen. Musharraf and Mr. Karzai are Muslim -- were Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley. The two nations' ambassadors to the U.S. also attended.

More than two hours after the dinner was scheduled to end, the White House said the three leaders had shared their views during the "post-sundown meal." But when asked by reporters how long the dinner had lasted, White House spokesman Nicole Guillemart would not say.

"The three leaders had a constructive exchange on the common challenges facing our three nations," spokesman Tony Snow said.

The White House dinner came as violence rises in Afghanistan.

This month, a suicide bombing killed a provincial governor, a close associate of Mr. Karzai's. On Monday, Safia Ama Jan, a women's rights advocate who ran an underground school for girls during Taliban rule, was assassinated.

Yesterday, Afghan security forces killed 25 insurgency suspects during a clash in southern Afghanistan, and a suicide bombing targeting a NATO convoy wounded one civilian.

A U.S. military official said American troops on Afghanistan's eastern border have seen a threefold increase in attacks since a recent truce between Pakistan and pro-Taliban tribesmen that was supposed to have stopped cross-border raids by the militants.

Mr. Bush's first challenge was to figure out how to push the two neighbors to stop their war of words and work together to clamp down on their porous borders and improve efforts to defeat the Taliban. The Taliban is growing in strength and conducting coordinated attacks on coalition forces in Afghanistan five years after being ousted from power in the wake of the September 11 attacks.

But the Afghan leader has for months accused Gen. Musharraf of allowing terrorists to cross his country's border and upset a delicate balance in Afghanistan, while the Pakistani leader has brusquely told Mr. Karzai that he does not know his own country.

Mr. Bush has been caught in the middle, seeking to find common ground on which the leaders of Pakistan, a chief ally in the war on terror, and Afghanistan, a fledgling democracy, can agree and act.

"It will be interesting for me to watch the body language of these two leaders to determine how tense things are," Mr. Bush said in a Tuesday press conference with Mr. Karzai, a few days after he held a similar event with Gen. Musharraf.

The Afghan leader cracked up the audience in the White House East Room when he replied with a smile: "I'll be good."

DOJ_NMG_0070358

The White House knows there is tension between the two leaders, and Mr. Snow said yesterday that Mr. Bush will seek to "do whatever we can, that they want us to do, to help resolve them."

"But the two leaders also understand that they've got a shared interest in making sure that the other guy succeeds," Mr. Snow said.

Although Mr. Karzai refers to Gen. Musharraf as "my friend" or "my brother," the two have split over a recent deal with Islamic extremists. Gen. Musharraf recently signed a pact with pro-Taliban tribal leaders on the Afghanistan-Pakistan border, a deal Mr. Karzai initially condemned.

But he said this week that the deal will be useful if it achieves one goal -- "that the terrorists will not be allowed to cross over into Afghanistan to attack the coalition against terror -- that is, the international community and Afghanistan together."

The deal requires Pakistani troops to end military action against the pro-Taliban fighters in return for the militants stopping attacks on Pakistani forces and not crossing into Afghanistan to launch ambushes.

"We will have to wait and see if that is going to be implemented exactly the way it is signed. So, from our side, it's a wait-and-see attitude. But, generally, we will back any move, any deal that would deny terrorism sanctuary in North Waziristan or in the tribal territories of Pakistan," Mr. Karzai said.

Gen. Musharraf has bristled at accusations that he is allowing terrorists to roam freely in his country.

He said that Afghanistan, not Pakistan -- which has deployed 80,000 troops along the border -- is responsible for the problem, and that it is hurting his nation.

"He is not oblivious. He knows everything. But he is purposely denying, turning a blind eye like an ostrich. He doesn't want to tell the world what is the fact for his own personal reasons," Gen. Musharraf told CNN.

The two also have clashed over the whereabouts of Taliban chief Mullah Mohammed Omar and al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden, who has long been suspected of being holed up in the mountainous region along the border.

Mr. Karzai said Mullah Omar is "for sure" in Pakistan, but Gen. Musharraf says he's in Afghanistan.

On bin Laden, Mr. Karzai says: "If I told you he was in Pakistan, President Musharraf, my friend, would be mad at me. But if I said he was in Afghanistan, that would not be true."

But as the joint dinner approached, both tempered their words and sought to put the United States in the middle to mediate differences.

"The United States, as our ally, is helping both countries," Mr. Karzai said Tuesday. "And I think it is very important that we have more dedication and more intense work with sincerity, all of us, to get rid of the problems that we have around the world."

Yesterday, the Afghan leader said, "I'm simply seeking more coordination. Afghanistan has to do more. Pakistan has to do more."

Gen. Musharraf said Pakistan and Afghanistan had settled some differences when he visited Kabul earlier this month.

"God willing, in the future, we have a concerted strategy and we trust each other in our fight against terrorism and extremism," he said.

Hold The Vinegar, Bush Urges (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush brought the leaders of Afghanistan and Pakistan to the White House on Wednesday evening, hoping that over a quiet meal in the family dining room he could persuade two key U.S. allies to stop blaming each other for their neighborhood's deepening terrorist threat.

Aides said Bush hoped that after days of exchanging charges and counter-charges, Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf and Afghan President Hamid Karzai would promise to improve cooperation and intelligence-sharing on their shared border, the site of escalating attacks by Taliban and Al Qaeda fighters.

"We understand that there are tensions between the countries, and we're going to do whatever we can, that they want us to do, to help resolve them," said White House Press Secretary Tony Snow. "But the two leaders also understand that they've got a shared interest in making sure that the other guy succeeds."

DOJ_NMG_0070359

After dinner, Snow released a statement saying the three leaders had "committed to supporting moderation and defeating extremism through greater intelligence sharing, coordinated action against terrorists, and common efforts to enhance the prosperity of the people of Afghanistan and Pakistan."

Musharraf discussed economic and security initiatives in tribal areas, and Karzai talked about enhanced security and speedier development, Snow said.

Karzai has accused Pakistan of allowing Taliban and Al Qaeda fighters to find sanctuary on its side of the border. He has said that Pakistan's recent agreement with pro-Taliban militants to withdraw troops from the North Waziristan border area would shift much more of the anti-terrorist fight to Afghan, U.S. and NATO forces across the border.

Musharraf has denied that his government is permitting the groups to elude justice or is scaling back its efforts. He, in turn, has accused Karzai of failing to deal with violence and drugs in his country.

As the three leaders headed inside Wednesday evening, Bush told reporters from the Rose Garden steps that the dinner was "a chance to strategize together, to make sure that people have got a hopeful future."

Also invited, the White House said, were Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, national security advisor Stephen Hadley and the Pakistani and Afghan ambassadors to the United States. The menu included spicy sea bass and sunchoke soup.

In an appearance earlier Wednesday in Tampa, Fla., where he met with officials at the U.S. military command responsible for the Mideast and Central Asia, the Afghan leader muted his criticisms. "I'm simply seeking more cooperation," said Karzai, who is struggling with declining public support at home. "Afghanistan has to do more. Pakistan has to do more."

Karzai has indicated that he wants Musharraf to commit to doing more to capture militants, to close down religious schools that foster terrorism, and to recognize the Karzai government.

Musharraf, who has also used his U.S. visit to promote his new book, "In the Line of Fire," has been tough on Karzai as well.

He told CNN that Karzai had denied the deep problems of his own country, "turning a blind eye, like an ostrich," to the sources of violence within Afghanistan. And the two nations shouldn't be compared, Musharraf said, because while Pakistan has a strong government and military, in Afghanistan "everything had broken down."

Musharraf didn't hold back on the Bush administration either. He said he had never supported the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq and continued to believe that "it has made the world a more dangerous place."

The Pakistani president also stopped by "The Daily Show," where political satirist Jon Stewart asked him who would win an election in Pakistan: Bush or Osama bin Laden.

"I think they'll both lose miserably," Musharraf replied.

An expert on the region said the meeting might prove a tactical gain for the White House, but said ending the conflict between the two neighboring countries would be difficult.

"In public relations terms, it will probably help quite a bit," said Husain Haqqani, director of the Center for International Relations at Boston University. "President Bush will show himself bringing the two closer together, and perhaps they'll agree on a specific laundry list of steps to improve their cooperation."

But the meeting probably will not fundamentally change relations between the neighbors, Haqqani added, because Pakistan will not want to entirely give up support for Islamist groups, which it has used as a lever of influence over events in Afghanistan.

"The duality over the Pakistani approach is not going to end just because there was a great dinner at the White House," said Haqqani, a former Pakistani government official and journalist.

Taliban Strikes On U.S. Troops Triple After Truce (WT/AP)

By Jim Krane

The Washington Times, September 28, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan -- American troops on Afghanistan's eastern frontier have seen a tripling of attacks since a truce between the Pakistani army and pro-Taliban tribesmen that was supposed to stop cross-border raids by militants, a U.S. military officer said yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0070360

Pakistan's Foreign Ministry rejected the U.S. assertion and said home-based insurgents were behind the violence in Afghanistan, where at least 25 militants were reported killed in fighting yesterday.

Raising further questions about the cease-fire, a Pakistani political leader maintained that Taliban leader Mullah Mohammed Omar approved the deal. A government official denied that.

The developments came amid a public feud between Afghan President Hamid Karzai and Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf, who had dinner last night with President Bush at the White House.

The U.S. officer said the cease-fire that began June 25, cemented by the signing of a peace accord Sept. 5, contributed to the Taliban's resurgence in Afghanistan. He said ethnic Pashtun insurgents are no longer fighting Pakistani troops and are using Pakistan's North Waziristan border area as a command-and-control hub for attacks in Afghanistan.

Pakistani tribal elders brokered the truce between Gen. Musharraf's government and militants, which ended years of unrest in the tribal region bordering Afghanistan.

But the agreement appears to have bolstered Taliban infiltrators, with the number of attacks in eastern Afghan provinces rising threefold since July 31, said the U.S. officer, who agreed to discuss the situation only if not quoted by name because of the sensitivity of the issue.

"That's why they had the chance to rest and refit, because they were in a sanctuary," he said, referring to a surge in Taliban attacks over the past several months but without giving specific numbers for incidents before or after the truce.

Pakistan's Foreign Ministry rejected that view, insisting Afghan insurgents get no help from inside Pakistan.

"We don't agree with this. These are just excuses," Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Tasnim Aslam said. "Whatever is happening, it is deep inside Afghanistan and is not because of Pakistan."

Pakistan turned over several Taliban fighters to the Afghan government after the accord, Mrs. Aslam said.

The U.S. officer acknowledged that the truce, championed by Gen. Musharraf, is not the only factor behind Taliban attacks in Afghanistan's eastern Paktika, Khost and Paktia provinces.

The Army's 10th Mountain Division has been pressing its own offensive, Operation Mountain Fury, sparking firefights and bombings that otherwise might not have occurred, the officer said.

Meanwhile, Latif Afridi, a top official in Pakistan's Awami National Party, said he received a letter containing Taliban leader Mullah Omar's approval of the North Waziristan peace deal.

He said the letter also claimed that Pakistani militants who back the Taliban in North Waziristan would fall under the command of Jalaluddin Haqqani, a front-line Taliban commander.

It was not immediately possible to verify Mr. Afridi's contentions. Government spokesman Shah Zaman dismissed them as "baseless."

Since the U.S.-led offensive that ousted the Taliban in late 2001, many of Afghanistan's former rulers are thought to have found sanctuary in Pakistan.

Some 30 members of the Taliban's top leadership, including Mullah Omar and the group's 10- to 12-member Shura Council, are thought to be in Pakistan, mainly Quetta, Miran Shah and Peshawar, the U.S. officer said.

Gen. Musharraf has said Mullah Omar is not in Pakistan, and that he is more likely to be in his former power base of Kandahar in southern Afghanistan.

The U.S. officer said the Taliban's connections with Pakistan run so deep that wounded fighters seek treatment on the Pakistani side of the border and even carry their dead to Pakistan for burial.

Some of the suicide bombers in Afghanistan have been recruited in Pakistan, including a 17-year-old boy who blew himself up in front of a U.S. military convoy in Kabul this month, killing a bystander and wounding three American soldiers, Afghan police say.

The border region is also thought to harbor top al Qaeda fugitives Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahri, the U.S. officer said, discounting reports that bin Laden may have died from typhoid or that his trail has gone cold.

"No, I don't think he's dead. The overall assessment is that they're still in Pakistan," the officer said.

In Afghanistan yesterday, insurgents attacked an Afghan police checkpoint in southern Helmand province and "at least 25 insurgents" were killed in the ensuing clash with international troops, the NATO-led force said.

DOJ_NMG_0070361

Three Italian soldiers attached to the NATO force and one civilian were wounded yesterday when a roadside bomb hit their vehicle in the western Herat province, the Italian Defense Ministry said.

The attack was the latest in a spree of bombings in previously calm western Afghanistan, where NATO and Afghan officials have reported an increase in Taliban activity. Four Italian soldiers were wounded Sept. 8 by a roadside bomb in neighboring Farah province.

In Tribal Pakistan, An Uneasy Quiet (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

PESHAWAR, Pakistan, Sept. 27 -- Three weeks after Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, announced a peace pact with Taliban radicals in a tribal area bordering Afghanistan, recent visitors say there is now pin-drop silence in a territory that once shook with artillery and bomb blasts. Religious patrols are enforcing law and order, they say, in place of Pakistan army troops who have withdrawn to their barracks.

But as the toll from violence rises across the border in Afghanistan, with suicide bombings killing 22 people in three cities this week, there are reports that militant Pakistani tribal leaders, while complying with their pledge to reduce the presence of foreign Islamic fighters, intend to defy the peace pact by sending local fighters and suicide bombers into Afghanistan.

Musharraf continues to deny Afghan charges that the Pakistani government is sheltering and encouraging the revived Taliban insurgency from the tribal zones. But people interviewed in northwest Pakistan said there is widespread support in the tribal region for the Taliban movement's harsh Islamic morality and its war against U.S. forces and their allies in Afghanistan.

The tribal zones are a cluster of seven remote and rugged border districts where Pakistan's central government has never exerted more than nominal control. AK-47 assault rifles are common household possessions. Most of the people are Pashtun, the same ethnic group that dominates neighboring southern Afghanistan and that gave rise to the Taliban movement in the 1990s. Many Pashtun don't recognize the Pakistan-Afghan border, crossing it at will in both directions.

Under terms of the Sept. 5 agreement, Musharraf pledged to withdraw troops who had been attacking armed Islamic groups in the tribal area. In return, the fighters agreed to stop attacks on both sides of the border and expel foreign fighters unless they take up a peaceful life.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai has faulted the pact in the past as taking pressure off the Taliban. But in remarks to reporters Tuesday in Washington he toned down his remarks, saying he would take a "wait-and-see attitude." Karzai said he was encouraged to learn that the pact had been signed with tribal elders, not with Taliban commanders.

But the traditional system of tribal self-governance has been weakened during three years of conflict with Pakistan troops. More than 200 tribal chiefs have reportedly been killed. It is not clear whether the Taliban leadership feels bound to any agreement made by local elders.

In the past two weeks, an elderly Afghan man accused of spying was decapitated in North Waziristan, the tribal area where the pact was signed. The teenage brother of a Pakistani journalist slain there earlier this year was also found dead. One source said he had been told that a group of teenagers, fresh from religious and military training, had recently headed for the border to carry out suicide bombings in Afghanistan.

In a recent telephone interview with a Pakistani reporter, senior Taliban leader Dadullah Akhund said he had told local Taliban members to cease attacks in Pakistan but to continue their fight "abroad" against the U.S. military. He said that he had 500 suicide bombers and 12,000 fighters at his disposal and that by next spring the Taliban would have enough force to launch major attacks on Kabul, the Afghan capital.

The revived Taliban insurgency has already cut a swath of violence across Afghanistan. This year, more than 2,000 people have been reported killed in numerous provinces. NATO forces are struggling to secure southern provinces where the fighting is focused.

On both sides of the border, critics of the peace pact condemn it as a farce. They described it as a major concession to the Islamic radicals by Musharraf after he failed to quell them by force, and a ruse to persuade the United States and European powers that he is serious about stopping the Taliban.

DOJ_NMG_0070362

"This deal has handed over North Waziristan to the Taliban," Afrasiab Khattak, a human rights activist and secular politician, said in an interview in Peshawar, located in the so-called settled areas outside the tribal region. He said a hierarchy of Taliban commanders had taken control of North Waziristan, collecting taxes and meting out rough justice.

"The war in Afghanistan is totally from this side," Khattak said. "It is a new round of jihad, and it is not going to remain inside the tribal enclaves."

U.S. officials have long believed that al-Qaeda members from various Muslim countries as well as renegade Taliban fighters had sought refuge in the tribal areas after the U.S.-led ouster of Taliban rule in Kabul in 2001. In recent months, fighters of an Uzbek Muslim militia, expert in explosives and sabotage, have reportedly been operating in the area. At U.S. urging, Pakistani troops in 2003 began staging repeated raids in the region but encountered tough resistance.

Several Pakistani journalists with contacts in North Waziristan have reported that since the peace pact was signed, local Islamic militants and clerics have abided by its term to ask foreigners to leave, making appeals from mosque loudspeakers. Groups of armed men affiliated with local religious parties are now enforcing order, the journalists said.

Officials of the major religious party that dominates the northwest tribal region -- though they were closely involved in negotiating the pact -- deny that there are any Taliban or foreign fighters in Waziristan at all. These leaders insisted the agreement was signed with local tribesmen who had nothing to do with attacks inside Afghanistan.

Qari Abdullah, a religious leader from the Jamiat-e-Ulema-i-Islami party in Bannu, a Pakistani city just outside North Waziristan, said Tuesday that his party was committed to bringing peace, democracy and development to the city's district.

"If the West calls us fundamentalists and terrorists, they are wrong," Abdullah said in an interview in his mosque. "If we had not helped make peace possible, North Waziristan would have turned into another Beirut." He asserted that the Taliban had been falsely blamed for attacks in Afghanistan: "The question is why there is an American army bombing innocent civilians, 15,000 kilometers from its own country."

Foreign journalists are not allowed to enter the tribal region, but some of its prevailing atmosphere and attitude spill into neighboring areas of Pakistan. During a visit this week to Bannu, the closest city to the zone, a reporter found a curious mixture of rapid modernization and strong support for the Taliban.

Many people interviewed said admiringly that the Taliban had brought Islamic justice and moral order to Afghanistan, which it ruled from 1996 to 2001. They expressed little fear of the reported presence of Taliban or al-Qaeda fighters in the neighboring tribal areas, and some condoned the recent late-night bombings of two CD shops in Bannu, presumed to be a Taliban warning against music.

Many people interviewed in Peshawar and Bannu tended to dismiss the troubles facing Afghanistan as the result of indigenous tribal enmities and historical conflicts. Few except a handful of secular activists gave any credence to the repeated claims by the Afghan government of Pakistani interference and sponsorship of Islamic insurgents.

"We like the Taliban because they are against drugs, television, CDs and other sinful things," said Aminullah, 35, who sells sacks of grain in a market. "Bush is the real warlord who is invading other countries and making Muslims hate America."

Once an isolated backwater of donkey carts and thorny fields, Bannu now teems with signs of construction and modernization, including a new hospital, new schools and cellphone shops. At the same time, residents said the area has become increasingly conservative in its religious views and that dozens of new Islamic academies, or madrassas, have opened. Some people embodied these contrasts as they spoke.

"The Taliban are quiet in the tribal area, but now they are starting to cause some problems here," said Amanullah, the owner of a busy cellphone shop adorned with verses from the Koran. "Their actions are bad but their ideas are right. If they became the government here, it would be good. We would have no cinemas, no vulgarity, nothing with a bad impact on our women and children."

Bush Urges Karzai, Musharraf To Put Terror Fight Before Feud (USAT/AP)

USA Today, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush appealed to the bickering presidents of Pakistan and Afghanistan on Wednesday to put aside their differences and “strategize together” over dinner on ways to defeat the common enemy of terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0070363

Standing between Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf and Afghan President Hamid Karzai, Bush emphasized "the need to cooperate, to make sure that people have got a hopeful future" in both countries.

"Today's dinner is a chance for us to strategize together" and find common solutions, Bush said shortly before the meal.

"These two men are personal friends of mine," Bush said. "They are strong leaders who … understand that the forces of moderation are being challenged by extremists and radicals."

The meal was billed as an iftar, the meal that breaks the daytime fast during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan. Musharraf and Karzai are Muslims.

After the meal, the White House issued a statement that called the session a "constructive exchange."

"They committed to supporting moderation and defeating extremism through greater intelligence sharing, coordinated action against terrorists and common efforts to enhance the prosperity of the people of Afghanistan and Pakistan," press secretary Tony Snow said.

For months, Karzai and Musharraf have been trading barbs and criticizing each other's efforts to fight terrorists along their long, mountainous border.

Afghanistan has alleged that Pakistan lets Taliban militants launch attacks into Afghanistan from Pakistani territory. Karzai has said Musharraf turns a blind eye to hatred being bred at Islamic schools in Pakistan.

Musharraf says Karzai has bad information and noted that Pakistan has deployed 80,000 troops along the border.

Musharraf said Karzai is behaving "like an ostrich," refusing to acknowledge the truth and just being political.

Nato 'must Speed Up Reaction' To Taliban (FT)

By Stephen Fidler

Financial Times, September 28, 2006

Nato takes too long to build forces for its missions and needs to be able to respond more rapidly to requests for troops, Des Browne, the UK's defence minister, said on Wednesday.

Speaking the day before a meeting of defence ministers of the 26-member alliance in Slovenia that is set to discuss a military request for more Nato troops in Afghanistan, Mr Browne said Nato faced a short-term test in getting "boots on the ground or the equipment in to support them" in Afghanistan.

He said Nato was rising to the challenge in Afghanistan, where it has more than 20,000 troops in place, but has struggled to find extra forces to meet unexpectedly fierce resistance from the Taliban militia. But he said there were lessons to be learnt from the deployment and he would tell the other ministers that Nato needed to modernise the way it generated its forces.

"It needs to look at its structures and its bureaucracy so that it can generate force in a way that responds in real time to the needs. I think it's becoming apparent in Afghanistan that the process of discussion is more complex than it needs to be," he said in a telephone interview from Manchester where he was attending the Labour party's annual conference.

UK officials said each country needed to look at its own operations but said too many Nato troops were still tied up in headquarters operations, for example.

Mr Browne said Nato's operations in southern Afghanistan, both those led by the Canadians in Kandahar and the British in Helmand, had been successful, but work was needed in reconstruction to improve the way the country was governed and to build economic opportunities.

Mr Browne said Nato needed to build a more comprehensive approach to its missions, bringing civilian agencies more closely into its operations. Officials said this would require closer co-operation with other bodies such as the United Nations and the World Bank.

The meeting in Portoroz is one of a series ahead of a summit of alliance leaders in Riga in late November, which is likely to give a political push to the efforts to increase the force in Afghanistan. However, the struggle Nato faces in generating troops is replicated by other international organisations because of the increasing number of multinational interventions under way.

American Commanders Question Political Will Of Iraqi Prime Minister (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070364

BAGHDAD, Sept. 27 -- Senior U.S. military commanders are questioning whether Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has the political will to weed out official corruption and tackle the brutal militias that are threatening to plunge Iraq into civil war.

"It's going to take time for a government to cleanse itself over time," said a senior U.S. military official who spoke on condition of anonymity at a briefing with reporters. "I've got to give it time to do that and hope that I have a prime minister that's going to take that on."

The questions come as sectarian violence and the spread of militias have replaced the insurgency as the biggest challenge to U.S. efforts to bring security to Baghdad and other parts of Iraq. The major militias are arms of political parties inside Iraq's fragile coalition government and have widely infiltrated the security forces, placing Maliki, who has vowed to disarm the militias, in a delicate political position.

The questions about Maliki are being posed only privately, with U.S. officials in their public statements still voicing cautious confidence in Maliki's ability to recognize and tackle the problems.

"We have to fix this militia issue," said Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the second-ranking U.S. military official in Baghdad. "We can't have armed militias competing with Iraq's security forces. But I have to trust the prime minister to decide when it is that we do that."

But in recent days, senior U.S. military commanders have suggested that if the Maliki government fails to take action soon, they may have to step in and pressure the government to go after militias holed up in neighborhoods around Baghdad. Their primary target is most likely the Mahdi Army, a militia linked to radical anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr that Sunni Muslims accuse of running death squads under the mantle of Shiite Islam.

"We are now at a time when we have a little bit of influence there," said the senior U.S. military official. "There is going to come a time when I would argue we are going to have to force this issue. . . . We have to, wherever we can, use what pressure, what influence we have, to get them as quickly as possible to clear these places out."

Complicating matters for the Maliki government are growing concerns over official graft that is so rife that it resembles the days under President Saddam Hussein, when such corruption was an accepted part of life.

"I can tell you in every single ministry how they are using that ministry to fill the coffers of the political parties," said the senior U.S. military official. "They are doing that because that is exactly what Saddam Hussein did."

The officials' comments underscore a growing frustration over the speed of government reform efforts, at a time when pressure is mounting back home for a withdrawal of U.S. troops. The private questions about Maliki's abilities also come after a particularly violent month in Baghdad and across Iraq, as suicide bombings and execution-style slayings have continued unabated.

"This has been a tough week. Over the past two weeks, we have seen a rise in the number of attacks, especially in Baghdad," said Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell. "Murders and executions are currently the number one cause of civilian deaths in Baghdad."

Ali Dabbagh, a government spokesman, said Wednesday that the militia problem needed to be tackled carefully in order not to disrupt the nation's delicate political balance and efforts to reconcile warring factions. If a political solution cannot be found, he said, the government will need to use force against the militias. But he said such measures should be undertaken by Iraqi security forces. "This issue is very critical," Dabbagh said. "I do not think the U.S. needs to interfere with this issue. The government should do this by themselves."

Dabbagh said the government is planning to install an inspector general in each ministry to audit its finances. He said a new integrity commission has already been launched to investigate corrupt officials. While Dabbagh said he was not aware if large sums of money had been stolen from the coffers of ministries, he conceded that corruption was a major problem for the government.

Senior U.S. military commanders are urging the government to take faster action against the militias, particularly those that have infiltrated various government ministries.

"There's a political piece to this to see if they deal with these guys," said another senior U.S. military official, who also spoke on condition of anonymity at a separate briefing with reporters. "I won't deny the fact that there is corruption and problems in some of these ministries, but it's got to be dealt with and it ought to be dealt with by the prime minister and the folks that are inside this government. And I think the time is short for them to deal with that over time because this can't go on like that."

DOJ_NMG_0070365

"I don't see an open end to this deal, I mean, where this just goes on and on. I think the government, the people will get tired if they don't see any action on this," the U.S. official said.

Sadr and his allies, however, control four government ministries and hold 30 seats in the Iraqi parliament, more than any other faction. He played an instrumental role in propelling Maliki into power in April following several months of Shiite political infighting. For the past two months, thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops have entered some of Baghdad's roughest neighborhoods as part of an operation to quell the sectarian strife. But no major operations have been undertaken in Sadr City, Sadr's stronghold and where his Mahdi Army is in full control.

A third senior U.S. military official, who also spoke on condition of anonymity in a briefing to reporters, similarly questioned the government's resolve to tackle Iraq's myriad problems. "There are still folks who think they can win a sectarian conflict, inside the political parties as well as some guys inside the government," he said. "I think the senior leadership recognizes that that's a failing policy. But getting from sort of the platitude to the reality is the challenge and growth."

He added, "And I'll tell you, the other aspect is, don't assume competency."

Military Officials Add To U.S. Criticism Of Iraq's Government (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 27 — Senior American military officials are warning that time is growing short for Iraq to root out militias inside and outside the government and purge ministries of corrupt officials who are diverting large sums of money to their own political parties.

"We are now at a time when we have a little bit of influence there," a senior military official said. Referring to the problem of militias, he added, "There is going to come a time when I would argue we are going to have to force this issue."

The official said political parties who were plundering ministries were squandering chances to make progress that could reduce sectarian violence.

"I can tell you in every single ministry how they are using that ministry to fill the coffers of the political parties," the official said. "They are doing that because that is exactly what Saddam Hussein did."

Another sign of how acute Iraq's security woes have become emerged Wednesday: the past week saw the highest number of suicide bomb attacks of any week since the American-led invasion in 2003, according to the chief United States military spokesman in Iraq, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV.

"This has been a tough week," General Caldwell said. "This week's suicide attacks were at their highest level in any given week." But such attacks, he said, are still not the No. 1 killer of Baghdad civilians. "Murders and executions are," he said.

In recent weeks American and Iraqi officials have privately voiced concerns that Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki might not have the will or the political dexterity to bring the country together and avoid a full-scale civil war. Mr. Maliki, they say, is hamstrung and beholden to rival political parties with their own large militias.

Comments offered by senior United States military officials in the last few days have been even more pointed and take in not only the Maliki administration but also the whole of the Iraqi government bureaucracy. The senior military officials agreed to speak only without being identified, because of the delicate nature of the issue.

Another senior military official said Mr. Maliki needed to move quickly to rid ministries of death squads and militiamen. "I think the time is short for them to deal with that over time, 'cause this can't go on like that," the official said. Speaking about the militias and other problems, he added that "people will get tired if they don't see any action on this."

The Iraqi national security adviser, Mowaffak al-Rubaie, said Mr. Maliki had little support within his own government to take action.

"The situation is really serious," Mr. Rubaie said. "There is no cohesion in the government to help him. There are so many circles he needs to take into consideration when he wants to make a decision. There is a lack of will to stop the violence among the politicians."

DOJ_NMG_0070366

An American raid on Wednesday in the restive city of Baquba, north of Baghdad, killed four women and four men. The military identified the men as "suspected terrorists," but family members said they were innocent.

The military said American forces had taken heavy fire from a building where terrorists were believed to be hiding, even after interpreters announced that the forces were in the area.

The military said that troops had killed two men it described as terrorists, and that United States aircraft had fired "multiple rounds" at the building. The military said that the dead found inside included another two male terrorists and four women, and that two terrorists and one woman had been wounded. Weapons and a global positioning system were found.

Relatives said the eight people killed were from the same family and had no ties to terrorism. Associated Press Television News quoted the homeowner's daughter, Manal Jassim, as saying: "They were all innocent people. We were sleeping when they entered our house at dawn. I found my father, mother, aunt and sister-in-law lying dead. We were an 11-member family. Eight were killed."

The western Baghdad neighborhood of Huriya continued to be a sectarian battleground where militiamen terrorize and kill Sunni Arabs. According to an Interior Ministry official, gunmen in two cars on Wednesday sprayed fire at Sunnis gathered near a mosque, killing 10 and wounding 11.

A car bomb in Huriya wounded two civilians, and another car bomb exploded elsewhere in Baghdad, killing five people and wounding eight, the Interior Ministry official said.

The United States military said a marine from Regimental Combat Team Seven was killed Monday during "enemy action" in Anbar Province, west of Baghdad. No details were provided.

An American soldier also died Wednesday, after being attacked by small-arms fire in southern Baghdad.

Iraq Impeding Efforts To Go After Shiite Militias, U.S. Military Says (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, September 28, 2006

BAGHDAD — Senior U.S. military officials have stepped up complaints that Iraq's Shiite-led government is thwarting efforts to go after Shiite death squads blamed in the execution-style killings of Sunni Arabs in neighborhoods across this capital.

Although deadly Sunni Arab rebel attacks remain frequent in Baghdad, U.S. officials, including Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, say death squads affiliated with Shiite militias have become the main factors ratcheting up the capital's death toll from sectarian killings.

Civilian deaths in Baghdad during July and August totaled more than 5,100, according to United Nations figures, and most were caused by the sectarian strife.

However, the 8,000 U.S. troops sent to Baghdad in recent weeks to restore order have been largely prevented from confronting those militias, many of which have ties to Iraqi government officials.

The statements by ranking U.S. authorities complaining about the situation highlight rising American dissatisfaction with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki and an increasing willingness to exert pressure on the fledging Iraqi government.

The U.S. forces would like to stage heightened military operations in Baghdad neighborhoods such as Sadr City, a stronghold for anti-U.S. Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada Sadr's Al Mahdi militia.

"We have to fix this militia issue," Army Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, commander of day-to-day operations in Iraq, said Wednesday.

"We can't have armed militias competing with Iraq's security forces. But I have to trust the prime minister to decide when it is that we do that."

U.S. officials are anxious for Iraqis to take a stronger role in their country's security because of mounting pressure to withdraw American troops as soon as possible. Rising public discontent in the United States with the war, tired troops on their third and fourth rotations in the Middle East and huge expenditures by American taxpayers are all driving U.S. officials to press the government of Maliki, a Shiite, to quickly take more responsibility.

A map provided by the U.S. military on Wednesday identified nine neighborhoods that have been targeted in a Baghdad security plan, a major effort aimed at ridding the capital of Sunni Arab insurgents and Shiite militias.

DOJ_NMG_0070367

However, all but two of these neighborhoods are predominantly Sunni.

Publicly, U.S. military leaders say they are simply conducting operations in areas where they are tracking the most killings, but privately they acknowledge that the Iraqi government has been reluctant to go after Shiite militias.

Tensions increased between the U.S. military and the Iraqi government after the Iraqi army's recent failure to deploy 4,000 troops to Baghdad.

Iraqi officials have attempted to send soldiers from the south to Diyala province to stabilize sectarian strife in the provincial capital, Baqubah, 35 miles north of the capital.

But a U.S. military official with knowledge of combat operations in Iraq said, "We told them that they can't send anybody to Diyala until they give us the troops we need for Baghdad."

The military official, who requested anonymity because of restrictions about speaking to news media about combat operations, also complained that Maliki's government had scrapped a plan to move U.S. and Iraqi troops into Sadr City before the start of the current holy month of Ramadan, a sign of how sectarian political considerations were hampering attempts to quell violence in Baghdad.

U.S. Army Maj. Gen. James Thurman, commander of military forces in the capital, said last week that "one of the sources of death groups are militias."

"I consider that issue a problem that the [Iraqi] government must deal with immediately."

Iraqi government spokesman Ali Dabbagh said Maliki well understood the dangers posed by Shiite militias, but he said that political realities in Iraq could present the prime minister with even greater peril.

"This might create a negative reaction, and it may affect the political situation as well as the security situation in Baghdad," he said, defending Maliki's refusal to allow the U.S. military to raid Sadr City this month.

Dabbagh also said it was unfair to treat the Shiite militias the same as the Sunni Arab insurgents, because, he said, the paramilitaries were reacting to first blows by the rebels.

"Extremists and Saddamist parties are making bombs and killing Iraqis," Dabbagh said. "We do agree that there are revenge killings taking place, but not in the way of the Saddamists — this is just a reaction. We have to deal with the main causes: There are suicide bombers and car bombs attacking the Iraqis every day."

The American frustration in Baghdad is part of a growing chorus in recent weeks from officials both in Iraq and Washington expressing disappointment that Maliki has not taken a stronger stand against the militias, some of whose members serve in Iraq's army and police forces.

The dissatisfaction comes as scores of corpses — many mutilated by power drills, knives and multiple gunshots — continue to arrive at Baghdad's morgues, victims of death squads that officials fear are affiliated with politically backed militias.

The Sadr movement has control of some of Iraq's most powerful ministries, including Health, Transportation and Agriculture. The Badr Organization, a militia affiliated with the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq — a leading Shiite political party — and followers of Sadr have a strong influence at the Interior Ministry, which supervises the nation's police forces. Many ministries have their own security forces, which have been implicated in killings.

U.S. officials said they worried that a hands-off stance toward the militias could alienate those Sunni Arabs who have entered Iraqi civil society, including the army. They say they are concerned that Maliki's unity government could fray and that disaffected Sunni Arabs could drift into militancy.

U.S. military leaders described various obstacles facing them as they attempt to quell sectarian violence in Baghdad, including "no-touch lists" that prohibit them from arresting politicians and other high-status individuals, and off-limits areas in Baghdad that the U.S. military may not enter without permission from the Iraqi government.

U.S. military officials said they were also constrained by their desire to see the Iraqi government prove its ability to rule fairly, without regard to narrow sectarian interests and without significant U.S. interference, by resolving the sectarian conflict.

"There's a political piece to this to see if they deal with these guys," said another high-ranking U.S. military official in Baghdad, who also requested anonymity in order to maintain relationships with the Iraqi government.

"I won't deny the fact that there is corruption and problems in some of the ministries, but it's got to be dealt with, and it ought to be dealt with by the prime minister and the folks inside his government."

DOJ_NMG_0070368

Instead, Maliki's government has often appeared to respond with ambivalence and occasional hostility to efforts to crack down on Shiite gunmen.

In August, U.S. forces raided Sadr City and battled with suspected militia members in one of the first thrusts of the Baghdad offensive. The prime minister responded by rebuking the American government for conducting the Sadr City incursion without permission from his administration.

Maliki's government also criticized two raids last week that captured suspected Al Mahdi militia leaders in the southern holy city of Najaf and in Baghdad.

In Washington, members of the Iraq Study Group — a high-profile, administration-backed panel examining U.S. policy in Iraq — recently held a news conference to say that they believed Maliki had just three months to act against the militias and restore stability.

But some observers say that Americans may have unrealistic expectations for an embryonic government so riven with sectarian and partisan fissures. Even if the Iraqi government had the will to act, it might not be able to control the militias, which U.S. and Iraqi officials contend have splintered into more radicalized and deadly elements.

"For example, Muqtada Sadr was ordered to control the militias, but even he can't control them," said Suha Azzawi, a Sunni Arab politician.

U.S. General Warns That Iraq Is Close To Dissolving Into Civil War (MCT)

By Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy, September 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - A top-ranked U.S. military officer in Iraq said Wednesday that the United States thought that the government of Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki was running out of time to prevent Iraq from dissolving into outright civil war.

"We have to fix this militia issue. We can't have armed militias competing with Iraq's security forces. But I have to trust the prime minister to decide when it is that we do that," said Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the second-highest-ranking American military official in Baghdad.

Chiarelli's comments to a gathering of reporters were a part of a growing chorus of concerns from U.S. political and military leaders about the Iraqi government's ability and willingness to tackle corruption and militia-run death squads. They suggest that top American leaders are growing frustrated with the pace of reforms and may even be starting to argue for eventual U.S. withdrawal.

Throughout the month, senior military officials - almost always speaking anonymously because of the sensitivity of the subject - have expressed frustration with the government, saying corruption and rogue militias backed by rebel Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada al Sadr are rampant. They've complained of ministers using their offices to fill the coffers of their political parties and of government workers using their jobs to attack rival sects. They said the Iraqi government turned a blind eye, embracing a sectarian winner-take-all approach to governance.

American and some Iraqi leaders quietly complain that Maliki isn't willing to make difficult decisions because he's politically beholden to the followers of Sadr, who backed his premiership. He often has blocked U.S. military officials from entering Shiite militia areas such as the Baghdad slum of Sadr City to make arrests.

"There's a political piece to this to see if they deal with these guys," a senior military official said earlier this month, speaking on condition of anonymity. "There is corruption and problems in some of these ministries, but it's got to be dealt with and it ought to be dealt with by the prime minister and the folks that are inside this government. I think the time is short for them to deal with that over time, because this can't go on like that."

Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, a top American military spokesman, said Wednesday that murders and executions were now the top reasons for civilian deaths in Baghdad. He said it was widely believed that Shiite militias and Sunni Muslim insurgency groups were doing the killing.

"When we say murders and executions, we're assuming murders and executions are in fact sectarian violence that is occurring within the city," Caldwell said.

DOJ_NMG_0070369

In a WorldPublicOpinion.org poll conducted Sept. 1-4 by the Program on International Policy Attitudes at the University of Maryland, 77 percent of Iraqi respondents, including 100 percent of Sunnis polled, said they'd prefer a strong government that would get rid of militias.

The minority Sunnis, whom U.S. officials want to remain in the political process, threatened last week to leave the government if Maliki doesn't address the problem of the militias.

Hassan Sineid, a Shiite assemblyman and fellow member of Maliki's Dawa Party, said security forces had performed badly, and he called for the defense and interior ministers to resign. He said the prime minister soon would present a resolution before parliament calling for the disbanding of militias.

Recently, Maliki publicly denounced an attack in Sadr City that killed 34 people last week. It was one of the few occasions he's condemned violence in Iraq at a time when an average of 100 people are killed in the country each day.

American officials continue to support Maliki because he's the country's elected leader.

In other developments, the U.S. military said eight people, including four women, were killed early Wednesday in a raid in Baqouba that targeted a terrorist with ties to the group al Qaida in Iraq. Three other people, including two whom the military said were tied to terrorist activity, were wounded.

During the raid, gunfire came from the building that soldiers were targeting and from throughout the neighborhood. The military called in an air attack.

Weapons and a global positioning system were found in the targeted building. American military spokesman Lt. Col. Barry Johnson said the deaths of the women came after those in the building were warned repeatedly to stop firing.

McClatchy special correspondent Zaineb Obeid and Mark Brunswick of the Minneapolis Star Tribune contributed to this report from Baghdad.

Poll: Iraqis Back Attacks On U.S. Troops (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, September 27, 2006

About six in 10 Iraqis say they approve of attacks on U.S.-led forces, and slightly more than that want their government to ask U.S. troops to leave within a year, a poll finds.

The Iraqis also have negative views of Osama bin Laden, according to the early September poll of 1,150.

The poll, done for University of Maryland's Program on International Policy Attitudes, found:

_Almost four in five Iraqis say the U.S. military force in Iraq provokes more violence than it prevents.

_About 61 percent approved of the attacks — up from 47 percent in January. A solid majority of Shiite and Sunni Arabs approved of the attacks, according to the poll. The increase came mostly among Shiite Iraqis.

_An overwhelmingly negative opinion of terror chief bin Laden and more than half, 57 percent, disapproving of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

_Three-fourths say they think the U.S. plans to keep military bases in Iraq permanently.

_A majority of Iraqis, 72 percent, say they think Iraq will be one state five years from now. Shiite Iraqis were most likely to feel that way, though a majority of Sunnis and Kurds also believed that would be the case.

The PIPA poll, which included an oversample of 150 Sunni Iraqis, has a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

The State Department, meanwhile, has conducted its own poll, something it does periodically, spokesman Sean McCormack said. The State Department poll found two-thirds of Iraqis in Baghdad favor an immediate withdrawal of U.S. forces, according to The Washington Post. McCormack declined to discuss details of the department's poll.

"What I hear from government representatives and other anecdotal evidence that you hear from Iraqis that is collected by embassy personnel and military personnel is that Iraqis do appreciate our presence there," he said. "They do understand the reasons for it, they do understand that we don't want to or we don't intend to be there indefinitely."

An Iraqi public opinion research firm with a proven record of conducting scientifically valid surveys conducted the department's poll, press officer Janelle Hironimus said later.

DOJ_NMG_0070370

"We will not identify the firm in order to protect it and its employees from danger," she said.

Iraqi officials have said Iraq's security was improving and expanding throughout the country, and most U.S. troops might be able to leave eventually.

Last week, Iraqi President Jalal Talibani told the United Nations that coalition forces should remain in Iraq until Iraqi security forces are "capable of putting an end to terrorism and maintaining stability and security."

U.S. To Gauge Iraqi Support For Operations (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

As violence continues in Iraq, the military is looking for ways to achieve stability through opinion polls and public relations.

The Multi-National Command in Baghdad wants to hire a private firm to conduct polling and focus groups in Iraq "to assess the effectiveness of operations as they relate to gaining and maintaining popular support," according to a notice the Department of the Army posted yesterday.

"Since the end of major combat operations in Operation Iraqi Freedom, Coalition Forces have sought to build robust and positive relations with the people of Iraq and to assist the Iraqi people in forming a new government," the notice says, posted on the government contracting Web site FBODaily.com.

Polling and focus groups are being sought as "important tools for assessing changes in the level of a population's support for various groups," according to the posting.

Polling in Iraq is so sensitive that the contract proposal states that the winner must ensure those being questioned "are not aware of the survey sponsor's identity." One member of a firm that has conducted polling for the Baghdad command said yesterday that "if someone out there believes the client is the U.S. government, the persons doing the polling could get killed." The official insisted on anonymity for fear of putting his company's employees at risk.

Word of the proposed new contract comes a day after release of a State Department poll that found that majorities in all regions of Iraq, except the Kurdish areas, want U.S. and allied troops to withdraw immediately and that their departure would make people feel safer. It also follows the release of an April 2006 National Intelligence Estimate on terrorism that found that U.S. military action has become a "cause celebre" in the Arab world and has fueled anti-American feelings in Iraq and the Middle East.

The Baghdad command also confirmed yesterday that it has awarded a two-year, $12.4 million contact to handle strategic communications management to the Lincoln Group, the Washington-based public relations company found late last year to have been paying money to place favorable articles in the Iraqi news media.

William Dixon, a spokesman for the Lincoln Group, said yesterday he could not comment on the details of particular contracts and deferred comment to the Baghdad command.

Lincoln was the lowest of seven bidders on what was estimated as a $20 million contract to help military commanders in Baghdad get what they considered the positive side of their operations in the news, according to one of the bidders who was briefed on the contract. The contract calls for providing media strategy such as setting up news conferences and public speeches, media training for Iraqi government officials in addition to military commanders, and monitoring of Middle East and some U.S. news outlets, including The Washington Post, New York Times and major television networks. The monitoring would include creating a database of articles graded as favorable or unfavorable.

Lincoln's practices have attracted controversy, most recently because of a report in the current issue of Harper's Magazine. In it, Willem Marx, an Oxford University student, describes working for Lincoln in Baghdad last summer and using a spreadsheet listing amounts charged by Iraqi newspapers to run articles written by Army personnel, at costs that ran from $50 to $1,500.

At least one of the bidders who lost to Lincoln is considering a challenge to the award based on Lincoln's record.

Lincoln's spokesman dismissed the article's claims. "The former intern's exaggerated and misleading account does not accurately depict the firm's activities in the emerging markets and challenging environments," Dixon said.

Rise In Violence Accompanies Ramadan (USAT/AP)

The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0070371

USA Today, September 28, 2006

BAGHDAD — The top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq said Wednesday that violence in Baghdad had risen, as predicted, with the onset of Ramadan. In Iraq, the Muslim holy month officially started on Monday.

Suicide attacks were at their highest level ever, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said. He didn't provide any figures.

"We are seeing an increase in attacks, as anticipated. The terrorists and illegal armed groups are punching back in an effort to discredit the government of Iraq and more specifically the Baghdad security plan," Caldwell said. "This has been a tough week."

He said murders and executions are the No. 1 cause of civilian deaths in Baghdad, and operations against sectarian death squads have been stepped up. Since mid-July, 29 death squad cell leaders and 254 members have been killed or captured, he said.

Wednesday, the bodies of 15 people found around Baghdad were turned in to the morgue in Kut, 100 miles southeast of the capital, morgue official Mahmoun Ajeel al-Rubaie said.

After evening prayers in the al-Meshahda Sunni mosque in Baghdad's northern Huriyah neighborhood, 10 people were killed in a shootout between gunmen near the mosque, police 1st Lt. Maythem Abdul Razzaq said.

Operation Together Forward, a neighborhood-by-neighborhood security drive, was launched this summer after U.S. generals warned that escalating violence in Baghdad was leading to civil war. Sweeps for weapons and insurgents have been started or completed in about half the neighborhoods.

Also Wednesday, U.S. troops got into a firefight when they approached a home of a suspected terrorist for al-Qaeda in Iraq. Troops killed two terrorist suspects and called in airstrikes because of "the heavy volume of enemy fire," the statement said. In the rubble were found the bodies of two more terror suspects and four women.

Relatives of those killed in the raid in Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, said their family had nothing to do with terrorists.

Meanwhile, Sunni tribal leaders who have vowed to drive al-Qaeda out of Iraq's most restive province met the Shiite prime minister.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki met with sheiks from Anbar province who have said al-Qaeda's violent ways and severe interpretation of Sunni Islam have alienated traditional-minded Sunnis.

The efforts to contain the violence came amid a poll that found most Iraqis would prefer to see foreign forces leave. A poll of 1,150 Iraqis done for the University of Maryland's Program on International Policy Attitudes found about six in 10 Iraqis say they approve of attacks on U.S.-led forces.

A State Department poll found two-thirds of Iraqis in Baghdad favor an immediate withdrawal of U.S. forces, according to The Washington Post. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack confirmed the poll had been conducted but declined to discuss details.

Cleric Said To Lose Reins Over Part Of Iraqi Militia (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 27 — The radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr has lost control of portions of his Mahdi Army militia that are splintering off into freelance death squads and criminal gangs, a senior coalition intelligence official said Wednesday.

The question of how tightly Mr. Sadr holds the militia, one of the largest armed groups in Iraq, is of critical importance to American and Iraqi officials. Seeking to ease the sectarian violence raging across the country, they have pressed him to join the political process and curb his fighters, who see themselves as defenders of Shiism — and often as agents of vengeance against Sunnis.

But as Mr. Sadr has taken a more active role in the government, as many as a third of his militiamen have grown frustrated with the constraints of compromise and have broken off, often selling their services to the highest bidders, said the official, who spoke to reporters in Baghdad on condition of anonymity because he was not permitted to speak publicly on intelligence issues.

DOJ_NMG_0070372

"When Sadr says you can't do this, for whatever political reason, that's when they start to go rogue," the official said. "Frankly, at that point, they start to become very open to alternative sources of sponsorship." The official said that opened the door to control by Iran.

Mr. Sadr's militia — dominated by impoverished Shiites who are loosely organized into groups that resemble neighborhood protection forces — has always operated in a grass-roots style but generally tended to heed his commands. It answered his call to battle American forces in two uprisings in 2004, and stopped fighting when he ordered it. But as the violence in Iraq has spread, evidence of freelancing Shiites has accumulated.

After the bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra in February, bands of militants dressed in black, the favorite color of Sadr loyalists, drove into neighborhoods, kidnapping and killing Sunnis. Mr. Sadr, who was abroad at the time, returned home and gave a rare public speech calling on his followers to stop, even proposing joint prayer sessions with Sunni clerics. Still, the rampage continued.

In Basra, a province in southeastern Iraq, Mr. Sadr has less direct control over militiamen, and they have tended to operate to suit their own agenda. Local leaders there have said that he has disciplined some members and fired others, but with little overall effect. He has run through four different leaders in Basra, according to the intelligence official, and has even had to shut offices temporarily, when local leaders ignored him and acted on their own.

Mr. Sadr is still immensely powerful, with as many as 7,000 militiamen in Baghdad, the official said. And the cleric has turned that firepower into political might. His candidate list won about 30 seats in Parliament this year, one of the largest shares. The participation was a central goal for American officials, who tried for months to persuade him to stop fighting and enter politics.

Still, six major leaders here no longer answer to Mr. Sadr's organization, according to the intelligence official. Most describe themselves as Mahdi Army members, the official said, and even get money from Mr. Sadr's organization, but "are effectively beyond his control." Some of those who moved away from Mr. Sadr saw him as too accommodating to the United States. Others saw him as too bound by politics, particularly as killings of Shiite civilians in mixed neighborhoods began to soar.

"They're not content to sit there and just defend their family on the street corner," the official said. "They want to go out and take on what they view as Al Qaeda or Baathists or both in aggressive measure."

One example is Abu Dera, a fighter in the Shiite stronghold of Sadr City in the capital who used to be loyal to Mr. Sadr. Residents said that as he began to gain a reputation for killing Sunni figures, Mr. Sadr told him to stop. But he ignored the order, and now he is referred to as the "Shiite Zarqawi," after Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the terrorist leader who exhorted Sunnis to kill Shiites.

"He started against the Americans, but he moved on to killing Sunnis," said Sattar Awad, a 29-year-old resident of the district. "People here look at him as a brave man."

American forces are hunting for Mr. Dera, the intelligence officer said, but he has eluded capture.

Although the splintering has solved some problems for the American military, it has raised new ones. "In some ways it makes it easier for me because I now have digestible doses I can deal with," said a senior American military official at a briefing on Wednesday, also in Baghdad. "At the same time it creates problems because they are harder to find when they are splintered."

The splintering has changed the tone of the American military's interaction with the Mahdi Army in Sadr City. In past years, American forays into the area would often draw a storm of grenade attacks. But recent American moves into the area have been carried out relatively peacefully: Mr. Sadr has not ordered attacks because the men being sought were freelancers like Abu Dera, the intelligence officer said.

The fighters' defections have raised the troubling prospect of more avenues of influence for Iran, the senior intelligence official said. The official cited shipments of weapons with labels that trace back to Iranian weapons manufacturers as evidence that Iran was actively aiding groups in Iraq. And that assistance has not just been limited to Mahdi Army offshoots. "They're not sure who will come out on top, so they fund everybody," the official said of Iran.

Even Mr. Sadr, who fashions himself as the quintessential Iraqi nationalist, has reached out to Iran's government, making a very public trip to Iran for talks early this year. He is also trying to reassert control over his power base at home, and to expand his influence, the intelligence official said. "What Sadr is looking for is discipline," the official said.

DOJ_NMG_0070373

He said Mr. Sadr had begun to increase his exposure in the northern city of Kirkuk and in Diyala Province, both mixed-population areas north of Baghdad where sectarian disputes have been on the rise. There, he is trying to appeal by casting himself as a defender of Shiites against Kurdish and Sunni Arab factions.

Heralded Iraq Police Academy A 'Disaster' (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 27 -- A $75 million project to build the largest police academy in Iraq has been so grossly mismanaged that the campus now poses health risks to recruits and might need to be partially demolished, U.S. investigators have found.

The Baghdad Police College, hailed as crucial to U.S. efforts to prepare Iraqis to take control of the country's security, was so poorly constructed that feces and urine rained from the ceilings in student barracks. Floors heaved inches off the ground and cracked apart. Water dripped so profusely in one room that it was dubbed "the rain forest."

"This is the most essential civil security project in the country -- and it's a failure," said Stuart W. Bowen Jr., the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, an independent office created by Congress. "The Baghdad police academy is a disaster."

Bowen's office plans to release a 21-page report Thursday detailing the most alarming problems with the facility.

Even in a $21 billion reconstruction effort that has been marred by cases of corruption and fraud, failures in training and housing Iraq's security forces are particularly significant because of their effect on what the U.S. military has called its primary mission here: to prepare Iraqi police and soldiers so that Americans can depart.

Federal investigators said the inspector general's findings raise serious questions about whether the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has failed to exercise effective oversight over the Baghdad Police College or reconstruction programs across Iraq, despite charging taxpayers management fees of at least 4.5 percent of total project costs. The Corps of Engineers said Wednesday that it has initiated a wide-ranging investigation of the police academy project.

The report serves as the latest indictment of Parsons Corp., the U.S. construction giant that was awarded about $1 billion for a variety of reconstruction projects across Iraq. After chronicling previous Parsons failures to properly build health clinics, prisons and hospitals, Bowen said he now plans to conduct an audit of every Parsons project.

"The truth needs to be told about what we didn't get for our dollar from Parsons," Bowen said.

A spokeswoman for Parsons said the company had not seen the inspector general's report.

The Coalition Provisional Authority hired Parsons in 2004 to transform the Baghdad Police College, a ramshackle collection of 1930s buildings, into a modern facility whose training capacity would expand from 1,500 recruits to at least 4,000. The contract called for the firm to remake the campus by building, among other things, eight three-story student barracks, classroom buildings and a central laundry facility.

As top U.S. military commanders declared 2006 "the year of the police," in an acknowledgment of their critical role in allowing for any withdrawal of American troops, officials highlighted the Baghdad Police College as one of their success stories.

"This facility has definitely been a top priority," Lt. Col. Joel Holtrop of the Corps of Engineers' Gulf Region Division Project and Contracting Office said in a July news release. "It's a very exciting time as the cadets move into the new structures."

Complaints about the new facilities, however, began pouring in two weeks after the recruits arrived at the end of May, a Corps of Engineers official said.

The most serious problem was substandard plumbing that caused waste from toilets on the second and third floors to cascade throughout the building. A light fixture in one room stopped working because it was filled with urine and fecal matter. The waste threatened the integrity of load-bearing slabs, federal investigators concluded.

"When we walked down the halls, the Iraqis came running up and said, 'Please help us. Please do something about this,' " Bowen recalled.

Phillip A. Galeoto, director of the Baghdad Police College, wrote an Aug. 16 memo that catalogued at least 20 problems: shower and bathroom fixtures that leaked from the first day of occupancy, concrete and tile floors that heaved more than two inches off the ground, water rushing down hallways and stairwells because of improper slopes or drains in bathrooms, classroom buildings with foundation problems that caused structures to sink.

DOJ_NMG_0070374

Galeoto noted that one entire building and five floors in others had to be shuttered for repairs, limiting the capacity of the college by up to 800 recruits. His memo, too, pointed out that the urine and feces flowed throughout the building and, sometimes, onto occupants of the barracks.

"This is not a complete list," he wrote, but rather a snapshot of "issues we are confronted with on a daily basis (as recent as the last hour) by the incomplete and/or poor work left behind by these builders."

The Parsons contract, which eventually totaled at least $75 million, was terminated May 31 "due to cost overruns, schedule slippage, and sub-standard quality," according to a Sept. 4 internal military memo. But rather than fire the Pasadena, Calif.-based company for cause, the contract was halted for "the government's convenience."

Col. Michael Herman -- deputy commander of the Gulf Region Division of the Corps of Engineers, which was supposed to oversee the project -- said the Iraqi subcontractors hired by Parsons were being forced to fix the building problems as part of their warranty work, at no cost to taxpayers. He said four of the eight barracks have been repaired.

The U.S. military initially agreed to take a Washington Post reporter on a tour of the facility Wednesday to examine the construction issues, but the trip was postponed Tuesday night. Federal investigators who visited the academy last week, though, expressed concerns about the structural integrity of the buildings and worries that fecal residue could cause a typhoid outbreak or other health crisis.

"They may have to demolish everything they built," said Robert DeShurley, a senior engineer with the inspector general's office. "The buildings are falling down as they sit."

Herman said that he doubted that was the case but that he plans to hire an architecture and engineering firm to examine the facility. He also plans to investigate concerns raised by the inspector general's office that the Army Corps of Engineers did not properly respond to construction problems highlighted in quality-control reports.

Inside the inspector general's office in Baghdad on a recent blistering afternoon, several federal investigators expressed amazement that such construction blunders could be concentrated in one project. Even in Iraq, they said, failure on this magnitude is unusual. When asked how the problems at the police college compared with other projects they had inspected, the answers came swiftly.

"This is significant," said Jon E. Novak, a senior adviser in the office.

"It's catastrophic," DeShurley added.

Bowen said: "It's the worst."

Two Wars, One Mission (LAT)

By Rich Lowry, David B. Rivkin Jr.

The Los Angeles Times, September 28, 2006

TO CRITICS of the Bush administration, the war in Afghanistan is the "good" counterinsurgency. Their calls for troop reductions or a timetable to end the "bad war" in Iraq are matched by demands for more resources and perseverance in Afghanistan. However, this preference is senseless, driven either by sentimentality or partisanship. There is no sound strategic reason to favor the Afghan war over the war in Iraq. In fact, the fates of Baghdad and Kabul are intertwined.

The two wars began differently, of course. The Afghan war has always been much less controversial. No one has ever denied that the Taliban's harboring of Al Qaeda was a legitimate casus belli. The Iraq war had much more opposition from the beginning, and one of its chief rationales — that Saddam Hussein was harboring stockpiles of weapons of mass destruction — seemed to collapse after the U.S. invasion. But if you put aside how the wars began — and we realize that many opponents of the Iraq war will never be able to do that — there is little to differentiate them.

In Iraq, we face a vicious insurgency that will take years to defeat; the same is true in Afghanistan. In Iraq, the insurgency is made more difficult by the overlay of sectarian violence (Sunni versus Shiite); the same is true in Afghanistan (Pashtun versus everyone else). In Iraq, the insurgents are aided by infiltration from neighboring countries (Syria, Iran); the same is true in Afghanistan (Pakistan). In both countries we are trying to rebuild the army and the police — with fitful progress — and fostering a fragile central government whose writ doesn't seem to extend very far across the country.

DOJ_NMG_0070375

Of course, at least today, the difficulties in the two countries are not of equal severity. In Iraq, the violence is worse, American casualties are much higher and the capital city — the center of gravity of the country — is besieged by insurgents and murderous sectarians. Compared to that, Afghanistan is doing quite well. But it has deep problems of its own, namely the risk that it will become a lawless narco-state.

Pessimists about Iraq say the country is in the midst of a civil war. By most definitions, it certainly is, but this needn't be a cause for utter despair. Indeed, in Afghanistan, the U.S. success in driving out the Taliban regime was greatly aided by the fact that the country was in the midst of a civil war and that we allied ourselves with one side. Likewise, there is no reason that the U.S. cannot successfully navigate the shoals of communal violence in Iraq, which pits not just the Shiites against the Sunnis but features major — and exploitable — splits within the Shiite leadership.

The most important similarity between the Iraq and Afghan wars is that in both we are fighting Al Qaeda. Leaving aside the issue of how and when Al Qaeda came to be in Iraq, it is there now, and it considers Iraq a central battlefield. What we are fighting to prevent in Iraq — a country, or a chunk of it, established as a terrorist base — is exactly what we fought to destroy in Afghanistan immediately after 9/11 and are fighting to prevent from reemerging there now.

Insurgents in both countries share the jihadi battle against the U.S., and tactics such as the use of improvised explosive devices and suicide car-bombings have migrated from Iraq to Afghanistan. The killing this week in Basra of Omar Faruq, a senior Al Qaeda leader of Iraqi decent who escaped last year from a U.S. detention facility in Afghanistan, further underscores the connection between the two insurgencies.

At the strategic level, the more Iraqi insurgents seem to be succeeding, the more emboldened insurgents in Afghanistan become. As the just-declassified portions of the National Intelligence Estimate put it, "perceived jihadist success [in Iraq] would inspire more fighters to continue the struggle elsewhere." Their belief that the U.S. is a "weak horse" lacking the will for a long fight would be validated.

The costs of the Iraq war are higher to the U.S. in terms of blood and treasure. But the stakes are higher as well. If the terrorists capture Iraq, they will win a country much more strategically located than Afghanistan, and they will control the world's fourth-biggest oil reserves.

There is no doubt, as the intelligence estimate noted, that the Iraq war is a recruiting tool for terrorists. But Iraq war opponents should not fool themselves; so are Afghanistan and dozens of other Muslim grievances, from our support for Israel to Russia's campaign in Chechnya to the publication of cartoons of Muhammad in Danish newspapers. In the view of jihadis, both the Iraq and Afghan wars are Western assaults on Islam. The recently arrested suspects in the London airplane bombing plot cited both wars as stoking their rage.

There is no good reason to favor the Afghan war over the Iraq war. The Afghan war was launched in a brief period of national unity, while the Iraq war helped stoke our current period of political enmity. But one war will not be won without the other.

DOJ:

Eid's Ethnicity An Asset, Not An Issue (DENP)

By Bruce Finley, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, September 28, 2006

U.S. attorney, son of Egyptian immigrant, says his post reinforces America's freedoms. Bush appointee says he'll fight illegal immigration, drug trafficking and those who prey on children.

At dinner atop a Denver office tower recently, a visiting Jordanian military chief who'd just been introduced to the new U.S. attorney, Troy Eid, an Arab-American, approached Eid incredulously.

"'How can that be?'" Eid recalled the Jordanian asking. A man of Arab descent couldn't possibly be picked to represent U.S. government interests, the Jordanian said. "'It must be a token post ... Are you wealthy?'"

Appointed by President Bush, Eid responded with pride. "I said: 'I'm not wealthy. I went to Wheat Ridge High School. That's the great thing about this country.'

"If my background can show a few people what's possible in this country, that's great."

Tommorrow Eid marks the formal start of his service after an ambitious first six weeks on the job as the government's top law enforcement officer for Colorado. The only son of an Egyptian immigrant, Eid, 42, appears to be the the only Arab-American among the 94 U.S. attorneys.

And with enforcement of immigration law his top priority, Eid said he'll draw on this background and a longstanding "interest in the underdog" to ensure fairness.

"Being fair is very important, telling people what your policy is going to be," he said. "You get into problems when you're selective."

The criminals he vows to prosecute most aggressively - deportees who illegally re-enter the United States - often prey on immigrant communities, he said.

And criminals from abroad often drive illegal drug trafficking, his second major priority. Colorado has emerged as one of the busiest drug distribution centers in the country with transnational gangs taking root.

Taken together, immigration and drug-related crime now dominate federal criminal prosecution in Colorado.

Other priorities for Eid: sexual exploitation of children using the Internet, and terrorism cases - the overall top priority of the Justice Department under Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

"We get terrorism cases. We take them very seriously. They typically come to us through the JTTF (the FBI-run Joint Terrorism Task Force). ... We have some investigations that have resulted in charges and convictions."

A symbolic investiture ceremony scheduled for this afternoon marks the formal beginning for Eid, who on Aug. 11 replaced acting U.S. Attorney William Leone. He had served since December 2004, when John Suthers resigned to become Colorado attorney general, after Ken Salazar left that position for the U.S. Senate.

Eid previously worked as legal counsel to Gov. Bill Owens and as a lawyer specializing in environmental and Indian affairs cases. He grew up in Wheat Ridge and graduated from Stanford University the University of Chicago law school. His wife, Allison Eid, because a Colorado Supreme Court justice in February. They have two children.

Eid's father, the late Edward Eid, fled from Egypt in 1957 after military dictator Gamal Nasser took power and started fresh in America. He worked at a steel factory and as an accountant at a candle factory - and dealt with discrimination along the way.

"My dad was typical of immigrants off the boat. ... He would have been offended if anyone focused on his roots. He came from a time when you put your head down and assimilated as quickly as possible," Eid said in an interview Wednesday.

"I thought of myself as an American whose father was from Egypt."

Diversifying the government's legal workforce - only 18 of 94 U.S. attorneys are women - has loomed as a goal.

"I venture Eid is among the first Arab-Americans to hold such as office," said Nidal Ibrahim, executive director of the Arab-American Institute.

"During an especially critical and sensitive time in our country's history, having an Arab-American serving as U.S. attorney for Colorado represents an important milestone."

Staff writer Bruce Finley can be reached at 303-954-1700 or bfinley@denverpost.com

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Dunn Suggests She Was Unaware Of Probe Tactics (WSJ)

By PETER WALDMAN, DON CLARK And STEVE STECKLOW

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

Former Hewlett-Packard Co. Chairman Patricia Dunn said she relied on advice from H-P executives, including the company's chief financial officer, before pushing a leak investigation that delved into personal phone records and used tawdry tactics.

DOJ_NMG_0070377

Ms. Dunn, in testimony prepared for a House committee hearing today on the H-P investigation scandal, said she was informed that using Ronald DeLia, a Boston-area private investigator involved in the affair, constituted "normal processes" in pursuing investigations at the Palo Alto, Calif., computer company, having been told he had worked for H-P for "eight or nine years."

The testimony of Ms. Dunn, who resigned last week in connection with the leak investigation, could shed light on the question of how much Mark Hurd, H-P's chief executive, knew about the affair. Her remarks also raise new questions about how H-P may have conducted any investigations that predated the leak probes, which took place in 2005 and early 2006.

The H-P investigation involved obtaining phone records through false pretenses -- a practice known as pretexting -- of at least 20 people, including board members, H-P employees and reporters.

Ms. Dunn, who pushed for the investigation following board leaks in early 2005, said she learned by late that spring that private phone records were being accessed. But she got the "clear impression" from Mr. DeLia that such phone records "could be obtained from publicly available sources in a legal and appropriate manner." She said she discussed the investigation with Mr. Hurd and other directors, though she didn't spell out whether they were told that private phone records were obtained.

Ms. Dunn's remarks confirm the impression from H-P emails that Mr. Hurd was eager to catch leakers and was briefed multiple times of the progress of H-P's investigations. The chairman of the House subcommittee investigating the H-P scandal yesterday said he believes Mr. Hurd knew of the company's efforts to obtain personal information about some of its own board members and others as part of the investigations.

TRACKING THE SCANDAL

See a graphical timeline1 and key documents in the H-P scandal. Plus, read profiles2 of former H-P Chairman Patricia Dunn, CEO Mark Hurd and other key players in the leak-probe controversy. • Hurd's Testimony3 | Dunn's Testimony4

• Complete coverage5

Rep. Ed Whitfield, the Kentucky Republican who chairs the House Energy and Commerce Committee's subcommittee on investigations, said he intends to grill Mr. Hurd on the matter, and whether the H-P CEO also knew such tactics were potentially illegal. "We're going to ask him a lot of questions and get the facts out," Mr. Whitfield said in an interview.

In his testimony prepared for the hearing, Mr. Hurd said "although the board was informed that an investigation had started, they were not told the operational details."

Echoing remarks he made at a news conference Friday, Mr. Hurd apologized for what he characterized as a "rogue operation." He castigates investigators for being "so focused on finding the source of the leaks that they lost sight of the values of this company." (See Heard on the Street6.)

Ms. Dunn, in her statement, said she turned to Robert Wayman, H-P's longtime chief financial officer, after she decided to pursue the matter of board leaks. She said he referred her to Kevin Huska, a staff member responsible for security, who referred her to Mr. DeLia. Mr. Huska couldn't be reached to comment.

"It was my assumption that Mr. Wayman, having ultimate authority over all the resources involved in security and investigations, as well as having been one of the directors who felt the most strongly about the importance of controlling leaks from the board, had provided authorization for whatever work was undertaken," she said.

Michael Moeller, an H-P spokesman, said "any assumption about Bob Wayman's involvement made by Ms. Dunn was nothing more than that, an assumption." He declined comment about any H-P investigations before the leak probe.

Ms. Dunn said Mr. Hurd was involved in two or three meetings on the leak probe this year, when H-P's investigators employed its most aggressive tactics that have come to light.

In early 2006, she said Mr. Hurd was included in "perhaps two or three meetings," to review "key milestones and provide his own input on the priority and motivations behind the investigation."

Ms. Dunn adds that "neither Mr. Hurd nor I designed or implemented the investigative techniques." She said she knew that some of the probe targets were followed, but said she had no problem with such "old-fashioned detective work."

She and Mr. Hurd have said they were aware of a gambit that involved sending a bogus email to a reporter as part of the probe. Ms. Dunn said she made special efforts to ascertain the tactic's legality, before referring it to Mr. Hurd for "the final decision."

Mr. Hurd said he approved the content of the message, but doesn't recall whether he knew the misinformation plot involved the use of tracer software that could show where the email was forwarded.

Mr. DeLia has been issued a subpoena by the House committee to appear at the hearing. He and his attorney haven't responded to requests for comment.

The House committee has requested testimony from Ms. Dunn, Mr. Hurd and several other H-P officials involved in the probe, as well as the company's outside counsel, Larry Sonsini. The House also issued subpoenas to five additional witnesses who may have been involved in surreptitiously obtaining telephone numbers, a person close to the investigation said yesterday. The five witnesses are believed to be subcontractors to Action Research Group, a Florida contractor believed to have been involved in accessing telephone records.

One of the persons suspected of obtaining phone records, Bryan Wagner, of Littleton, Colo., said in an interview yesterday that he didn't know if he obtained any phone records in connection with the H-P leak probe because his employer-Action Research Group-never identified its clients.

"They do not provide me any details on anything," he said. "I pretty much always assume that I am looking for people who have taken cars and aren't paying." He added that he believed most of the clients are "bounty hunters and bondsmen."

Mr. Wagner said he hadn't yet decided if he will answer questions before the House committee, but will appear. He also declined to comment about an article in The Wall Street Journal yesterday that he had told an investigator in Denver last week that he had destroyed his computer with a hammer and discarded it after learning that he might get caught up in the investigation of the H-P leak case.

"I just don't have my computer anymore," he said, declining to answer any questions about it.

Ex-H.P. Officer To Say She Knew Of No Illegality (NYT)

By Miguel Helft And Damon Darlin

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 27 — In her most detailed account of the leak investigation that forced her to resign, Hewlett-Packard's former chairwoman maintains that while she was in regular contact with those conducting the operation, she was not its supervisor.

In prepared remarks that she is expected to deliver Thursday at a Congressional hearing, Patricia C. Dunn, the former chairwoman who resigned from the board last week, also said she never had reason to believe that illegal methods were used. And she said she repeatedly sought assurances on that point from those directly involved.

But even as she got those assurances, a senior investigator for the company was warning early this year, as the operation entered a crucial phase, that its techniques of using subterfuge to gain private phone records were "very unethical at the least and quite likely illegal."

Saying that the practices, even if legal, "could damage our reputation or worse," the investigator, Vince Nye, said in an e-mail message, "I think we need to refocus our strategy and proceed on the high-ground course." Mr. Nye worked in the company's global security unit.

Why that advice was not followed — and apparently did not reach the top levels of Hewlett-Packard's leadership — is expected to be a central theme of Thursday's hearing.

The roles of Ms. Dunn and the company's chief executive, Mark V. Hurd, in the investigation — the extent of their knowledge, their action or inaction, and the questions they raised or failed to — are expected to dominate the questioning. Several company officials and others engaged in the effort are to testify.

The investigation, aimed at tracing press leaks from the company's board in 2005 and early 2006, included the hiring of private detectives who used ruses to gain the phone records of directors, employees, journalists and others — a practice called pretexting.

The operation came into public view scarcely three weeks ago as a result of boardroom divisions that have already led to three resignations, including Ms. Dunn's. It is also the subject of federal and state criminal investigations.

Mr. Nye's e-mail message, obtained by The New York Times from someone with access to documents given to the committee, is the strongest indication yet of internal questions about the operation's legality.

It came on Feb. 7, shortly after a new leak from the board had revived the investigation and while more elaborate forms of surveillance, beyond obtaining phone records, were being considered or carried out.

The message was addressed to Anthony R. Gentilucci, the head of the company's Boston-based global investigations unit, a key figure in the operation from its start a year earlier. It is not clear whether or how Mr. Gentilucci responded.

In her prepared testimony, Ms. Dunn said that once the board agreed to an investigation of leaks in early 2005, she relied on top Hewlett-Packard officials who referred her to the company's global security department, which in turn referred her to Ronald R. DeLia, a contractor in the Boston area who had performed investigations for Hewlett-Packard for nearly a decade.

"I did not 'hire' the private investigators" involved in the operation, Ms. Dunn said. "They were already under contract to H.P. when the leak investigation was initiated."

Ms. Dunn called Mr. DeLia's firm a "captive subsidiary" of Hewlett-Packard and noted that it was used to perform a background check on Mr. Hurd before he was hired, including a report on his health.

Ms. Dunn said that after she learned in the spring of 2005 that the phone records of directors were being gathered, "the clear impression I had from Mr. DeLia was that such records could be obtained from publicly available sources in a legal and appropriate manner."

She also said that "given that attorneys were unambiguously overseeing" a later, more intense phase of the investigation that employed similar techniques, she had no reason to believe those techniques were inappropriate.

It was not until after the second phase concluded in May 2006 that she began to comprehend the word "pretext," Ms. Dunn said, adding, "I still do not understand whether it is or is not legal, as opinions vary."

Ms. Dunn also lashed out at Thomas J. Perkins, a former board member whom she accused of disseminating "false statements about my having organized and conducted an elaborate spying campaign on H.P. directors for no good reason except, to paraphrase, a delusion of paranoia."

Mr. Perkins resigned from the board in May over the leak investigation, whose findings pointed to a friend and fellow director, George A. Keyworth II, as the source. It was Mr. Perkins's subsequent inquiries into the investigation's methods that led to their disclosure this month.

Ms. Dunn's statement defends the goal of the investigation, and it includes no expression of regret or apology for its handling.

In his own prepared testimony, Mr. Hurd portrays Ms. Dunn as having taken a more engaged role in the operation, saying she "enlisted the professional services" of Mr. DeLia.

Mr. Hurd's statement largely reiterates the account he offered in announcing Ms. Dunn's resignation last Friday. He says he was present at two meetings to discuss the operation while it was under way, and was consulted at another point about the use of a bogus e-mail message to try to detect a reporter's source.

"While many of the right processes were in place, they unfortunately broke down, and no one in the management chain, including me, caught it," he said.

Just how those processes broke down is likely to be a topic of pointed questioning by members of the House Energy and Commerce Committee.

Among the documents sent to the committee is an 18-page report from Kevin T. Hunsaker, senior counsel and director of ethics at the company, after the investigation's conclusion in May that summarizes the findings and makes clear that private phone records were obtained — adding in a footnote that the effort involved "a lawful investigative methodology commonly utilized." It was sent to Mr. Hurd, the company's board, and Ann O. Baskins, the general counsel.

"These folks still in the company need to come clean," said Greg Walden, the Oregon Republican who is vice chairman of the panel's investigations and oversight subcommittee, which is convening the hearing.

Five additional witnesses, all said to have been engaged in obtaining phone records, were subpoenaed Wednesday to appear at the hearing.

The five are Bryan Wagner of Littleton, Colo.; Darren Brost of Austin, Tex.; Charles Kelly of CAS Agency in Villa Rica, Ga.; Cassandra Selvage of Eye in the Sky Investigations in Dade City, Fla.; and Valerie Preston of InSearchOf Inc., in Cooper City, Fla. Congressional staff members said they did not know if any would answer questions.

The five are believed to be at the end of a long investigative chain that stretched from Hewlett-Packard's headquarters in Palo Alto, Calif., to its own investigators in Boston, through Mr. DeLia's firm, Security Outsourcing Solutions, and on to Action Research Group, a data broker in Melbourne, Fla., that is said to have hired the actual pretexters.

The hearing is scheduled to begin at 10 a.m. and stretch into the evening. It is expected to be covered live by C-Span 3, a government affairs cable network.

The hearing will begin with a panel of witnesses who are expected to invoke their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.

Lawyers for two of those subpoenaed — Mr. Gentilucci, the manager of global investigations, and Mr. Hunsaker, the senior counsel — said their clients had not decided whether to answer questions.

Mr. DeLia, the author of several reports on the investigation given to company officials, has also been subpoenaed, but it is not clear how he will respond. His lawyer could not be reached for comment.

A second panel will include company officials who were involved in the investigation, including Ms. Dunn; Ms. Baskins, the general counsel; and Fred Adler, a security investigator, as well as Larry W. Sonsini, the company's outside counsel. That panel will also include Joseph DePante, the owner of Action Research Group, the Florida investigative firm.

A third session will include only Mr. Hurd, at his request, in part because he wanted his role to seen as separate from other H.P. officials.

Sitting separately, however, carries its own risks. He will face more questions than if he shared the panel with others, since each committee member gets 10 minutes to ask questions at each panel.

Ousted HP Chairwoman Says She Consulted Others In Leak Probe, Was Certain Methods Were Legal (FINDLAW/AP)

By Marcy Gordon, Ap Business Writer

AP, September 28, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-Hewlett-Packard Co.'s ousted chairwoman said it was her duty to stem boardroom leaks of sensitive information and that her decision to initiate an investigation was made in concert with others at HP, according to prepared testimony released by a congressional committee.

Patricia Dunn said she believed that the methods used in the investigation were anything but legal, and that she discussed the conduct of the probe with the technology company's CEO and board members - getting a clear impression that the directors were satisfied with it.

"I never doubted ... that what they were doing was legal," Dunn said in written testimony prepared for her appearance Thursday at a hearing by the House Energy and Commerce Committee. It was released by the panel late Wednesday.

She was referring to the probe led by Ron DeLia, the operator of a private detective firm. The investigation involved private eyes impersonating HP board members, employees and journalists to obtain their phone records, spying on targeted people and their relatives, sifting through their garbage, and using an e-mail sting to dupe a reporter.

"I initiated the investigation, in response to directors who urged me to take more serious action in response to leaks," Dunn said in her lengthy and detailed recounting of events. "I turned to resources that HP normally used to do this type of work.

"I now believe that not only I, but all of the executives upon whom I relied at HP, whose integrity I have never questioned to this day, were similarly confident that these records were accessed under fully legal circumstances."

Five private investigators who allegedly served as the foot soldiers in the company's efforts to identify the source of leaks have been ordered to testify at Thursday's hearing.

The subpoenas, announced Wednesday, were the second batch issued by the Energy and Commerce Committee. The private eyes are believed to have masqueraded as journalists, HP directors and employees to obtain their phone records. Last weekend, two HP employees and the operator of a detective firm were ordered to appear.

DOJ_NMG_0070381

The House committee will be exploring a scandal has roiled Silicon Valley's largest and oldest technology company, brought federal and state criminal probes, and claimed the company's chairwoman, two directors and two high-level employees. California's attorney general has said he has enough evidence to indict HP insiders and contractors.

Dunn, HP CEO Mark Hurd - who succeeded her as chairman on Friday - and General Counsel Ann Baskins also have agreed to appear at the hearing.

"I'm deeply concerned about corporations, in this case HP, using private detectives and information brokers to obtain illicit access to telephone records and other personal information," Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., a senior member of the House panel, said in a statement Wednesday. "We need to know how this happened, why HP and others thought this was legal, and how widespread (is) this practice of spying on employees, directors or the corporate competition."

The five private eyes summoned to appear are believed to have acted as "pretexters" who got phone records under false pretenses. They are Bryan Wagner of Littleton, Colorado; Charles Kelly of CAS Agency in Villa Rica, Georgia; Cassandra Selvage of Eye in the Sky Investigations, Dade City, Florida; Darren Brost of Austin, Texas, and Valerie Preston of InSearchOf Inc., Cooper City, Florida.

Wagner told an investigator that he had destroyed his computer with a hammer, The Wall Street Journal reported in Wednesday's editions, citing an anonymous person familiar with a probe of the HP case.

Documents have shown that investigators working for HP intruded into the personal lives of seven HP directors, two employees, nine reporters and family members of the targeted individuals. In addition to impersonating those targeted to procure phone records, they also spied on an HP director and his wife, sifted through their garbage, and concocted an e-mail sting to dupe reporter Dawn Kawamoto of CNet Networks Inc.'s technology news site.

On the Net:

Dunn testimony: http://energycommerce.house.gov/108/News/09282006-Testimony-Dunn.pdf

Hurd testimony: http://energycommerce.house.gov/108/News/09282006-Testimony-Hurd.pdf

CEO Faces Gantlet At Hearings (USAT)

By Michelle Kessler

USA Today, September 28, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — When Hewlett-Packard CEO Mark Hurd takes the stand before a congressional committee today, he will be fighting for his reputation — and possibly his job.

Hurd, 49, has acknowledged approving at least part of a plan to snoop on journalists, board members, even his own employees. Some of the tactics his team and their contractors used may have been illegal.

Now, Hurd and other key players have been asked to defend their actions before the House Energy and Commerce Committee. Wednesday, the Committee subpoenaed five more individuals, all private investigators. That brings the total requested witness list to seven detectives, six current or former HP employees and one outside lawyer.

But none will face as much scrutiny as Hurd, who as CEO, is ultimately responsible for what happened at HP.

HP board member Robert Ryan, a former Medtronic executive, says Hurd is a victim of the scandal, not the cause. The board had told Hurd to focus on fixing HP's operational problems instead of boardroom squabbles, Ryan says.

So Hurd wasn't paying much attention when a private investigative team began using subterfuge to obtain phone records of reporters and staffers, in hopes finding a leak, Ryan says. When the board delivered a report, Hurd and the board were so busy figuring out what to do about the leaker (board member George Keyworth) that nobody thought to ask how the investigation was conducted, Ryan says. The mistake shouldn't get Hurd fired, he says.

But it will be difficult for Hurd to emerge untarnished. He will face tough questions, including:

•Did Hurd know that private detectives were physically surveilling people at their home and work?

•Why did he OK a plan to send e-mails from a fictitious source to a journalist in order to trick her?

•Did he knowingly allow HP staffers to turn over employees' Social Security numbers to investigators?

•Is there more snooping that has not yet been uncovered?

Morgan Lewis, a law firm hired by HP to conduct an internal investigation, says it also has evidence of detectives snooping through someone's trash, though it doesn't know whose. Morgan Lewis says it hasn't found evidence of wiretapping phones or installing software to track computer keystrokes.

Congress is eager to know, says Rep. Ed Markey, D-Mass. Internal documents that the company has released show a blasé attitude toward pilfering phone records, he says. That suggests, "It is very unlikely that HP is the only corporation that is aiding and abetting the illegal practice," he says.

And Congress intends to stop that. "We clearly need to ban these kinds of practices," says Rep. Diana DeGette, D-Colo. While the House committee can't prosecute HP, it can help spawn regulation that will prevent such scandals from happening again, she says. Several other government agencies are investigating and could impose penalties.

The results will affect all of Corporate America, but the stakes are huge for HP. Hurd, head of the company for 18 months, has won acclaim for turning around the troubled computer giant. Now, he must grapple with a messy, attention-getting scandal that exposes HP to legal liability. And he must do so just as his corporate overhaul enters a crucial and difficult period.

"His performance on Thursday will be a career-defining moment," says business professor Eric Johnson at Dartmouth College.

Hurd has a good chance of surviving it, Johnson says: He has handled the crisis fairly well, so far. If he continues to do so, he should be able to hang on to his position — unless HP drops another bombshell. If that doesn't happen, "he'll weather the storm," says equity analyst Charlie Wolf with Needham & Company.

A big part of Hurd's defense is plausible deniability. He wasn't at HP when the snooping program started in early 2005. His predecessor, Carly Fiorina, launched it as a way to find out which board members were leaking information to the press. In the shake-up that ousted Fiorina, board member Patricia Dunn became chairman and assumed responsibility for the program.

Hurd has repeatedly said that his focus at HP has been on day-to-day operational problems. During his tenure, he focused on retooling HP's 150,000-person bureaucracy. (Hurd's previous job was head of NCR, a company less than one-fifth HP's size.)

Hurd has publicly confessed to giving a general go-ahead to the snooping program, though he says he didn't know many of the details. He has also apologized, and hired former U.S. prosecutor Bart Schwartz to analyze the company's business practices.

The board is also looking for outside members to help improve corporate governance, Ryan says.

The public statements could have come out earlier, says tech analyst Crawford Del Prete at researcher IDC. But overall, Hurd is "taking this head-on," he says.

If HP's stock price is any indication, HP's investors are not too worried. Shares have risen more than 61% since Hurd became CEO. They've slipped less than 3% this month despite non-stop coverage of the scandal in the business press.

Wall Street's main concern is that Hurd keeps his job, Needham's Wolf says. Hurd told BusinessWeek he has no reason to believe his job is in danger. (Hurd denied requests to be interviewed for this story.)

Other major players have not been so lucky. Dunn tried to hang on to her board seat, agreeing earlier this month only to resign as chairman. But as more reports were issued that linked her to Ron DeLia, a private investigator in the case, she resigned.

So did HP security manager Anthony Gentilucci, who handed at least one HP employee's Social Security number over to private investigators.

HP lawyer Kevin Hunsaker left the company Tuesday, though HP wouldn't say whether he quit or was fired. Hunsaker had led one stage of the snooping program, assuring others at the company that it was legal, HP's current lawyers say.

Gentilucci, Hunsaker and DeLia have all been subpoenaed to appear before the House committee. Dunn and Hurd have been asked to appear, as have two more HP employees: general counsel Ann Baskins and security investigator Fred Adler. The exact details of their roles are not yet publicly known. It's also unclear what role HP employees Vince Nye, Denis Lynch, Tim O'Neill or Jim Fairbaugh played. All were members of the investigation team, according to an HP document obtained by USA TODAY.

Private investigator Joe Depante has also been asked to appear before the committee. He owns Action Research Group, a subcontractor of DeLia's firm, Security Outsourcing Solutions (SOS).

DOJ_NMG_0070383

Silicon Valley attorney Larry Sonsini is also scheduled to testify. Sonsini, HP's outside legal counsel, was part of the team that investigated HP's snooping methods after HP director Tom Perkins complained. At the time, Sonsini said he could not say that all techniques employed by HP and its subcontractors were legal.

It's less clear what role the five private investigators subpoenaed Wednesday played in the HP scandal. The Committee says each has used subterfuge to obtain phone records — a technique known as pretexting — and all have relevant information to HP.

But one, Cassandra Selvage of Dade City, Fla.-based Eye in the Sky Investigations, says she has not worked for HP, SOS or Action Research Group. She says her subpoena contained no details, and the Committee wouldn't provide any when she called and asked. "I will be there, but I don't know what for," she says. She would not say whether she used pretexting. The others, Bryan Wagner of Littleton, Colo., Charles Kelly of Villa Rica, Ga., Darren Brost of Austin and Valerie Preston of Cooper City, Fla., could not be reached for comment. HP had no comment on the new subpoenas.

In addition to the House committee, five other government agencies are looking into the snooping scandal. That's a distraction, but a corporate shake-up may ultimately benefit Hurd, Needham's Wolf says.

Hurd has made few big changes to HP's top ranks. Now, at the very least, he will have the opportunity to pick two board members to replace Dunn and Perkins, who resigned in protest of Keyworth's treatment.

But Hurd faces huge challenges in the coming months, IDC's Del Prete says.

Corporate turnarounds are relatively easy at first, he says. Cost-cutting measures often instantly boost profits. Hurd has slashed 15,000 jobs, and reported five straight quarters of rising net income.

Now, things get tougher. He must get the $87 billion company to grow despite tough competitors such as Dell, Sony and Kodak.

Additionally, Hurd now holds the dual role of CEO and chairman, putting him in charge of HP's famously contentious board.

He must boost morale inside the battered company. And he'll have to prove that he has the strategy to keep the computer giant — which rivals IBM in size — moving forward.

But if things go well Thursday, it will "at least put to bed the question of whether Mark Hurd can survive (the scandal)," Dartmouth's Johnson says.

HP Leader Hurd Expected To Apologize At Hearing (USAT)

By Michelle Kessler And Jon Swartz

USA Today, September 28, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Hewlett-Packard CEO Mark Hurd is expected to apologize before Congress for HP's snooping scandal today. Former chairman Patricia Dunn is expected to blame others for the mess.

According to prepared remarks released by the House Energy and Commerce Committee, Hurd will tell Congress that a hunt to find out which board member was leaking information to the press "became a rogue investigation that violated our own principles."

"The end came to justify the means," Hurd's prepared remarks say. "If Bill Hewlett and David Packard were still alive, they would be appalled."

The statement contains few new details about Hurd's role in the scandal, which unfolded after an HP contractor used subterfuge to obtain home phone records of journalists, board members and employees.

Dunn, in contrast, plans to name names. In her statement, she says she was put in charge of the leak investigation in early 2005. She turned to Bob Wayman, HP's longtime chief financial officer then also serving as interim CEO.

Wayman introduced Dunn to an HP security employee, Kevin Huska, who in turn introduced her to private detective Ron DeLia, the statement says. DeLia has been subpoenaed to appear before the committee. He is expected to invoke his right against self-incrimination, says Rep. Diana DeGette, D-Colo.

HP spokesman Ryan Donovan said Wayman was not involved in the leak investigation. "Any assumption about Bob Wayman's involvement made by Ms. Dunn was nothing more than that, an assumption," he said.

Dunn's statement also says that she was in regular contact with Hurd and Ann Baskins, HP's general counsel, about the leak hunt. She says she knew that private detectives were physically following HP board members. "I did not find it objectionable," she said.

Dunn says, though, that it wasn't until board member Thomas Perkins began questioning HP's investigative tactics this summer that she understood that the detectives were swiping phone records.

Dunn, a former executive at Barclays Global Investors, was forced out last week. Among letters of support to the House panel, she is endorsed by John Galvin, president of the Henry David Thoreau Foundation, and David Nygren, head of the corporate governance group at Mercer Delta Consulting. Both have had business dealings with Dunn.

House Panel Expands Probe Of Hewlett-Packard Spying (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, September 28, 2006

The House Energy and Commerce Committee issued five more subpoenas yesterday to detectives tied to the privacy invasion scandal at Hewlett-Packard, setting the stage for two days of hearings that could reveal new details of the tech company's now-infamous spying practices.

Hewlett-Packard (HP) stumbled into a political and legal minefield this month when its internal probe of boardroom leaks of confidential company information became public. HP admitted hiring private detectives to fraudulently obtain the phone records of board members and journalists through a tactic known as "pretexting," which has been in the crosshairs of Energy and Commerce's oversight subcommittee for almost a year.

"Clearly the HP case is a high-profile example of the scam" of pretexting, in which detectives impersonate individuals in order to access their personal data, Energy and Commerce spokesman Terry Lane said. "We want to find out how pretexting was used and find out any other type of investigative methods that were used by HP."

The witness list for today's hearing includes most central players in the widening HP scandal. HP chief executive officer Mark Hurd offered to appear last week to discuss the company's use of pretexting, and Patricia Dunn, who resigned as board chairman last Friday over her role in the affair, also will testify under oath.

In a statement late last week, Dunn was optimistic that today's hearing would be the first step to rebuilding HP's reputation. "I look forward to appearing before Congress next week to answer their questions and help the company put this unfortunate event behind it," she said.

The committee also has called HP's general counsel, global security manager, and Larry Sonsini, a top Silicon Valley lawyer who gave legal advice to the company. Two other witnesses are private contractors used by HP who could take the 5th Amendment rather than potentially incriminate themselves.

The five new subpoenaed witnesses, sources said, may have played subcontractor roles in HP's broad pretexting operation but may have done so without full knowledge of their ultimate employer.

Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton has pushed for months for floor action on his panel's pretexting bill, which would explicitly criminalize pretexting of phone records and empower the Federal Trade Commission and Federal Communications Commission to step up enforcement of penalties. But the bill was pulled from the House floor schedule in the spring as the National Security Agency's warrantless-wiretapping program first made headlines and its future is uncertain.

Despite the harsh light cast by the HP scandal on the commonality and low price of invasive pretexting, the packed House schedule could prevent any action this year, a House GOP source said. The nine appropriations bills yet to be considered look to push pretexting to the bottom of the House agenda though the situation coudl change.

Rep. Ed Markey (D-Mass.), who sent a strongly worded letter to Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) after the bill was initially pulled, nonetheless hopes today's hearing and a follow-up tomorrow will jumpstart debate on privacy protection issues.

"We need to know why this happened, why HP and others thought this was legal, and how widespread this practice of spying on employees, directors, or the corporate competition [is]," Markey said in a statement.

Representatives from the Federal Trade Commission and the Federal Communications Commission will testify tomorrow, and the FTC is expected to stress its escalating efforts to prosecute phone-records pretexters for unfair or deceptive practices.

While the Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act of 1999 made it a crime to pretext for financial records, phone records remain a murky area in the law.

The House has unanimously passed the Judiciary Committee's pretexting bill, increasing criminal penalties for detectives found using the tactic, but that measure has yet to see action in the Senate. Earlier this month, Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.) and two fellow panel members wrote to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), urging action on their product.

"If an attorney of Mr. Sonsini's caliber (in our view mistakenly) believes that pretexting is not already a crime, then the time has come to clearly and unambiguously make that activity illegal," wrote Sensenbrenner and Reps. Lamar Smith (R-Texas) and Howard Berman (D-Calif.) on Sept. 8.

Consumer and grassroots groups largely prefer the House Energy and Commerce approach to the Senate Commerce Committee's pretexting bill. Still, that measure has yet to be merged with an overlapping Senate Judiciary Committee bill, leading to a crush of options that is likely to postpone Senate action until after the election, if at all this year.

Two central players in the HP saga have signed lawyers with significant Bush administration clout. Thomas Perkins, the board member whose May resignation ignited internal scrutiny of Dunn's handling of the leak probe, has retained former Justice Department counsel Viet Dinh, while Sonsini has retained Akin Gump's Michael Madigan, a onetime counsel for President Bush's 2000 campaign.

Hewlett Packard's media relations department did not return requests for comment by press time.

Between The Lines Of HP's Spy Scandal (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

Hewlett-Packard Co.'s media-leak investigation went forward despite warnings from HP security personnel that the tactics used were "probably illegal" and should be stopped, according to documents collected for today's congressional hearing on the scandal.

In February, HP global security investigator Vince Nye told a Boston colleague working with him on the leak probe that he had "serious reservations" about how they were obtaining phone-record information in an internal probe to ferret out the source of media leaks.

He said he thought the method, impersonating someone else to trick the phone company into providing call data, "is very unethical at the least and probably illegal."

"I am requesting that we cease this phone number gathering method immediately and discount any of its information," Nye wrote in a Feb. 7 e-mail to Anthony Gentilucci, one of four members of the internal investigative team reporting to HP's legal department. Nye sent a copy of the e-mail to Kevin Hunsaker, then HP's chief ethics director, who supervised the probe.

How and why top management failed to heed the warning are among the questions members of the House Energy and Commerce oversight and investigations subcommittee want answered at today's hearing. More than a dozen key figures, including chief executive Mark V. Hurd and former chairman Patricia C. Dunn are scheduled to appear to explain how their media-leak probe morphed into an elaborate spying operation that targeted board members and journalists.

The hearing was fueled by concerns about how private citizens' phone records were illegally accessed. On a deeper level, analysts and lawmakers said, the issue is one of corporate ethics and how HP's leaders could let an internal probe go so awry.

Dunn, in a statement submitted to the committee for today's testimony, strongly defended her handling of the leak investigation, which started in 2005. She distanced herself from its operational aspects, saying: "I did not at any point consider myself its 'supervisor.' "

Dunn professed not to know that illegal tactics were used. At some point in spring 2005, Dunn said she became aware from Ronald DeLia, a Boston contractor who had done investigative work for HP for eight or nine years, that phone records were being obtained as a "standard component" of internal investigations.

"The clear impression I had from Mr. DeLia was that such records could be obtained from publicly available sources in a legal and appropriate manner," she said.

Dunn, who left the company Friday, said both she and Hurd were aware of a planned e-mail sting operation on a reporter conducted in February in an attempt to flush out the reporter's source of company information. She said she was assured that this was "a legal and common investigative technique" and so referred it to Hurd for the final decision.

Dunn's remarks contrasted with a more contrite statement from Hurd to the committee for today's testimony. In it, he apologized to the nine journalists, two current HP employees, and seven former or current HP board members and their families whose phone records were to varying degrees obtained under false pretenses, a practice known as pretexting.

"How did such an abuse of privacy occur?" he wrote. "It's an age-old story. The ends came to justify the means."

"What began as a proper and serious inquiry into leaks to the press of company information from within the HP board became a rogue investigation that violated our own principles and values," he added. "There is no excuse for this aberration. It happened; it will never happen again."

The scandal brings to the fore questions of privacy that affect thousands of Americans whose phone or bank records have been fraudulently obtained by data brokers who sell the information to investigators. What catapulted this to the headlines was the fact that this time, it was a Fortune 100 company seeking the personal data

Not only did investigators lie to obtain phone call records, they also conducted extensive background checks of reporters, directors, their spouses and children; plotted to plant spies in newsrooms; discussed the possibility of inspecting trash; and planned a ruse to trick a reporter into revealing her source by planting a tracer in an e-mail sent by a fictitious HP tipster.

"What happened here was like cutting off your head to kill a head cold," said Charles M. Elson, chairman of the University of Delaware's John L. Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance.

The purpose of today's hearings, lawmakers and aides said, is to lay bare what happened, find out who committed or knew about any acts that were illegal or unethical, and to push Congress to pass pending legislation that could prevent much of this from happening again.

"For the highest-ranking officials of a company like Hewlett-Packard to be aware of and seemingly approve this kind of activity I do not think speaks well of their value system or their culture," said subcommittee chairman Edward Whitfield (R-Ky.).

The scandal seems curious, considering how Hewlett-Packard, founded in 1938, spent decades building an image as an ethical company devoted to civic responsibility and the welfare of its employees. HP codified its philosophy of respecting individuals, encouraging teamwork and promoting openness as it tried to fashion useful products. Called "the HP Way," its corporate philosophy became a legend in Silicon Valley.

In his statement, Hurd admitted that the probe had fallen afoul of the "HP Way." He outlined steps taken to correct mistakes, including accepting Dunn's resignation. Two others involved in the investigation, Hunsaker and Gentilucci, have also left the company. Hurd said existing ethical practices will be reviewed and new measures developed to protect information privacy.

He, too, distanced himself from the investigation's operation: "I was apprised of the existence of the investigation by Ms. Dunn, but I was not involved in the investigation itself."

Both the FBI and the California attorney general's office are investigating the case, and California Attorney General Bill Lockyer has said he has enough evidence to bring criminal charges against people inside and outside the firm. Documents delivered to Congress detailed one exchange between HP investigators that suggested they knew they were pushing the bounds of the law.

In a Jan. 30 e-mail, Hunsaker asked Gentilucci how HP's private investigator was obtaining phone records. "Is it all above board?" he asked.

Gentilucci replied that the investigator, DeLia, used " some ruse" to trick phone operators. "I think it's on the edge, but above board," he wrote.

Hunsaker's reply: "I shouldn't have asked."

Staff writer Yuki Noguchi and staff researcher Richard Drezen contributed to this report.

Dunn And Dumber (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

One refreshing aspect of the Hewlett-Packard "leak" scandal is that it hasn't become an excuse to diagnose some larger sickness in all of corporate America. Today, however, the story heads to Congress, which specializes in false diagnoses, not to mention bad prescriptions. So perhaps it's time to sort out the lessons of this case, prosaic as they are.

From our vantage point in the cheap seats, the spectacle looks like a unique case of board of director dysfunction and bad human judgment. Such things are known to happen, even among the rich and otherwise savvy. Patricia Dunn, H-P chairman until her recent resignation, led a wild leak chase all out of proportion to the story that prompted it. That chase evolved into a fishing expedition into telephone records and even newspaper trash, including misrepresentations that may have been illegal. Most H-P directors still haven't admitted, perhaps even to themselves, how dumb and dumber this all was.

None of this is to say that board leaks aren't a problem. Directors are supposed to have a company's best interests in mind, and leaks to the press can make life difficult for any management. H-P's most damaging leak came in January 2005, when this newspaper reported that the board had concerns with then-CEO Carly Fiorina. She was later sacked, and the H-P board agreed not to speak to the press. But leaks are a fact of modern American life, and the search to find the leaker typically does more harm than the leak itself. Media relations, leaks included, are a key part of an executive's job.

All the more so in H-P's case because the actual "leak" that triggered a second phase of the probe hardly deserves the term. A story on CNET News, the Web site, was mostly an endorsement of the strategy of new CEO Mark Hurd. Most companies want this kind of publicity. But Ms. Dunn seems to have used the story as an excuse to investigate directors she disagreed with, specifically physicist George "Jay" Keyworth.

Ms. Dunn hasn't yet told her side of this story -- not surprising given California Attorney General Bill Lockyer's loose words about criminal indictments. But the board's internal disagreements seem to have been about the role of directors. Mr. Keyworth, who was Ronald Reagan's science adviser and whose 21 years on the board go back to the era of founder David Packard, was part of a faction who believe directors need to be conversant enough with technology to appreciate the company's main business risks. After H-P's failure to recognize the threat from the distributed computer revolution in the 1990s, this makes a lot of sense.

Ms. Dunn, by contrast, is a former financier with little knowledge of the computer industry. She believed H-P's board should focus more on supervisory process -- for example, by fulfilling its obligations under Sarbanes-Oxley. There may also have been some residual tension on the board over Ms. Fiorina's dismissal; Mr. Keyworth was among those who wanted to replace Ms. Fiorina, who still has friends on the board.

In any case, there's little doubt that Ms. Dunn's leak probe was aimed principally at Mr. Keyworth, who acknowledged having lunch with the CNET writer, a long-time acquaintance. Asked to resign at a board meeting in May, Mr. Keyworth understandably refused on grounds that what he had "leaked" was public information, finally resigning this month as a way to help Mr. Hurd clear the decks.

Are there any bigger lessons here about "corporate governance"? Not really. The fad of dividing the roles of CEO and chairman may sometimes make sense, but at H-P that division of responsibility led to dysfunction. Ms. Dunn seems to have meddled too much in corporate operations by supervising a leak probe run from the H-P counsel's office. That's one danger of dividing the two jobs. But like any collection of human beings, the knowledge and judgment of the individuals on a board matter far more than its structure.

Mr. Hurd and the entire H-P board also seem to have ignored a law of modern public relations, which is to get all the bad news out early, take responsibility, and move on. Instead, the board knew as early as June that the probe involved "pretexting," or misrepresentation, to obtain Mr. Keyworth's phone records, yet it failed to stop it. Mr. Hurd has finally acknowledged he should have paid more attention to the details of the probe, but he was also too slow to accept that Ms. Dunn had to leave as chairman. He's fortunate H-P's stock has performed so well, or some investors would be using this episode to call for his head as well.

As for Congress, we understand the impulse to grab some camera time by beating up on H-P witnesses. But even otherwise shrewd Members of Congress have been known to do stupid things from time to time. The last thing the country needs is a new Bureau for the Prevention of Bad Business Judgment, which is at bottom what the H-P saga is all about.

A Fugitive's Haven In Africa Turned Out To Be Anything But (WSJ)

By CHARLES FORELLE, KARA SCANNELL And PAUL DAVIES

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

Kobi Alexander Is Arrested In Namibia; the Tip-Off Was Hefty Bank Transfer

Kobi Alexander, a former chief executive embroiled in a stock-options scandal and the focus of an international manhunt, seemed to have found the safest of havens: Windhoek, the picturesque capital of Namibia, an African country with no extradition treaty with the U.S.

Missing since early August, and supposedly spotted in Sri Lanka several weeks ago, Mr. Alexander was living openly in Windhoek with his wife and children, said a U.S. official in Namibia. He had filled out a temporary residence permit using his given name, Jacob Alexander, the official said, had enrolled his children in the international school and was looking for real estate.

Yesterday, this life on the lam came to an end. Early in the morning, Namibia's justice minister filed a special notice with parliament to allow the country to extradite Mr. Alexander to the U.S., and a magistrate issued an arrest warrant soon after. At about 2 p.m. local time, authorities arrested Mr. Alexander, the 54-year-old former chief of Comverse Technology Inc., as he was having lunch with his wife in his suite at the luxury Windhoek Country Club. They'd been staying there while shopping for a residence, according to the U.S. official.

Shortly thereafter, the U.S. attorney in Brooklyn, N.Y., unsealed a 32-count indictment against Mr. Alexander for his alleged role in a scheme to backdate stock options at the company he had co-founded.

Herman Oosthuizen, an attorney for Mr. Alexander in Windhoek, declined to comment. Keith Krakaur, an attorney for Mr. Alexander in New York, said he hadn't spoken to his client since the arrest and didn't know how he would respond to the effort to extradite him.

About a month ago, an official at Namibia's bank regulatory agency noticed an unusual transfer of funds into the African country: Tens of millions of dollars to the account of Mr. Alexander, who had arrived days before. That seemed suspicious for a person with no known permanent Namibian residence, family or business connections. The official sent word through an Interpol liaison, who got in touch with the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation, and learned that Mr. Alexander was a wanted man. "The Namibians and we are flabbergasted about why he would come here," said the U.S. official who provided the account of Mr. Alexander's capture.

The Wall Street Journal's Lee Hawkins8 reports on the news that former Comverse CEO Kobi Alexander is in custody.

Windhoek, a city of both modern buildings and German colonial architecture, has a reputation as one of the most beautiful in Africa. Namibia is off the beaten track and has beautiful deserts and haunting coastlines. Like South Africa next door, it has a colonial history and modern lifestyle. Namibia got a publicity boost earlier this year when actors Angelina Jolie and Brad Pitt traveled there for the birth of their daughter, Shiloh Nouvel.

While corruption, lackluster law enforcement and an absence of extradition treaties make much of Africa a refuge for people looking to dodge prosecution, Namibia has a fairly sophisticated legal and business environment. The regulator's tip set off a quick chain of events under the Namibian laws that let the justice ministry seek dispensation to arrest and extradite a fugitive. Namibian officials filed the required notice with parliament yesterday morning, said the U.S. official, and after an arrest warrant was granted, Mr. Alexander was arrested.

He is spending the night in jail and will have a hearing today. The U.S. official, who said no one could remember a case where Namibia has extradited anyone to the U.S., praised Namibian authorities for their quick action.

In the 1980s, Mr. Alexander and an Israeli engineer co-founded Comverse to produce technology for voicemail systems. Mr. Alexander was the son of the head of Israel's national oil company and a former member of an elite Israeli army unit. At Comverse, he was known as a tough executive who held tight sway.

Comverse was originally something of a family affair, with Mr. Alexander's sister, brother-in-law and father once board members. It grew to become a leading maker of voicemail software and survived when many others failed in the collapse of the telecom bubble. Based in New York, it has more than 5,000 employees and about $1.2 billion in annual revenue.

The business made Mr. Alexander wealthy, but prosecutors allege that millions of dollars of his fortune came from improper backdating of stock-option grants. In August, they charged him and two other former executives, alleging a scheme by which they deceived directors who were supposed to authorize stock-option grants. By using bogus dates, prosecutors charge, the executives made the grants appear to have been given at a time when Comverse's stock price was lower, making the grants more valuable.

According to an affidavit filed by an FBI agent, Mr. Alexander and former finance chief David Kreinberg also engineered the creation of a secret options slush fund that held grants to phony employees, with the options later doled out to favored employees. Mr. Kreinberg and former Comverse General Counsel William Sorin surrendered to federal agents on Aug. 9. Mr. Alexander didn't show.

Messrs. Kreinberg and Sorin are charged in a complaint with securities fraud but haven't been indicted. Mr. Alexander faces a 32-count indictment that includes false-filing counts for each of eight forms submitted to the Securities and Exchange Commission. It also includes 14 wire-fraud counts for various emails, electronic forms and faxes, plus three mail-fraud charges related to the sending of documents to directors.

Prosecutors allege that in July 2006, knowing he was under investigation, Mr. Alexander shuffled money that included options proceeds between two accounts -- then sent $57 million to an account in Israel. He is charged with three money-laundering counts. Prosecutors are moving to seize funds in two accounts at Israeli banks held by Mr. Alexander, along with two West Side Manhattan apartments.

Namibia has relatively close ties to Israel, and Windhoek once had a sizeable Jewish community. Laurence Pieters, former president of the Windhoek Hebrew Congregation, said, "We have a lot of Israelis coming to services here." The community numbered more than a thousand between the 1950s and the 1970s but has declined. Mr. Pieters said he hadn't heard of Mr. Alexander.

Just what happens to Mr. Alexander's money in Namibia isn't yet clear. Being in jail, he doesn't have access to the cash, the U.S. official said, adding that it likely would be informally held by Namibian authorities until legal proceedings are sorted out.

--Robert Block contributed to this article.

Former Chief Of Comverse Is Arrested In Namibia (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

Life on the run ended early yesterday for Jacob Alexander, the former chief executive of Comverse Technology, after he was arrested by local authorities in Windhoek, the capital of Namibia in southwestern Africa.

Mr. Alexander, also known as Kobi, is expected to be brought before a court in Namibia, possibly as soon as today, and the United States intends to seek his extradition to face charges stemming from a scheme to backdate stock option grants at Comverse, according to the United States attorney's office in Brooklyn.

Once back in the United States, Mr. Alexander, 54, will face conspiracy, securities fraud and money-laundering charges, according to a 32-count indictment against him that was unsealed yesterday. Prosecutors are also seeking forfeiture of $138 million in bank accounts or other assets held by Mr. Alexander.

Details about Mr. Alexander's arrest and what brought him to Namibia remained murky yesterday. He is believed to have been in the region for some time and was, at times, there with his family, according to two individuals briefed on the investigation.

Adding to the confusion were questions over whether the United States can legally request Mr. Alexander's extradition from Namibia.

"The U.S. does not have an extradition treaty with Namibia," said Janelle Hironimus, a spokeswoman for the United States State Department. "Our understanding is that Namibia law permits extradition in the absence of a treaty in certain circumstances."

"The U.S.," she said, "will submit a formal request for Mr. Alexander's extradition and that request will be considered by the Namibian courts."

One of Mr. Alexander's lawyers, Robert G. Morvillo, said, "I don't have a clue with regard to this particular country and what his particular rights are in the context of whatever is going on there."

Another of his lawyers, Keith D. Krakaur of Skadden, Arps, said he also had not spoken with Mr. Alexander since his arrest and did not know whether he intended to fight or cooperate with extradition attempts.

The arrest ends another strange chapter in Mr. Alexander's career. Credited with turning Comverse from a penny stock to a communications software company with $1 billion in annual sales, Mr. Alexander was the subject of an international manhunt this summer, with reports — all unconfirmed — that he traveled from Israel to western Sri Lanka during his time as a fugitive.

Mr. Alexander's fortunes had turned earlier this spring, when Comverse began an internal investigation into the altering of dates of options granted to him and other executives and employees of the company. The investigation prompted Mr. Alexander to resign as chief executive of the company and chairman of the board in April.

In August, federal prosecutors described a brazen scheme that involved backdating every companywide option grant between 1998 and 2001 to days when Comverse's stock was trading at lower prices, hence creating the potential for bigger profits. Mr. Alexander and two other former Comverse executives were charged in a criminal complaint with securities, mail and wire fraud.

Options give an employee the right to buy a stock at some point in the future at the price of the stock on the day it was granted, commonly referred to as the strike price. The lower the strike price, the more an option is worth to the recipient. By dating the options back to a time when the stock was trading at a lower price, the recipient receives even bigger profits.

Two of the executives, David Kreinberg, the former chief financial officer, and William F. Sorin, the former general counsel, were not named in the indictment that was unsealed yesterday. Their cases are still pending.

Among the allegations against the three executives was that they were involved in a scheme that in which stock options were granted to fictitious employees to create a secret account of options to dole out to favored employees.

The account was initially named "I. M. Fanton" by an assistant who had seen the Broadway show "The Phantom of the Opera." Later, it was renamed "Fargo" for the movie directed by the Coen brothers.

According to the indictment unsealed yesterday, Mr. Alexander "reaped substantial personal gain from his fraudulent conduct," citing more than $15 million in "paper profits." The indictment does not say whether any of those paper profits were sold for real profits.

So far, executives from only two companies — Comverse and Brocade Communications Systems — have faced criminal charges as the investigations into options practices widen.

More than 100 companies nationwide are now under investigation over their options practices by the Securities and Exchange Commission or by federal prosecutors in San Francisco, Brooklyn and Manhattan.

Fugitive CEO, Sought In Brooklyn, Captured In Namibia (FINDLAW/AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 28, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-The fugitive former chief executive of leading voicemail software maker Comverse Technology Inc. has been captured in Africa following a two-month international manhunt, U.S. officials announced Wednesday.

Details of the arrest of Jacob "Kobi" Alexander in the Republic of Namibia were not immediately available. But in a statement, U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf credited local officials in the southwest African nation for assisting the FBI in the capture.

"We are very grateful for the Namibians' swift action and commend them for their vigilance," she said.

Mauskopf said she would seek Alexander's swift extradition to face charges in federal court in Brooklyn. A call to his defense attorney in New York was not immediately returned.

The manhunt was launched in late July shortly before authorities unsealed a criminal complaint accusing Alexander and two other former top executives of secretly manipulating stock options for personal profit.

Before he disappeared, Alexander, 54, an Israeli citizen and a U.S. permanent resident, allegedly transferred $57 million (â,¬45 million) to Israel, fueling speculation he may have fled there. News reports in Israel speculated that he may have been hiding out in a small Sri Lankan fishing village.

Two other defendants, former finance chief David Kreinberg and former senior general counsel William Sorin, surrendered in August and were released on $1 million (â,¬790,000) bond each.

The complaint unsealed in federal court accuses the three men of making stock options more lucrative by backdating their exercise price to a low point in the stock's value. Usually, a stock option's exercise price coincides with the market value at the time of a grant to give the recipient an incentive to drive the price higher.

From 1991 through 2005, Alexander exercised options and sold stocks worth approximately $150 million (â,¬118 million), making $138 million (â,¬108.7 million) profit, according to the complaint. Of that, about $6.4 million (â,¬5 million) was generated by backdating options, it said.

Prosecutors allege Kreinberg and Sorin earned about $1 million (â,¬790,000) each on backdated options.

In addition, the company awarded thousands of stock options to fictional employees, then secretly transferred the awards to an internal account under the name I.M. Fanton, which stood for phantom, court papers said. The scheme allowed Alexander to award those options to real "favored employees" and to himself without board of directors approval, the papers added.

Comverse Technology is headquartered in Wakefield, Massachusetts.

Former Comverse Chief Alexander Arrested In Namibia (Update5) (BLOOM)

By Allan Dodds Frank And Bob Van Voris

Bloomberg, September 28, 2006

Sept. 27 (Bloomberg) -- Jacob ``Kobi'' Alexander, the former Comverse Technology Inc. chief executive officer who became a fugitive after being charged with securities fraud, was arrested today in Namibia.

Alexander, the ex-Israeli intelligence officer turned high- technology entrepreneur, will be brought before a court in Windhoek within 48 hours, and the U.S. will seek his extradition, the Justice Department said.

Federal prosecutors charged Alexander, 54, on Aug. 9 with backdating stock options to boost the compensation of executives at New York-based Comverse, the world's largest maker of voicemail software. He is the second CEO charged in the government's probe of illegal stock-option backdating, the largest investigation of corporate wrongdoing since a mutual fund trading scandal three years ago led to $4.3 billion in penalties.

``Alexander's alleged role in options back-dating victimized Comverse shareholders and deceived prospective investors,'' Brooklyn U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf said today in a statement. ``The fraud affected the company's bottom line by misstating earnings.''

Alexander, the wizard of Israel's technology boom, was arrested by Interpol and local police on a Namibian warrant issued at the request of the U.S., said Ray Castillo, a spokesman for the U.S. embassy in Namibia.

Sought by Jiang Zemin

The former Comverse CEO was sought out by the likes of former Chinese President Jiang Zemin, who slipped away from official meetings in 2000 and steered his motorcade through a pot-holed section of Tel Aviv to meet with Alexander. Engineers at the company cheered as the Chinese leader shook hands with their chief executive officer.

The probe of backdating at Comverse presents the widest- ranging fraud allegations arising from more than 130 inquiries launched by regulators, prosecutors or companies into stock- options timing. Options backdating, used by companies to reward employees with shares granted at below-market prices, has so far cost investors at least $7.9 billion in market value, according to Bloomberg data.

Alexander left New York-based Comverse in April. His former subordinates, David Kreinberg, Comverse's ex-chief financial officer, and William Sorin, a former general counsel, were also charged last month and released on $1 million bail each. The three were charged in a criminal complaint July 31 of changing the dates on millions of Comverse stock options so employees, including themselves, could buy shares at low prices. Kreinberg and Sorin pleaded not guilty.

Most Wanted List

Since then, the FBI has put Alexander's face on its Most Wanted list and Interpol has sent out a global ``red notice,'' asking police to arrest the former CEO, a dual U.S.-Israeli citizen, and extradite him to face trial in New York. His assets at two Citigroup Smith Barney accounts were frozen by the Brooklyn court July 31.

DOJ_NMG_0070392

A 32-count indictment unsealed today in Brooklyn charges Alexander with crimes relating to an alleged ``slush fund'' and the backdating of stock options from 1998 to 2006. He is charged with conspiracy, securities fraud, making false filings with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, mail fraud, wire fraud and money laundering.

If found guilty of the charges, Alexander may be sentenced up to 25 years in prison, according to Mauskopf's statement.

Alexander's lawyer, Robert Morvillo, didn't return a call seeking comment.

Extradition Treaties

``The apprehension of Alexander follows an international manhunt led by the FBI, and the cooperation of the government of the Republic of Namibia,'' Mauskopf said in her statement.

Windhoek is the capital of Namibia, located on the southwestern coast of Africa. The country was administered by South Africa until 1990, when it won its independence, according to the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency's Web site. One-fifth of the country's economy is dependent on mining, including diamonds and uranium, according to the CIA.

Under international extradition treaties, a foreign country must determine whether the U.S. crime is considered a crime at home and whether the treaty covers it.

Comverse's fortunes soared during the late 1990s with growing sales of cellular phones which use the company's voicemail software. The stock rose from a low of $9.98 on Oct. 8, 1998, to $121.63 on Jan. 24, 2001.

Last year, the company reported $959 million in sales and employed just over 5,000, about half of them in Israel, according to Bloomberg data and the company.

Second CEO Charged

A message left on voicemail at Comverse's headquarters wasn't immediately returned.

Alexander is the second CEO to be charged in the backdating scandal. The first was former Brocade Communications Systems Inc. Chief Executive Officer Gregory Reyes, who Sept. 25 requested a subpoena of two San Francisco-area law firms to defend against charges he improperly backdated stock option grants.

Reyes last month pleaded innocent to 12 counts of securities fraud and other charges that he improperly backdated options so employees could profit from when Brocade's stock was lower.

Comverse shares rose 34 cents to $21.85 at 12:57 p.m. in Nasdaq composite trading.

The case is: U.S. v. Alexander, No. 06-MJ-817, U.S. District Court, Eastern District of New York (Brooklyn).

To contact the reporter on this story: Bob Van Voris in New York at rvanvoris@bloomberg.net

Bondholders Seek $21.5 Million In Damages From BearingPoint Default (WP)

By Kim Hart And Terence O'hara

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

Plaintiffs who won a bond default ruling against BearingPoint Inc. last week said that they aren't trying to ruin the company and that they don't think the $21.5 million in damages they have requested will hurt the McLean consulting firm's business.

A group of bondholders sued BearingPoint for failing to file up-to-date financial reports -- a violation of the bond agreement that has become a common tool used by creditors and most typically hedge funds to extract concessions. A New York court last week agreed that the firm was in default on about $200 million in corporate debt.

Hareesh Paranjape, portfolio manager at New York-based Fore Advisors L.P. and one of three hedge fund managers who instigated the lawsuit, said he's only trying to make the company meet its obligations.

"The company is not in financial distress," Paranjape said. "Of course, it is just a technical default. But they breached the covenants [of the bonds]. We wanted the damages due to us as a result of that breach. I think it's ludicrous that a $1.7 billion market-cap company thinks that a relatively small damage claim would put them in financial distress."

He said that usually in such cases, companies settle with the bondholders and move on. "BearingPoint for whatever reason did not concede an inch, and now they're paying the price," he said.

BearingPoint officials have appealed the court ruling and asked other creditors to grant waivers to avoid similar suits. The company said it would delay filing its annual report, expected tomorrow, because of the uncertainty that the court ruling has produced for the company.

DOJ_NMG_0070393

BearingPoint's stock closed yesterday at $7.78, down more than 8 percent.

Chief executive Harry L. You yesterday criticized the creditors who brought the suit, saying hedge funds who file this sort of litigation are preying on technicalities to boost their return.

"All the people we've talked to outside the plaintiffs are being very rational about this," You said. "This is just a group of people who've made some money suing people on this technicality."

BearingPoint has not filed timely financial statements in more than two years after inheriting accounting and other problems from when it was part of KPMG LLP. BearingPoint was spun off from KPMG and provides management and information-systems consulting for large corporations and government agencies. In 2005, a new management team, including You, took over, and the firm was "ahead of schedule on its turnaround," said Adam Frisch, an analyst with UBS AG.

"It's unfortunate that this has to overshadow the improvements," he said.

Some analysts agreed that BearingPoint would be able to weather this problem without seeking bankruptcy protection.

But the court ruling still poses risks. Other creditors could use the default judgment to pursue their own payment demands, for example. It could also spook potential clients and prompt existing customers to consider canceling contracts, said Ivan Feinseth, an analyst with Matrix USA LLC.

"How do you advise others when your own house is not in order?" he said. "I don't think bankruptcy is imminent, but they'll have to do some kind of restructuring" of their debt.

You said bankruptcy is not in the cards, though credit-rating agency Egan-Jones Ratings Co. said yesterday that a bankruptcy protection filing remains a possibility.

"The company needs to be watched," Egan-Jones said in a written analysis released yesterday.

Despite its creditor problems, BearingPoint says its revenue has been growing, and it has $291 million in cash on hand. The company warned in its SEC filing, however, that it probably wouldn't be enough to fund its operations should its creditors start submitting "sudden, unexpected significant demands for cash collateral or for accelerated payment of principal and accrued interest."

Revenue for 2005 was $2.40 billion, about a 2 percent increase over 2004, You said yesterday. The company expects to report a loss of $650 million to $720 million for 2005, at least $100 million more than it lost in 2004.

Moody's said yesterday that it had a B1 rating on BearingPoint's corporate debt, a rating it assigns to speculative corporate bonds with relatively high probability of default and loss. Moody's also said its BearingPoint rating "may be under review."

Regulators Urge Joint Action On Derivatives (FT)

By Gillian Tett In London And Anuj Gangahar In New York

Financial Times, September 28, 2006

Three of the world's most powerful financial regulators have taken the unusual step of issuing a joint warning that individual nations cannot contain some of the risks posed by the explosive growth of derivatives and must collaborate across borders.

The dramatic pace of integration and innovation in global markets makes it increasingly difficult to solve problems with "a local or national solution", top officials from the UK Financial Services Authority, the Federal Reserve Bank of New York and the US Securities and Exchange Commission write in the Financial Times.

"In a more integrated global market, we will increasingly find ourselves compelled to pursue borderless solutions," write Timothy Geithner, president of the New York Fed; Sir Callum McCarthy, chairman of the FSA; and Annette Nazareth, a commissioner at the SEC.

The comments come after leading global investment banks, institutional investors and international regulators met at the New York Fed on Wednesday to discuss industry initiatives to improve back-office systems for derivatives trading. The move follows concern last year that back-office backlogs were so serious they could create systemic problems if not addressed.

At the New York meeting, regulators said a process of co-operation between the US and European regulators last year had cut credit derivatives backlogs, but warned the industry still needed to tackle serious backlogs in the equity derivatives world. Their comments prompted the International Swaps and Derivatives Association to declare that it would take urgent action.

DOJ_NMG_0070394

In the FT article, the regulators suggest the US-European initiative could act as a model for co-operation on broader issues in the future. “In the case of derivatives, a local or national solution would have been insufficient to protect domestic financial markets from the risks posed by market practices,” they said.

“To fix the credit derivatives problem, it was necessary to involve a large and diverse pool of financial institutions. No firm or national authority had the capacity to make progress on its own.”

The comments will be closely watched in the financial industry. Although US and European regulators have co-operated extensively behind the scenes in recent years, this collaboration has been discreet, since national supervisors have been expected to handle problems in their local markets. As a result, when Long Term Capital Management, the US hedge fund, imploded in 1998, the New York Fed facilitated rescue efforts by local, Wall Street investment banks.

However, the growing integration of capital markets is making it easier to transmit shocks across borders. When Amaranth, the US hedge fund, lost $6bn this month in US gas markets, this triggered a massive firesale of Amaranth’s loans in London.

Projects Under Scrutiny (HC)

By David Ivanovich

Houston Chronicle, September 28, 2006

Inquiry looks at Halliburton work in Nigeria and elsewhere

WASHINGTON - Federal investigators, who have been looking into a possible bribery scheme involving Houston's Halliburton Co. and a Nigerian natural gas plant, are scrutinizing "multiple" projects both within and outside Nigeria, according to company filings.

Recently uncovered information suggests employees at Halliburton's M.W. Kellogg Co. — some time before 1998 — may have planned to funnel payments to government officials to land projects in countries outside Nigeria, Halliburton subsidiary KBR said in a filing with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission.

The SEC has issued subpoenas seeking documents related to multiple projects from the last 20 years in and outside Nigeria, the filing said.

Halliburton spokeswoman Cathy Mann would not discuss the investigations, saying in an e-mail: "As these are ongoing investigations, it would be inappropriate to comment further at this time."

She did point out that the activities under investigation predate Halliburton's acquisition of Dresser Industries, which owned M.W. Kellogg.

Halliburton officials have been scrutinizing the activities of an unnamed agent who "has worked with us outside of Nigeria on several current projects and on numerous older projects going back to the early 1980s," the company said in the filing.

Halliburton officials are trying to determine whether this individual broke the law or violated the company's code of conduct.

At the same time, Halliburton has been examining another agent involved in a project in Nigeria.

The company was tipped off by an unnamed joint venture partner about "allegations of wrongful payments" the agent may have made.

Kellogg was merged with Halliburton's Brown & Root to form Kellogg Brown & Root, now known as KBR.

A $5.5 billion projectThe latest inquiries grew out of a long-running investigation into the construction of a $5.5 billion natural gas liquefaction complex at Bonny Island in Nigeria's Rivers State.

That facility was built by a Madeira, Portugal-based joint venture known as TSKJ. Kellogg held a 25 percent stake in TSKJ. Other partners included France's Technip; Snamprogetti Netherlands, a subsidiary of Italy's Saipem; and Japan's JGC Corp.

Halliburton officials have acknowledged that agents working for TSKJ may have made improper payments to Nigerian officials in connection with that project.

Several investigationsThe SEC and Justice Department, as well as authorities in France, Nigeria, Switzerland and Britain have all been investigating. Halliburton officials said they do not expect those probes to be wrapped anytime soon.

Spokesmen for the Justice Department and the SEC declined to comment.

In August 2005 and then again in January, the SEC subpoenaed documents from Chicago Bridge & Iron Co. in relation to the TSKJ probe.

DOJ_NMG_0070395

Chicago Bridge, an engineering and construction company based in The Netherlands with its worldwide administrative headquarters in The Woodlands, served as a subcontractor for a Halliburton affiliate on the project.

"We are cooperating fully with such investigation," Chicago Bridge said in an SEC filing last month.

Some Shocked At Sentence (HC)

By Kristen Hays And Tom Fowler

Houston Chronicle, September 28, 2006

Fastow's 6 years has a few experts scratching heads

Andrew Fastow's six-year prison sentence caught many longtime observers of the case off guard this week, including a former member of the government team that negotiated his 2004 plea agreement.

Fastow had agreed to a 10-year prison sentence in the plea deal with the understanding that he would not ask for a lesser sentence later.

Yet his lawyers asked for just such a break. The government didn't object and instead stressed the critical cooperation Fastow provided in helping the government build criminal cases against former Chairman Ken Lay and former CEO Jeff Skilling.

With no dissenting opinion from prosecutors, U.S. District Judge Kenneth Hoyt cut four years from Fastow's term.

"The way the government handled it is surprising, given the written terms of the agreement," said Andrew Weissmann, former director of the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, who was on the team when Fastow's plea was negotiated. Weissmann step- ped down from the task force last year and later went into private practice.

Michael Wynne, a former federal prosecutor in Houston, also was surprised.

"I expected him to receive the full 10 years. The judge even said that there was no way Fastow would be able to repay all the harm that he caused," Wynne said.

Fastow, 44, has long been considered among the most egregious of Enron's felons, having orchestrated multiple schemes to help Enron manipulate earnings while enriching himself with kickbacks. Some of those unsustainable schemes began crumbling in 2001 and helped fuel the company's failure late that year.

Both Lay and Skilling argued in their fraud and conspiracy trial earlier this year that no fraud occurred at Enron other than Fastow's self-dealing. But Fastow linked both to fraud, either for participating in or approving fraudulent schemes or lying to investors about Enron's financial strength to maintain an illusion of success.

A short fightFastow fought the government for more than a year after being indicted in October 2002, but admitted to two counts of conspiracy and agreed to cooperate in January 2004.

Since then, Fastow's plea agreement was thought to guarantee he would serve the decade he agreed to serve in prison, with potential to shave some time off with credit for good behavior.

But a January 2005 U.S. Supreme Court decision prompted Fastow's lawyers to try to unchain Fastow from that agreed-upon decade.

Fastow's plea agreement said his 10-year sentence was governed by 2001 federal sentencing guidelines that were mandatory. Last year, the high court ruled that the guidelines were strictly advisory.

Fastow's lawyers argued that the change meant Fastow was no longer bound to the 10-year agreement because judges' discretion in sentencing had largely been restored.

However, Candace Zierdt, a contract law professor at Stetson University College of Law in St. Petersburg, Fla., said the plea agreement — and its written terms — remained binding despite the Supreme Court ruling.

"There's this whole area of case law that says once you enter a plea agreement, it is governed by contract law. Just because it turns out to be a bad deal because the law changed, that doesn't mean the contract changes," Zierdt said.

She noted a 2005 ruling from the U.S. 7th Circuit Court of Appeals that said the Supreme Court said the same thing. That case involved a defendant who appealed his sentence based on the Supreme Court decision after agreeing not to do so as part of a plea deal.

"Disputes over plea agreements are usefully viewed through the lens of contract law," said the opinion, written by Judge Richard Posner. "A plea agreement is a type of contract."

Yet Kirby Behre, a former federal prosecutor and an expert on federal sentencing, said the binding nature of the plea agreement could be challenged in light of the ruling.

"It's not a clean way of doing it," he said of the argument from Fastow's lawyers, "but one can understand why there would have to be some tinkering with an agreement predicated on an assumption that the Supreme Court said is no longer part of the law."

Asked for fiveFastow lawyer John Keker alerted U.S. District Judge Kenneth Hoyt to Fastow's intention to ask for mercy in a court filing last week. He did not suggest a specific prison term until Tuesday, when he asked for five years followed by probation for three years.

Prosecutor John Hueston, who questioned Fastow during Lay and Skilling's fraud and conspiracy trial earlier this year, didn't object to Keker's suggestion or recite the terms of the plea agreement. Instead, he praised Fastow's "critical" cooperation, without which he said the outcomes of the investigations of the company's former top two executives "were in doubt."

Hoyt, who was never bound by the plea agreement, said Fastow deserved mercy despite his crimes because of the cooperation he provided to the government and shareholders trying to recover money from others allegedly involved in Enron's demise, and the torment he and his family have been put through.

Credit for good behaviorFastow can shave up to nearly two years from his six-year sentence with credit for good behavior and completion of a drug rehabilitation program he wants to enter.

Hueston declined to discuss why he didn't object to Keker's request, but he said the government didn't backtrack from its intention that Fastow serve a decade in prison.

"The government's position has always been that under the plea agreement, the government was recommending a 10-year term," he said. "Then you have to consider what the defendant did and what the judge did."

Behre said Hueston's silence on Keker's request coupled with his praise of Fastow's cooperation likely conveyed unspoken support for a lesser term.

"Without asking for it, you're clearly asking for it," Behre said.

Others agreed.

"It tells the judge they're in agreement with it," Kent Schaffer, a Houston defense attorney who has followed Enron, said Wednesday. "I'm sure for PR reasons the government doesn't want to come in and recommend a six-year sentence, but by not objecting I think it shows that was probably their intent all along."

Often reiteratedFastow testified repeatedly in the Lay-Skilling trial that he expected to serve 10 years.

"My outcome is already determined," he told Skilling lawyer Daniel Petrocelli. He later told Hueston: "My understanding is that I will be sentenced to 10 years. The judge ultimately has a discretion; but in my plea agreement, I agreed to the 10-year sentence."

Petrocelli questioned why four months after the trial, Fastow's lawyers asked that he serve half that time.

"What is disturbing is that in the trial against Mr. Skilling, Fastow and the prosecutors represented to the jury that Fastow would serve a minimum of 10 years," Petrocelli said.

David Gerger, another of Fastow attorneys, said his client fulfilled the terms of the plea agreement in full.

"The judge exercised his discretion as he is allowed," Gerger said.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Jeanine Pirro Under Criminal Investigation (WNBC-TV)

WNBC-TV, New York, September 28, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. -- NewsChannel 4's Jonathan Dienst has learned Jeanine Pirro, the Republican candidate for New York Attorney General, has been under state and federal criminal investigation.

Images: Pirro Probed For Alleged Spy Plan

Video: Conversations With Kerik

Raw Video: Pirro Press Conference

Dienst reported these allegations center on whether Pirro illegally spied on her own husband, Albert Pirro, while she held the office of the Westchester District Attorney.

The sources said that court authorities wiretapped conversations that appear to show that while preparing for a statewide run for office, Jeanine Pirro was desperate to prove her husband was cheating on her.

She came under the scrutiny of six different law enforcement agencies, including the New York Police Department, the city's Department of Investigation and prosecutors in the Bronx and Westchester.

According to documents now in the hands of several defense attorneys, Pirro and the former New York City Police Commissioner Bernard Kerik were apparently talking about planting a hidden device aboard her husband's boat. Her possible motive may have been to see if he was having an affair.

Sources told NewsChannel 4 that in one conversation, Pirro complained that one of Kerik's employees was reluctant to board Albert Pirro's boat.

Jeanine Pirro suggests, "We can just simply say, if there is an issue, that I am redecorating it for our anniversary." She complains that Kerik's man is, "uncomfortable with that."

Kerik responded by saying, "But Jeanine, I'm having the same f------g problem with everybody. Everybody is panic stricken because it's you. I've gone out on a limb. I had two other people looking at this. It's a problem."

Pirro said, "What am I supposed to do, Bernie? Watch him f--k her every night? What am I supposed to do? I can go on the boat. I'll put the f-----g thing on myself."

Minutes later, Kerik called a contact at Giuliani Partners, former Mayor Rudy Giuliani's consulting firm, asking him to find a recording device, according to documents.

Sources said the FBI and Justice Department have been asked to look into whether Pirro and Kerik also might have violated federal laws.

In the wiretapped conversations, Pirro appeared to discuss how her husband's alleged indiscretions hurt her politically.

Without her husband, sources said she told Kerik, "I move into the governor's mansion." That's an apparent reference to her aspirations for higher office, the documents said.

Lobbyist Albert Pirro was convicted of tax fraud in 2000 and has fathered a child out of wedlock. He was investigated for allegedly leaking information from his wife's Westchester district attorney's office to the mob, which he has denied. To date, no charges have been brought.

Twice this summer, he has been ticketed for speeding in his Mercedes.

Jeanine Pirro decided not to seek re-election in Westchester, and first put her name in the race for the Senate. However, she dropped out in her bid to go against Sen. Hillary Clinton and switched to the Attorney General's race.

However, according to documents, when speaking to Kerik in the summer of 2005, Pirro apparently belittled a run the attorney general job, saying it's a "been there, done that kind of thing."

Some of the conversations with Kerik were recorded because Kerik's phone was tapped in 2005, as part of an unrelated corruption probe. Kerik ended up pleading guilty to two misdemeanor charges in June to receiving gifts from a construction firm investigated for having mafia ties.

Pirro currently trails Democrat Andrew Cuomo in the race for attorney general.

As for Kerik, his legal troubles appear to be mounting. NewsChannel 4 has revealed that Kerik remains under investigation for more than $1 million missing from a jail charity when he was city corrections commissioner.

U.S. Investigating Pirro's Talk Of Taping Spouse (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

Federal prosecutors in New York are investigating whether Jeanine F. Pirro, the Republican candidate for state attorney general, and Bernard B. Kerik, the former New York City police commissioner, illegally taped conversations of Ms. Pirro's husband last year to determine if he was having an affair.

At a hastily arranged news conference yesterday, called because of an imminent television report on the inquiry, Ms. Pirro conceded that she had her husband, Albert, followed in the summer of 2005. She said she had discussed bugging the family's boat with Mr. Kerik, an old friend who was then running his own security business. But Ms. Pirro, who was the district attorney of Westchester County at the time, said she never went through with the plan, and she insisted that she broke no laws.

Seething with anger, and choking up as she laid bare her marital problems, Ms. Pirro said that two federal agents approached her at her home late one recent night and revealed that the United States attorney's office for the Southern District of New York was investigating her surveillance discussions. They had been caught on tape by Bronx authorities who were conducting a separate investigation of Mr. Kerik.

With less than six weeks to go until the Nov. 7 election, Ms. Pirro said she was being hounded by authorities as part of a "political witch hunt and smear campaign" led by the same federal lawyer who helped convict Mr. Pirro of tax evasion in 2000. But the United States attorney for the Southern District, Michael J. Garcia, a Republican appointee, issued a statement denying that the inquiry was politically motivated.

Ms. Pirro said she would remain in the race against the Democratic nominee, Andrew M. Cuomo, although top Republican leaders appeared torn over her fate yesterday, and former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani canceled a fund-raiser for her next month. A telegenic politician who has often appeared as a commentator on legal matters, she has been considered a potential future leader of the party and perhaps a candidate for governor. Republican leaders had considered Ms. Pirro's bid to replace Attorney General Eliot Spitzer as the party's best hope of capturing a statewide office.

At her news conference, Ms. Pirro acknowledged that she was angry with Mr. Pirro, who fathered a child in an extramarital affair in the 1980's, and with whom Ms. Pirro has two children. But she said she was guilty only of the anger of a woman scorned. And she also said her political fate should be a matter of a concern to women.

"There is no way — when I have the opportunity to be the first woman attorney general in the history of this state — that I am going to be pushed out of this race because somebody wants to delve into the personal lives of my husband and myself," she said. "I'm standing up for myself and I'm standing up for women."

Ms. Pirro, a former three-term district attorney, repeatedly said her actions were not illegal. Legal experts said the law was murky, and one important factor was whether the boat, owned by Mr. Pirro, would be treated the same way as a marital home. Mr. Pirro did not return telephone calls for comment.

Details of the conversations between Ms. Pirro and Mr. Kerik were rushed onto the air by WNBC-TV, which broke into its regular programming. Minutes later, Ms. Pirro held her news conference, in which she said prosecutors had no business investigating her "matrimonial discord," and she demanded an investigation into how the report of her conversations with Mr. Kerik was leaked.

Joseph Tacopina, Mr. Kerik's lawyer, said yesterday that nothing illegal was discussed or done. "Bernie spoke to a friend in distress regarding a domestic conflict," Mr. Tacopina said.

WNBC said the conversations included profanity-laden rants by Ms. Pirro about her husband, as well as politically damaging remarks. At one point, according to WNBC, she is said to be heard dismissing the attorney general's job as a "been there, done that kind of thing" for her; at another, she suggests she could be governor if not for Mr. Pirro's baggage. Ms. Pirro had initially run to unseat Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, but pulled out of that race late last year at the urging of party leaders.

Ms. Pirro blamed for the revelations a man far less known to most New Yorkers, Elliott B. Jacobson, an assistant United States attorney who prosecuted Mr. Pirro in 2000 and sent him to jail for 11 months. She said Mr. Jacobson's motives were "personal and highly improper" and, as a result, federal agents were now "prying into the personal lives of married couples."

"Let me reiterate my disappointment with the United States attorney's office for allowing an unethical overzealous prosecutor with a partisan political agenda using taxpayers' money and public resources to pursue a baseless investigation into a marital situation and seek to affect the outcome of an election," Ms. Pirro said.

The United States attorney, Mr. Garcia, confirmed the investigation in a statement yesterday and disputed Ms. Pirro's accusation that the inquiry was politically motivated.

DOJ_NMG_0070399

"Because the investigation is ongoing, we will not comment as to its substance, except to say that we do not take politics into account in deciding either the subject matter or timing of our investigations," said Mr. Garcia, who was appointed by President Bush.

The new revelations set the latest scene in one of the most Shakespearean political dramas in New York, the complicated lives of the Pirros, and immediately set off speculation about Ms. Pirro's future. State Republican leaders, who have suffered through the Pirro marriage for years now, watching her scuttle past plans to run for lieutenant governor and United States Senate, appeared torn over what to do.

The chairmen of the Republican and Conservative Parties, which are both running Ms. Pirro on their November ballot lines, issued statements supporting her candidacy. But these are two parties with a history of sacrificing problematic candidates, and Mr. Giuliani's move to cancel his Pirro fund-raiser was widely seen by top Republicans as a sign of things to come.

Other respected party leaders, like Edward F. Cox, a son-in-law of President Nixon, said openly that they doubted her candidacy could survive this latest controversy.

"The political issue is not whether she broke any laws, but the fact that she would think about doing this to her husband raises questions about her judgment and about whether you want that individual as attorney general," said Mr. Cox, a Manhattan lawyer who briefly ran against Ms. Pirro for the Republican nomination for the United States Senate against Mrs. Clinton last year.

Gov. George E. Pataki was traveling yesterday and could not be reached for comment. His spokesman, David Catalfamo, said Mr. Pataki was still reviewing the details and had no comment about Ms. Pirro's candidacy.

Two senior Republican Party leaders said yesterday that Mr. Pataki had some inkling that Mrs. Pirro's problems with Mr. Pirro had been looming last year. They said he had asked Mr. Cox not to quit the Senate race last fall because he thought Ms. Pirro — who was still running — would ultimately bow out over problems with her husband.

Mr. Catalfamo said that Mr. Pataki had no foreknowledge of Ms. Pirro's conversations with Mr. Kerik, and that it would be inappropriate to discuss the governor's conversation with Mr. Cox.

Ms. Pirro said yesterday that she was staying with her husband, and she came close to tears as she explained why.

"My husband is a great father. I have two beautiful children in school, a teenage son who needs his father with him," she said, and then choked up audibly as she added, "These are personal choices that I have made, and I shouldn't have to keep explaining them."

Mr. Pirro, a prominent lawyer, Westchester power broker and a friend of state Republican leaders, has been a frequent source of embarrassment to his wife. Besides his prior conviction on tax evasion charges, investigations of his business practices have drawn scrutiny, particularly his ties to reputed mob figures, and he was ticketed twice for speeding this summer.

Ms. Pirro's lawyer, Paul Shechtman, maintained yesterday that case law existed to support a spousal exception to the federal wiretapping statute. Regardless, he added emphatically, Ms. Pirro had never actually bugged the boat.

"There were no devices, no devices were put in anywhere," Mr. Shechtman said.

The tape recording of the Pirro-Kerik conversation was made by the Bronx district attorney's office and later provided to the F.B.I. It was made as part of the investigation into Mr. Kerik's acceptance of a free apartment renovation from a contractor looking for city work.

Ms. Pirro spoke to Mr. Kerik when she was dragging out deliberations in the summer of 2005 over whether to run for governor, senator or attorney general in 2006. She said at that time that she took so long to make her choice because her mother had been ill; it became clear for the first time yesterday that her concern about her husband's behavior was also a factor in the much-delayed decision.

"This was one of the reasons we wanted her to run for Senate — all this awful Al Pirro stuff would cloud her credentials to be the top law enforcement officer," said one Republican Party official who spoke only when granted anonymity.

The campaign of Mr. Cuomo, the son of former Gov. Mario M. Cuomo, and Democratic Party officials said they had nothing to do with the revelations. Ms. Pirro did not accuse her opponent, though associates of hers suggested yesterday that Mr. Cuomo and Mr. Jacobson might have worked together long ago.

DOJ_NMG_0070400

Yet it is another man, Mr. Pirro, who has done more damage to Ms. Pirro than anyone else over time, Republicans and political analysts said yesterday. Ms. Pirro acknowledged as much at her news conference, urging voters not to hold her accountable for a husband who had driven her to profound bitterness.

"I was a very angry woman and I said a lot of things, but what matters is what I did and didn't do, and I didn't do anything here other than vent," Ms. Pirro said.

AG Candidate Focus Of FBI Investigation (AP)

By Beth Fouhy, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 28, 2006

New York (AP) -- Republican state attorney general candidate Jeanine Pirro said Wednesday she was under federal investigation for plotting to secretly record her husband to find out whether he was having another affair.

Pirro, speaking at a Manhattan news conference, said that any probe into her troubled marriage was "highly improper" but she had no intention of quitting her campaign, calling the investigation politically motivated and sexist.

"My husband is a great father. I have two beautiful children in school ... a teenage son, who needs his father with him," she said, her voice cracking. "These are personal choices that I have made, and I shouldn't have to keep explaining them."

She also said that federal prosecutors had no business delving into her union with millionaire lobbyist Albert Pirro, who spent 11 months in prison after being convicted on tax fraud charges in 2000 and fathered an illegitimate daughter after their wedding in 1975. The couple has a 21-year-old daughter and a 17-year-old son.

"Sometime last year, I came to believe that my husband was seeing another woman," Pirro said. "In the midst of matrimonial discord, I was angry and had him followed to see if what I suspected was true. Although I spoke about taping him, there was no taping by me of anyone. There was anger, and frustration, and disappointment."

Pirro, former district attorney of Westchester County, just outside New York City, said that "placing a recording device on one's property to intercept a conversation involving one's spouse is not a crime."

Two people familiar with the situation, who spoke to The Associated Press before Pirro's news conference on condition of anonymity because she had not yet spoken herself, said Pirro was overheard by authorities having a telephone conversation with former New York City Police Commissioner Bernie Kerik in the middle of last year. They said that Pirro suspected her husband, Albert Pirro, might be having an affair and that she and Kerik, a private security consultant, discussed possibly placing a recorder in a room to listen in on him.

The two people said that the recording device was never used and that a Kerik investigation turned up no firm evidence of an affair. Kerik's attorney declined to comment on the case.

Pirro said Kerik was a friend and confirmed that they had spoken about her marital concerns.

"I was a very angry woman, and I said a lot of things," Pirro said. "What matters is what I did and didn't do, and I didn't do anything here other than vent."

Pirro, who faces former federal Housing Secretary Andrew Cuomo in the attorney general's race, said she learned about the investigation when she was approached by a pair of FBI agents outside her home. She repeatedly said this was a personal matter involving her husband and charged she was the target of "an unethical, overzealous prosecutor with a partisan agenda."

U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia confirmed in a statement his office was investigating but declined to offer details. But, Garcia said, "we do not take politics into account in deciding either the subject matter or timing of our investigations."

A telephone call to Albert Pirro's White Plains office was not immediately returned Wednesday. A Cuomo spokeswoman, Wendy Katz, declined comment.

Associated Press writers Marc Humbert and Mark Johnson in Albany, N.Y., contributed to this report.

Gifted School Teacher Arrested On Pornography Charges (NSDY)

By Robert E. Kessler, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 28, 2006

A long-time teacher at a Huntington Station private school was arrested yesterday after dozens of images of child pornography were found on his home computer, authorities said.

Michael Kelly Reiner, 46, an educator for 18 years at the Long Island School for the Gifted, faces federal child pornography charges for possessing the 70 pictures and 42 videos, officials said.

Reiner, of 82 Pengo Circle, East Meadow, also operated a Web site devoted to sadistic fantasies and cannibalism, prompting investigators to probe whether he has acted on his fantasies, the officials said.

Reiner, who taught fourth, fifth and sixth grades at the school for especially bright students, pleaded not guilty to child pornography charges at his arraignment yesterday in U.S. District Court in Central Islip.

He was temporarily detained pending a bail and permanent detention hearing scheduled for tomorrow by U.S. Magistrate Kathleen Tomlinson. In court, federal prosecutor Allen Bode had asked that Reiner be permanently detained as a danger to the community and children. In making the recommendation for detention, Bode said school officials had not immediately taken the federal investigation seriously.

Bode, head of the child exploitation unit in the Eastern District, said that when agents of the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement recently approached school authorities about contents of the Web site, they were told investigators "didn't understand the defendant's sense of humor ... and called customs officers 'ignorant.'"

The attorney for the school, Linda Caputo-Friedmann, said Reiner had been suspended from teaching and in fact, the school had cooperated fully with federal authorities and taken the matter seriously. The school fired him yesterday after learning of the arrest.

Caputo-Friedmann said Reiner was "a beloved teacher" who had "excellent rapport with students and ... parents."

Reiner's attorney, federal public defender Randi Chavis, said her client had voluntarily cooperated with federal investigators. Chavis questioned whether the government was in a position to criticize the actions of school officials -- "a school that certainly has a number of experts on its staff.

"Their determination that Mr. Reiner was not a danger should be given respect," Chavis said.

Federal agents began investigating Reiner after Canadian border police notified them that they had made a routine stop and search of Reiner and a portable computer in his car when he crossed over from the United States into Ontario on Aug. 4. Reiner was going to Canada to visit a friend with whom he operated the Web site, court records show.

At the time, according to court documents, the Canadian police said they found an estimated thousand images of young boys in "sexually provocative poses" that are not pornographic under U.S. law.

The boys appeared to range from 4 to 16 years old and wore bathing suits or underwear, the Canadian authorities were quoted as saying. "Reiner stated, in sum and substance, that he had a fetish for young boys, slavery and cannibalism," though he said that he did not actually practice cannibalism, the federal officials said, quoting Canadian border police.

"He further stated in sum or substance 'I like kids. They're fun. I'm a school teacher for grades four, five, six for Long Island School for the Gifted. I joke with them; I say I'm going to eat them, but I'm only joking; the kids always laugh,'" according to officials.

Federal officials said they were trying to determine whether Reiner's statements were part of a fantasy world, or whether he had acted upon any of his impulses.

The Web site Reiner operated has a disclaimer saying, "The complete contents of this Web site are entirely fictional, and are intended for entertainment purposes only. Contributors to this site in no way condone or support any harmful action against any person."

Staff writer William Murphy contributed to this story.

PIRRO'S FURY AT CHEATING AL (NYPOST)

By KENNETH LOVETT And FREDRIC U. DICKER

The New York Post, September 28, 2006

September 28, 2006 -- ALBANY - In a devastating blow to her campaign, Republican attorney-general candidate Jeanine Pirro admitted yesterday she is under federal investigation for discussing with former city Police Commissioner Bernard Kerik how to secretly record her bad-boy husband to see if he was cheating.

DOJ_NMG_0070402

Bombshell transcripts of conversations between Pirro and Kerik reveal that an angry Pirro even offered to plant the bug herself on her husband's boat, where she believed he was having sex with another woman.

"What am I supposed to do, Bernie? Watch him f- - - her every night?" Pirro is quoted as saying on the transcripts, obtained by WNBC-TV. "What am I supposed to do? . . . I can go on the boat, I'll put the f- - -ing thing on myself."

U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia confirmed his office is "investigating allegations recently brought to our attention by other law-enforcement agencies" and is working with the FBI and Pirro's old District Attorney's Office in Westchester County.

Garcia is looking into whether Pirro engaged in illegal wiretapping, which carries a five-year maximum prison sentence.

The conversations between Pirro and Kerik came to light as federal investigators tapped the former NYPD commissioner's phone during an unrelated investigation, according to sources.

Pirro, who has hired a lawyer, was Westchester County DA in the summer of 2005 and gearing up for a run against Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton when she became convinced that husband Al was being unfaithful and she wanted to catch him in the act.

In one conversation, Pirro complained to Kerik, who heads a private security firm, that one of his workers was reluctant to board Al Pirro's boat.

Kerik said: "But Jeanine, I'm having the same f- - -ing problem with everybody. Everybody is panic-stricken because it's you. I've gone out on a limb. I've had two other people looking at this. It's a problem."

Soon after, according to the transcript, Kerik asked a contact at Rudy Giuliani's consulting firm to find him a recording device, WNBC/Channel 4 reported. A Giuliani spokeswoman had no comment.

Pirro also belittled the AG's office she is now seeking, calling it a "been-there-done-that kind of thing." She said she would have been in the governor's mansion if it weren't for her husband.

In a hastily called Manhattan press conference yesterday, Pirro tried to contain the fallout and insisted she is in the race to stay.

At times choking back tears, she angrily denied breaking the law, calling the investigation a "political witch hunt and smear campaign" that is "timed to affect a statewide election."

"It is wrong, it is an outrage and I demand an investigation into why sealed documents were leaked publicly," she said.

Thinking that her husband was again cheating on her - he fathered a love child more than two decades ago when the two were married - Pirro admitted she had him followed "to see if what I suspected was true."

While she talked with Kerik about secretly taping Al Pirro, no taping ever occurred, she insisted.

She said she was simply venting to the former police commissioner, who has had his own recent legal problems.

But the political fallout was already beginning last night.

Giuliani was supposed to host a fund-raiser for Pirro next week at the East Side Marriott, but according to a source close to the mayor, "We're not going forward with the Oct. 3 fund-raiser for Jeanine."

"She's done," a top Republican political operative said simply of Pirro, who already trailed Democratic AG opponent Andrew Cuomo by double digits in recent polls.

Kerik's lawyer said his client e was listening to a friend in distress and that "nothing illegal was discussed and nothing illegal was done."

Even if she had taped her husband, Pirro argued, there is nothing illegal about one spouse taping another.

"There was anger, frustration and disappointment, so why a federal investigation?" said Pirro.

She said she was approached earlier this week outside her house at 10 p.m. by two FBI agents who told her she was the target of a U.S. Attorney investigation.

She noted that one of the prosecutors, U.S. Assistant Attorney Elliot Jacobson, was the man who prosecuted her husband on tax-fraud charges seven years ago, "which is to say it's personal and highly improper."

"Prying into the business of a married couple is not the business of a federal prosecutor and it's time to stop," she said.

"Nothing happened that is or should be the business of the United States Attorney's Office."

Garcia denied politics was involved in his probe.

DOJ_NMG_0070403

Pirro acknowledged her family over the years has had ups and downs and said she stays with her husband because he is a "great" father to their two children and her teenage son "needs his father with him."

"These are personal choices that I have made and I shouldn't have to keep explaining them," Pirro said, adding, "I've said it before and I'll say it again, I love my family."

The transcripts, though, quote Pirro as saying that without her husband's years of public transgressions, "I move into the governor's mansion."

Pirro did not reveal whether she found evidence he was having an affair.

Neither Al Pirro nor his lawyer returned calls for comment yesterday.

Yesterday's startling turn of events was just the latest in a long public saga of the Pirros' marriage.

It was 20 years ago that Pirro abandoned her campaign as the Republican candidate for lieutenant governor because of her then-virtually unknown husband Al's alleged ties to mob-connected companies. And it was almost a year ago that Pirro abandoned her campaign for U.S. Senate - deciding instead to run for attorney general - after her husband secretly worked behind the scenes to undermine her candidacy.

In 1995, a woman who worked for the Florida branch of Al Pirro's law firm stepped forward to claim that he had fathered her child.

After repeated denials and an insistence that the woman was a well-known liar, Al Pirro was forced by a court order a few years later to submit to a DNA test. It showed he was, in fact, the father.

In 1999, word surfaced that Al Pirro was the subject of a massive federal investigation into income-tax evasion. A year later, he was charged with evading taxes on $1 million in income and for claiming deductions on such luxuries as his own $123,000 Ferrari and his wife's new Mercedes.

He was eventually convicted on 66 counts of federal tax fraud and served 11 months in a federal prison.

In 2001, Al Pirro's law license was suspended because of his conviction, and remains so to this day.

In 2003, he denied allegations from a suspended Mamaroneck police officer that the department covered up an incident in which Al was stopped while driving drunk. His wife, who was in the car, allegedly demanded special treatment.

In 2004, Al Pirro was alleged by a FBI informant to have bragged to a local Westchester mobster that he was leaking confidential information involving an investigation being conducted by his wife's DA's Office.

In July, he was charged with driving nearly 100 mph on a Westchester highway. Earlier this month, he was accused of going more than twice the speed limit in a school traffic zone.

But through the years, Al Pirro also emerged as a wealthy and powerful Westchester County influence peddler and, after the 1994 election of good friend Gov. Pataki, he parlayed his power at the local and state level into influence.

Using his connections, Al Pirro set in motion a career ladder for his intelligent and attractive wife that led her from an initial appointive job as an assistant district attorney to her election as a Westchester judge in 1989 and then to her election to her defining post as Westchester DA in 1993.

In the mid-1990s the Pirros became close social friends with Pataki and his wife Libby, as well as then-U.S. Sen. Al D'Amato, and both used those connections to help advance Al Pirro's economic interests and Jeanine Pirro's political ambitions. As a result, during the '90s, Jeanine Pirro emerged as a rising star of New York GOP politics, talked about as a successor to D'Amato, as the next attorney general, and possibly even a candidate for governor herself.

Cuomo and state Democrats had no comment yesterday. State Republican Committee Chairman Stephen Minarik dismissed yesterday's revelations as a "political leak five weeks before an election."

"We stand 100 percent behind Jeanine and her candidacy," Minarik said. "This is an intensely private matter and should remain that way."

Uh, Jeanine, Hope You Had Career Plan B (NYDN)

By David Saltonstall, Daily News Senior Correspondent

New York Daily News, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070404

The political fallout for Jeanine Pirro was swift yesterday - a planned fund-raiser to be hosted by former Mayor Rudy Giuliani was abruptly canceled.

"We're not going forward," a source close to the former mayor said of the Oct. 3 event.

It was that kind of day for the former Westchester County district attorney, whose once sparkling career seemed to flame out in the space of a few hours amid revelations that she considered wiretapping her allegedly philandering husband - itself a potential crime.

"Oh ... my ... God," was all veteran political consultant George Arzt could say when told of Pirro's latest implosion. "In my 40 years in politics, this is the worst plummet I have ever seen."

It was hard to know which aspect of Pirro's latest fall was the most politically lethal yesterday - there were so many choices.

Was it that the tough-talking prosecutor discussed bugging her husband - an act federal investigators are now probing - with former Police Commissioner Bernard Kerik, who at the time was himself a soon-to-be-indicted con already being bugged by law enforcement?

Or was it the actual words that Pirro was caught uttering on those tapes in the summer of 2005, many of them four-lettered and some suggesting she was willing to break the law herself?

"I'll put the f-----g thing on myself," she tells Kerik when the former police commissioner expresses concerns about the legality of placing a bug on the Pirro family boat, according to transcripts of the tapes reported by WNBC NewsChannel 4.

Without her husband, she allegedly tells Kerik, "I move into the governor's mansion."

As for the attorney general's race, which she did not enter until months later, Pirro had nothing but disdain, telling Kerik it was a "been-there-done-that kind of thing."

Pirro forcefully stressed yesterday that she never went through with the wiretapping plot, casting herself instead as an angry and frustrated spouse who was just "venting" - and who remains a candidate for attorney general.

"I was a very angry woman, and I said a lot of things," Pirro told reporters.

As a political strategy, playing the spurned-but-still-married wife - as Pirro did masterfully, many said - was perhaps the best card she could play.

Think of Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.), who more than once converted her husband's "bimbo explosions" into politically potent sympathy, often by forthrightly facing the cameras as Pirro did yesterday.

Pirro also rightly pointed to the timing of yesterday's leak - coming just 41 days before the election, and more than a year after she was recorded - as more than a little suspicious, experts said.

But the writing may be on the wall. Pirro may or may not have committed a crime in trying to wiretap her husband, political experts agreed, but her fate as a viable candidate may have been sealed yesterday.

Pirro: Feds' Probe Is 'Highly Improper' (CBS2CHI)

CBS 2 Chicago, September 28, 2006

(CBS) NEW YORK State attorney general candidate Jeanine Pirro on Wednesday angrily denounced a federal probe of her plan to secretly record her husband because she suspected he was having an affair.

At a packed news conference in Manhattan, a furious and at times tearful Pirro insisted she would not quit the race and blasted the investigation as politically motivated and sexist.

"There is no way, when I have the opportunity to be the first woman attorney general in the history of this state, that I'm going to be pushed out of a race because somebody wants to delve into the personal lives of my husband and myself," Pirro said. "I'm standing up for myself and standing up for women."

Pirro confirmed she had been informed by FBI agents this week that she was under investigation and said she had hired an attorney to represent her in the case.

But she insisted that prosecutors had no business delving into her troubled union with lobbyist Albert Pirro, who spent 11 months in prison on tax fraud charges and fathered an illegitimate daughter after their wedding.

DOJ_NMG_0070405

"Sometime last year, I came to believe that my husband was seeing another woman," Pirro said. "In the midst of matrimonial discord, I was angry and had him followed to see if what I suspected was true. Although I spoke about taping him, there was no taping by me of anyone. There was anger, and frustration, and disappointment."

Pirro noted that one of the U.S. attorneys assigned to the case, Elliott B. Jacobson, had prosecuted her husband's tax evasion case seven years ago.

"This is personal and highly improper," she said, adding that she would demand an investigation into who leaked information about the case to reporters.

Michael J. Garcia, U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York, released a statement Wednesday confirming the investigation but declined to offer details. But, Garcia said, "we do not take politics into account in deciding either the subject matter or timing of our investigations."

Pirro, a former Westchester County district attorney, spoke with Bernard Kerik, the disgraced ex-New York police commissioner, about possibly placing a recorder in a room to listen in on her husband, said two people familiar with the situation, who spoke to The Associated Press only on condition of anonymity.

Pirro said Kerik was a friend and confirmed that they had spoken about her marital concerns.

"I was a very angry woman, and I said a lot of things," Pirro said. "What matters is what I did and didn't do, and I didn't do anything here other than vent."

Kerik, who was working as a private consultant when the conversation occurred, has his own problems. There were reports that during his 18-month tenure as police commissioner he had simultaneous extramarital affairs with two women, including the publisher of his memoir. And he pleaded guilty three months ago to accepting tens of thousands of dollars in gifts from a New Jersey firm accused of having mob connections.

Kerik lawyer Joseph Tacopina confirmed Kerik's role in the matter but said he had become involved through a long friendship with Pirro.

"Bernie spoke to a friend in distress regarding a domestic issue," Tacopina said. "Nothing illegal was said, and nothing illegal was done."

Pirro, a Republican who faces former federal Housing Secretary Andrew Cuomo in the attorney general's race, repeatedly said this was a personal matter involving her husband and charged she was the target of "an unethical, overzealous prosecutor with a partisan agenda."

A telephone call to Albert Pirro's White Plains office was not immediately returned Wednesday. A Cuomo spokeswoman, Wendy Katz, declined comment.

Pirro, whose troubled relationship with her husband of 21 years has been a source of controversy throughout her public life, was unusually candid when she spoke of why she remained in the marriage. They have a 21-year-old daughter and a 17-year-old son.

"My husband is a great father. I have two beautiful children in school ... a teenage son, who needs his father with him," she said, her voice cracking with emotion. "These are personal choices that I have made, and I shouldn't have to keep explaining them."

U.S. Attorney's Office Fires Back At Pirro Accusations (WNBC-TV)

WNBC-TV, September 28, 2006

The U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York says the investigation is far from a game of politics.

Pirro stated in an afternoon news conference that the timing of the investigation is improper, and said prosecutors had no business delving into her troubled union with lobbyist Albert Pirro, who spent 11 months in prison on tax fraud charges and fathered an illegitimate daughter after their wedding.

Shortly afterward, Michael J. Garcia, the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York released this statement:

"This Office is, as Jeanine Pirro said today, investigating allegations recently brought to our attention by other law enforcement agencies, involving possible violations of Title 18, United States Code, Sections 2511(1)(a) and (b).

DOJ_NMG_0070406

There are two Assistant United States Attorneys assigned to the case. They are both career prosecutors with experience in public corruption matters. They are working in conjunction with an experienced Assistant District Attorney from the Westchester County District Attorney's Office.

Their actions, and those of the FBI agents with whom they are working, have been approved by several layers of supervisors, including me. Because the investigation is ongoing, we will not comment as to its substance, except to say that we do not take politics into account in deciding either the subject matter or timing of our investigations."

In The Murky World Of Marital Spying, Legal Pitfalls Await Those Who Tape A Spouse (NYT)

By Leslie Eaton

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

Jeanine F. Pirro, in criticizing what she called a politically motivated federal investigation into whether she illegally eavesdropped on her husband, insisted yesterday that anything she had done, or considered doing, to find out if her spouse was having an affair was entirely legal.

Ms. Pirro's insistence that she never contemplated doing anything illegal in investigating her husband — including her discussion of placing a recording device on a boat he owned — involves the somewhat murky world of what amounts to marital spying.

Paul Shechtman, the lawyer Ms. Pirro retained recently, said that federal law permitted spouses to eavesdrop on each other in a house they shared. He cited several cases, including one from 1986 in which a federal judge on Long Island dismissed a case brought by a woman whose husband placed a listening device on the family phone in the course of their divorce, but while they were still sharing a house.

And on the specific question of whether it would be legal for Ms. Pirro to place a device on her husband's boat, Mr. Shechtman argued that it would be as well, because the boat was used by the entire family. "It's a family boat," he said.

But some experts were not so sure.

"If the boat is registered only in his name, it could be considered unlawful wiretapping," said Robert Mann, director of global operations for Worldwide Intelligence Network, a private investigation and personal protection company headquartered in Los Angeles.

Steven F. Gruel, a criminal defense lawyer and a former federal prosecutor in San Francisco, said that surreptitiously recording conversations was always risky because of the broad scope of a federal law that generally prohibits intercepting the communications of others. The rights of other people caught on any recordings might become an issue, he noted, saying, "Who else is going to be in the room other than the person being targeted?"

If Ms. Pirro's claim that she never went ahead with any plan to record her husband was true, Mr. Gruel said, she had made the right choice.

"Given that this area of law at the federal and state levels is laden with pitfalls and uncertainties, it sounds like the prudent thing was done, which was nothing," he said.

That is what Ms. Pirro, the Republican candidate for state attorney general, stressed during her news conference when she conceded that she had discussed recording her husband in the summer of 2005. She had those discussions with Bernard B. Kerik, the former police commissioner of New York, who was then running a private security firm.

"I was a very angry woman and I said a lot of things," she said about the conversations. "But what matters is what I did and didn't do. And I didn't do anything here other than vent."

And that, Ms. Pirro insisted, should be clear to federal investigators. She said the timing and nature of the investigation — in the final weeks of a campaign and involving the embarrassing issue of marital strife — made clear to her that the investigation was driven by politics.

She offered no specifics to support that claim, but mentioned a federal prosecutor, Elliott B. Jacobson, suggesting he was involved in the inquiry. Mr. Jacobson, an assistant federal prosecutor for the Southern District of New York, had prosecuted her husband, Albert J. Pirro Jr., several years ago for tax evasion.

"This is a waste of taxpayer money timed to affect the outcome of a statewide election," she said. She asked for an investigation into how sealed documents related to the inquiry had become public.

Mr. Jacobson, a registered Democrat who worked under Rudolph W. Giuliani when he was the federal prosecutor, did not respond to telephone messages left at his office and home.

But his boss, Michael J. Garcia, the United States attorney in Manhattan, issued an unusually forthright statement in which he confirmed that Ms. Pirro was under investigation for possibly violating federal wiretapping laws. Mr. Garcia, who was appointed by President Bush last year, said that two assistant United States attorneys were assigned to the case, though he did not name them.

"They are both career prosecutors with experience in public corruption matters," Mr. Garcia said. "They are working in conjunction with an experienced assistant district attorney from the Westchester County district attorney's office. Their actions, and those of the F.B.I. agents with whom they are working, have been approved by several layers of supervisors, including me."

Kerik Is Again A Figure In An Official Investigation (NYT)

By Russ Buettner And William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

The name of Bernard B. Kerik has already figured in embarrassing moments for the Bush administration and for former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani.

Yesterday, Mr. Kerik's name turned up in yet another uncomfortable place: a federal investigation that threatens to disrupt the race for state attorney general.

In a rare afternoon news break, WNBC television revealed that Jeanine F. Pirro, the former Westchester County district attorney and current Republican candidate for attorney general, was captured with Mr. Kerik last year on wiretaps discussing how Mr. Kerik might secretly record Ms. Pirro's husband, Albert J. Pirro Jr., to catch him in a suspected affair with another woman.

The conversations took place in mid-2005, long after Mr. Kerik's rise to fame in the months after Sept. 11, 2001, had been upended by damaging allegations that emerged after his nomination by President Bush to become the nation's homeland security secretary.

Mr. Kerik had left Mr. Giuliani's consulting business, Giuliani Partners, months earlier and was opening his own security firm, the Kerik Group. But he remained under investigation by the Bronx district attorney's office, which was finding that as New York City corrections commissioner, he had accepted free renovations to his Bronx apartment from a city contractor when the company was under investigation for possible ties to organized crime.

Apparently as part of that investigation, Bronx authorities began listening to Mr. Kerik's conversations, including several in which Ms. Pirro asked him to undertake the grunt work of the average private investigator, marital surveillance.

Ms. Pirro yesterday did not deny the substance of the conversations as reported by WNBC. The station said that in a profanity-laced exchange, the two discussed whether Mr. Kerik's company could place a recording device on her husband's boat to capture evidence of any trysts.

In the conversations, WNBC said, Ms. Pirro expressed frustration that her husband might be cheating on her.

At one point, Ms. Pirro complained that an employee of Mr. Kerik seemed hesitant to plant a recording device and offered what she suggested was a plausible reason that workers might be on the boat.

"We can just simply say, if there is an issue, that I am redecorating it for our anniversary," Ms. Pirro said, according to the WNBC report.

Mr. Kerik, WNBC said, spoke during the conversation with concern that recording conversations on the boat might be problematic, although the report did not specify what the problems were. "Everybody is panic-stricken because it's you," Mr. Kerik was quoted as telling Ms. Pirro.

Ms. Pirro, swearing, said during one conversation that if need be, she would put the monitoring device on the boat herself.

WNBC reported that Mr. Kerik, just minutes later, called an employee at Mr. Giuliani's consulting firm and asked him to find a recording device. A spokeswoman for Mr. Giuliani, Sunny Mindel, declined to comment yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0070408

Although federal prosecutors confirmed the existence of the investigation, they declined to comment yesterday on whether they believe a recording device was ever planted and used. Ms. Pirro said emphatically that none had been.

Joseph Tacopina, a lawyer for Mr. Kerik, said yesterday that Mr. Kerik had done nothing wrong in discussing a possible investigation of a marital dispute.

"I don't think this is a problem. This is not a problem," Mr. Tacopina said. "Bernie had his problems. He dealt with them in the Bronx."

Earlier this year, at the conclusion of the joint investigation by the Bronx district attorney's office and the city's Department of Investigation, Mr. Kerik pleaded guilty to two misdemeanors stemming from the apartment renovation. Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg ordered Mr. Kerik's name removed from the city jail in Lower Manhattan that had been named in his honor.

One person familiar with the conversations, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the matter, said the Bronx district attorney's office had provided tapes of the conversations to Janet DiFiore, the Westchester County district attorney. The tapes were later passed on to the Federal Bureau of Investigation and federal prosecutors in Manhattan. Spokesmen for the Bronx and Westchester County district attorneys' offices would not comment.

Mr. Pirro has been listed as owner of several boats in recent years. Current state records describe him as owning a 26-foot-long pleasure craft that is registered in his name only.

In an afternoon news conference after the WNBC broadcast, Ms. Pirro characterized the federal investigation of her conversations with Mr. Kerik as politically motivated.

Ms. Pirro and Mr. Kerik have a history of lending professional support to each other. Earlier this year, Mr. Kerik sent an e-mail message to friends urging them to support Ms. Pirro's campaign.

"Jeanine Pirro is a fighter," Mr. Kerik wrote, according to a copy of the e-mail message obtained by The New York Times. "Smart, understanding and tough," the message goes on, "she has dedicated her career to fighting crime and improving the lives of her fellow New Yorkers."

Several friends of Mr. Kerik have lost their jobs in the fallout from the investigations into his conduct, including the Correction Department's longtime inspector general, Michael Caruso, and Thomas Antenen, Mr. Kerik's spokesman at both the Correction and Police Departments.

And the contractors accused of having played a role in the renovation of Mr. Kerik's apartment, Peter and Frank DiTomasso, are under a felony perjury indictment for telling a Bronx grand jury that they had nothing to do with it.

Federal investigators are still looking into other matters regarding Mr. Kerik, including his role in a Correction Department charity that spent $1 million in rebates on cigarettes bought with city money.

Judge Declares Another Mistrial In Gotti Racketeering Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 28, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-For the third time in the past 12 months, a judge declared a mistrial Wednesday in the racketeering trial of former mob boss John A. "Junior" Gotti.

The jury, which deliberated for seven days over two weeks, sent out a second note in as many days indicating it could not reach a unanimous verdict. "Your honor, unfortunately we are deadlocked," said the note, prompting U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin to declare the mistrial shortly after noon.

A relieved Gotti hugged his brother Peter and other supporters, then wiped his eyes while sitting at the defense table.

"It was a tough one," said Gotti, who has almost become a full-time defendant in the last year. "This one drained the life from me."

Two previous juries in the last year wound up deadlocked, with resulting mistrials, after Gotti's lawyers argued the second-generation Mafiosi had years ago severed his ties to organized crime. If convicted, the 42-year-old Gotti had faced up to 30 years in prison.

He is free on $7 million (â,¬5.52 million) bail, and there was no immediate word on whether the government would mount a fourth prosecution.

"That's a decision above my pay grade," said prosecutor Victor Hou when asked about the possibility. The defense made motions to suspend Gotti's current home detention and electric surveillance by the government.

From the start, the key issue in the case has been whether Gotti quit the Gambino crime family as he claims before July 1999. If so, a five-year statute of limitations would have expired before prosecutors brought new racketeering charges in 2004.

Prosecutors say the jury should conclude Gotti continued to receive mob money after 1999 and thus was part of a racketeering conspiracy.

His defense lawyers say Gotti paid a large fine when he pleaded guilty to a racketeering charge in another case in 1999 and was permitted to keep the property and businesses which remained, regardless of where the money originated.

Gotti was also accused of ordering two 1992 attacks on radio talk show host Curtis Sliwa, including one where he was shot twice before escaping out the window of a taxi rigged to keep him trapped inside.

Prosecutors have said Gotti was retaliating for on-air attacks against his father, John Gotti, who was sentenced in 1992 to life in prison without parole. He died in prison in 2002.

Sliwa sat in the courtroom, looking disappointed, as the mistrial was declared.

But this trial didn't focus as much as the first two did on the Sliwa attacks. Prosecutors instead aimed their evidence at convincing jurors that Gotti never quit the mob before he pleaded guilty to racketeering charges in 1999 as he insisted he had.

They tracked Gotti's financial moves to try to convince the jury that Gotti never left the mob because he continued earning money off businesses such as real estate that he started with crime-tainted money.

Gotti's defense team acknowledged his life in organized crime, but insisted their client had retired from the Mafia and had no role in the Sliwa attack. Gotti was indicted on these charges in July 2004, just two months before he was due out of prison on a prior conviction.

Last September, a jury deadlocked 11-1 in favor of conviction. At his second trial, the majority of the second jury favored acquitting Gotti in March after his lawyers successfully emphasized their claim that he had had quit the mob.

The trials were meant to resolve the 14-year-old question of whether Gotti ordered two assaults on Sliwa. Sliwa and prosecutors maintained the Gambino family targeted him to halt his daily verbal fusillades against Gotti's father.

"He's getting personal," Gotti allegedly told one of Sliwa's attackers. "I want us to get personal."

Sliwa testified for a third time, although he was called by the defense at this trial.

According to authorities, the younger Gotti assumed control of the powerful Gambino family after his father's 1992 conviction on racketeering and murder charges.

For The Third Time, A Jury Fails To Convict Gotti (NYT)

By Timothy Williams

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

For the third time in just over a year, a federal jury yesterday failed to reach a verdict in the racketeering prosecution of John A. Gotti, the former head of the Gambino crime family, allowing him to walk free even though jurors said they believed he was guilty of one of the main accusations against him.

A federal official said that after three mistrials, the prosecution was unlikely to retry Mr. Gotti unless new evidence turned up, a decision that would all but end an expensive and highly publicized organized crime prosecution in a startling defeat for the government.

Jurors said they believed Mr. Gotti was guilty of orchestrating the 1992 shooting and bungled kidnapping of Curtis Sliwa, the radio talk-show host. But, the jurors said, the government failed to prove that the shooting was part of a pattern of crimes, a necessary part of the racketeering charge, and so they could not convict him.

Jurors, who first said on Tuesday afternoon that they could not reach a verdict, told Judge Shira A. Scheindlin that they had made no significant progress since Monday. They had deliberated for a total of six and a half days and were dismissed at midday yesterday after they sent the judge a note just before lunch that read, “Your Honor, unfortunately, we are deadlocked.”

After the judge read the note, Mr. Gotti cried and rested his head on his folded hands on the defense table. He then reached over to hug his lead lawyer, Charles Carnesi. His sister Angel, brother Peter and other friends and family members in the packed courtroom also began to sob.

"It's enough now, they got to let us go," Mr. Gotti, 42, told reporters afterward, referring to prosecutions against him and his late father, John J. Gotti, who preceded him as family boss. "Just let me go and let me move on with my life. Let us go. He's dead."

The jurors' names were not disclosed. After they were dismissed, several said they had been unable to agree on the trial's key issue: whether Mr. Gotti had withdrawn from the Gambino organized crime family before July 1999, which was an essential piece of the defense's case.

"Ultimately, it's based on our division regarding withdrawal," said one juror, a woman in her 40's who described herself as a health professional. Four jurors believed that Mr. Gotti had quit the mob, eight did not, she said.

A law enforcement official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak about the case, said the government would not prosecute Mr. Gotti again on the same charges unless it turned up new evidence — or was able to link him directly to a murder.

His father became known as "the Teflon Don" after he avoided conviction at three state and federal trials from 1984 to 1990. By the time he was convicted on federal murder and racketeering charges in 1992 and died in prison in 2002, he had become famous.

The Gotti name automatically linked the son with organized crime in the national consciousness while guaranteeing that the trial would be well attended. Mr. Gotti's public persona seemed different during the three trials — the first in September 2005, the second in March 2006. Before they started, his wardrobe consisted of velour track suits, but in court he wore coats and ties.

During this trial, Mr. Carnesi acknowledged for the first time that Mr. Gotti led the Gambino family during part of the 1990's. In addition to two racketeering charges, Mr. Gotti faced single counts of extortion and witness tampering, but the jury divided on those as well.

Because the jurors could not reach a verdict, the charges against Mr. Gotti still stand, at least for now. Seth Ginsberg, one of Mr. Gotti's lawyers, told Judge Scheindlin that he planned to ask that the charges be dismissed and that some conditions of Mr. Gotti's bail be ended, including home confinement and electronic monitoring.

Mr. Gotti could have been sentenced to up to 70 years behind bars if convicted on all counts. Before the first trial, he rejected a government plea deal that would have sentenced him to 17 years; later he turned down an offer of 10 years before the second trial and 5 years before the third.

The most serious act under the racketeering charge against Mr. Gotti was that he had ordered the abduction and beating of Mr. Sliwa, a founder of the Guardian Angels. Witnesses testified that Mr. Gotti was angered by what Mr. Sliwa said on the radio about the Gotti family, including calling his father a drug dealer.

Mr. Sliwa was shot twice and escaped his attackers by leaping out the window of a speeding taxicab commandeered by two Gambino crime family enforcers, according to witnesses. Mr. Sliwa, 52, testified for the prosecution in the first two trials, but in the third, it was not the prosecution that called him, but the defense.

Yesterday, Mr. Sliwa watched the teary Gotti family celebration from the back of the courtroom, gritting his teeth.

Jurors said they quickly agreed that Mr. Gotti was responsible for the abduction and shooting of Mr. Sliwa, but in order to convict Mr. Gotti under the full racketeering count, they would have had to find him guilty of at least one more act in the racketeering charge — witness tampering, extortion or loan sharking.

"It's an insult to injury that the jury can be so clear about that, then see him hug and glad-hand his supporters and walk free," Mr. Sliwa said outside court. "Now I'm going to have to see him party."

The six-week trial delved into a number of murky areas: Mr. Gotti's personal finances, the truthfulness of the testimony of two former Gambino family members, and the question at the center of each of the trials: whether Mr. Gotti had truly quit the Gambino crime family before July 1999.

The date was critical because if the jury was unable to find evidence of criminal activity by Mr. Gotti after July 1999, the five-year statute of limitations on the racketeering charges would have expired by the time Mr. Gotti was indicted in 2004.

Mr. Carnesi said Mr. Gotti quit the mob as he prepared to begin serving a 77-month prison sentence in 1999 on unrelated charges of racketeering and illegal gambling. Two former Gambino family members who had been Mr. Gotti's confidants testified against him, but they acknowledged that they did not know that he was involved in crime after July 1999.

The government's case was built around F.B.I. surveillance recordings of Mr. Gotti while he was in prison. The recordings, though muffled and often difficult to understand, appeared to present a vengeful and petty Mr. Gotti who threatened violence against his uncles as well as against people who he feared might testify against Gambino family members in various trials, including his own.

Jurors said the quality of the sound undercut the recordings' usefulness.

"The tapes didn't help," said one juror, a man in his 40's, who described himself as a security supervisor at a law firm.

Another juror, an editor at a newspaper, also in his 40's, said: "My worry is that this is the only life he has known, and if he is out, I hope he doesn't get drawn back in. I think he's been given a real chance here, and I hope he takes advantage of it."

Mr. Gotti said he was looking forward to spending time with his family and wanted to "work with children."

"I can't tell you how thankful I am for this jury," he said. "They saved my life."

Jury Tunes Out Tapes (NYDN)

By Thomas Zambito, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, September 28, 2006

The hours of jailhouse tapes played during John A. (Junior) Gotti's latest trial made for some great courtroom drama - but didn't have much of an impact on the jury deciding his fate.

"The tapes were a very cloudy issue because you couldn't hear them very well," one juror said yesterday after the panel deadlocked - prompting Gotti's third straight mistrial.

The female juror and two others agreed to speak with the press yesterday after seven days of deliberations locked in a windowless room.

The panel was split, 8 to 4, in favor of conviction, on most counts. Each side made arguments, most low-key, some emotional.

But in the end, no one was budging.

"We voted again this morning on every count" and nothing changed, said the female juror, who works as a meeting planner.

Among the anonymous panel of seven women and five men was a working journalist and one who has left the profession, a nursery school director, a college professor and a former singer.

The jurors who talked with the press said they were confused by testimony about Gotti's finances and that allegations that he had continued to rake in mob money even after 1999 - when he said he quit the mob - just didn't add up.

"We didn't feel that we had all the information," said another female juror, a health professional.

The only thing they could agree on was that Gotti had a role in the 1992 attack on radio host Curtis Sliwa. Sliwa was shot after getting into a cab near his lower East Side apartment.

The jurors said they were not swayed by defense suggestions that Sliwa's inability to identify his attackers masked an all-out effort to blame Gotti in the shooting.

Some panelists questioned the motivation behind the testimony of Gotti's brother Peter, who denied retrieving some $50,000 in mob money from Gambino capo Michael (Mikey Scars) DiLeonardo for his brother.

"We all felt he was there to support his brother," said one female juror. "We weighed it against that."

The panel split, 6 to 6, on the witness-tampering charge involving Gotti's alleged attempt to get to DiLeonardo - a key turncoat witness - through DiLeonardo's son.

Most panelists held on tightly to their convictions from the start, with little movement among the camps.

Still, they said they continued deliberating right up until the moment yesterday afternoon when they told Manhattan Federal Judge Shira Scheindlin they were deadlocked.

MISTRIAL TEARS OF JOY FOR 'JR.' (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, September 28, 2006

September 28, 2006 -- It was strike three for prosecutors in the John "Junior" Gotti case yesterday as a federal judge declared a third mistrial - a stunning development that could mean freedom for the mob scion.

The Teflon son of late Gambino boss John "Dapper Don" Gotti buried his face in his hands and wept as Manhattan Federal Judge Shira Scheindlin read the final note from a deeply divided anonymous jury.

"Your honor, unfortunately we are deadlocked," wrote the hung jury, which deliberated into a seventh day before throwing in the towel.

An emotional Gotti bear-hugged brother Peter and sister Angel and then turned to the future, announcing his hopes to move his family to the Midwest and pursue a degree in child psychology.

"[If] they let me leave, I'll leave. I'll take my family and I'll go. Let me move on with my life," said Gotti, 42, who accused the feds of going after him because of his father's legacy.

Three jurors who spoke with reporters after the verdict revealed that the panel agreed on one thing - all 12 believed was Gotti guilty of the sensational 1992 kidnapping of radio host Curtis Sliwa.

That wasn't enough for conviction because the kidnapping was charged under a racketeering count that requires prosecutors to prove a second criminal act.

"I'd be better off dead," said a disgusted Sliwa, who got little consolation from the mixed result. "This guy got away with a crime . . . but as God is my witness, God will not forget that he tried to kill me."

"I know he's going to go straight to hell without an asbestos suit," said Sliwa, flanked by red-jacketed members of the Guardian Angels civilian patrol group, which he founded.

The sticking point for the jury was Gotti's claim that he retired from the mob in 1999 and therefore could not be convicted under the five-year statute of limitations - with four jurors buying that defense, the jurors said.

Prosecutors tried to overcome the defense by showing Gotti continued to live lavishly off his ill-gotten gains.

The panel was also split 6-6 over an alleged witness-tampering plot targeting star turncoat Michael "Mikey Scars" DiLeonardo in 2003 and voted 8-4 that Gotti was guilty of construction-industry extortion and related crimes.

The jury first announced it was deadlocked at 12:15 p.m. Tuesday, but followed the judge's instruction to continue trying to reach a verdict, before giving up at 12:05 p.m. yesterday.

Gotti was facing up to 30 years behind bars if convicted.

In dismissing the jurors, Scheindlin commended their dedication and said their inability to reach a verdict was "not your failure. The case has its difficulties."

Gotti lawyer Seth Ginsberg told the judge the defense would file legal papers asking for dismissal of the charges.

Prosecutors, who mounted their case three times over the past year only to get the same non-result, would not say whether there would be a fourth trial.

Outside court, Gotti told a crush of news crews, "I'd like to go back to school, get a degree in child psychology."

"I'd like to work with children," said the former Gambino leader, who already penned one children's book while behind bars and plans to write another.

A THIRD MISTRIAL (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Staff Writer; Staff Writers Wil Cruz, Herbert Lowe And Carl Macgowan Contributed To This Story.

Long Island Newsday, September 28, 2006

His father was the Teflon Don, but John A. Gotti is proving to be very slippery, too.

For the third time in about a year, a federal jury deadlocked yesterday in the racketeering case against the son of the late Gambino crime boss, ending the case in a mistrial and forcing federal prosecutors to decide if they should try again to stick him with a conviction.

After six full days of deliberation, the jury in federal court in Manhattan failed to agree on any of the four counts in the indictment and prompted Judge Shira Scheindlin to declare the mistrial shortly after noon. Some jurors later told reporters that the government's case wasn't overwhelming but added that Gotti's claim he withdrew from mob life didn't convince many either.

"Unfortunately we are deadlocked," the jury of five men and seven women reported in a note Scheindlin read out in court at 12:15 p.m.

With the word "deadlocked," the 42-year-old Gotti buried his face in his head and gasped. Defense attorney Seth Ginsberg gave him a hearty slap on the back. Gotti then turned to lead defense counsel Charles Carnesi and planted a kiss on his check and gave him a crushing embrace.

"This was a tough one, it drained the life out of me," said Gotti after the jury left the courtroom. He then took a cell phone call from his wife, Kim, who was with the couple's six children at their Oyster Bay home.

Gotti said the government should move on and not take another shot at him.

"My father's dead for over four years; it is time for us to move on ... it is time for us all to move on," Gotti said. He then drove to his 65-year-old mother Victoria's home in Howard Beach and left there at about 4 p.m., presumably for Oyster Bay.

By failing to reach unanimity, the jury couldn't decide on charges of racketeering conspiracy, racketeering, extortion conspiracy and witness tampering.

The mistrial was a clear indication that a revised government presentation, which included prison tapes and financial evidence, failed to sway the jury. Jurors said that the only thing they agreed on was that Gotti took part in the 1992 abduction and wounding of radio talk show host Curtis Sliwa. But the Sliwa act was only one so-called "predicate" racketeering crime for which two were needed for conviction on the substantive racketeering charge.

"John Gotti Junior has to be the luckiest person in the world ... it's absolutely unbelievable that he escapes justice and gets to walk out of court," said Sliwa. "It actually would have been better if I were dead, believe it or not, because then he would have been held culpable."

Since the trial opened last month, prosecutors Victor Hou and Miriam Rocah presented tapes made of Gotti while he was at Ray Brook federal prison in upstate New York, as well as tapes made of him and his father. The prosecutors believed the tapes showed that the younger Gotti never left his life of crime prior to July 21, 1999, as he had claimed. That date was important because it would put the indictment outside the statute of limitations.

In addition, prosecutors were using the tapes to show that he was still taking extortion money after July 21, 1999. But some jurors later said the tapes were inconclusive.

Immediately after the verdict, Manhattan U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia issued a terse statement that expressed disappointment but praised his staff.

"We are disappointed ... but we commend the dedication of our prosecutors and the agents who worked on this case," said Garcia. "We will inform the court in the very near future about how we plan to proceed."

Carnesi said the defense would be asking for a dismissal of the indictment.

Shortly after the mistrial, Ginsberg asked Scheindlin to change the terms of Gotti's $7-million bail so that he wouldn't be under home confinement. Scheindlin was expected to approve that request late yesterday.

"We feel so great, I can't tell you, I feel first for my mother, second for my brother," said Gotti's sister, Victoria.

Gotti said he didn't have wild plans for the night.

"To go home and sleep in my own bed and be with my children, that is my celebration," Gotti told Newsday when asked how he would celebrate.

Staff writers Wil Cruz, Herbert Lowe and Carl MacGowan contributed to this story.

Fuhgeddaboud Me Stayin' Here (NYDN)

By Austin Fenner, Jose Martinez, And Thomas Zambito, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, September 28, 2006

Prosecutors' third bid to send John A. (Junior) Gotti back to prison ended with their third mistrial yesterday - spurring bittersweet tears from the mob scion and a vow to leave New York forever.

It appeared unlikely last night that the government would seek a fourth trial, giving the Teflon Son a chance to prove he really has ditched the mob life he inherited from his father, whose specter loomed large over the courthouse.

DOJ_NMG_0070414

"They let me leave, I'll leave," Gotti, 42, told reporters outside Manhattan Federal Court, as he pledged to flee his Long Island mansion with his wife and six children for a quieter life in the Midwest.

"I'll take my family and I'll go. It's enough now. They got to let go. Let us go, he's [Dapper Don John Gotti] dead. We just want to move on. He's in Tomb 451 at St. John's [Cemetery, Queens]. It's over.

"If they let me, I want to go back to school," he added, his lawyer Charles Carnesi by his side. "I want to study child psychology and I want to write a book. I want to buy some property out west .... In the 1990s, I lived an opulent and extraordinary lifestyle. I have very simple needs now.

"I want to start from scratch, wherever my wife would be happy," he said. "I'm different than my father. My children are my life. You can convert me. My father you could not ...

"I want to thank this jury. They saved my life," he said before leaving for a pizza party with family.

The emotional words came after the jury declared themselves deadlocked a second straight day. Judge Shira Scheindlin relented and declared a mistrial.

Gotti rode his "I quit the mob" defense to the third mistrial by convincing four holdout jurors he chucked the Mafia life - even though the panel agreed he was responsible for the 1992 attack on radio host Curtis Sliwa.

"Your honor, unfortunately we are deadlocked," the jury said in a signed note that ended their seventh and final day of deliberations.

With those words, the burly Gotti bowed his head and cried. A few rows back, his brother Peter wiped away tears. Sister Angel slumped into her husband's arms weeping.

"It's over," she said.

Scheindlin seemed to express the same sentiments when she urged Gotti's lawyers to file a motion to dismiss the racketeering indictment that could have put him behind bars for 30 years.

Later, at the frame house in Howard Beach, Queens, that John (Dapper Don) Gotti called home, the Don's widow, Victoria, welcomed her oldest son with hugs and kisses. Daughter Victoria, the writer and reality TV star, arrived with a stack of fresh pizzas.

"I will thank our good fortune every day for a judge like Shira Schiendlin," Mamma Gotti told the Daily News. "She is the difference between a fair trial and a railroad job. God bless her."

"It's been torture for her," daughter Victoria said of her mother. "She hasn't slept right. She hasn't eaten right. It was like her life stopped. She was at her breaking point."

Junior Gotti was facing a four-count racketeering indictment and the key the issue was whether he quit the Gambino crime family as he claims before July 1999.

If so, a five-year statute of limitations would have expired before prosecutors brought new racketeering charges in 2004.

The only charge jurors unanimously agreed upon was that he was guilty of the June 1992 attack on Guardian Angels founder Sliwa, which followed his relentless battering of the Gotti clan on his WABC radio show.

But the 12-0 vote on the Sliwa kidnapping claim proved a hollow victory for prosecutors, who needed to prove Gotti participated in at least two criminal acts in the four-count conspiracy in order to win a guilty verdict.

The jurors' 6-6 split on a witness-tampering charge involving the son of mob informant Michael (Mikey Scars) DiLeonardo. The panel split 8-4, in favor of conviction, on the other major counts.

"He lives to high-five and laugh at me another day," a stunned Sliwa said outside the courthouse. "But I'll have the last laugh either in the criminal justice system or when we're knocking at St. Peter's gate.... You can bet your last George Washington I will continue to be John Gotti Jr's worst nightmare."

U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said he was disappointed in the outcome, adding, "We will inform the court in the very near future about how we plan to proceed."

At the time of the last mistrial, in March, prosecutors said almost immediately they would try Gotti again.

Before the start of this trial, Scheindlin raised questions about the fairness of trying someone three times and sounded reluctant to let prosecutors give it a fourth try.

The judge indicated that she would consider lifting house-arrest restrictions on Gotti, who is out on $7 million bail.

DOJ_NMG_0070415

Gotti took a risk by going to trial, turning down a plea offer before trial that would have allowed him to go free after five years.

He feared that prosecutors would come after him again. After taking a plea deal in 1999 and serving nearly six years on racketeering charges, federal prosecutors slapped him with a new indictment in 2004 as he was about to go home.

He spent more than $1 million in legal fees, by mortgaging his $1.3 million Oyster Bay Cove, L.I., estate and borrowing from family and friends.

"It was a tough one," Gotti said of his third trial. "This one drained the life out of me."

With Tamer El Ghobashy and John Lauinger

When all's said and Don...

"In the 1990s, I lived an opulent and extraordinary lifestyle. I have very simple needs now."

"I'll take my family and I'll go. It's enough now. They got to let go. Let us go, he's [John (Dapper Don) Gotti] dead."

"I want to start from scratch, wherever my wife would be happy. I'm different than my father. My children are my life. You can convert me. My father you could not."

Will Prosecutors Throw In Towel? (NSDY)

By Joseph Mallia And Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writers

Long Island Newsday, September 28, 2006

Experts agree: It'll be tough to get a conviction - ever

Legal experts to Gottiprosecutors: Three strikes, you're out.

John A. Gotti's third deadlocked jury - and racketeering mistrial - should mark the end of his legal saga, academic experts and defense lawyers said yesterday.

"This case is fatally flawed. One could even say that if they bring it again it would be abuse of prosecutorial power," said Fordham Law School professor Jim Cohen, who specializes in criminal law.

"There were concerns in the legal community that the case was brought to trial this time," Cohen said. "It would be very surprising if it were brought a fourth time."

One thing on which several experts agreed: After the highly visible defeats, prosecutors must balance mounting costs - by one estimate already exceeding $1 million - against chances of success.

U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia hasn't said whether his office will drop the case, which was based on the charge that Gotti, known as "Junior," replaced his father, John J. Gotti, as the Gambino crime family boss.

A Manhattan federal court jury of five men and seven women told U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin yesterday it couldn't agree on a key question: whether Gotti had withdrawn from the crime family by July 1999.

Observers said the U.S. attorney's office operated on the belief that Gotti's withdrawal was a sham, but had not convinced the jury with persuasive evidence.

"If I were in charge, the kind of question I would ask is, 'Can you convince me that, in a subsequent trial, we can be more persuasive?'" New York University Law School professor James Jacobs said.

"And, 'Why do you think it would come out differently than the last two or three?'"

A decision to try again would be viable only if new witnesses or information had come to light, said Jacobs, author of the books "Mobsters, Unions and Feds" and "Busting the Mob."

Cosa Nostra cases typically depend on the quality of surveillance tapes, undercover officers, participating witnesses and wiretapped conversations, Jacobs said. Clear financial links between an organized crime suspect and a flow of money from unexplained, or illegal, sources is also crucial, Jacobs said.

But in the "Junior" Gotti cases, the money flow wasn't easy to prove, he said.

Jacobs was skeptical that any new evidence is forthcoming.

"They've been investigating for a long time. It's probable that they have surfaced as much evidence as they can against John Gotti," Jacobs said.

In all three cases, the number of jurors who favored the defense is a clear indication that the evidence was weak, defense lawyers said.

In yesterday's mistrial, the jurors were unanimous on only one charge, while others were split 6-6 and 8-4 in favor of conviction, jurors said afterward.

"I'm not a statistics expert but a sample of 36 jurors over three trials is pretty strong evidence the prosecution should drop the case," said Gerald Lefcourt, a past president of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers.

Manhattan defense lawyer Gerald Shargel said the courts must look hard at a decision to continue prosecuting the case.

"My view is that enough is enough," Shargel said. He acknowledged that the family's notoriety was bound to affect jurors' view of Gotti's recent cases.

"Here we have a case of Shakespearean proportions. The fallen king, the conflicted prince, the concerned mother, the larger-than-life sister," Shargel said.

But Shargel added that credit for the mistrial may have more to do with another factor. "I really don't think this is a case of him outwitting the prosecution," Shargel said. "It's a matter of him having very good lawyers."

John A. Gotti isn't the first defendant to face multiple prosecutions for the same alleged crimes. After two mistrials caused by alleged jury-tampering, Gotti's uncle Gene Gotti was convicted in May 1989 on federal charges of running a heroin ring.

Thank Goodness For Fair Judge (NYDN)

By Victoria Gotti, Special To The News

New York Daily News, September 28, 2006

Last month, with her son fighting for his life in court, Victoria Gotti described him as a "gladiator ... waiting in the center of the arena for the lions to be let in and spectators waiting with anxious anticipation for what they hope will be a bloodbath." Now she reflects on her son's third mistrial:

I will thank our good fortune every day for a judge like Shira Schiendlin. She is the difference between a fair trial and a railroad job. God bless her.

The defense team was second to none and basically worked pro bono. Last, but not least, God bless those jurors for not believing the swill they were being fed daily by government and stories being planted by their government shill at the New York Post.

I pray my son, who I love more than life, will now go with love and my nightmare will now be over.

There is no celebration. We are all just too exhausted, emotionally and physically. We can all just get a good night sleep tonight.

As for Curtis Sliwa, let him explain - as former Guardian Angel William Diaz testified at the trial - why he would take a gang and go to assault another group that he thought were the people who attacked him. What does that make him?

I would think, as I said, Mr. Sliwa needs to be very, very grateful for that statute of limitations or it would be him doing hard time.

He is what he is, a carnie guy - anything that can give him a show. He will now go from show to show to get the attention he craves.

As for John giving up people, had he been willing, he would not have been on trial a third time. It is John who was given up by several people - including a legal person.

It was a government source who tried his best to get my son murdered by circulating that he was a rat. Conveniently, the government source, an FBI agent, gave this garbage to The Post ... We learned that Curtis Sliwa's best friend ... is the new publisher of that paper. We didn't expect anything but yellow journalism.

For Theft Of Rare Maps, A Sentence Of 42 Months (NYT)

By Alison Leigh Cowan

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Sept. 27 — A map dealer who stole nearly 100 rare maps valued at $3 million from Yale and other institutions was sentenced to three and a half years in prison on Wednesday after a federal judge credited him for helping the authorities retrieve most of the items taken.

DOJ_NMG_0070417

Representatives of the institutions that were looted, who had traveled long distances to lobby for a stiff sentence, left the court saying they were deeply disappointed with the punishment given the map dealer, Edward Forbes Smiley III. Federal sentencing guidelines suggested that Mr. Smiley was looking at a term of 57 to 71 months, although the maximum penalty was 10 years.

Mr. Smiley, 50, told the court he was "deeply ashamed" and was eager to make restitution to the institutions and dealers who lost money. Some of the stolen maps have not been retrieved, and dealers who bought maps from Mr. Smiley and then resold them often had to reimburse their clients so that the maps could be returned.

He stood within 20 feet of three cartons containing dozens of the stolen maps that had been retrieved, which had been brought into court to allow the judge to inspect them.

"I have hurt many people," he said, his hands clasped behind him. He said he had read the many victim-impact letters sent to the court and said, "I find them very powerful. I believe they were written by a group of people who have love for these materials and who have devoted their lives to making them public."

Mr. Smiley said he understood the sense of betrayal felt by the curators and library staff members who had helped him when he came to examine their collections.

Mr. Smiley, 50, was arrested by the Yale police in June 2005, shortly after leaving Yale's rare-book library with seven maps stashed in his briefcase and tweed jacket.

After a year of cooperating with the authorities, he pleaded guilty in federal court in June this year to the theft of a major artwork. As part of the plea agreement, he admitted to removing maps from collections at Harvard, Yale, the New York Public Library, Boston Public Library, the Newberry Library in Chicago and the British Library in London.

All of those institutions sent representatives to Wednesday's hearing to press for a stiff sentence. Robert Karrow, the map curator at the Newberry, said he wanted a sentence that would tell "Smiley's successors that the stakes in this game of cultural hijacking have been raised."

Several also expressed outrage that Mr. Smiley's lawyer, Richard A. Reeve, wanted his client to be rewarded for helping retrieve what he had stolen.

"That cooperation, of course, occurred only after he was caught in the very act of mutilating books and stealing maps" at Yale, said Professor Frank M. Turner on behalf of the university's libraries.

The judge, Janet Bond Arterton of the United States District Court, said "this is anything but an easy sentence to impose" given Mr. Smiley's many contradictions.

She said she was awed earlier that day when she inspected the maps that Mr. Smiley had taken.

But she said Mr. Smiley's decision to cooperate when he could have told federal agents to "have a nice investigation," as Mr. Reeve had put it earlier, made her feel Mr. Smiley deserved to get less than the sentence suggested by federal guidelines.

Map Dealer Dealt Prison Term In Thefts (BOS)

By David Abel, GLOBE STAFF

The Boston Globe, September 28, 2006

A well-known dealer who stole at least 98 rare maps from the Boston Public Library, Harvard College, and such institutions as Yale University and the British Library in London was sentenced Wednesday to three years in prison and ordered to pay more than $1.9 million to clients he swindled.

E. Forbes Smiley III, 50, of Chilmark on Martha's Vineyard, admitted that over an eight-year span he stole more than 30 maps from Boston and New York public libraries, eight from Harvard's Houghton Library, and 10 from Yale's Beinecke Rare Book and Manuscript Library in New Haven, prosecutors said. The British Library has said Smiley took centuries-old maps that told the story of the New World.

''I have hurt many people,'' Smiley said in US District Court in New Haven, according to the Associated Press. ''I stole very valuable research materials from institutions that made it their business to provide those materials to the public for valuable research. I am deeply ashamed of having done that. I cannot imagine the pain and the anger that I made them suffer.''

The judge ordered Smiley to report to prison in January, at a facility to be designated by the Federal Bureau of Prisons.

Beth Brainard, a spokeswoman for Harvard College's library system, said some of the maps have been damaged and that Harvard contends 13 maps, five more than Smiley admitted to. ''We are always gratified to see individuals who steal and destroy valuable library materials brought to justice,'' she said.

Antique Map Thief Gets 3 1/2-Year Jail Term (AP)

By John Christoffersen, The Associated Press

AP, September 28, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- A renowned antique map dealer who admitted stealing nearly 100 rare maps was sentenced Wednesday to 3 1/2 years in prison, after one librarian described him as a "thief who assaulted history."

E. Forbes Smiley III, 50, also was tentatively ordered to pay restitution of $1.9 million. He is scheduled to report to prison Jan. 4.

Smiley, who faced up to six years in prison under federal sentencing guidelines, stole the maps over eight years from the New York and Boston public libraries, the Newberry Library in Chicago, the Harvard and Yale university libraries and the British Library in London. The oldest maps dated back to the 1500s and some are the first records of settlements, territories and discoveries in America, experts said.

"Your honor, I have hurt many people," Smiley said in court. "I stole very valuable research materials from institutions that made it their business to provide those materials to the public for valuable research. I am deeply ashamed of having done that."

Smiley, who pleaded guilty in June, was arrested after a Yale librarian found a razor blade on the floor. The arrest prompted Yale and other top map libraries to review their security procedures.

Authorities say Smiley acted out of resentment toward the prestigious libraries and to pay for his expensive tastes and mounting debts.

U.S. District Judge Janet Bond Arterton said she wanted to send a dual message with the sentence. Prosecutors did not ask for a specific a sentence, but recommended Smiley be given credit for his cooperation with the investigation.

"If you steal human treasurers, then you will go to prison, but if you help recover them, this will be taken into account and weighed in the balance," Arterton said.

Leaders of the prestigious libraries urged a stiff sentence, saying he took world treasures and left a trail of victims.

"It will go down in criminal and library history as one of the largest, most prolonged, premeditated and systematic of all thefts from libraries, and with no mitigating circumstances," British Library Director Clive Field said during the sentencing hearing.

The maps marked the discovery of new lands, traced wars and peace treaties, new settlements and disappearances of people, said David Ferriero of the New York Public Library.

"I am here today to talk about the actions of a thief _ a thief who assaulted history, betrayed personal trust and caused irreparable loss of treasures whose value to future scholarship will now never be known," Ferriero said.

Field and other librarians said Smiley stole world treasures, hurt staff morale, mutilated the maps, harmed scholars who count on the documents, and shattered the trust that is essential between libraries and their patrons.

Smiley sought a sentence of up to three years, saying his extensive cooperation with authorities led to the recovery of most of the maps.

"It is not a slap on the wrist," said Richard Reeve, Smiley's attorney.

Baton Rouge Woman Pleads Guilty In FEMA Fraud Counts (BRADV)

Baton Rouge Advocate, September 28, 2006

A Baton Rouge woman pleaded guilty Tuesday in federal court to two counts of fraud related to hurricane disaster relief programs.

Keosha Martin, 24, pleaded guilty to making two false and fraudulent claims to the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

According to the indictment, Martin was employed by FEMA between October 2005 and November 2005 as an applicant assistant whose duties included assisting disaster victims in applying for benefits.

DOJ_NMG_0070419

At the time, Martin filed a claim on her behalf for damage from Hurricane Katrina and later filed a claim for damage from Hurricane Rita.

Martin could be sentenced to 10 years in prison, a $500,000 fine or both, per count.

The number of people who have been charged in the Baton Rouge based Middle District of Louisiana with violations related to hurricane disaster relief funds stands at 74.

In September 2005, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales formed the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force to deter, investigate and prosecute disaster-related crimes such as charity fraud, identity theft, procurement fraud and insurance fraud. The task force includes the FBI, the U.S. Inspectors General community, the U.S. Secret Service, the U.S. Postal Inspection Service, the Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys and others.

FEMA Workers Charged With Fraud (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

Two Hurricane Katrina recovery workers hired last year by the Federal Emergency Management Agency have been charged with trying to defraud the government by filing a false claim for damage to a houseboat, which resulted in an award of $25,500 in disaster assistance. One of the FEMA employees, Duane Adams, claimed to own the houseboat in Moss Point, Miss., and the other, Emily Fuqua, helped Mr. Adams file the false claim. The two, who worked in clerical administration and disaster recovery programs, have been placed on unpaid leave, a FEMA official said.

'It's Over,' Says Ex-prosecutor (DEN)

By Paul Egan, The Detroit News

Detroit News, September 28, 2006

DETROIT -- Former Macomb County Prosecutor Carl Marlinga burst into tears, embraced his wife, Barbara, and whispered, "It's over," after a federal jury acquitted him Wednesday of public corruption charges.

Marlinga, 59, who loudly proclaimed his innocence even before the federal government indicted him on bribery and fraud charges in 2004, was ecstatic but not bitter after the jury forewoman read the words "not guilty" five times.

"I'm speechless, probably for the first time in my life," Marlinga told reporters immediately after the verdict. "I want to thank God, I want to thank my wife, and I want to thank two of the greatest lawyers and friends that I could have ever met."

Marlinga, who was represented by Mark Kriger and N.C. Deday LaRene, said he ignored his lawyers' advice when he repeatedly agreed to be interviewed by investigators and twice testified before a federal grand jury investigating his conduct. At his trial, Marlinga found his own words forming a central part of the government's case.

Now a lawyer in private practice, Marlinga would not rule out a return to politics. His future could test whether a politician, once cleared, can cleanse the stain of an indictment and return to public life.

It also represents the latest in a series of setbacks for the federal government in high profile cases in Detroit.

The case is another prominent defeat for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Detroit.

The government does not appeal jury acquittals in criminal cases. "We respect the jury's decision, I congratulate Mr. Marlinga's attorneys on the defense, and we're moving on," said U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy.

Marlinga, a Democrat who served nearly 20 years as Macomb County prosecutor, was accused of giving favorable treatment to the accused in two sexual assault cases in return for campaign donations in 2001 and 2002, when he ran unsuccessfully for a seat in Congress.

The government's case was based largely on circumstantial evidence related to the proximity in timing between campaign donations from advocates for the accused, and Marlinga's actions and promises in connection with the cases. In addition to Marlinga's statements, the government relied on taped telephone calls between Marlinga and Warren businessman Ralph Roberts, who routinely taped his own business calls.

Roberts, who believed Jeffrey Moldowan was wrongly convicted of a brutal 1991 sexual assault and was pushing Marlinga to help get Moldowan a new trial, donated $2,000 to Marlinga's congressional campaign and promised additional fund-raising help. But Roberts, who was briefly charged with bribery before the charges were dropped, maintained there was nothing incriminating if his conversations with Marlinga were heard in their entirety.

DOJ_NMG_0070420

Prosecutors and investigators "should be filled with regret for what they've done," Roberts said Wednesday. "They were just trying to further their careers by bringing down a politician and a prominent businessman in Macomb County."

Robert Cares and Jonathan Tukel, the assistant U.S. attorneys who prosecuted the case, were not available for comment after the verdict. But Murphy said his office strives to do the right thing in all cases and commended the efforts of those involved in the Marlinga case.

"We will continue to investigate allegations of public corruption and we will prosecute when the facts and evidence warrants," Murphy said.

Murphy rejected the view that Marlinga's acquittal represents the latest in a series of defeats by his office, including a botched terrorism case prosecuted shortly after the attacks of Sept. 11 and a massive Detroit police corruption prosecution that resulted in the dropping of most charges against police officers indicted and a raft of legal actions by those the indicted officers had arrested.

Murphy noted the recent successful prosecution by his office of former Detroit city councilman Alonzo (Lonnie) Bates on public corruption charges.

"We've had a strong record of success, especially in the last two years," Murphy said. "Any prosecutor's office is not going to win 100 percent of the time."

Marlinga's trial before U.S. District Judge Victoria Roberts began Sept. 12. A jury of 10 women and two men began deliberating Tuesday morning and signaled they had reached a verdict at about 2:40 p.m. Wednesday.

Marlinga was acquitted of two counts of bribery, one count of wire fraud, one count of making false statements to the Federal Election Commission, and one count of exceeding campaign contribution limits. He faced up to 20 years in prison if convicted.

Macomb County Prosecutor Eric Smith, who succeeded Marlinga, said he could not be happier for his former supervisor.

"We, as in our office, have been very supportive of Carl," said Smith, adding he did not think Marlinga's prosecution would leave any lasting scars on his office.

Marlinga said he felt no bitterness toward the authorities and commended for their diligence the FBI and Michigan State Police officers involved in the case. But he expressed disappointment in that the U.S. Attorney's Office chose to bring the charges after both he and Roberts passed polygraph tests.

"As a prosecutor, I know that sometimes you make mistakes," Marlinga said.

Marlinga acknowledged he sometimes changed his positions -- which itself was an issue in his criminal case, and said, "I wasn't the smartest politician, but I always prided myself on my integrity."

To him, only a charge such as child sexual abuse could be worse than being charged with public corruption, Marlinga said.

"The emotional cost was incalculable," he said. "It was the worst thing I've ever gone through in my entire life."

Marlinga said his decision to give so many voluntary statements to authorities may not have been wise and he would not recommend such a move to his own clients, but he said he does not regret what he did.

"You can't have too much truth," he said. "Eventually, the truth of what you are saying has got to rise to the top."

Among those surrounding Marlinga after the verdict were his wife, stepsons John and Michael, and his sister-in-law, Donna Nicholson, who pushed a rosary into Marlinga's hand to hold while he awaited the verdict.

"This is as sweet as it gets," said Kriger, Marlinga's co-counsel.

Detroit News Staff Writer Santiago Esparza contributed to this report. You can reach Paul Egan at (313) 222-2069 or pegan@detnews.com.

MARLINGA ACQUITTED: 'Thank God' For The Verdict (FREEP)

By Amber Hunt And David Ashenfelter, Free Press Staff Writers

Detroit Free Press, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070421

Ex-prosecutor overjoyed

With the first "not guilty," former Macomb County Prosecutor Carl Marlinga bent his head forward and began to cry softly.

By the time the jury forewoman said those words for the fifth time -- acquitting Marlinga of all federal corruption charges that have dogged him for two years -- he sobbed.

"I'm speechless for probably the first time in my life," Marlinga, still tearful, said after spectators left the courtroom.

But he wasn't.

"I want to thank God, my wife and two of the greatest lawyers and friends I could ever have in my life," Marlinga said, referring to defense lawyers Mark Kriger and N.C. Deday LaRene. "They just didn't stop working on the case."

Marlinga, 59, had faced up to 10 years in prison and $250,000 in fines for allegedly swapping prosecutorial favors in two rape cases for contributions to his failed 2002 congressional campaign. The five charges included two counts of bribery, deprivation of honest services, making false statements to the Federal Elections Commission and exceeding campaign contribution limits.

The charges derailed Marlinga's political career, causing the popular Macomb County Democrat to step aside shortly after the indictment was issued in April 2004, after 20 years as the county's chief prosecutor.

As they filed out of the courthouse, jurors said federal prosecutors weren't convincing.

"We felt the government didn't prove its case and Mr. Marlinga's attorneys did," said jury forewoman Mary Shultz of Rochester.

"There were way too many loose ends," said juror Megan Bowman, an Ortonville homemaker. "There wasn't a whole puzzle."

Jurors said it took two days to reach a verdict because they carefully reviewed the evidence to make sure they weren't overlooking anything.

Bowman and juror Sue Kramer, a Rochester teacher, said the single best witness was Marlinga, who convinced jurors that he was honorable and ethical. They said he did the right thing when he intervened in one of the rape cases -- that of Jeffrey Moldowan, who was convicted in 1991 of raping and mutilating an ex-girlfriend.

"We all felt that it was the greatest thing that Carl Marlinga got on the stand," Kramer added. "You could get a real sense of who he is and what was in his heart."

Marlinga, reversing his office's long-standing position on the Moldowan case, filed a brief in January 2002 to the Michigan Supreme Court citing discredited bite-mark evidence and new witnesses that ultimately led to Moldowan's 2003 retrial and acquittal.

Prosecutors said that because Marlinga accepted contributions from Ralph Roberts -- a Warren real estate broker and Moldowan supporter -- just days before the brief was filed, Roberts had bought Marlinga's prosecutorial influence.

They also accused him of accepting $26,000 from defense lawyer Dennis Johnston -- including $4,000 prosecutors said was funneled through then-state Senate candidate James Barcia, a Bay City Democrat -- while discussing possible plea deals for one of Johnston's clients. The client, James Hulet, was accused of drugging and raping a teenage girl.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Cares, who said during the trial that Marlinga's political ambition caused him to sell his influence, declined comment. His cocounsel, Jonathan Tukel, said later: "We always respect the jury's verdict."

U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy said it was a difficult case and congratulated Marlinga's lawyers.

Although the office had a string of high-visibility losses in the months before Murphy took the helm in 2005, he said: "No prosecutor's office in America will or should have a 100% batting average. We strive to do the right thing in every case."

Kriger gave Marlinga a hearty hug after the verdicts were announced.

"This is as sweet as it gets," Kriger said. "Ninety-nine percent of the time, the jury gets it right," he said, adding that Wednesday's verdict was one of those times.

As soon as the verdicts were read, a sobbing Marlinga reached behind him to clutch his wife of 13 years, Barbara, who doubled over in tears.

"I kept telling her to have confidence in the system," Marlinga told reporters as he and his wife continued to cry.

Barbara Marlinga hugged her two sons -- Marlinga's stepsons -- and said, "I can finally sleep tonight!"

DOJ_NMG_0070422

She managed to get through the ordeal, she said, because strangers frequently said they were pulling for Marlinga.

Marlinga said the case took a huge toll on his family and that it will leave him with a substantial legal bill, even though his lawyers gave him a discounted rate to represent him in the case because they believed in his innocence.

If he could do anything over again, Marlinga said, he would never have gone to the Dec. 18, 2001, Christmas party where he ran into Roberts and asked him to contribute to his campaign. Marlinga said in trial that he also promised to update Roberts on the Moldowan case.

Shortly after learning of the verdict, Roberts -- who initially had been indicted alongside Barcia before charges were dropped against both of them last summer -- said he was thrilled Marlinga was cleared.

"The jury was the hero for the Roberts family and the Marlinga family today," Roberts said. "This was four years of reckless destruction."

Thomas Cranmer, a former assistant U.S. attorney and prominent criminal defense lawyer, said the legal community kept close watch on the two-week trial.

"The case was hard-fought in terms of there certainly being a dogged prosecution and a vigorous defense as well," Cranmer said. "The system does work. The prosecution didn't prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. That's the message you take from the verdict."

The Michigan State Police and the FBI began investigating Marlinga in late 2002. The investigation prompted Marlinga to drop out of the 2004 prosecutor's race, ending his 20-year run as a top vote-getter in Macomb County.

He proclaimed his innocence and said his faith in being acquitted never wavered. Some Macomb County residents said their belief in him also never wavered.

Sheriff Mark Hackel described the case as absurd.

"Carl does not have a criminal bone in his body. It was absurd to even think about -- or fathom -- Carl committing some kind of crime," Hackel said Wednesday night.

"

Marlinga praised FBI Agent Ronald Loch and Michigan State Police Detective Sgt. David Kelly for their work, but he said federal prosecutors chose to believe only part of the truth.

Macomb County Prosecutor Eric Smith said his office is happy that Marlinga, his former boss, can move on.

"This has been hanging over their heads in excess of four years," Smith said.

Besides potential prison time and fines, Marlinga also would have lost his license to practice law, which he's been doing privately since he stepped out of public office.

Judgment For Marlinga (FREEP)

Detroit Free Press, September 28, 2006

Carl Marlinga may have exercised poor judgment or been naive about how things would look, but a federal court jury decided Wednesday that the former Macomb County prosecutor was not guilty of a crime. The verdict clearing him on five corruption charges rewarded Marlinga's faith in a system that he served pretty well for 20 years.

The allegations that he swapped favors in criminal cases for contributions to a failed congressional campaign effectively ended Marlinga's political career.

But he has always been a pretty straight shooter as a public official and took the witness stand to declare his innocence with the same earnest demeanor that made him a favorite of Macomb County voters. This time, Marlinga got all the votes he needed.

Figure In New Orleans Corruption Probe Avoids Prison (AP)

AP, September 28, 2006

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — A figure in a federal investigation targeting corruption in the New Orleans transit authority was put on three years of probation on Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0070423

John S. Keller pleaded guilty in August 2005 to failing to report a felony. U.S. District Judge Ginger Berrigan also ordered him to perform 200 hours of community service and pay $10,000 in restitution to the Regional Transit Authority, along with a $5,000 fine.

Keller was the business partner of Glenn Haydel, who pleaded guilty in May to stealing $550,000 from the RTA. Haydel, the brother of former Mayor Marc Morial's mother, had a lucrative consulting contract with RTA when Morial served two terms.

Haydel admitted to diverting $550,000 from an RTA trust account to his own company and then taking $350,000 for his personal use. Cancellation of Haydel's contract was one of Mayor Ray Nagin's first acts after he took office in 2002.

The federal investigation also has targeted other aspects of City Hall during the Morial years. Three men with close ties to Morial — businessman Stan "Pampy" Barre and Reginald Walker, along with former city property manager Kerry DeCay — face charges stemming from the largest city contract let during Morial's tenure.

The three are accused of orchestrating a plan to skim hundreds of thousands of dollars from a $65 million contract to upgrade energy-related fixtures in city buildings. All three have pleaded not guilty and are awaiting trial.

Morial, now head of the National Urban League, has not been accused of wrongdoing.

On Sept. 21, another member of Morial's inner circle, political consultant William Schultz, agreed to plead guilty to federal tax charges and pay nearly $187,000 in back taxes, including levies on money he made from companies run by Barre and Walker.

Under terms of that deal with prosecutors, Schultz faces a year in prison, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said.

Feds Ask Judge To Shield Evidence In Probe Of Fumo, Nonprofit (SCCD)

By Maryclaire Dale

The State College Centre Daily, September 28, 2006

PHILADELPHIA - The federal grand jury investigating whether state Sen. Vincent Fumo extorted corporate donations for a charity in his district should wrap up its work by February, prosecutors disclosed Wednesday.

"The grand jury is sorting out potential defendants, potential charges," Assistant U.S. Attorney John Pease said at a hearing in a related case. "It's at a very sensitive stage."

Two ex-Senate staffers, computer technicians Mark C. Eister and Leonard P. Luchko, are charged with obstructing the investigation by deleting years worth of e-mail about Fumo's ties to the charity from office and other computers.

Prosecutors managed to recover much of it, however, and told the presiding judge they have gathered 100,000 pages worth of e-mails.

At the hearing Wednesday, they asked the judge to order defense lawyers to keep under lock and key the e-mails, grand jury transcripts and other evidence that prosecutors must turn over to the defense.

Some of it involves "scandalous" and perhaps criminal information about numerous third parties who may never be charged, Pease said.

"If these interviews and grand jury transcripts fall in the hands of someone who wants to write a (news) story, it's going to cause extreme embarrassment," Pease argued.

Defense lawyers promised not to distribute the material to third parties but objected to the demand from prosecutors that they keep a log of everyone who sees it and swear those people to secrecy.

"I'm just worried I'm going to get in trouble," said defense lawyer Brian McMonagle, who represents Eister.

U.S. District Judge William H. Yohn Jr. asked the sides to try to narrow the scope of the documents that would come under a protection order, and scheduled a telephone conference with lawyers on Monday.

Defense lawyers argue that prosecutors themselves have courted the press, with dramatic pre-dawn arrests and the public filing of a 65-page FBI affidavit that spells out the focus on Fumo and includes colorful e-mail excerpts about the senator.

"From the outset of this case, the government has used its power and the media to isolate and embarrass Luchko in an attempt to scare him into testifying," defense lawyer James C. Schwartzman wrote in opposing the government's secrecy motion.

DOJ_NMG_0070424

Luchko and Eister are the only people charged to date in the investigation of the Philadelphia power-broker. Federal authorities are investigating whether Fumo extorted millions in corporate donations for Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods and used the South Philadelphia charity for political purposes, according to an FBI affidavit.

A call to Sprague & Sprague, the law firm that represents Fumo, rang unanswered after business hours Wednesday.

Prosecutors - in a heightening war of words - have also suggested that the technicians' lawyers are more concerned with protecting Fumo than their clients, and question who is paying their fees.

The Senate paid the legal costs of Luchko and Eister until June, when they were indicted.

Since then, a trust fund has been set up by unnamed "independent trustees and a well-respected Philadelphia law firm," to pay to defend Luchko and other former Senate staffers, Schwartzman disclosed in a recent court filing.

Prosecutors want to know just who controls those purse strings.

"The revelation ... cries out for investigation by the court," they wrote. A hearing on the conflict-of-interest question is set for Oct. 12.

Luchko, 50, of Collingdale, is charged with 30 criminal counts, including conspiracy, destroying evidence and obstructing a federal investigation. Eister, 36, of Camp Hill, faces five counts.

They have repeatedly offered to cooperate but want immunity, a condition that prosecutors reject, according to defense filings.

Yohn has scheduled a Jan. 8 trial date, but the date could be postponed, the judge suggested Wednesday.

Judge Bars Full Gag On Fumo Case Info (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 28, 2006

A federal judge yesterday ordered prosecutors and defense attorneys to work out a dispute over whether to disclose some evidence in the case of two former computer aides to Sen. Vince Fumo who are charged with obstructing a federal probe of Fumo.

U.S. Senior District Judge William H. Yohn Jr. said he would not grant prosecutors a blanket order prohibiting defense attorneys from disclosing information in the case.

He told prosecutors and defense attorneys to accommodate each other's concerns over the next few days and report to him on Monday.

At a hearing yesterday, Assistant U.S. Attorney John Pease said the feds wanted to safeguard the privacy of witnesses and make sure an ongoing grand-jury investigation is not compromised.

At issue are summaries of FBI and IRS interviews with witnesses, grand-jury transcripts and two search-warrant affidavits that have been filed under seal.

"We think the defense counsel should have that under discovery obligations," Pease said, "but some of it is scandalous, even criminal, and would be extremely embarrassing to the persons involved" if it were made public.

Prosecutors have not yet turned over all the evidence they have accumulated against the two ex-Senate aides, Leonard Luchko and Mark Eister, but they must deliver it soon.

Pease identified 15 interview summaries by investigators, nine grand-jury transcripts and two search-warrant affidavits that prosecutors don't want to appear in newspaper stories.

One suggestion was for defense attorneys to keep a log of people they interview and then get them to sign an affidavit that they won't divulge any information to a third party.

But James C. Schwartzman, attorney for Luchko, said that could restrict his ability to prepare a defense.

"If we have to get people to sign a document, I know we'll get little cooperation," he said.

He also asked for a delay in the trial start date, now slated for January.

Yohn permitted the Daily News and Inquirer to weigh in on the government's motion.

Michael Baughman, a lawyer representing the two papers, argued against any order that would restrict access to discovery materials.

DOJ_NMG_0070425

He said that unless the feds could show that disclosure would result in "intensified pain" to third parties, the public's right to know outweighed privacy interests of witnesses, especially if they are public employees and the case involves allegations of public corruption.

"This has to be done on a document-by-document basis, and there has to be a finding of intensified pain," he said.

Luchko and Eister are charged with deleting Fumo's e-mails to thwart the federal investigation of the senator. Both have pleaded not guilty.

The feds have been investigating Fumo since 2003 to determine whether he committed extortion when he solicited contributions for the Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, a nonprofit organization with ties to Fumo, and whether he used any of the contributions to benefit himself personally or politically.

Fumo has denied any wrongdoing.

Prosecutor Says U.S. Probe Of Fumo To End This Year (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 28, 2006

The three-year federal corruption and extortion investigation of State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo should be resolved by Christmas, a prosecutor said yesterday.

"We're nearing a conclusion," Assistant U.S. Attorney John Pease said during a related court hearing. The case, he said, is at "a sensitive stage."

Authorities have been investigating whether the powerful Democrat illegally used a South Philadelphia nonprofit for political or personal gain.

In May, two former Senate computer technicians were charged with obstruction of justice for allegedly deleting e-mails as part of an effort to thwart the FBI and IRS probe. Leonard Luchko and Mark Eister have pleaded not guilty and are scheduled for trial Jan. 8.

During a pretrial hearing in their case yesterday, Pease said that he expected the Fumo investigation to conclude before the Luchko and Eister trial begins. Grand juries typically do not meet in late December.

U.S. District Judge William H. Yohn Jr. convened yesterday's hearing to hear arguments on a proposed order that prosecutors said is necessary to prevent leaks to the media.

As part of the routine pretrial discovery process, prosecutors are poised to disclose hundreds of FBI and IRS reports and thousands of pages of grand jury transcripts to Luchko's and Eister's lawyers. Such material contains "shocking, scandalous... embarrassing" information about people who may never be charged in the case, Pease said, and should remain confidential.

To support this assertion, Pease said he had prepared a sealed 10-page document, which he said contained 26 examples of potentially embarrassing disclosures - detailed in 15 FBI investigative reports, nine grand jury transcripts, and two search warrants, including one executed at Fumo's district offices in Philadelphia.

Yohn indicated that he didn't need to review the 10-page document - at least not yet.

Lawyers for Luchko and Eister - as well as a lawyer for The Inquirer and Philadelphia Daily News - opposed the so-called protective order, which would require anyone with access to the material to swear not to divulge its contents, except to prepare for trial.

Lawyers James Schwartzman and Brian McMonagle said such an order would make it difficult to prepare a defense, because people identified in the material - especially potential witnesses - would be reluctant to sign such an agreement.

Michael Baughman, a lawyer for the newspapers, cited a 1994 decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit in Philadelphia that says protective orders are less appropriate in situations involving public figures or public issues.

Yohn did not rule yesterday. He urged the lawyers involved to compromise.

2 Ad Men Admit Pay-to-play Scheme (PHI)

By George Anastasia

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070426

A former advertising-company executive and a consultant for that company each pleaded guilty to fraud charges yesterday, bringing an end to one phase of an ongoing federal corruption investigation at Philadelphia International Airport.

Joseph Evans, 51, the former chief executive officer of Sky Sites Inc., and Joseph Moderski, 69, a consultant, entered their pleas during hearings before U.S. District Judge James T. Giles.

Evans, under terms of a plea agreement, pleaded guilty to one count of mail fraud. Moderski pleaded guilty to conspiracy, mail fraud and wire fraud.

Both men are to be sentenced in January.

Evans and Moderski were charged in a pay-to-play scheme in which they conspired to funnel money out of the company to finance illegal campaign contributions to Mayor Street.

The mayor has not been charged with any wrongdoing, but his office was briefly bugged by the FBI as part of a broad corruption probe that focused on city contracts, campaign contributions, and allegations of quid-pro-quo arrangements between elected officials and businessmen.

Evans and Moderski were charged in a scheme in which money was siphoned out of Sky Sites and its parent company, JCDecaux, to cover the cost of campaign contributions Moderski and others made to Street's campaign.

It is illegal for corporations to make such contributions.

The government alleged that Moderski orchestrated the plan, claiming that the contributions would help the company win new advertising contracts and retain existing contracts at the airport.

JCDecaux specializes in indoor, back-lit advertising displays in airport terminals throughout the world.

Two others charged in the case, former Sky Sites vice president Eric Selby, and architect Terry Crockett, who did subcontracting work for the company, had entered guilty pleas earlier and were cooperating with the government.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Joan L. Markman, in outlining the charges against Moderski and Evans, told Giles that the scheme involved a $10,000 "sham bonus" paid to Moderski in August 2000 and a phony $30,000 payment to Crockett in 2001.

The bonus payment was made to cover a $10,000 contribution Moderski had made to Street's campaign, Markman said. The $30,000 invoice for work that was never done was used to cover contributions of $10,000 each made by Selby, Crockett and Moderski to a PAC run by Ronald A. White, one of Street's chief fund-raisers.

White was indicted in a broader racketeering case. He died before his case came to trial.

Evans pleaded guilty yesterday to one count of mail fraud filed this week as part of a plea agreement. In exchange, prosecutors agreed to drop three additional charges.

Moderski, on the other handed, pleaded guilty to conspiracy, wire fraud and mail fraud - charges contained in the original indictment handed up against him and Evans earlier this year.

Markman would not comment on whether the government had tried to negotiate a plea agreement with Moderski, a Bryn Mawr-based political and business consultant.

"The investigation is continuing," she said when asked about the status of the corruption probe at the airport.

Polygamist Sect Leader Will Stay Jailed (AP)

By Jennifer Dobner, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 28, 2006

(ST. GEORGE, Utah (AP) -- Polygamist sect leader Warren Jeffs, a fugitive for nearly two years, appeared in a Utah courtroom Wednesday and said he was willing to wait several weeks for a judge to decide whether to send him to trial on charges of arranging an underage marriage.

"Yes, sir. Yes, your honor," Jeffs replied when Judge James Shumate asked if the delay was acceptable.

The judge set a Nov. 21 probable cause hearing and said he would address Jeffs' bond status at that time. He remains in jail.

The hearing lasted less than 10 minutes for the self-proclaimed prophet who heads the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. Jeffs is charged with two counts of rape as an accomplice, a first-degree felony that carries life in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0070427

Under his suit, tie and white shirt, Jeffs was wearing a bulletproof vest. There was tight security inside and outside the Washington County courthouse, including SWAT teams.

Prosecutors claim Jeffs, 50, forced a teenage girl to enter a spiritual marriage with an older man and submit to sex to produce children.

The girl twice told Jeffs she didn't want to marry or have sex, but was told it was her "spiritual duty" to submit because the marriage had been arranged by God, according to court filings.

"The victim is doing well," Brian Filter, chief deputy county attorney, said outside court, adding that he expects the victim will testify at the hearing.

Defense attorney Walter Bugden said "absolutely" when reporters asked if this was religious persecution.

"Let's wait until we can have a trial in this matter before we jump to the conclusion that Mr. Jeffs is guilty of anything," Bugden said.

Named to the FBI's 10 Most Wanted list in May, Jeffs was arrested last month during a traffic stop near Las Vegas. He had been a fugitive for nearly two years.

Jeffs, who took over the leadership of the church from his father in 2002, is also facing two felony charges in Arizona for a similarly arranged marriage. He'll face those charges after the Utah case.

A lawyer who has represented members of Jeffs' sect said before the hearing that finding a jury with impartial — or even mild — views on polygamy may be difficult in Washington County.

"There's a real skepticism brought to bear on their claims," said Rod Parker, who believes sect members are perceived differently than other clients he's defended. "It's very subtle, but it's there."

For nearly 100 years, members of the sect, which numbers nearly 10,000, have lived a quiet, insular life in the border towns of Hildale, Utah, and Colorado City, Ariz. The sect broke away from the Mormon church more than a century ago and has been disavowed by The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

Parker represented Rodney Holm, a Hildale police officer convicted of bigamy in 2003, and last year tried unsuccessfully to persuade the Utah Supreme Court to keep a polygamist judge on the bench.

In the Holm case, questionnaires that asked about polygamy revealed a strong bias among prospective jurors, said Parker, who is not acting as Jeffs' attorney.

"I thought going into it, that being in southern Utah where people had a little more interaction with the fundamentalists, that it would be better," he said. "We were surprised."

Whether prosecutors state it or not, polygamy will be an underlying factor at Jeffs' trial, said John Bucher, who represented a client on charges of bigamy and child rape in 2001 in a different county.

"I don't think you can say, 'The perpetrator is a member of a polygamist organization,' and try to separate that out from the crime in the jurors' mind," Bucher said.

Jeffs' Attorney Says Case Is 'religious Persecution' (SGS)

By PATRICE ST. GERMAIN

St. George Spectrum, September 28, 2006

ST. GEORGE – Warren Jeffs' attorney Walter Bugden said his client views the case against him as religious persecution.

"Absolutely," Bugden said in response to the question.

Bugden, along with his partner Tara Isaacson, Las Vegas attorney Richard Wright and investigator Doug Maack, appeared in court for Jeffs' scheduling conference this morning.

The court appearance lasted less then five minutes. Following his court appearance Jeffs met with his attorneys before Bugden gave a brief statement to the media outside the courtroom.

"We're going to have a preliminary hearing, with one step at a time. We intend to confront the witnesses against us and there will be cross-examination at the preliminary hearing," Budgen said.

The preliminary hearing has been scheduled for 8:30 a.m. on Nov. 21.

DOJ_NMG_0070428

Jeffs, the self-proclaimed prophet of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, faces two first-degree felony charges of rape as an accomplice in Utah.

He is also charged with several counts of sexual conduct with a minor and conspiracy to commit sexual conduct with a minor in Mohave County, Ariz.

Bugden said he cannot represent Jeffs in Arizona but that Jeffs has retained council for the charges against him there. He said he does not know who that attorney is.

Jeffs In Jail Until November (DESERET)

By Ben Winslow, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, September 28, 2006

FLDS leader waives right to have hearing within 30 days

ST. GEORGE — Captured polygamist leader Warren Jeffs said he is willing to remain in jail until his preliminary hearing in November.

"Is it all right with you?" Shumate asked.

"Yes," Jeffs said softly, nodding his head in agreement.

Appearing in person, Jeffs was brought in under heavy security. The Fundamentalist LDS Church leader wore a crisp black suit, a starch-white dress shirt and a white tie. Underneath, a bullet-proof vest was faintly visible.

Jeffs was flanked by his defense lawyers. There were so many of them, the judge had to ask deputies to move to accommodate them.

"Mr. Bailiff, would you step over just to the side of Mr. Jeffs there so Mr. Bugden can have a spot?" Shumate asked, waving a Washington County sheriff's deputy over. Jeffs was surrounded by deputies.

Outside the courtroom, deputies carrying assault rifles were standing guard. The St. George Police Department deployed its SWAT team outside the courthouse.

During the seven-minute hearing, the judge set a preliminary hearing for Nov. 21, when he will also review the issue of bail. The judge said it was "troublesome" that Jeffs had remained behind bars for so long without bail being addressed.

The courtroom was packed with news reporters, investigators, observers, ex-FLDS members and even a pair of Jeffs' faithful followers. As Jeffs was being led out the courtroom, his brother Nephi Jeffs and FLDS member Lindsey Barlow stood in what appeared to be a show of respect for their prophet.

The men bolted from the courthouse after the hearing, refusing to answer reporters' questions.

Ezra Draper, who left the FLDS Church several years ago, said he wanted to see Jeffs for himself.

"The ironic thing about this situation is that he will have the opportunity to present his defense," Draper said. "In his administration in the FLDS Church, people were tried without a trial, found guilty and cast away."

Jeffs is accused of purging dozens of people from within the FLDS Church in Hildale, Utah, and Colorado City, Ariz., re-assigning polygamous wives and children to other families. It was allegations of child-bride marriages to older men that began putting him under intense focus of law enforcement.

A representative from the U.S. Attorney's Office in Utah was also in the courtroom Wednesday, observing the proceedings.

"We remain interested in the case. We're preserving the options that we may have," U.S. Attorney's spokeswoman Melodie Rydalch told the Deseret Morning News as she left the courthouse.

Federal prosecutors have refused to drop an unlawful flight to avoid prosecution warrant against Jeffs and have threatened to indict him on it should he be granted bail.

Jeffs, 50, is charged here with two counts of rape as an accomplice, a first-degree felony. He is accused of forcing an underage girl into a polygamous marriage with an older man. When she objected, prosecutors allege the FLDS leader threatened her "salvation."

The girl, identified in court papers only as "Jane Doe IV" will testify at the preliminary hearing in November.

"The victim is doing well. She is looking forward to testifying and looking forward to having her day in court," said deputy Washington County attorney Brian Filter.

DOJ_NMG_0070429

Prosecutors have told the Deseret Morning News they are screening more possible charges against Jeffs. Filter said it is also possible Jane Doe IV's husband could also face rape charges.

Sarah Ause, Deseret Morning News

Wally Bugden, Warren Jeffs' defense lawyer, is questioned by the press after a hearing Wednesday. "There is a possibility he will be charged," he said Wednesday.

Defense lawyers suggested this may be a case of religious persecution against Jeffs and his followers.

"Absolutely," attorney Wally Bugden said to that question as he left the courthouse after meeting behind closed doors with the judge.

Moving quickly through a throng of reporters, Bugden said he will vigorously defend Jeffs.

"We're going to have a preliminary hearing, just one step at a time. We intend to confront the witnesses against us and there will be cross-examination at the preliminary hearing," he said.

Jeffs was on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted list until he was arrested during a traffic stop outside Las Vegas last month.

Warren Jeffs Trial: Witness Set To Testify In Rape Case (SLT)

By Brooke Adams, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, September 28, 2006

Polygamist leader in courtroom; preliminary hearing set in November

ST. GEORGE - The state's key witness in the case against polygamous sect leader Warren S. Jeffs will testify in court for the first time during a day-long hearing set for mid-November.

At the Nov. 21 preliminary hearing, the young woman identified only as Jane Doe No. 4 is expected to describe her assigned marriage to an older man she alleges later raped her, as well as Jeffs' alleged instructions that she submit "mind, body and soul" to her husband.

Based on that and other evidence offered by the state, 5th District Judge James L. Shumate will decide whether there is enough evidence to believe Jeffs committed a crime and should be tried.

The woman, who was between 14 and 18 at the time of her spiritual marriage, is looking forward to her day in court, according to Brian Filter, spokesman for the Washington County Attorney's Office.

He also said other witnesses and evidence will be presented.

Jeffs uttered a single word Wednesday during a six-minute scheduling hearing attended by a few supporters and curious onlookers. He has previously appeared via videolink from the Purgatory Correctional Facility, where he has been incarcerated since Sept. 5.

Unshackled and wearing a suit, white dress shirt and white tie - and a bullet-proof vest beneath his clothes - Jeffs was brought into the courtroom from a rear hallway.

He warmly shook hands with his legal team, quietly exchanging greetings with Las Vegas attorney Richard A. Wright and the Salt Lake attorneys Walter F. Bugden and Tara Isaacson.

The 50-year-old polygamist softly answered, "Yes," when Shumate asked if he was willing to postpone his preliminary hearing to November.

Jeffs faces two first-degree felony charges of being an accomplice to rape for allegedly conducting the spiritual marriage between the girl and a then-28-year-old man. The charges are punishable by five years to life in prison.

Washington County Prosecutor Brock Belnap

Advertisement

has not said when the crime occurred. If reported to police, rape charges may be brought up to eight years later.

That deadline may be put on hold if a defendant moves out of Utah and then resume if he or she later returns.

Belnap has said previously the state has not brought rape charges against the woman's husband - who also has not been publicly identified - for strategic reasons, but may do so in the future.

Jeffs, arrested during a traffic stop on I-15 north of Las Vegas on Aug. 28 after a year as a fugitive, is the leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

The sect is based in the twin cities of Colorado City, Ariz., and Hildale, Utah.

Shumate said Wednesday he was troubled that Jeffs has not had a bail hearing, but Bugden said he will raise the issue later.

Two FLDS members attended the hearing: Nephi Jeffs, a younger brother of and secretary to the sect leader, and Lindsay Barlow, who runs a moving crew that helps relocate families within the FLDS.

Leaving the courthouse amid a swarm of journalists, Bugden responded to a shouted question about whether this is a case of religious persecution.

"Absolutely," he said. "Let's wait until we can have a trial in this matter before people jump to the conclusion that he's guilty."

Judge Urged Not To Release Intel Reports (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

The Associated Press, September 27, 2006

Federal prosecutors went into a private hearing Wednesday to urge a judge not to release sensitive intelligence reports at the upcoming trial of a former White House aide.

Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, wants to use President Bush's daily terrorism briefings as evidence at his obstruction and perjury trial in January.

Libby says the records from 2003 and early 2004 will show he did not lie to investigators about his role in the leak of a CIA officer's identity. He contends he had important things on his mind and may have forgotten details about the leak.

Prosecutors and defense lawyers will not discuss the contents of the classified briefing summaries. But the dates overlap with the military's hunt for Iraq's Saddam Hussein, the death of his two sons, and continuing discussions about nuclear programs in North Korea and Iran.

The documents also contain information about covert operations and informants. The details are so sensitive that they are not released even to many intelligence officials.

Shortly before the hearing was to begin, the courthouse was evacuated because a suspicious package was discovered outside the building. That left Fitzgerald and Libby, along with several other lawyers in the case, to wait outside with more than 100 others.

The package turned out to contain a homeless person's clothes.

After the private hearing, which was expected to stretch into next week, U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton will decide what information Libby should be allowed to use as evidence. Walton then will hold a second round of hearings to decide whether to black out or summarize the records.

Intelligence officials still can refuse to declassify the documents, even in the blacked-out form Walton orders. That refusal could lead to the case being dismissed.

Prosecutors have said that is precisely Libby's plan. Requesting classified data in an effort to sabotage a case is a legal tactic known as graymail.

Libby is the only person charged in Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald's three-year, $1.4 million investigation into the leak of Valerie Plame's identity. Nobody was charged with violating the law by discussing her job with the CIA, but authorities say Libby lied about his discussions with reporters regarding Plame.

Plame's husband, Joseph Wilson, criticized the Bush administration's intelligence leading up to the Iraq war. The couple has accused Libby and others of leaking Plame's identity as retribution.

House Suspends Hill Telecom License (WP)

By James V. Grimaldi

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

House leaders have suspended a multimillion-dollar wireless communications license that federal prosecutors say was corruptly awarded to a Dulles telecommunications firm by Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) in exchange for gifts from lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

DOJ_NMG_0070431

The award of the license was one of a series of acts that Ney said he performed for Abramoff in exchange for campaign contributions, expensive meals, luxury travel and sports tickets. Ney agreed this month to plead guilty to corruption charges and is set to enter his plea Oct. 13.

The license to install antennas for cellular and wireless telephones in House office buildings was awarded in 2002 to MobileAccess, formerly known as Foxcom Wireless, which was based in Israel. The company, now based in Vienna, Va., later paid Abramoff $280,000 in lobbying fees and donated $50,000 to a charity operated by Abramoff that paid for a golf junket to Scotland for Ney.

Rep. Zoe Lofgren (D-Calif.) said the license "has been suspended pending review," which could affect the wireless contract for the congressional visitors center now under construction.

"I think a company should not profit from corrupt actions," said Lofgren, who is on the House Administration Committee. "Obviously, what happened in awarding the contract was wrong, illegal, corrupt. The question is what role did the company have? Was the company a knowing participant?"

Salley Collins, a spokeswoman for the committee, said the review was underway but provided no more information. Congressional sources who spoke on condition on anonymity because the issue is under consideration said a review was prompted by the Abramoff corruption investigation.

MobileAccess employees "have cooperated fully in the investigation," said MobileAccess attorney Douglas A. Fellman, of Hogan & Hartson. "There has never been a suggestion of wrongdoing or improper conduct on the part of MobileAccess or its personnel, and after a very thorough investigation, that continues to be the case."

Abramoff and Neil G. Volz, who went to work for Abramoff as a lobbyist after serving as Ney's top aide, admitted in plea agreements this year that the wireless license was a favor for Abramoff in exchange for gifts.

Prosecutors said in charging papers that Ney took a variety of official actions for Foxcom, "including meeting with representatives of the client on or about May 10, 2001, leaking to Abramoff a copy of a letter from the client's competitor complaining about the selection process in or about September 2002, and issuing a license to Abramoff's client."

The decision had long-term implications for Foxcom competitor LGC Wireless Inc. of San Jose. The Senate also uses MobileAccess to remain consistent with the protocols of the House. LGC uses a different technology, though wireless and cellphone companies say both firms provide service that meets their standards.

An LGC official said yesterday that his company was pleased by the news of the House review.

"Given that it is public record that the House wireless job was awarded to Foxcom/MobileAccess due to Jack Abramoff's improper influence, and MobileAccess has subsequently been the recipient of follow-on business on the Hill in large part due to that initial award, we feel that it is appropriate that the license be reviewed," LGC spokesman John Spindler said. "Only in this way can competitiveness and fairness in any future government awards be ensured."

Cellphone coverage is a sore point with many members of Congress, who complain about dropped calls, particularly in the Capitol. It was a topic at the Administration Committee meeting.

House Reviews Foxcom License (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, September 28, 2006

The House Administration Committee is reviewing a $3 million license awarded by its former chairman, Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), to a client of former lobbyist Jack Abramoff in late 2002, according to the panel and House insiders.

Ney's alleged influence peddling in granting the license to provide cell phone antennas in House office buildings to Foxcom Wireless, now Mobile Access Networks, was part of the plea agreement that the Ohio Republican recently reached with the Justice Department. Ney admitted to accepting "things of value" from Abramoff in return for official actions, including granting the Mobile Access license.

Abramoff's own plea deal in January with federal prosecutors also referenced the Mobile Access episode.

"There are issues with the license agreement," said Salley Collins, spokeswoman for the House Administration panel. "Those issues are under review by the committee at this time." Collins declined to offer any further details on the committee's action.

House insiders said that the Administration Committee and Jay Eagan, the Chief Administrative Officer for the House, jointly made the decision to conduct the review following Ney's plea deal. House officials declined to say whether they were considering taking legal action against the company.

Douglas Fellman, an attorney representing Mobile Access, said no one at the firm had ever engaged in illegal activity in obtaining its license with the House.

"There has never been a suggestion of wrongdoing or improper conduct on the part of Mobile Access, after a thorough investigation by the Department of Justice and others, that continues to be the case," Fellman said.

"Mobile Access and its employees have always been, and continue to be assured, that there are no issues as to the company's conduct."

Foxcom, as Mobile Access was then known, donated $50,000 to a charity controlled by Abramoff in 2001. Abramoff used the charity to pay for a Scotland golf junket the following year attended by Ney and several of his aides, including Neil Volz. Volz pleaded guilty to corruption charges this summer.

According to Ney's plea deal, "From in or about April 2001 through or about November 2002, Ney supported the application of and ultimately issued a license to one of Abramoff's lobbying clients, allowing that client to win a multi-million dollar contract with wireless telephone companies to install wireless telephone infrastructure" in the House.

Mobile Access formally hired Abramoff's former lobbying firm, Greenberg Traurig, in January 2003, two months after it already had been granted the license by Ney, to represent it. Greenberg Traurig was paid $280,000 for its lobbying work in 2003 and 2004, according to lobbying disclosure records.

In obtaining the licensing agreement from the House, Israeli-based Mobile Access won the right to millions of dollars in payments from wireless carriers, who would be using equipment installed by the company to route cell phone calls throughout the House complex.

A rival bidder complained in 2002 that Mobile Access was unfairly awarded the license thanks to its political connections, but even after his relationship with Abramoff was publicly exposed, Ney denied that he had acted improperly in handling the matter.

Ney checked into an alcohol rehabilitation facility right after signing onto his plea deal with Justice and has made no public statements during the last two weeks. His attorneys and federal prosecutors have agreed to recommend a 27-month prison sentence for Ney. Ney is scheduled to appear in federal court on Oct. 13.

Woman Charged In Porn Case (PTR)

By Tony LaRussa, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, September 28, 2006

A Washington County woman has been accused of using the Internet to distribute stories that describe children -- some as young as 2 years old -- being kidnapped, sexually molested and murdered.

Karen Fletcher, 54, of Meldon Avenue, Donora, was indicted by a federal grand jury Tuesday on six counts of transportation of obscene matters, U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said.

"This case is a very important part of our efforts to prosecute people who exploit children," Buchanan said. "Use of the Internet to distribute obscene stories like these not only violates federal law, they embolden sex offenders who would target children."

Free speech specialists, however, question whether the charges will stick because there don't appear to be any child victims.

Contacted at her home Wednesday, Fletcher said federal authorities "didn't like my site." She said she was not aware of the indictment and otherwise declined comment on the charges.

DOJ_NMG_0070433

Fletcher is accused of operating a Web site featuring excerpts of "extremely explicit and graphic stories" that could be downloaded by purchasing a $10 monthly subscription, according to investigators.

The indictment against Fletcher alleges that on Aug. 8, 2005, she used an interactive computer service to distribute half a dozen stories about adults having sex with children between 2 and 9 years old.

Fletcher told a pair of FBI agents who interviewed her at her home on Feb. 11, 2005 that she owned what she described as a "fantasy site" on which she posts "sexually explicit stories about adults having sex with children," according to court papers.

Ken Vandevelde, a law professor at Thomas Jefferson School of Law in San Diego, questioned whether prosecutors could win a case if they attempted to prove that Fletcher trafficked in child pornography.

"The U.S. Supreme Court ruled in 2002 that so-called 'virtual porn' -- drawings or computer generated images of children engaged in sex -- cannot be treated as child pornography because no child was involved in its production," said Vandevelde. "It seems reasonable that the same would apply to the written word."

"I find it very troubling that a fictional account, somebody's fantasy, could be considered a crime when there is no indication that anybody has been exploited," said Joan Bertin, executive director of the New York-based National Coalition Against Censorship.

"I can't defend this material because I haven't seen it, but I question the role of government in deciding when material, even if most people would consider it over the top, is appropriate for adults to write or read," Bertin said.

Fletcher is scheduled to be arraigned in federal court on Oct. 17. If convicted, she could face up to 30 years in prison and a $1.5 million fine.

In the past several years, the U.S. Justice Department has intensified its prosecution of obscenity cases.

Last year, Buchanan asked a federal appeals court to reinstate charges against a California couple whose company, Extreme Associates, was accused of violating federal law by using the U.S. Postal Service and the Internet to send videos depicting graphic scenes of rape and murder into Western Pennsylvania. A 10-count indictment against the company and its owners had been dismissed by a federal judge.

In December, the court ruled that the charges against Robert Zicari and Janet Romano and their company be reinstated. The couple's attorney, H. Louis Sirkin, subsequently filed a petition asking the U.S. Supreme Court to hear the case. The petition, however, was denied.

Town's Residents Say They Were Targets Of Big Mortgage Fraud (WSJ)

By James Hagerty

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

MARTINSVILLE, Va. -- Federal and state authorities are investigating allegations of an elaborate mortgage fraud involving about 100 people living in or near this small factory town who say they unwittingly took out loans to buy houses at inflated prices in Indiana.

The borrowers, who include truck drivers, factory workers, a pastor and a hair stylist, say they were duped by acquaintances into signing stacks of documents and didn't know they were applying for loans. Instead, they thought they were joining a risk-free "investment group."

Now, many of the loans are in default, the borrowers' credit ratings are in ruins, and lenders are pursuing the organizers of the purported investment group in court. Companies stuck with the defaulting loans include Countrywide Financial Corp., the nation's largest home lender, and Argent Mortgage Co., another big lender.

A lawsuit filed by Countrywide accuses the organizers of acquiring homes and then fraudulently selling them for a quick profit to the Virginia borrowers. Representatives of the borrowers put the total value of loans involved at about $80 million, which would make it one of the largest mortgage-fraud cases ever.

Mortgage fraud, involving loans obtained by providing false information, has mushroomed in recent years as lenders have pushed for speedier loan approvals in an effort to remain competitive and milk maximum profits from the now-fading housing boom. The Federal Bureau of Investigation reported that mortgage fraud led to losses of $1 billion in 2005, up from $429 million a year earlier. Some of the fraud that slipped through during the boom is only now starting to surface.

DOJ_NMG_0070434

Attracted by the ability to obtain large sums quickly, some criminal gangs involved in drug dealing and other street crimes have branched out into mortgage fraud, says Chip Burrus, assistant director of the FBI's criminal investigative division. "It's more profitable and less risky," he says.

Part of the problem, say critics inside and outside the industry, is that -- in their haste to earn commissions and fees -- loan officers and brokers are asking fewer probing questions. "We aren't asking questions, and we aren't verifying like we used to," says Bob Simpson, president of Investors Mortgage Asset Recovery Co., Irvine, Calif., which helps lenders recover losses from fraud. "For legitimate, honest consumers, that's a good thing," but it creates opportunities for crooks, Mr. Simpson says.

Kurt Pfotenhauer, a senior vice president at the Mortgage Bankers Association in Washington, says the pursuit of efficiency in making loans has made the industry more vulnerable to fraud. But he said his trade group is educating members on the risks and on preventive measures, and urging Congress to provide more money for cracking down on mortgage scams.

The case involves about 400 loans averaging $200,000 each, according to Tony and Robin Pickett, a married couple who work as real-estate agents at Prudential Ron Matthews Realtors in Indianapolis. Ms. Pickett says she and her husband represent 39 of the borrowers and are trying to help them sell the houses, which are scattered among rough inner-city neighborhoods and new subdivisions.

Lenders and others involved in the case say a task force of federal and state agencies is investigating, including the Internal Revenue Service. An IRS spokeswoman declined to comment. A spokesman for the FBI said the agency is aware of the case but declined to elaborate.

A lawsuit filed in June by Countrywide in the Circuit Court in Marion County, Ind., says that the investment group was organized by people led by Robert Penn. Acquaintances say Mr. Penn, believed to be in his early 40s, grew up near Martinsville, joined the Navy and then moved to the Indianapolis area. He couldn't be reached for comment, and his lawyers didn't return calls.

In recent years, the Martinsville area has been hit hard by closures of furniture and textile factories. Timothy Jacobs, 29 years old, one of the scores of local residents caught up in the case, lost his job in a textile plant several years ago and was unemployed for nine months before finding a new job, working overnight at a telecommunications-cable plant more than an hour's drive from his home. About two years ago, a friend told Mr. Jacobs about an investment group organized by Mr. Penn and some of his relatives in the area.

Mr. Jacobs says he was soon introduced to Mr. Penn's sister, Sharon, a hairdresser who lives in the area. Ms. Penn couldn't be reached for comment. Mr. Jacobs says she explained that the group needed people with good credit ratings to be used for real-estate investments that would be made as a group, not individually. Mr. Jacobs, who was living with his mother at the time and says he couldn't afford to buy a home of his own, says he understood that he wouldn't have to make any payments or assume any financial obligations but would receive payments for letting the group use his credit record.

"It sounded pretty good," Mr. Jacobs says. "Everything I asked them, they had an answer for."

Mr. Jacobs and others who joined the group say they were rushed into signing documents without being given time to read them. Within weeks of signing those papers, Mr. Jacobs says, he received two payments, totaling $7,000, from the Penns. After a few more months, however, he began to get calls from Countrywide representatives demanding mortgage payments. Mr. Jacobs says it turned out that two loans, totaling more than $200,000, had been taken out in his name and that he owned two houses. He says he now thinks the houses might be worth only around $40,000 apiece.

Others who signed up for the group say their credit ratings have been so devastated that they can no longer buy anything on credit. "My dad brought me up to pay my bills before I eat," says Nancy Muse, who heard about the group from a friend who used Ms. Penn as a hairdresser. Months later, Ms. Muse found out she was in trouble when she inquired about buying a modular home for herself. A representative of the home-building company checked her credit and told her she already owned four homes.

In its lawsuit, Countrywide said it acquired some of the loans from the original lender, People's Trust Mortgage LLC, Erlanger, Ky. Countrywide alleges that a loan officer for People's Trust "conspired" with Mr. Penn and associates to apply for loans using false information about the borrowers' incomes and financial assets. Representatives of People's Trust couldn't be reached for comment. A lender who formerly had dealings with People's says he believes it is no longer in business.

The Countrywide suit says companies associated with the Penns acquired houses and then quickly resold them for much higher prices to the Martinsville borrowers. That allowed the Penns and associates to profit from the quick sale while leaving the people in Martinsville stuck with loans they couldn't pay, the suit says. One church secretary, who says she heard about the investment group from her pastor, says she and her husband, a building-maintenance worker, learned that they were the owners of 14 homes in Indiana, a state they had never visited.

DOJ_NMG_0070435

Countrywide, based in Calabasas, Calif., is suing Mr. Penn and others allegedly involved in the program for unspecified damages. Its suit doesn't say why the lender didn't raise questions earlier about why so many people in a struggling area of southern Virginia would be investing in houses in Indiana. The suit does, however, suggest that a closer review of some of the home-purchase documents might have prompted questions; one such document failed to identify the seller.

A Countrywide spokesman said: "We have a zero-tolerance policy against fraud and put a great deal of time and expense into identifying and investigating possible cases."

Some of the loans were made by Argent, based in Irvine, Calif. An Argent spokesman said the company is investigating what he described as a sophisticated scheme. Fannie Mae, the government-sponsored provider of funding for mortgages, acquired some of the loans from Countywide and has reported its findings in the case to law-enforcement officials and regulators, a spokeswoman said.

Fraud has proliferated as lenders increasingly deal with borrowers through brokers and other intermediaries rather than having face-to-face relationships. "Lending is becoming more anonymous," says Rachel M. Dollar, a Santa Rosa, Calif., attorney who runs a Web site that provides mortgage-fraud information. In addition, better computer equipment has made it easier to forge or alter documents.

Borrowers' attorneys and other consumer advocates say many problems arise simply from greed or haste on the part of loan officers and brokers motivated by commissions to push for high volumes. A lawsuit filed in December 2004 in federal court in New York by South Brooklyn Legal Services, a nonprofit law clinic, alleged that Argent Mortgage made a $425,000 loan arranged by participants in a foreclosure fraud scheme even though the application was incomplete and a title-insurance company warned the lender something was amiss with the deal.

"The red flags were as strong as you can get," says Jessica Attie, a staff attorney with the clinic's Foreclosure Prevention Project. In court papers, Argent denied it was at fault in the case, which it settled in April.

In a lawsuit filed in May 2005 in state court in Dayton, Ohio, ABN Amro Mortgage Group Inc., a unit of ABN Amro Holding NV, claims it lost $2 million after a convicted felon and other conspirators arranged as many as 23 mortgages in the names of dead people. In court papers, however, two title insurance companies named among the defendants claim ABN Amro failed to conduct due diligence on the loans and, as a sophisticated lender, knew or should have known about the fraud. The case is still pending. Andrea Lewis, a spokesperson for ABN Amro, said no one with knowledge of the case was available to comment yesterday. The case is still pending.

Other lenders also appear to have overlooked some suspicious borrowing patterns. According to a mortgage-fraud indictment against several people filed by the U.S. attorney's office in Atlanta in U.S. District Court there in January, the defendants took out loans in the names of "straw borrowers" based on inflated prices for real estate. One of those borrowers -- identified in the court filing only as Justin Z -- obtained loans from National City Corp.'s mortgage arm to finance purchases of 20 condominiums in the Atlanta area between Feb. 1 and March 26, 2001, according to the indictment.

A spokesman for Cleveland-based National City said: "We are currently in litigation to recover our losses and we continue to cooperate with authorities on the matter." As part of "continuing efforts to further enhance our mortgage-fraud protection," he adds, National City is tracking individual customers to monitor how many properties they finance, among other measures.

Mortgage Suit Says 'Trust Us' Led To Fleecing (NYT)

By John Leland And Tom Zeller Jr.

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

MARTINSVILLE, Va., Sept. 27 — In a tightknit neighborhood, where people's social lives often revolve around their churches, Beulah Penn and her daughter, Sharon, were well-connected and trusted. Beulah Penn was a lay minister in a local church; her daughter, Sharon Penn, dressed hair.

DOJ_NMG_0070436

Using these connections, according to a recent lawsuit, the two women and another relative in Indianapolis perpetrated one of the largest mortgage frauds in American history, victimizing dozens of local residents and, according to sources with knowledge of the accusations, at least $40 million in fraudulent loans — perhaps even twice that amount.

"Looking back, maybe it sounded too good to be true, but everyone knew them, and my friends went to church with them, people I been knowing for 10 years," said Timothy Jacobs, a 29-year-old worker in a fiber-optics factory who discovered recently that he owed $200,000 on two houses in Indiana. "They said they'd be responsible for everything. Now everyone's probably going to end up filing for bankruptcy."

The civil lawsuit, filed in June by one of the nation's largest mortgage lenders, describes an elaborate confidence game in which Martinsville residents with good credit ratings were enlisted last year to join what they believed was a risk-free investment in Indiana real estate. Instead, they found themselves responsible for hundreds of thousands of dollars in unpaid mortgages.

While no criminal charges have been filed, federal grand jury subpoenas are being prepared in Indiana, and further civil action at the federal level is expected to be filed against the investment group soon.

Repeated calls and e-mail messages to people named as defendants in the lawsuit, both in Martinsville and in Indiana, as well as to some of their lawyers, were not returned.

The F.B.I. called mortgage fraud an "epidemic" last December, noting that losses associated with the crime had jumped to more than $1 billion last year from $429 million in 2004. Although the hot housing market that may have at least partly given rise to the fraud boom is cooling, officials say mortgage fraud losses are on pace to increase again this year.

Martinsville, a small Piedmont city of 14,925, once known for its Nascar track and its thriving textile mills, has lost both population and its economic base since the mills and furniture industries moved overseas in the 1990's. Small older houses and often empty businesses cluster in the center of town, with larger, more expensive developments — like the ones the Penns moved to — on the fringes.

The median household income is about half the state average. Mr. Jacobs, who was out of work for nine months after a mill closed, said he and his friends saw the real estate venture as a chance to get back on their feet after setbacks. "Now we don't know what to do," he said.

Court papers filed by Countrywide Home Loans, the residential mortgage lender, say the Penns invited people to join an "investor's club" that would buy properties in Indiana and sell them at a profit. Club members were told they faced no risk.

According to court papers and to four participants, the investors were told they would not have to contribute any money but would simply allow their credit ratings to be used in acquiring the properties, which would be owned and managed by the group. Each were promised checks of at least $2,000.

But Mr. Jacobs and others were, by all appearances, the pawns in a quick-flip mortgage scheme, designed to gain control of a property at a low price and sell it quickly at a profit. The game is often rigged at every level — from doctored applications, to bogus property appraisals, to the loan approvals themselves.

Documents reviewed by The New York Times suggest that even independent parties associated with closing the sales on the properties may have played a role in perpetrating the fraud, or demonstrated negligence in overseeing the transactions.

The Countrywide suit asserts, for instance, that the founder of the group, Robert Penn (the son of Beulah Penn and brother of Sharon Penn), acting through a variety of companies, secured purchasing agreements for Indiana properties at market value, then had them appraised at substantially higher rates.

Mr. Penn's group then bought the homes, according to the lawsuit and documents reviewed by The Times, in the names of the Martinsville residents at the inflated prices — or even higher — but paid only the agreed-to market price to the seller. Mr. Penn's companies then received the substantial difference, the documents contend.

Often the group closed on several properties in the same buyer's name on the same day, documents show. Kelvin Thompson, 44, a tire worker, said he discovered he was in trouble when he tried to borrow $1,000 from his credit union to buy presents last Christmas.

That is when Mr. Thompson learned that he owned five houses in Indiana, all in default, with mortgages totaling close to $1 million.

DOJ_NMG_0070437

He said he could not have been more surprised. The Penns, he said, did not seem "sophisticated enough" to pull something like this off. "We're very angry," he said, "and also embarrassed for being suckered."

Many of the investors contacted were unwilling to discuss their cases — some out of embarrassment, some out of suspicion of a stranger asking questions about their finances. Some said they had known the mother and daughter for so long that they still did not know what to think.

Mildred, a municipal employee who said she was too embarrassed to be identified by her last name, said she trusted Sharon Penn "because she was my girlfriend."

She added, "She did my hair for four years."

Although she was not a member of Mrs. Penn's church, Mildred said, she knew that Beulah Penn was "a minister, a woman of the cloth," and so she let down her guard. Even so, she said, when Sharon Penn approached her about joining the investment club, she resisted at first. "But I saw people coming and going, this one got a check, that one got a check," she said.

She also saw that the Penns were making a lot of money and talking about how "blessed" they were, she said. She agreed to join, she said, on promises that she was part of a no-risk partnership in a development of brand-new houses on which payments were guaranteed by the federal government.

From a leather valise in the back of her car his week, she produced documents showing that two of the three houses she owned were built in 1950 and 1917. The outstanding mortgages on the three homes total more than $500,000. The houses, she said, were worth about $30,000 each.

"I thought I was smarter than that," she said. "But they were so smooth, and I saw so many people getting checks."

Repeated calls to Beulah Penn's home went directly to her voice mailbox, which was full.

William Stern, the mortgage fraud coordinator at the F.B.I. said the agency would not comment on whether it was investigating the Martinsville case. But he said the agency had uncovered similarly ambitious schemes recently.

In August last year, he said, the largest federal sentence for mortgage fraud — 30 years — was handed down to Chalana McFarland of Atlanta, for her role in a major flipping operation that netted $20 million from 1999 to 2002. As a testament to the elaborate nature of the modern mortgage fraud operation, also indicted were two paralegals, six loan originators, one broker, three real estate agents, three appraisers, three straw borrowers, one bank employee, an identity thief, and a property manager.

"This represents an approach to mortgage fraud whereby an entire mortgage fraud ring is targeted and addressed," Mr. Stern said.

A Martinsville area minister who also lost money in the Penn investments expressed exasperation, but caution. Like others in town, he said he knew Beulah Penn professionally and Sharon Penn as an occasional visitor to his church.

"Nobody has been charged here," he said, declining to be named because he did not want to embarrass his church. He said he was still holding out hope, "that they just got caught up in this, just like I did."

Good Cybercitizens Keep Watch Over ID-theft Victims (USAT)

By Jon Swartz

USA Today, September 28, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — For a few hours a day, Steven Peisner calls strangers across the USA — sometimes at night — and reads to them their Social Security numbers and credit card data.

Though many recipients immediately suspect he is an ID thief, Peisner's intent is just the opposite: He is a digital whistle-blower.

"My motivation is to be a good citizen and put a dent in (fraudulent e-mail) phishing scams," says Peisner, president of SellitSafe.com, which provides anti-phishing services for online merchants. He works closely with law enforcement and computer-security experts. Peisner, 43, is one of several avenging angels nationwide looking out for the well-being of ID-theft victims. They share a fervent desire to publicize the widespread availability of stolen personal data on the Internet.

•Betty "BJ" Ostergren, a former insurance-claims supervisor in Virginia , occasionally warns consumers that their Social Security numbers are posted on public government websites. For the past four years, she has spent several hours a day digging through sites for Social Security numbers. So far, she's uncovered 18,000 records.

•Janice Forster, 50, a paralegal in North Carolina, this year started FindMyId.com, a website devoted to educating consumers about ID theft. In the past week, she mailed more than 100 letters to North Carolina residents informing them that their personal information is available on the Internet.

"I just want to make a difference," says Forster, who had never before been involved in a grass-roots movement. "In good conscience, I can't watch this happen to people."

That's why Peisner called Christopher Buckley, a high school teacher in Los Angeles, late at night during Labor Day weekend to inform Buckley that his credit card number was on the ccpower forum, a black-market website where criminals deal in stolen personal data. "I was shocked he called but glad he did," says Buckley, 31, who mistakenly forked over information via e-mail to someone claiming to be from PayPal.

There is a method to Peisner's madness. As phishing continues to escalate, the safest course for consumers may be to warn them over the phone. There is little in the way of software to warn consumers they have been phished.

"We need to take control of the situation," says Peisner, who does not profit from his advice to consumers but sells his company's services to businesses. "The police have their hands full with these type of cases. It's up to consumers like me to take action."

Since May, good Samaritan Peisner has scoured the Internet forums of cybercrooks, looking for the names of ID-theft victims whose personal information is for sale online. The same day, he informs victims that their names — not to mention Social Security numbers, credit card information and phone numbers — are floating in cyberspace. Peisner calmly tells them he has come across their filched profiles and they should immediately close their credit card and/or bank accounts. To make his point resonate, he reads to victims their stolen information as it appears in the forums.

Symantec detected 157,477 unique phishing messages during the first half of 2006, up 81% from the last six months of 2005. Home PCs were targets of 86% of security threats in the first six months of 2006, according to a Symantec report released Monday.

The incidents have soared as attacks become more sophisticated. Tried-and-true scams aimed at customers of AOL, eBay, PayPal, Citibank, Bank of America and other high-profile companies continue. But the deceptive e-mail messages and websites have gotten much craftier. Customer names and addresses now routinely appear in phishing e-mail. Previously, scams were addressed to "Dear valued (company name) member," say security experts.

"This is slick stuff," says Ron O'Brien, senior security analyst at Sophos. He says recent phishing attempts actually warn customers about phishing and ask them to update their information for security reasons. To assure wary users, the 800 phone number of a targeted company is included in the e-mail. The scam often works, he says.

The scam is just the latest iteration in an evolving cycle of phishing attempts that surface every few months, says Dennis Maicon, executive vice president of financial-services solutions at computer-security firm Digital Resolve. Late last year, phishers typically preyed on customers of large financial institutions, warning them in e-mails to update their accounts or risk losing them. Early this year, phishers used the same scam but on customers of regional banks and credit unions.

Phishers also are ensnaring corporate customers with bogus phone trees that ask consumers to enter personal information. How the scam works: An e-mail advises victims to call a number to verify basic data. But the number is actually recording data with the intent to steal it, according to law enforcement officials. The stolen information often winds up on cybercrime forums, websites that function as digital marketplaces.

The speed of transactions on those forums can be quick, victims say.

Scott London, an attorney in Santa Barbara, Calif., can vouch for that. Soon after he surrendered personal data to a PayPal-targeted phishing scam on Aug. 18, it was posted on the CardersMarket forum.

In less than one minute, $100 was pulled from his bank account. An e-mail receipt from the real PayPal confirmed the withdrawal seconds later. Another 15 minutes later, more than $1,200 in airline tickets, electronic equipment and two other items were charged to London's Chase-issued MasterCard.

By the time Peisner called to warn London, the charges had been made. But London took Peisner's advice and notified his bank and credit card issuer. "It could have been worse if not for Steven," London says.

DOJ_NMG_0070439

Peisner admits it can be a thankless job, rousting strangers at night and telling them their innermost financial secrets. “One guy in Florida wants to kill me,” he says.

But those are the occupational hazards of being a do-gooder.

For many victims, Peisner is the first line of defense. Most software doesn't notify the consumer until after an illegal purchase. Peisner tells them as soon as he spots their information in carding forums.

On a typical day, he contacts more than a dozen victims. To gain their trust, he explains who he is and what he has found online — usually the victim's name, address, Social Security number and credit card number. He advises them to contact their credit card issuer and bank and to monitor their credit reports for two to three years. Victims range in age from 19 to 88, and they are universally shocked when he calls, Peisner says.

“Steven scared me to death, but he saved me a lot of grief,” says Stephen Sanders, 55, a retiree from Carmel, Calif., who was the victim of phishing scam tarageting eBay/PayPal users last month. Sanders closed his bank account and discontinued his credit card the next day. He also flagged credit reports.

Absent consumer advocates, there is little that tech vendors can do to immediately alert phishing victims.

AOL, Yahoo, Microsoft and other providers of Internet service continue to refine their anti-phishing filters. Yahoo this month rolled out a service that better protects consumers from phishing sites. Future versions of Microsoft Internet Explorer and other browsers such as Opera and Firefox will include built-in phishing filters.

Still, newer phishing attacks can slip through.

AOL offers free features that inform users whenever a financial transaction is made over their AOL account. Customers can set up e-mail spending alerts for themselves, based on the amount of a transaction and when it occurs, says Michael Jones, technical director of AOL's anti-spam operations.

But until phishing is eviscerated, and short of directly warning intended victims, consumers will continue to be hooked by phishing attempts. Even though Buckley was quickly tipped off by Peisner, cybercrooks rang up $1,000 in charges to his credit card before he could cancel it. “Just think of the damage they could have done if Steven didn't call me,” Buckley says. “For that, I'll always be grateful to him.”

Louisiana Renews Call For Dicks’ Extradition (FT)

By Andrew Ward In Atlanta

Financial Times, September 28, 2006

Kathleen Blanco, governor of Louisiana, has voiced support for the state's clampdown on online gambling and renewed an extradition request for Peter Dicks, former chairman of Sportingbet.

The governor's intervention came as Mr Dicks prepared to attend a court hearing in New York to learn whether he will be sent to Louisiana to face illegal gambling charges.

Lawyers for Mr Dicks, who was arrested in New York three weeks ago on a Louisiana warrant, had hoped to halt the extradition process before Thursday's hearing.

But a spokesman for Ms Blanco said she was still pushing for his extradition as part of efforts to enforce the state's law against online gambling.

"If we do not enforce this law, online gambling would be completely unregulated and that would clearly be an expansion of gambling which is unacceptable," she told the FT.

Barry Slotnick, lead defence lawyer, acknowledged that Louisiana had “dug in” over recent days, raising the prospect of a courtroom battle over Mr Dicks' fate.

“They are not backing off,” he said, in an interview. “We’re preparing our argument to rebut what Louisiana says.”

Thursday’s hearing in New York comes amid increasing alarm among online bookmakers about the legal threat posed to the industry by US anti-gambling laws.

William Hill, the UK bookmaker, on Wednesday said it would no longer accept casino and poker business from clients with a US address or credit card, pending clarification of US laws.

The company had already stopped accepting online sports bets from US customers.

DOJ_NMG_0070440

Congress is considering the introduction of tough new federal laws against online gambling in addition to existing state laws such as those used by Louisiana to arrest Mr Dicks.

Louisiana's Police Gaming Enforcement division told the FT this week that arrest warrants had been issued for four Sportingbet representatives, including Mr Dicks, after state police placed a bet with the company.

UK-listed Sportingbet said on Wednesday that it had banned board members from travelling to the US.

Mr Dicks may still be spared prosecution in Louisiana because of legal questions over the legitimacy of the state's extradition request.

Defence lawyers have argued that Mr Dicks cannot be extradited to Louisiana under New York law because he was not in either state at the time of the alleged crime.

Mr Dicks was allowed to return to the UK on bail two weeks ago while the case was reviewed but he was ordered to return for Thursday's hearing.

George Pataki, New York governor, has withdrawn a warrant needed for Mr Dicks' extradition because of doubts about the case. That warrant would need to be reinstated before Louisiana could take custody of him.

"Louisiana has taken a position where they are demanding extradition. Our position is that extradition is not a proper remedy," said Mr Slotnick.

2nd Emergency Crime Law Eyed (WT)

By Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, September 28, 2006

D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams' plan to extend emergency anti-crime legislation appears to violate a city statute barring passage of the same law more than once on an emergency basis.

City officials are trying to determine whether extending by 90 days anti-crime legislation enacted in July would violate the statute.

If it is found to violate the statute, 48 surveillance cameras placed in neighborhoods would have to turned off until permanent anti-crime legislation could be enacted, which would be December at the earliest.

In addition, police no longer would have access to criminal juvenile records and would not be able to hold robbery suspects and handgun offenders until the permanent legislation is passed. And the 10 p.m. curfew for minors would revert to 11 p.m. on weeknights and midnight on weekends.

Charlotte Brookins-Hudson, legal counsel for the D.C. Council, said that the intent of the statute is to prevent city officials from circumventing the congressional review period to which D.C. laws are subject.

Mrs. Brookins-Hudson said that she will review the mayor's emergency submission and that changes to it will have to be more than cosmetic.

"It will have to be a very substantial modification," she said. "If it is identical, I will inform the chairman of the council, and she will make her ruling."

Mr. Williams said that a spate of four killings in 24 hours spanning Sunday and Monday proves the need to extend the crime-fighting legislation.

"I think what we've seen in the last couple days, the youth violence, this uptick of it, is all the more reason we need to continue it," the mayor said. "Technically, you can't reintroduce an emergency measure exactly like the preceding, but substantively ... I think we should continue this strategy while the council looks at the long term."

Among the four killings were three juveniles:

•Andre Pee, 14, was shot in the back Sunday night in a Southeast public housing complex. Curtis Watkins, 32, was found dead nearby.

• Dominick A. Dixon, 15, was found dead Monday near a construction site in Northeast. Police arrested Robert Crosby, 51, late Tuesday and charged him with second-degree murder in that case.

• CeQuawn Brown, 16, was shot in the head Monday in Southeast.

DOJ_NMG_0070441

Ed Reiskin, interim city administrator and deputy mayor for public safety and justice, said that city officials are moving forward "as if we can" get the council to extend the emergency legislation.

"I haven't seen what the council's counsel's concerns are," he said. "I mean, if it's not legal, it's not legal, but I'm hopeful that we can find some legal way of allowing the council to consider an extension."

Mr. Reiskin said that the worst-case scenario would be a "gap" in which four programs authorized by the crime emergency would be suspended until permanent legislation that has already been submitted to the council is addressed.

Karr Lawyers Ask To Have Porn Charges Dropped (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, September 28, 2006

LOS ANGELES — Lawyers for John Mark Karr asked a judge Wednesday to dismiss child pornography charges against the onetime suspect in the JonBenét Ramsey case because authorities lost a computer that allegedly contained illicit photographs of children.

Arguments on the issue in Santa Rosa, Calif., were so extensive that Sonoma County Superior Court Judge Cerena Wong continued the hearing until Friday. She could also decide then to unseal evidence in the 5-year-old case.

Karr, 41, a former teacher, is due to go on trial Monday. He faces five misdemeanor charges of possessing child pornography.

Sheriff's deputies seized the computer from Karr's home when he was arrested in April 2001. The sheriff's department said it copied the contents of the computer's hard drive and printed out five pornographic photographs.

Saying that new technologies might reveal additional photos on the hard drive, deputies launched a two-week search for the computer late last month but didn't find it.

Karr is being held in Sonoma County jail on $200,000 bail. If convicted, he could face a maximum of a year in jail on each count.

He spent six months in jail awaiting trial in 2001 but skipped a court date and fled the country.

Karr was arrested Aug. 16 in Thailand after suggesting that he killed JonBenét, a 6-year-old beauty pageant star, in her Boulder, Colo., home in 1996.

He was returned to Colorado, but the Ramsey case collapsed Aug. 28 after DNA failed to link him to the crime.

Karr has rejected a plea deal that would have waived three of the five child pornography charges if he pleaded guilty to two.

He would have been placed on probation for three years and would have been required to register as a sex offender.

Sex Offender Admits Killing Teen In NE (WP)

By Allison Klein And Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

A 51-year-old convicted sex offender admitted that he killed a 15-year-old boy and dumped his body at a construction site in Northeast Washington, telling police the two had fought over a $10 purchase of crack cocaine, according to the prosecution's charging documents.

Robert J. Crosby has been charged with second-degree murder in the death of Dominick A. Dixon, who was found at the construction site Monday afternoon wearing only his boxer shorts. Crosby was ordered held without bond yesterday by D.C. Superior Court Magistrate Judge Richard Ringell.

The D.C. medical examiner's office said yesterday that Dixon was killed by asphyxiation and ruled the case a homicide. D.C. police have been treating the case as a homicide since Dixon's body was found in the 1000 block of 51st Street.

Crosby has spent most of his adult life in Maryland prisons after being convicted in the mid-1970s of raping a 14-year-old girl in Baltimore, records show. He was released in 2004, and as a condition of his parole, was not permitted to have contact with anyone younger than 18 or to leave Maryland without permission, authorities said.

The D.C. medical examiner's office has not completed Dixon's autopsy, which would indicate whether he was sexually assaulted.

DOJ_NMG_0070442

Dixon was one of five people, including three juveniles, found dead in a 24-hour stretch Sunday and Monday in the District. Last night, D.C. Council member Marion Barry (D-Ward 8) and others gathered for a vigil to remember the victims and decry the violence.

In the Dixon case, Crosby told police that on Sunday, he and Dixon were in a vacant house in the 5000 block of Lee Street NE, which is next to the site where Dixon's body was found, according to charging papers.

Crosby was buying $10 of crack from Dixon, but he believed that Dixon was shorting him and protested, the documents said. Crosby said Dixon drew a knife and tried to stab him, which sparked a fight that ended when Crosby wrapped a television cable around Dixon's neck and strangled him, according to the prosecutors' documents.

The charging papers quoted Crosby as saying he removed Dixon's clothes because he feared that his blood might have been left on them.

Crosby said he bit one of Dixon's ears and a finger during the fight, the documents said.

The charging papers provided other details about Crosby's alleged actions after the crime. Crosby told police that he left Dixon's body in the abandoned house until Monday morning, when he pushed it over a brick wall into a courtyard at the construction site. Crosby said he got rid of the knife in a sewer drain. Police later found it. They also found a coaxial cable in the vacant house.

Police took Crosby into custody after stopping him for a traffic violation Tuesday in the 5000 block of Lee Street. When they took him to the police station, he said he killed Dixon, charging documents said.

According to a report by the D.C. Pretrial Services Agency, Crosby has worked for a contractor in Silver Spring for six months.

After he was released from prison, Crosby told his Maryland parole agent that he wanted to move to the District, but D.C. officials denied the request, according to court authorities. It appears that he moved to the District without letting his parole agent know. D.C. police list his address as the 1000 block of 51st Street NE, and he was registered to vote in the District at that address.

Maryland parole workers believed that they were supervising him in Baltimore and that he was still living there, said Elizabeth Bartholomew, a spokeswoman for the Maryland Division of Parole and Probation.

Crosby is on Maryland's sex offender registry, with his home address listed in Baltimore.

Crosby last reported to his parole agent Aug. 24, Bartholomew said. She said he was to report Sept. 14 but did not. His next appointment was to be today, and had he not reported, a warrant would have been issued for his arrest, she said.

Gloria Dixon has said she last saw her son Saturday. She reported him missing at 4 a.m. Monday, and a friend of the family found the body about seven hours later.

Dixon said she had talked to Crosby for about a half-hour after her son's body was found.

Crosby told her that he knew her son and that he was a good kid, she said. He then tried to comfort her, saying "If I hear anything, I'll let you know," Dixon said.

Dixon added, "He couldn't understand why anyone would do that to a nice young man."

Mid Now Faces Rape Charges (BSUN)

By Bradley Olson, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, September 28, 2006

Ex-football player could get life sentence if convicted of assault on 2 fellow students

The Naval Academy has charged a former football player with drugging and raping two female midshipmen on separate occasions, including at a party attended by at least four teammates.

Kenny Ray Morrison, 24, is accused of raping one woman in a Georgetown hotel room at the rowdy, boozy party Feb. 4, and the other in Annapolis on April 21, according to charging documents.

The senior had been scheduled to stand trial Tuesday at a special court-martial, a midlevel form of military trial, only on charges of indecent assault and indecent acts in the Georgetown incident. If convicted of those charges, he would receive no jail time.

DOJ_NMG_0070443

If found guilty in a military court of the new charges of rape, distribution of a controlled substance and assault in both cases, as well as conduct unbecoming an officer in the Feb. 4 incident, he could receive a maximum of life in prison. Such a sentence is unprecedented in recent history, according to military law experts.

An academy spokesman declined to discuss the case, including the reason for the upgraded charges, because it's part of a continuing investigation.

William Ferris, Morrison's civilian attorney, said the academy can't prove the charges and accused the academy and Navy lawyers of acting unethically in the case. He said his firm is exploring legal challenges based on the argument that his client's rights to a speedy trial and to see evidence against him were violated.

"The whole handling of this, I think, is completely improper, and we're investigating all those issues," he said.

The latest charges could prove embarrassing to the Annapolis military college and the football team, whose former star quarterback was acquitted in July of rape. Lamar S. Owens Jr. was convicted of lesser charges and is awaiting notice from the academy on whether he will be allowed to graduate and be commissioned in the Navy or be kicked out and owe $140,000 for his education.

Owens and Morrison have been temporarily reassigned to the Washington Navy Yard.

According to charging documents, which offer no details about the Annapolis incident, Morrison gave both of his alleged victims gamma-hydroxybutyric acid, also known as GHB, without their knowledge. It is a common date-rape drug that is also used recreationally.

The Sun is not identifying either woman because they are alleged victims of sexual assault.

The documents say that at the Feb. 4 party at the Embassy Suites in Washington, he lifted the woman up from the bed in which she was sleeping, carried her to another bed, took her clothes off and "engaged in multiple acts of sexual intercourse without her consent."

According to the documents, he also had sex in front of now-Ensign Jason Monts and exposed his and the alleged victim's nude body to midshipmen Zachary Gallion and Trey Hines and 2005 graduate Kyle Eckel.

A star fullback at Navy, Eckel's mark of 2,906 career rushing yards is the fourth-best in academy history. He was signed as an undrafted free agent by the New England Patriots but was waived and then picked up by the Miami Dolphins, who have him on their reserve/military list.

"This has nothing to do with our program," Navy Athletic Director Chet Gladchuk said. "This is about charges against Kenny Ray Morrison, who was a walk-on on our team and will have an opportunity to defend himself."

In preliminary hearings on the Feb. 4 incident, attorneys on both sides revealed that Morrison's DNA was recovered from a rape kit examination of the alleged victim.

A judge threw out evidence that the hair of the alleged victim in the Feb. 4 incident tested positive for GHB. Prosecutors could not link the drug to Morrison, and the tests could only prove that the drug was administered in a six-week period that included the time of the alleged assault.

The Feb. 4 incident was originally investigated by Washington's Metropolitan Police Department and turned over to a civilian grand jury. Prosecutors and defense attorneys have declined to comment about the grand jury's findings, how the case was turned over to Navy investigators or why Morrison was not originally charged with rape.

The new charges will be referred to a military evidentiary hearing, akin to a civilian grand jury; if an investigator determines that there is enough evidence, the case will go to the most serious court-martial forum.

Charlotte Cluverius, a former academy law instructor and officer who now works in private practice in Washington, said the way this case has been prosecuted has been unusual, although it's not unprecedented in military trials to bring more serious charges after finding new evidence while preparing for the trial.

Cluverius said the upcoming evidentiary hearing, called an Article 32, would reveal whether the new evidence will hold up in court.

"They throw up every charge they can find that is even remotely tied to the evidence," she said.

bradley.olson@baltsun.com

DOJ_NMG_0070444

Former Soldier Charged With Smuggling Machine Guns (ARMYT)

By Michelle Tan, Staff writer

Army Times, September 28, 2006

A former North Carolina National Guard soldier has been charged in federal court for smuggling four machine guns into the United States from Iraq and then trying to sell them.

Robert James Clymore, 38, was arraigned in federal court Sept. 21 in Atlanta, Ga. He was indicted June 13 by a federal grand jury on charges of unlawful importation, possession, transportation and transfer of machine guns, according to a press release from the Justice Department.

Clymore, of Wade, N.C., is accused of acquiring four machine guns while on active duty in Iraq and smuggling them home in his gear.

Clymore, who served in the Navy, joined the Guard on Aug. 29, 2003, said Maj. Matt Handley, a spokesman for the North Carolina Guard.

He was a sergeant with C Company, 120th Combined Arms Battalion, in Parkton, N.C., and he served in Iraq from early 2004 to early 2005, Handley said. Clymore was honorably discharged from the Army on April 15, Handley said.

According to documents filed in federal court, Clymore brought to the United States a Sterling, model MK4, 9mm submachine gun; a Carl Gustav, model 45, 9mm submachine gun; a Zastava, model M72 LMG, 7.62 x 39mm machine gun; and a Soviet, model PPSH-41, 7.62 x 25mm submachine gun. The Carl Gustav did not have a serial number.

In December 2005, Clymore brought the weapons to a gun dealer in Taylorsville, Ga., and negotiated a deal to trade an all-terrain vehicle and a pistol for the machine guns, according to the Justice Department. The gun dealer informed the FBI about the machine guns, and FBI agents set up surveillance to record the transaction, which was scheduled for the following day, Dec. 15, 2005. When Clymore returned, the FBI seized the four machine guns.

The six-count indictment against Clymore charges him with violating federal firearms and tax laws. The charges carry up to 25 years in prison and a fine of up to $1.25 million.

Prison For Man Who Assaulted Feds (PTR)

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, September 28, 2006

A state inmate was sentenced today to nearly 12 years in federal prison for assaulting two deputy U.S. Marshals.

Andre L. Jacobs, 24, formerly of Harrisburg, attacked the marshals in March 2005 inside a 9th floor elevator at the federal courthouse, Downtown. After a jury ruled against Jacobs in a civil trial, the inmate struck one marshal with his handcuffs and grabbed the other marshal. The first marshal suffered ligament damage to his wrist, which required surgery.

Jacobs was convicted by a jury in April and was sentenced to 210 months in prison yesterday by U.S. District Judge Gustave Diamond. Jacobs is already serving 5 to 18 years in SCI Fayette on an unrelated conviction.

Inmate Who Assaulted Federal Deputy Gets 17-year Prison Sentence (PPG)

By Paula Reed Ward, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, September 28, 2006

Andre Jacobs grew up with no parental figures. He witnessed domestic violence between his mother and father as an infant and toddler. Then his father left, and his mother, an alcoholic, pretty much abandoned her son.

Mr. Jacobs spent the majority of his youth in juvenile psychiatric facilities and was certified as an adult offender at age 15.

He has a steep history of violence, including assaults on corrections officers. Since 1998, when he began serving a state prison sentence, he has received 91 misconduct reports, guaranteeing that he will remain in disciplinary custody until at least 2011.

Yesterday, Mr. Jacobs, now 24, was sentenced to serve more than 17 years in prison for assaulting a U.S. marshal last year as he was being escorted out of the federal courthouse following a civil case. That amounts to 10 additional years in prison since he will serve the first seven years concurrently with previous sentences.

DOJ_NMG_0070445

In an effort to avoid any repeats of the attack in which Mr. Jacobs slammed his handcuffed arms down onto a marshal's wrist, he was led into Senior U.S. District Judge Gustave Diamond's courtroom by six marshals.

Deputy U.S. Marshal Robert Potter, who was injured in the attack, underwent surgery and was placed on light duty for 47 days while recovering, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen R. Kaufman.

The short, slender man wore leg irons, and his wrists were handcuffed to his waist. A large bandage stretched across his forehead.

Mr. Jacobs previously has been convicted of firearms violations, escape and aggravated assault, and currently has five "serious" cases pending, Mr. Kaufman said.

The prosecutor acknowledged Mr. Jacob's troubled childhood but countered it with the need for public safety.

"He's a damaged individual," he said. "Unfortunately, he's a very dangerous individual."

Mr. Jacobs' sentence was enhanced by several factors, including that his victim was a federal law enforcement officer; that he caused "serious bodily injury;" and because he is considered a career offender.

"This is probably the saddest, most tragic case I've ever been involved with," said public defender Jay Finkelstein. "I think it's absolutely heart-breaking."

The only person to speak on Mr. Jacobs' behalf was Dr. Jolie Brams, a clinical and forensic psychologist, who evaluated him.

"In many ways, he would have been better off being an orphan," she said.

Dr. Brams talked about Mr. Jacobs' background, his profound, uncontrolled anger, his feelings of abandonment, and the lack of treatment.

But she also noted that he basically taught himself how to read, passed the high school equivalence test, and has taken and passed correspondence classes to be trained as a paralegal.

"I believe there is still room for growth and development," she said, "especially if he gets the help he so desperately needs."

Mr. Jacobs begged for that help when it was his turn to speak to the judge.

"I want to be given a chance -- to work things out; look forward to a future," he said, trailing off. "Just have a life, man."

Then Mr. Jacobs began to cry.

"I just feel like I never had a chance," he continued. "Everybody gave up on me before I ever had a chance. I can't do it by myself."

Man Helped By Priests Is Charged With Fraud (NYT)

By Anthony Ramirez

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

The voice on the line would beg the priest, Help me, Father; I'm in trouble.

My mother is facing eviction, the voice would say. Sometimes she needed money to pay for assisted living, or for a down payment on a new home, federal prosecutors said.

In the end, the man behind the voice, whom the authorities identified as Robert Riggio, 60, of Manhattan, bilked numerous priests around the country of at least $200,000, federal prosecutors said yesterday

Priests in North Carolina, Texas and Kentucky were victimized, prosecutors said, adding that the priests often drew on personal savings to send money to Mr. Riggio, and that some priests were bilked twice.

The scheme, which began in March 2004 and lasted until this month, involved more than 150 wire transfers from guileless priests to Mr. Riggio and a partner who was not named in court papers. In some cases, Mr. Riggio pretended to be a member of the priest's parish seeking help, the papers said.

The scheme was undone by an undercover agent posing as the niece of a priest, prosecutors said.

Mr. Riggio appeared yesterday at a hearing in Federal District Court in Manhattan, where he was advised of his rights and informed of the charges against him, but not formally arraigned. He has not been indicted.

He is charged with one count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud and one count of wire fraud. If convicted, he faces up to 25 years in prison.

He surrendered to federal marshals at 9 a.m. yesterday and was ordered released on a $100,000 personal recognizance bond after surrendering his passport.

Dressed in a pink polo shirt, blue polyester warm-up pants and white running shoes, Mr. Riggio answered questions from Magistrate Judge Henry Pittman with a "yes" or "no" in a clear voice, and made no statement.

Mr. Riggio's lawyer, Chris Flood, and Nicholas Goldin, an assistant United States attorney, declined to comment on the case.

Mr. Riggio has an extensive criminal history on Long Island and in New Jersey. According to the New Jersey Department of Corrections, for example, he served nearly two years in a New Jersey prison for "theft by deception." He was released on May 2, 2001.

In court papers released yesterday, a special agent with the F.B.I., Tina M. Taylor, said Mr. Riggio used the aliases William Kelley and Timothy Ryan. Agent Taylor appeared in court but did not make a statement.

Agent Taylor said in court papers that she was part of a special squad investigating Mr. Riggio and his partner. She cited telephone surveillance recordings, Western Union and MoneyGram records, and the testimony of an undercover agent posing as the niece of a priest in Kentucky who had sent $25,600 to a William Kelley.

As part of the investigation, the undercover agent telephoned Mr. Riggio last Thursday. At the same time, Agent Taylor said, she observed Mr. Riggio answering his cellphone.

Mr. Riggio identified himself to the undercover agent as William Kelley and said he was a member of the priest's Kentucky parish trying to obtain housing in Manhattan for his mother.

"Mr. Kelley" said that he needed more funds for his mother but that he was in West Virginia at the moment, according to Agent Taylor's court papers.

Crime Lab Probe Tab To Grow By $1.5 Million (HC)

By Alexis Grant

Houston Chronicle, September 28, 2006

The City Council on Wednesday approved spending an additional $1.5 million to complete an independent investigation of the police crime lab that has already cost the city nearly $4 million.

After months of delay, during which Mayor Bill White, several council members and a high-ranking police official questioned whether more money should be allocated to the project, the panel approved the funding without discussion.

White said after the meeting he is confident this will be the last time the city puts money toward the investigation, which began in March 2005.

"I wanted to make sure that we were going to get value for what we asked for and that this would not be perpetual," White said.

The city hired lead investigator Michael Bromwich, a former U.S. Justice Department official, to investigate the crime lab more than two years after problems there came to light. Two men had been released from prison because of inaccurate work on evidence from their cases.

The independent team of lawyers and scientists conducting the project have reviewed about 2,300 cases from the Houston Police Department crime lab. HPD's conclusions about evidence in 93 cases may be inaccurate, they say.

The project initially was expected to cost about $3.2 million. City Council first allocated $2.2 million, then agreed to pay $1.6 million more.

In June, Bromwich asked for an additional $1.5 million to complete testing. It was needed because the scope of the project expanded at the request of council members after scientists found widespread problems, he said.

The most recent payment brings the total cost of the probe to $5.3 million.

Some Lethal Injections May Have Been 'Excruciating' (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein And Maura Dolan

The Los Angeles Times, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070447

SAN JOSE — Inmates executed by lethal injection in California may have been conscious when they were administered a drug that induces suffocation and an "excruciating" experience comparable to drowning or strangulation, an anesthesiologist who has reviewed state execution logs testified today.

Mark Heath, a professor of anesthesiology at Columbia University Medical School, said the logs showed that some of those executed were still breathing several minutes after prison personnel administered pancuronium bromide, a paralytic agent and the second of three drugs used in lethal injections in California and three dozen other states.

"If someone is breathing like that, they may not be in a deep plane of anesthesia. They may not even be unconscious," Heath said on the second day of a hearing before U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel on a challenge to California's lethal injection procedures by death row inmate Michael Morales.

His attorneys contend that the state procedure violates the U.S. Constitution's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. As Heath was testifying, attorney Ginger Anders displayed a copy of a prison log of the execution of Robert Massey, which showed that Massey continued to breathe for four minutes after the pancuronium was administered.

Heath also presented a withering portrayal of California's procedures for executing condemned prisoners, based on his review of prison records, depositions of execution team members and other material obtained by attorneys for Morales.

Among other things, Heath said members of the execution team were ignorant about the properties of the drugs they were using and failed to administer the required dose of the anesthetic sodium thiopental, which is meant to deaden the inmate to the pain of the paralytic.

In response to a question about what she knew about the anesthetic, a registered nurse on the execution team said, "I don't study. I just do the job. I don't want to know about it," according to a deposition read by Anders.

Heath said he was very disturbed by the response: "You can't understand and appreciate the dangers if you don't know how the drug works."

Heath also said he was troubled by a discussion between corrections officials and the governor's representatives about changing the lethal injection protocol to address concerns Fogel voiced when Morales' execution was postponed last spring. According to notes taken by attorney Bruce Slevin, a doctor who works for the Corrections Department suggested that the state use a different, longer-lasting and more effective anesthetic.

But lawyers in the meeting spurned Dr. Robert Singler's idea, saying they believed the state should not change course because the three drug protocol had been upheld by courts. Instead, they suggested that the procedure be "tweaked," according to Slevin's notes.

Heath said this was "not a medically valid reason." Heath added: "The priority should be to make sure it is humane. If we make sure it is humane, a court is not going to stop" the state from conducting lethal injection executions, Heath concluded.

On Tuesday, an expert on pharmacology said the drug used to anesthetize inmates wears off "extremely fast" and potentially exposes prisoners to painful deaths.

The four-day trial here is one of several court proceedings around the nation in which lethal injection is under challenge as a violation of the U.S. Constitution's ban on cruel and unusual punishment. Executions have been put on hold in California pending the outcome of the litigation, brought by Morales, who was sentenced to death for the 1981 murder of Terri Winchell, 17, in Lodi.

Judge Fogel has stressed that condemned inmates are not entitled under the Constitution to a painless death.

CIVIL LAW:

S.J. Nursing Home Guilty Of Defrauding Medicare (MERCN)

By Rodney Foo

The San Jose Mercury News, September 28, 2006

An East San Jose nursing home was convicted Tuesday of filing false Medicare claims, and its corporate owner also has agreed to pay $14.7 million to settle a related federal lawsuit instigated by a whistle-blower, prosecutors said.

DOJ_NMG_0070448

Representatives for Parkview Nursing Center agreed to plead guilty in U.S. District Court in Oakland to two counts of submitting inflated nursing hours related to patients' reports to Medicare. No individuals were charged, U.S. Department of Justice spokesman Luke Macaulay said, only the business entities.

The crimes occurred in November 1997 and September 1998, prosecutors said. The complaint against Parkview was filed earlier this month.

Parkview also was ordered to pay a $500,000 fine. The 99-bed nursing home was closed in 1998 by its owner and operator, Horizon West Healthcare, a wholly owned subsidiary of Horizon West, based in Rocklin.

A Horizon West spokeswoman, Susan Bitar, said the reporting errors were the result of a ``complex and outdated system" used to record nursing hours.

``These errors could not and would not be made today," she said.

The conviction follows an August agreement by Horizon West to pay $14.7 million to settle a 2000 lawsuit brought by a former employee, Julia Lee, and the Justice Department. The settlement will be paid out over five years, according to the agreement.

Lee originally filed the action under a federal law that permits whistle-blowers to sue on behalf of the government, alerting prosecutors to the inflated Medicare reports.

Lee and the government are in negotiations over her percentage of the settlement, Macaulay said.

Neither Lee nor her attorney could be reached for comment Tuesday.

House Panel Moves FOIA Bill Forward (AP-Y)

By Laurie Kellman

AP, September 28, 2006

A House panel advanced a bill to close gaps in the Freedom of Information Act and speed the release of government documents, but the legislation seemed unlikely to pass this year.

The legislation, approved unanimously by a House Government Reform subcommittee, would penalize federal agencies that fail to respond to FOIA requests in a reasonable period of time.

The subcommittee added a provision not in a similar measure passed last week by the Senate Judiciary Committee. The amendment by Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., would revoke two Bush administration memos that directed agencies to withhold information from FOIA requests when that information would threaten national security.

The House bill awaits action by the full committee, the Senate's by the full Senate.

The legislation appears likely to fall victim to Congress' end-of-session rush to recess this week so lawmakers can head home to campaign for re-election.

Given the workload, House and Senate Republican officials said no plans have been made to take up the FOIA bill during a weeklong session now scheduled between the Nov. 7 election and Thanksgiving.

Nonetheless, it was significant that the Republican-led subcommittee adopted Waxman's amendment on reversing the White House's memos.

After the Sept. 11 attacks, then-Attorney General John Ashcroft shifted from the Clinton administration's policy of "maximum responsible disclosure" to one emphasizing "institutional, commercial and personal privacy interests" when considering FOIA requests.

In 2002, then-White House chief of staff Andrew Card sent a memo to agencies to "safeguard" information that could help in the development or use of weapons of mass destruction, or that could be used "to harm the security of our nation."

The Bush administration has removed thousands of documents from public access on the basis of those two actions, according to government watchdog groups and federal agencies.

The new legislation restates the 1966 act's "strong presumption in favor of disclosure."

Court Doesn't Intervene In 'Electioneering' Case (RC)

By Matthew Murray

Roll Call, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070449

A federal court Wednesday refused to intervene in a dispute between a Maine nonprofit organization and the Federal Election Commission regarding the group's right to air a television advertisement during a federally restricted blackout period.

A three-judge panel of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia ruled that the FEC was correct in determining that claims by Christian Civic Life off Maine, Inc., were "not ripe" and "too speculative."

The group had sought to run an issue-based advertisement identifying Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) within 30 days of a primary election. Running the ad could have been a violation of the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002.

In May, the same court denied the group's request for preliminary injunctive relief.

"We are very pleased that this case has been dismissed, and the 'electioneering communication' provisions of BCRA stand in place as written by Congress and upheld by the Supreme Court," said Fred Wertheimer, president of the campaign-finance watchdog group Democracy 21.

Jan Baran, a GOP election lawyer, said the ruling's significance is limited, but that the court will ultimately have to address the issue again.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Discrimination Case Opens Door To Internet ADA Claims (LAW)

By Sheri Qualters, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, September 28, 2006

Judge's ruling moves case forward against Target Corp.

A federal judge's decision not to dismiss a discrimination case against retailer Target Corp. for operating a Web site inaccessible to the blind opens the door to Internet-related Americans with Disabilities Act claims.

The recent order is believed to the first ruling from a judge that the ADA can apply to the Internet, and lawyers from both sides of the bar anticipate more cases.

"To limit the ADA to discrimination in the provision of services occurring on the premises of a public accommodation would contradict the plain language of that statute," wrote U.S. District Judge Marilyn Hall Patel, who sits in San Francisco. "To the extent defendant argues that plaintiffs' claims are not cognizable because they occur away from a 'place' of public accommodation, defendant's argument must fail."

Patel declined the National Federation of the Blind's request for a preliminary injunction requiring Target to immediately update its site. She said that there is no emergency to address and that more discovery is needed to investigate Target's claim that the average blind person is able to access its Web site now. National Federation of the Blind v. Target, No. 06-01802 (N.D. Calif.).

COMPANIES UNAWARE

There will be continued exploration of the applicability of the ADA and certain state laws to commercial Web sites, predicted Daniel F. Goldstein of Brown, Goldstein & Levy in Baltimore. Goldstein represents the plaintiff in the case, Baltimore-based National Federation of the Blind. "It's too important of an economic activity for the blind to be excluded," Goldstein said.

The federation, which filed the lawsuit as a class action on behalf of all blind people unable to access Target's site, encourages members to report inaccessible Web sites. Companies are often unaware of the problem and usually quick to update their Web sites, but Minneapolis-based Target was one of the exceptions, said spokesman John Pare.

The federation's dispute with Target is not its first lawsuit seeking Internet access, but it's the first to reach such an advanced stage, Pare said.

Several years ago, the federation dropped an earlier lawsuit against America Online (before its absorption by Time Warner Inc.) when the company agreed to update the site. Although the federation declined to publicly name other potential lawsuit targets, it's prepared for other court battles, Pare said.

Although "disappointed" that the case was not entirely dismissed, Target said it is heartened by the court's decision to deny the federation a preliminary injunction, according to a company statement.

DOJ_NMG_0070450

"We believe our Web site complies with all applicable laws and are committed to vigorously defending this case. We will continue to implement technology that increases the usability of our Web site for all our guests, including those with disabilities," Target said.

Al Mohajerian, whose Los Angeles-based Mohajerian Law Corp. handles many ADA cases, said "common sense" leads him to believe that making Web sites accessible to the blind will be required if compliance is not too expensive.

"If you're opening doors one way or the other for the public to do shopping, you have to consider the disabled," Mohajerian said.

The federation estimates that Target would need to spend between $20,000 to $40,000 to retrofit its Web site, but Pare said the extra work to make Web sites accessible at the beginning is "negligible."

Blind users need screen-reading software installed on their own computer to read accessible Web sites. Accessible sites include alt-text code, which allows the software to recite a description of graphic images. Pare also noted that offering online shopping is important to the blind, who often would otherwise need to rely on other people for rides or pay for transportation to get to a store.

Plaintiffs' lawyers with ADA experience also say the case may go in favor of the federation. Web sites for stores like Target are closely tied to their retail operation, which is defined by the law as a place of public accommodation, said attorney Barry Weintraub of Stafford, Va.

Weintraub also noted that the ADA requires access rather than specific architectural features.

"Just because you don't have a per se violation like a ramp with too much of a slope, that doesn't mean you can't bring an action under the general provision of no discrimination," Weintraub said.

Voting Is Tricky Mission For Troops Waiting For Ballots In Battlefield (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — Election year after election year, tens of thousands of overseas voters fail to complete the time-consuming process of registering to vote, requesting a ballot, receiving it and mailing it back before polls close. As a result, their votes aren't counted.

Pentagon officials say the situation is particularly troublesome for troops in battle, who often are redeployed before mail reaches them. Michael Dominguez, principal deputy undersecretary of Defense for personnel and readiness, calls it “the special challenge of reaching the deployed warrior on the battlefield.”

Again this year, many states are still preparing their fall ballots after recent primaries:

•In Wisconsin, a Sept. 12 primary prevented election officials from readying the fall ballot. Kevin Kennedy, executive director of the state Elections Board, says it will be mailed out about 30 days before the elections Nov. 7, rather than the preferred 45 days. The state is among at least 17 that will accept returned ballots later this year.

•In Minnesota, scene of another Sept. 12 primary, officials hope to get ballots sent to overseas voters about 35 days before the elections. “There is no question that the timetable puts their votes at risk,” Secretary of State Mary Kiffmeyer says.

•In Washington, scene of a Sept. 19 primary, the Legislature has voted to move future state primaries to August. That would help in cases like the governor's race in 2004, which was so close it took seven months to determine Christine Gregoire's 133-vote victory.

Scott Wiedmann, deputy director of the Federal Voting Assistance Program at the Pentagon, says at least six states have begun mailing out overseas absentee ballots. The elections are 40 days away.

The Department of Justice has won consent decrees from several states to get more time for overseas votes to be counted.

The Federal Voting Assistance Program is working with post offices to get mail to the 142,000 troops in Iraq and 21,000 in Afghanistan.

Until 2004, Pentagon officials considered Internet voting, but its security was in doubt. The Pentagon pushes alternatives such as faxing and e-mailing.

DOJ_NMG_0070451

"We want to make sure that they have some options out there if the mail doesn't get through," says Polly Brunelli, director of the Federal Voting Assistance Program.

Susan Dzieduszycka-Suinat, executive director of the Overseas Vote Foundation, says those solutions will improve timing at the expense of voters' right to privacy. "I find it offensive that to be able to vote and have our ballots counted on time, we have to give up confidentiality," she says.

Robert Carey, a senior fellow with the National Defense Committee, a grass-roots group that lobbies for a stronger military, says Internet voting should be reconsidered.

While stationed in Bahrain with the Navy, he says, mail usually took two weeks to reach him and two weeks to get back to the USA. If the Internet is secure enough for financial transactions and classified military documents, he says, it should be good enough for votes.

Ray Martinez, former vice chairman of the commission, sees both sides of the debate. Using e-mail and fax machines compromises ballot secrecy and is "not the long-term solution," he says. "But at least it ensures that these voters don't get disenfranchised."

Overseas Voting A Concern — Again (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — Six years after problems counting overseas votes clouded the 2000 presidential election, U.S. troops and other Americans abroad face tight timetables and emerging technologies that still make it difficult to have their votes counted.

•Fourteen states with September primaries risk getting absentee ballots out too late for remote voters to return them in time.

•Efforts to speed things by using e-mail and fax machines pose a risk to voters' confidentiality.

•Websites intended to help overseas voters navigate the process are not widely used. A private group's site was taken down earlier this month in a contract dispute.

The problems with timing and technology concern federal election officials, who try to ensure that overseas votes are counted on time. An estimated 29% of troops who wanted to vote did not get absentee ballots in 2000 or received them too late.

About 3.7 million Americans live overseas, and more than 400,000 members of the military are stationed or deployed overseas. In 2004, Pentagon officials estimate, 58% of Americans abroad voted, compared with overall turnout of 60%. Military participation overseas was estimated at 75%.

Those figures are disputed by the federal Election Assistance Commission (EAC) and the Government Accountability Office because of the sample size and response rate.

"You cut the time so short that people start getting disenfranchised," says Paul DeGregorio, chairman of the EAC, which held a hearing in St. Louis last week on issues concerning overseas voting. "This problem needs to be addressed nationwide."

The Senate Armed Services Committee has scheduled a hearing on the issue for today.

The biggest problem is timing. Polly Brunelli, director of the Pentagon's Federal Voting Assistance Program, and other experts say there should be 45 days between the time ballots are sent to voters and when completed ballots are received at election offices. Only 40 days remain until the Nov. 7 general election.

Congress has approved $2.5 million for the expansion of Web technologies, including e-mail and secure-server transactions. Those methods risk voters' privacy.

Fewer than one in five uniformed military personnel know about Pentagon websites, according to a March report by the Pentagon's inspector general. And the Overseas Vote Foundation's website, which helps users register and request ballots, recently had to be taken down and reconfigured.

DeGregorio says the problems may require legislation setting deadlines for states to send out ballots. Internet voting deserves another look, after a $22 million project was scrapped in 2004, he says. "I believe the technology can be found to fix this problem," he says.

Restore Voter Confidence (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0070452

By Henry Hyde

USA Today, September 28, 2006

The Constitution guarantees every citizen the right to vote. The integrity of elections is central to our democracy. Because of increasing concern over electoral fraud, the House passed the Federal Election Integrity Act (FEIA) mandating that voters present proof of citizenship and a valid photo ID when registering to vote. A valid photo ID would also be required at the polling place.

Not surprisingly, FEIA has met strong opposition from the majority of Democrats, who support amnesty, a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants. The vote in the House was 228-196, mostly along party lines.

Contrary to false claims, the federal government would provide funding for people who proved they can't afford a valid ID card.

FEIA follows the REAL ID Act of 2005, which requires citizenship status on driver's licenses starting in 2008. This measure was recommended by the bipartisan Carter-Baker Commission on Federal Election Reform.

Objections were made that people in rural areas would not have access to photo services, but these can be provided at driver's license facilities, township offices, municipal offices or any local facility designated by the election board.

We are required every day to present valid identification when applying for Social Security, Medicare, Medicaid, township services such as food stamps or housing, driver's licenses, insurance, entering a nursing facility, or opening a bank account.

When the bill reaches a House-Senate conference committee we can, by amendment, permit people objecting to photos on religious grounds to have retinal scans.

Overseas active duty military personnel absent from the USA on Election Day are excepted from this provision.

This proposal would not disenfranchise anyone who wants to vote. Our purpose is to stop fraud and to ensure every citizen the right to vote.

In Washington state 1,678 illegal votes were cast in the 2004 general election, which exceeded the margin of victory. Some voters have been told at the polls that they have already voted! Residents of cemeteries vote. A member of the New York City Council proposed allowing illegal immigrants to vote in local elections.

By enacting this bill, we can help restore confidence in our system and thereby encourage voter participation.

Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., is chief sponsor of the Federal Election Integrity Act.

ANTITRUST:

Mittal Prefers To Sell Weirton (BSUN)

By Allison Connolly, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, September 28, 2006

For Sparrows Point, 'it's good news,' plant manager says

Mittal Steel Co. NV said yesterday that it plans to sell its Weirton, W.Va., mill rather than Sparrows Point if it's compelled to dispose of a U.S. property to settle antitrust issues.

Netherlands-based Mittal said it had identified at least 10 potential buyers for the West Virginia property, easing concerns at the Baltimore County plant, which Mittal acquired in 2005. Sparrows Point employs nearly 2,500 salaried and hourly workers.

Mittal must sell either Weirton, Sparrows Point or Canadian steelmaker Dofasco in the wake of its $38 billion merger with Luxembourg-based Arcelor SA to appease Justice Department officials, who say the combined company, Arcelor Mittal, would have a monopoly on tin production in the United States.

Mittal has promised to sell Dofasco to German-owned ThyssenKrupp AG, but despite the merger agreement, Arcelor officials refuse to let it go. In one of a series of moves to fend off Mittal's nearly six-month hostile takeover bid, Arcelor transferred Dofasco to a Dutch trust, making a sale without Arcelor's consent impossible.

The Justice Department has given Mittal until Nov. 28 to sell Dofasco, with the option of a 60-day extension. If Mittal is unable to sell Dofasco, the Justice Department will give Mittal 90 days to sell either Sparrows Point or Weirton.

DOJ_NMG_0070453

In a slide presentation posted on Arcelor Mittal's Web site yesterday, Mittal's Chief Financial Officer Aditya Mittal said the company still wants to sell Dofasco but has begun discussions with the Justice Department about Weirton.

Sparrows Point was not mentioned in that slide, but later in the presentation, the Point was listed as a "key facility" in the "largest and most efficient industrial network in the Americas."

Ultimately, the Justice Department must sign off on which plant is sold and to what buyer.

Employees at Weirton and Sparrows Point were cautiously optimistic yesterday about the development.

"Overall, it's good news for us," said Sparrows Point General Manager Thomas Russo. "Not knowing who the potential buyer would be, it wasn't a good place to be."

"We've been going through a period of uncertainty," echoed John Cirri, president of United Steelworkers Local 9477, which represents production workers at the plant.

Sparrows Point isn't out of the woods entirely. Justice Department officials toured Sparrows Point last week, Russo said.

"It's not a done deal until the Department of Justice says it is, but it's a good sign they're leaning that way [toward Weirton]," Russo said.

A Justice Department spokeswoman declined comment.

In Weirton, workers have been lobbying Mittal to sell the plant to an investor who will restart the steelmaking furnaces. Mittal idled them last year and sent the hot-metal work to Sparrows Point because the Baltimore County plant was more efficient. About 1,000 workers in Weirton lost their jobs, and the plant was reduced to a finishing mill.

"They're good facilities, and we're willing to make it as efficient as we possibly could make it," said Mark Glyptis, president of the Independent Steelworkers Union, which represents workers at the Weirton plant.

Glyptis said Weirton has more capacity to produce tin than either Sparrows Point or Dofasco and would be a valuable acquisition. He said the union proposed a plan to Mittal to reduce costs by $90 million a year before Mittal decided to shut down the furnaces.

Mitchell Hecht, a former executive at International Steel Group, which sold Weirton and Sparrows Point to Mittal, has expressed interest in buying Weirton and restarting its furnaces, Glyptis said.

Steel analyst Charles Bradford, of New York City-based Bradford Research Inc., is skeptical that there are 10 serious buyers for Weirton. But he said there is room for another player in the tin market: Mittal and U.S. Steel Corp. control more than 80 percent of tin plate production in the United States. The rest is made by Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel. The tin is used to make cans for food and hairspray, among other products.

"The market for tin plate is a good market," he said.

Bradford said ThyssenKrupp is not interested in tin, and wants Dofasco because it provides high-grade steel sheet for the lucrative auto market

Also yesterday, Arcelor Mittal announced that it would distribute 30 percent of its profits to shareholders, promising a minimum annual dividend of $1.30 a share.

allison.connolly@baltsun.com

Federated Stores Says Icahn Plans To Increase Stake (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Cotten Timberlake

Bloomberg, September 28, 2006

Sept. 27 (Bloomberg) -- Federated Department Stores Inc., owner of Macy's and Bloomingdale's, said billionaire investor Carl Icahn plans to buy $113.4 million to $500 million of additional stock, sending the retailer's shares to a record.

If Icahn purchases $500 million of Federated stock, he would be acquiring about 11.5 million shares at today's price and boosting his stake to 2.5 percent. Icahn, 70, notified Federated of his plans to seek regulatory approval for the purchase, the company said today in a statement.

Icahn is known as a corporate raider, taking stakes in companies and forcing management to take steps to improve stock prices. Federated shares have more than tripled since February 2003.

``Carl Icahn is almost never a passive investor," said Pat McGurn, executive vice president and special counsel at Institutional Shareholder Services. ``He traditionally has gone after companies whose stock prices are weak, so it will be interesting to see what his take will be in this situation." McGurn's Rockville, Maryland-based firm advises investors on how to vote proxies.

Federated, the second-biggest U.S. department store company after Sears Holdings Corp., converted more than 400 stores to the Macy's name earlier this month, doubling the total. The stores were acquired as part of last year's $11 billion purchase of May Department Stores Co.

Shares Jump

Shares of Federated jumped $1.48, or 3.6 percent, to $43.13 at 2:11 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. It earlier reached a record $43.90. The stock had already rallied 26 percent this year through yesterday, more than triple the 7.1 percent gain in the Standard & Poor's 500 Index. Federated has a market value of $23.4 billion.

Federated said in a statement today that it welcomed Icahn's plans. ``We're glad Mr. Icahn sees value in our company," Chief Executive Officer Terry Lundgren said. Icahn didn't return phone calls seeking comment.

Icahn Management LP held 2.01 million shares, or 0.37 percent, of Cincinnati-based Federated's outstanding stock, as of June 30, Bloomberg data shows.

Regulators

Anyone who purchases more than $58 million in a company must report it to antitrust enforcers at the U.S. Justice Department and Federal Trade Commission. The requirement gives the government an opportunity to determine if the transaction poses any antitrust problems. The government has 30 days to decide whether to open an antitrust investigation.

Icahn earlier this year tried and failed to take control of Time Warner Inc., the world's largest media company. He pushed the company to boost its stock-buyback program to $20 billion from $12.5 billion, and slash $1 billion in costs. He also urged a break up of Time Warner in an effort to boost the stock price.

On Sept. 7, Icahn agreed to sell the oil and natural-gas unit of his American Real Estate Partners LP to Riata Energy Inc. for $1.52 billion, 10 times what he paid for the business three years ago.

Icahn informed Federated ``very recently" that he intended to make the regulatory filing, spokesman Jim Sluzewski said, declining to be more specific. ``We were notified and we felt the obligation to report it," said Sluzewski. ``This is consistent with what other companies have done and potentially a material development."

To contact the reporters on this story: Cotten Timberlake in New York at ctimberlake@bloomberg.net

Judge Dismisses Key Part Of AMD Antitrust Lawsuit Against Intel, Sets Trial Date (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jordan Robertson, Ap Business Writer

AP, September 28, 2006

(AP) - SAN JOSE, California-A federal judge dismissed a major portion of Advanced Micro Devices Inc.'s antitrust lawsuit against archrival Intel Corp., ruling that AMD cannot sue in the U.S. for Intel's alleged monopolistic tactics overseas.

The judge also set a trial date of April 27, 2009 for AMD to argue that Intel forced major customers into exclusive deals and offered secret rebates to undercut AMD in the market for microprocessors that act as the brains of computers.

U.S. District Judge Joseph J. Farnan Jr. set the 2009 trial date Wednesday, a day after stripping a key component from AMD's lawsuit, which alleges anticompetitive practices in several countries including Britain, Germany and Japan.

On Tuesday, the Delaware-based judge ruled that AMD failed to prove that Intel's alleged strong-arm tactics abroad had "direct, substantial and foreseeable effects" on AMD's operations in the United States.

Santa Clara-based Intel, the world's largest computer chip maker, argued that AMD should not be able to sue in the U.S. for alleged lost sales of microprocessors that were made and sold in other countries. It also argued that part of AMD's case should be dismissed because AMD was seeking redress abroad for "foreign commerce claims."

AMD, which filed its lawsuit in June 2005, maintains that the market for microprocessors is global and that Intel's conduct domestically and abroad are inextricably linked.

The ruling was a big win for Intel but much of the case remains intact.

"We are pleased that the judge understood and agreed with our argument and analysis of the law," said Intel spokesman Chuck Mulloy. "Nonetheless, we plan to vigorously defend ourselves on the remaining portions of this case."

AMD has not yet decided whether to appeal the ruling, said company spokesman Michael Silverman.

"Intel cannot escape antitrust scrutiny for its conduct," Tom McCoy, AMD's executive vice president for legal affairs, said in a statement. "As this U.S. litigation is joined by global antitrust investigations, it is clear that Intel cannot escape the consequences of its illegal monopoly abuses."

Symantec: Microsoft Won't Give Us Key Vista Tech (CNET)

By Tom Espiner, Special to CNET News.com

CNET News, September 28, 2006

Security rival says Microsoft is withholding spyware APIs for Windows update, but software giant denies it.

Symantec has accused Microsoft of withholding key information about its upcoming Vista operating system in an attempt to gain an advantage in the security market.

The security specialist said this week that Microsoft is refusing to hand over the application programmable interfaces (APIs) for Windows Defender, the spyware product that will be included in Windows Vista. Without the APIs, Symantec contends that it's unable to ensure that its own security products are compatible with the update.

"Microsoft is affirmatively introducing bottlenecks to funnel customers to their products," said John Brigden, Symantec senior vice president for Europe. "It's all about control and dominance. They are deliberately delaying giving us the APIs."

Microsoft responded to Symantec's concerns on Wednesday, and said it had made the APIs for Defender available earlier this week.

"As a result of our ongoing dialogue with partners and our customers, Microsoft decided in August this year to add the ability for any security software company to programmatically disable Windows Defender access through an API," a Microsoft representative said.

"Availability of the Defender APIs was announced to security partners on Friday, Sept. 22, 2006, and we understand Symantec requested and received the go-ahead to develop on that API on Monday, Sept. 25," Microsoft said.

Microsoft added the functionality to disable Windows Defender in Release Candidate 1 of Vista, or RC1, which came out early this month. There may have been some confusion in the industry because the accompanying information for developers, called a software development kit, or SDK, did not provide details on the functionality, the company said.

"Two weeks after releasing RC1, we provided the follow-up documentation, which was released out-of-band; normally we release it with major milestones," said Adrien Robinson, business development manager at Microsoft. "The confusion, I think, that people are having is that the functionality is not in the RC1 SDK, and the reason for that is that we added it just before RC1."

Symantec, though, insists that the APIs still aren't available.

The timing of the release of APIs is crucial for Symantec, as it is due to ship a Vista-compatible Norton antivirus product to PC makers in October.

"No one has received any information about Defender, and we're coming up to an OEM (original equipment manufacturers) shipment date in October. It's three weeks away," Brigden said.

Symantec has partnerships with equipment manufacturers Dell, Fujitsu, Hewlett-Packard, IBM, Sony and Toshiba, among others. The antivirus vendor is worried that Microsoft will hand over the APIs so late that Symantec won't be able to make its antivirus software compatible with Vista in time.

"Microsoft will provide information about two days before the October shipment date, and say, 'We've given you the APIs.' Now, we're good, but we're not good enough (to integrate Norton with Defender) in that time," a Symantec representative said.

Symantec hopes the APIs will be supplied before that. It would not comment on the potential damage to its relationships with PC partners should it not have enough time to integrate Norton into Vista.

DOJ_NMG_0070456

The entry of Microsoft into the security market has put incumbents on their guard, given the software giant's $34 billion cash pile and a hefty presence on desktops. On top of this, European Commission regulators and Microsoft are in the middle of a tussle over the potential antitrust impact of security components in Vista.

Security vendor McAfee is also irked that Microsoft has not provided APIs for Defender. Sources close to the company confirmed that Microsoft has not provided the APIs, and that senior McAfee executives "really have a bee in their bonnets" about the situation.

McAfee is concerned that there will be compatibility problems between its security systems and Vista, and that customers will not be able to remove Defender from their systems, CNET News.com sister site ZDNet UK has learned.

Symantec and McAfee are battling Microsoft for the ability to replace the Windows Security Center with their own security consoles. Additionally, the security companies also claim the PatchGuard feature in 64-bit editions of Vista excludes them but lets in hackers.

Tom Espiner reported for ZDNet UK in London. CNET News.com's Joris Evers contributed to this report.

Johnson & Johnson Charges Leak To Competitor Subverted $24B Acquisition (LAW)

By Martin C. Daks, New Jersey Law Journal

New Jersey Law Journal, September 28, 2006

Johnson & Johnson has filed suit in federal court against Abbott Laboratories and two medical device manufacturers, seeking at least $5.5 billion for alleged tortious interference and breach of a merger agreement.

The New Brunswick, N.J.-based health care company charges that a planned $24.2 billion acquisition of Guidant Corp. of Indianapolis was scotched in early January after Guidant leaked confidential information to another manufacturer, Boston Scientific Corp., which ultimately bought Guidant for $27 billion.

Harold Paul Weinberger of Kramer, Levin, Naftalis & Frankel in New York, represents J&J in the suit, filed Monday in the Southern District of New York.

In December 2004, J&J announced it had structured an agreement to buy Guidant, a heart device manufacturer. To ease antitrust regulators' fears, the companies agreed to grant a nonexclusive license for certain Guidant patents to Abbott Labs, a competing health care company based in Columbus, Ohio.

J&J says the terms of the deal prohibited Guidant from providing confidential information to any other company unless the third party was making a superior, unsolicited takeover offer. That caveat was designed to keep Guidant from using its agreement with J&J to shop around for higher offers.

Last December, Boston Scientific made a $25 billion offer for Guidant, later upped to $27 billion, and, as part of its formal offer on Jan. 8, said it would ease antitrust fears by selling certain Guidant businesses to Abbott. Abbott in turn agreed to make a $700 million loan to Boston Scientific.

J&J alleges that Abbott was induced to cooperate when it received confidential information about Guidant. The complaint contends that J&J was alerted to the alleged breach by a comment Boston Scientific CFO Lawrence Best made during a Jan. 9 conference call about its deal with Guidant. The complaint quotes Best as saying, "We had the opportunity to do a certain level of due diligence. Abbott had the opportunity to do a much deeper dive on due diligence."

J&J charges that at some point between the announcement of Boston Scientific's bid on Dec. 5 and submission of its formal proposal on Jan. 8, "Guidant not only allowed Boston Scientific to conduct due diligence on it [sic] business but also disclosed even more confidential business information to Abbott -- which had no independent right to receive any information."

J&J claims that, based on the disclosures, Abbott agreed to enter into a divestiture and financing agreement with Boston Scientific that allowed the company to make an offer for Guidant that "would not require a lengthy and uncertain antitrust review." In turn, that advantage gave Guidant the opening to accept Boston's offer as "superior" to J&J's.

Paul Donovan, a spokesman for Boston Scientific and Guidant, said Wednesday, "We believe the suit is meritless. ... Throughout this process, we complied with all the terms of the J&J/Guidant merger agreement."

Melissa Brotz, a spokeswoman for Abbott, likewise said the suit is "without merit."

DOJ_NMG_0070457

Some outside observers, however, say J&J's case may have merit, though it won't be an open-and-shut decision. "We think the prepackaged asset sale was needed to complete the deal financially and to gain FTC [Federal Trade commission] okay," Robert Gold, a Standard & Poor's analyst who covers Boston Scientific, said in a research note dated Tuesday. "But we think ABT's [Abbott's] due diligence may have violated terms of JNJ's offer for Guidant. We think BSX [Boston Scientific] investment risks are raised by this development."

Late Wednesday, Boston Scientific stock traded at $14.85 a share, up a nickel from Tuesday's close but off from the 12-month high of $27.82 reached last Dec. 2.

E.On Closes In On Endesa Deal (WSJ)

By KEITH JOHNSON And JASON SINGER

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

German utility E.On AG's richer offer for Endesa SA is expected to clinch an approval from the Spanish power company's board, according to people close to the matter, a move that could close an acrimonious 13-month takeover battle and open the door to a broad remodeling of the European energy sector.

Should E.On's €37 billion ($47 billion) all-cash offer go through, one of the first effects could be an acceleration of a merger between Iberdrola SA and Union Fenosa SA, Spain's second- and third-biggest electricity companies. That would create another Spanish company big enough to fend off foreign suitors and even make acquisitions abroad. It would also leave smaller regional power companies, such as Spain's Gas Natural SDG SA or Energia de Portugal SA, prey to a second wave of consolidation.

E.On's offer comes as energy companies are rushing to bulk up ahead of a full liberalization of Europe's electricity sector next summer, when power companies from any European Union country will be allowed to operate in any other member state.

So far, cross-border deals have been limited, often by national governments. High oil prices and energy shocks, such as a natural-gas dispute between Russia and Ukraine last winter, have also stoked fears in Europe regarding the security of energy supplies, leading to a rise in protectionism. Still, major European power companies such as E.On and Italy's Enel SpA have built up sizable war chests of cash and grown by expanding into Eastern Europe.

In recent years, Spanish utility companies were forced to watch this game from the sidelines, as a succession of Spanish governments handcuffed their efforts to consolidate, even as their European competitors bulked up.

Now, however, as the European Union has started knocking down obstacles to a single market, Spanish companies are being drawn into the action. On Tuesday, the EU executive body, the European Commission, struck down the Spanish government's conditions designed to block E.On's bid. That ruling is expected to hasten the creation of pan-European energy titans, following in the path of industries such as banking, telecommunications and infrastructure management, which have already seen a wave of consolidation across the Continent.

If completed, E.On's bid for Endesa would be Europe's biggest cross-border electricity deal, and would create one of the Continent's largest power companies.

Endesa will not be free to study E.On's improved offer until it is approved by Spanish authorities, which could take as long as six weeks. Spain's Industry Ministry must first rule on a legal complaint by Endesa against an earlier, €21 billion hostile bid by Gas Natural SDG. Endesa's legal maneuvers have paralyzed both takeover bids. Analysts say Gas Natural, a company roughly a third the size of Endesa by market cap, will be hard-pressed to sweeten its cash-and-share offer to compete with E.On's new bid of €35 a share, 38% higher than its previous offer.

E.On's improved bid for Endesa won't be trouble-free. It comes one day after Spanish builder and energy company Acciona SA purchased a 10% stake in Endesa for €3.4 billion at €32 a share. E.On Chief Executive Wulf Bernotat said that he sweetened the offer in reaction to the Acciona purchase, and that it was meant "to send the right signal, so everybody concerned knows we mean business."

Mr. Bernotat said that Acciona officials indicated a desire to talk to the German company, and that he was open to a discussion. He suggested E.On wouldn't be opposed to Acciona remaining a shareholder in a combined company, but said it is too early to say for sure what the shareholder structure would look like. E.On's bid is contingent on securing at least one share more than 50% of Endesa.

E.On's bid is also conditioned on overturning bylaws that limit voting rights in Endesa to 10%, regardless of the size of any holder's stake. Acciona could be hoping to rally other big Endesa shareholders, and be in a position to block any change in Endesa's bylaws at a shareholders' meeting that would be called if E.On's bid goes ahead. That would defeat the E.On bid and allow Acciona to focus on its stated goal of "leading" Endesa as part of its aggressive push into electricity generation.

"Our plans haven't changed" despite the new E.On bid, said Acciona spokesman Javier de Mendizabal. "We are still the leading player," he said.

Acciona's swoop on Endesa was followed quickly by another builder's move on Iberdrola, which people close to the deal say could be a prelude to another merger. Actividades de Construccion y Servicios SA, or ACS, said yesterday it had paid €2.1 billion for a 6.3% stake in Iberdrola. The builder asked banks to secure a 10% stake, at €37 a share, on Tuesday afternoon, but ACS couldn't find sellers for the full 10%. ACS already is the biggest shareholder in Fenosa, with a 35% stake.

ACS said yesterday that it "had not taken any decision to promote a merger" between the two companies. An Iberdrola spokesman said, "We have not had any negotiations with Fenosa" regarding a merger. Fenosa declined to comment.

Endesa shares rose 7.7% to €35, and Iberdrola shares soared 14% to €38.16 in Madrid yesterday.

Speculation about a deal involving Iberdrola spilled over into Portugal, where the Spanish company has a 9.5% stake in state-controlled Energia de Portugal. Shares in the utility rose 6.2% yesterday. Analysts said EDP would be a likely takeover target by one of the big Spanish groups.

Rural Areas Left In Slow Lane Of High-Speed Data Highway (NYT)

By Ken Belson

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

CANAAN, Vt. — For most businesses, the goal is to attract as many customers as possible. But in the fast-changing telephone industry, companies are increasingly trying to get rid of many of theirs.

Bill and Ursula Johnson are among the unwanted. These dairy farmers in bucolic northeastern Vermont wake up before dawn not just to milk their cows, but to log on to the Internet, too.

Their dial-up connection is so pokey that the only time they can reliably get onto the Web site of the company that handles their payroll is at 4 in the morning, when it is less busy. Mr. Johnson doubles as state representative for the area, and he doesn't even bother logging on to deal with that. He communicates with colleagues in Montpelier, the capital, by phone and post instead.

The Johnsons' communication agony could soon get worse. Instead of upgrading them to high-speed Internet access, Verizon, their local phone company, is looking to sell the 1.6 million local phone lines it controls in Vermont, New Hampshire and Maine. The possible sale is part of an internal plan called Project Nor'easter, according to a person with knowledge of the details.

A Verizon spokesman, John Bonomo, would not comment on the plan, but said the company "continually evaluates the assets and properties in our portfolio for strategic fit and financial performance."

Verizon is not alone in its desire to reduce the number of landlines it owns. Big phone and cable companies are reluctant to upgrade and expand their networks in sparsely populated places where there are not enough customers to justify the investment. Instead, they are funneling billions of dollars into projects in cities and suburbs where the prospects for a decent return are higher.

But those projects are unlikely to reach rural areas of Vermont and other states, leaving millions of people in the Internet's slow lane, just as high-speed access is becoming more of a necessity than a luxury. The United States already lags behind much of the industrialized world in broadband access.

The lack of broadband has preserved places like Bessie's Diner as Canaan's de facto meeting hall. Over burgers and turkey club sandwiches, local residents swap tidbits that, in a more wired world, might end up in e-mail and instant messages.

Helen Masson, who lost her job at an Ethan Allen furniture factory a few years ago, grumbles that the lack of broadband has made it harder for her to find work, despite taking computer classes. Mr. Johnson, sitting nearby, nods in agreement. "The staff at the statehouse shudder when I'm on a committee because they have to lick a stamp instead of pressing a send button," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0070459

Verizon has sold phone lines before. In 2005, the Carlyle Group bought its business in Hawaii. Verizon also sold 1.3 million lines in Alabama, Kentucky and Missouri in 2002.

Others have followed. In May, Sprint Nextel spun off its local phone division with 7.1 million lines and renamed it Embarq. In July, Alltel spun off its local phone group and merged it with Valor Communications.

If Verizon does sell the New England lines, it would most likely be to a smaller company or private equity group that could be even less capable of offering fast Internet access. That prospect has Vermonters fearful that the exodus of jobs and employers from the state could accelerate.

"We have companies that lose money because they don't have broadband," said Maureen Connolly, a director at the Economic Development Council of Northern Vermont. "We're not a third world country. We shouldn't have to beg for service."

While selling off slow-growing landlines in New England may please Verizon's shareholders seeking higher returns, the company's plan has reignited long-simmering political and economic debates about whether the region is being left behind as wealthier states nearby pull further ahead.

The proceeds from any sale of New England lines would help Verizon pay for the potentially more lucrative fiber optic network it is building in and around cities like New York and Boston.

The network is part of Verizon's push to transform itself into a fast-growing technology company and shed its image as a stodgy utility.

The possibility that Verizon would sell local lines is another sign of how much the phone business has changed in the last half decade. Verizon and other former local phone monopolies argue that since the cellphone, cable and Internet companies that are luring away millions of their customers are not compelled to serve remote and rural places, then they should not have to bear that burden either.

In Vermont, Verizon has broadband available on just 56 percent of its 330,000 lines, compared with 95 percent for most local phone companies, which receive substantial federal subsidies. Without the same aid, Verizon must bear more of the financial burden to upgrade its network.

"Vermont — like all rural states — has higher fixed costs of providing service," said Polly Brown, president of Verizon Vermont, where the number of landlines has declined 9.1 percent since 2002. "You're spreading those costs over fewer customers, who are located far and wide, and you're dealing with topographical challenges such as mountains and a rock base."

Residents, unions and politicians in Vermont do not dispute that the phone business is a challenging one, but they say that residents will have a harder time telecommuting or home-schooling their children. Towns like Canaan will not have access to the growing number of government records kept online, they say, and hotels and other tourist attractions will have a harder time attracting outsiders.

Take Michael and Louise Kingston, who have had a summer home in nearby Averill for the last 35 years. Owners of a grape-growing company with vineyards in Chile and California, they often cut their vacations short and return home to New Jersey because they cannot run their business on the 26-kilobit dial-up line — a speed considered fast in 1993 — in Averill.

"It means we can spend less time here, which means you spend less money here at a time when the local economy needs it," Mr. Kingston said.

Connections are so slow that their son drives 25 miles south to Island Pond to find a broadband line. There is no cellphone service either, so when locals go to areas where there is reception, they take along other peoples' phones to retrieve their voice mail for them. In places where Verizon does not sell high-speed Internet, some people have the option of getting broadband from their cable provider. But in Vermont, cable companies have focused on more populous towns like Montpelier and Burlington, the state's largest city. Cable coverage in the northeast part of the state is spotty.

Several rural phone carriers have spoken to Verizon about its lines in New England, including Fairpoint Communications, CenturyTel and Citizens Communications, according to people with knowledge of the discussions. Buyout firms may also be considering the business.

DOJ_NMG_0070460

Rural phone lines can be profitable because the basic infrastructure was paid for years ago, there are often few competitors and subsidies from the Universal Service Fund, which helps carriers provide service to hard-to-reach consumers, can be substantial.

But the subsidies do not benefit all carriers equally. For example, Vermont Telecom, which has 21,000 phone lines in the state, will receive $24.34 a month per line in the fourth quarter from the fund, money that is credited to customers on their bills.

But as a larger carrier, Verizon will receive one-tenth the subsidy, or $2.42 per phone line. Any company that buys Verizon's lines will inherit the same subsidies, making such a deal a less attractive investment. Verizon could compensate by lowering its sale price, at the risk of disappointing shareholders.

The economics of providing broadband in rural areas are discouraging, too. The cost of upgrading an existing copper line that runs from switching stations to remote homes can be as much as $5,000, according to the National Exchange Carrier Association. Such costs are prohibitive for phone companies, which typically want to make back their money within three years, said Victor Glass, the director of demand forecasting at the carrier association.

Though frustrations with Verizon run high in places like Canaan, the alternatives are more alarming. Since it took over Verizon's lines in Hawaii, the Carlyle Group has had billing problems that caused a fourfold spike in consumer complaints.

Carlyle's experience could presage what rural areas like northern Vermont might face if Verizon departs, particularly if the buyer sharply cuts costs and jobs.

"We would rather deal with Verizon because there's a process in place and people up and down the food chain that we know," said Darlene Stone, an operator at a Verizon call center in South Burlington and chief steward in the Communications Workers of America, which represents 135 Verizon employees in Vermont. "Private equity funds are not people who are going to be interested in our opinions."

The possibility that a sale could lead to worse service has put regulators in the uneasy position of trying to pressure Verizon to do more while not alienating the company, which invested 37 percent less in its network in Vermont last year than in 2001.

In 2005, the Public Service Board fined Verizon $8.1 million for providing inadequate customer service in Vermont. This year, regulators also got Verizon to agree to expand its broadband coverage to 80 percent of its phone lines by 2010.

That holds out some hope for isolated areas, but there is no guarantee that any particular customer, like the Johnsons, will be among the 80 percent and there is no guarantee that Verizon will still be in Vermont by then.

Alternative broadband providers who could fill that gap face problems, too. Jake Marsh, who runs Island Pond Wireless, a company that beams high-speed Internet signals over strings of antennas, has signed up 250 customers and has a waiting list just as long. But to expand, he is counting on towns getting state funds to help defray the installation costs.

Yet officials in Norton, 15 miles west of Canaan, could not download the 20-page grant application because their dial-up line was so slow.

Cable Guys (WSJ)

By JAMES K. GLASSMAN

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

In an era of partisan nastiness and gridlock, the California legislature did something on Aug. 31 that was shockingly harmonious, reasonable and beneficial to consumers. Both parties voted overwhelmingly to allow competition into a sector -- cable television -- where prices have been elevated and service depressed by the most pernicious monopoly in America.

When Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signs the bill, as expected, companies that want a statewide video franchise can go straight to the Public Utility Commission and get approval to operate within 44 days. In the past, in California, as in other states, cable companies had to make separate deals with America's 33,760 municipal units -- a process that can take years. The local licensing agencies "would often drag their feet and demand unrelated favors such as building parking lots and planting trees," writes Sonia Arrison of the Pacific Research Institute.

The effect was to create cable monopolies that often infuriated captive customers. According to a 2004 study by the Government Accountability Office, "cable subscribers in about 2% of all markets have the opportunity to choose between two or more wire-based operators." As cable rates rose in the 1980s, the federal government tried to fix the market with more regulation.

DOJ_NMG_0070461

That attempt, of course, failed. For the five years ending January 2004, the Federal Communications Commission reports that average cable rates increased 7.8% annually, compared with a 2.1% increase in the Consumer Price Index.

Very quietly, things are changing. Seven states, comprising about one-third of the U.S. population, have now passed video franchise laws, which will not only lower monthly subscriber costs but also create new technology jobs -- 10,000 in California alone, according to one estimate -- as Verizon and AT&T, along with cable overbuilders like RCN, jump in with both feet. To bring high-quality video to the home over a technology called Internet protocol, the telcos will make major investments to drive the fiber -- which carries the data -- much more deeply into their networks. Broadband service will improve; state and local governments will still get their franchise fees. All that will end is a monopoly that drives consumers nuts.

Bills bringing competition to cable have been outrageously popular. In Kansas and South Carolina, the vote in each state house was unanimous; in California, it was 33-4 in the Senate and 68-7 in the House. Supporters range from the National Association of Manufacturers to the Communications Workers of America.

With a national election coming up, you would expect Congress to get on the bandwagon and embrace a version of the state bills, killing the monopoly and taking the credit. Instead, federal legislation is slowed down by measures promoting "net neutrality" -- the concept that telecom companies should be barred from asking content providers, like Amazon, to pay extra for higher-speed service the telcos develop -- the way that an airline asks more for a first-class seat. The House, after rejecting a net-neutrality amendment, passed a video-choice bill, as it's called, by a 3-1 margin in early June. But net neutrality lives in the Senate, and the debate has become tendentious. Moveon.org has taken up the cause, claiming on its website that a tiered system that gives faster delivery to some customers "would end the free and open Internet." Such claims are nonsense, and irrelevant when a federal bill to liberate cable TV is otherwise at hand.

How much will consumers save? A 2004 study by the GAO looked at six markets with cable competition and found that rates were 15% to 41% below similar markets with no competition. Annual savings for U.S. households through competition will total $8 billion, says the Phoenix Center for Advanced Legal and Economic Public Policy.

In Texas, where a statewide franchising law went into effect last year, a study by the American Consumer Institute surveyed consumers and found that 22% switched cable providers and saved an average of $22.30 per month. Subscribers who stayed with incumbent providers saved $26.83 per month because of the downward pressure on prices. Verizon rolled out a service in Keller, Plano and Lewisville, charging $43.95 a month for 180 video and music channels. "Shortly thereafter," writes the Heartland Institute's Steven Titch, Charter, the erstwhile monopoly cable provider, "began offering a bundle of 240 channels and fast Internet service for $50 a month, compared to $68.99 Charter had been charging for the TV package alone." Savings in Texas this year alone will total $599 million, according to the Phoenix Center. Yale Braunstein, an economist at the University of California at Berkeley, estimates that Californians will save between $692 million and $1 billion a year.

Yes, Americans can choose satellite TV, but, for reasons of convenience and service, many find it an inadequate substitute. There's a reason that cable families far outnumber satellite families. "Overall customer satisfaction among satellite subscribers has declined," says Steve Kirkeby, senior director of telecommunication research for J.D. Power and Associates. But if satellite TV improves and becomes a more attractive alternative, what's wrong with having enhanced cable competition, too? The more the merrier is, apparently, an economic concept that some folks in Congress still don't get.

Mr. Glassman is a resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute and editor of its new magazine, "The American." He is also a senior adviser to AT&T Corp.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

No Charges In Sound Oil Spill (SEAPI)

By ROBERT McCLURE AND PAUL SHUKOVSKY, P-I REPORTERS

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, September 28, 2006

ConocoPhillips ship suspected in '04

DOJ_NMG_0070462

After a mysterious midnight oil spill turned central Puget Sound beaches into a stinky mess, the Coast Guard proudly proclaimed that investigators had tracked down the spiller. The oil's chemical fingerprint clearly implicated a ConocoPhillips tanker, the agency said.

That was more than 1 1/2 years ago.

But now, federal prosecutors in Seattle are declining to press criminal charges against ConocoPhillips, even though the chemical fingerprint showed that the substance spilled was crude oil, which is usually carried by tankers such as ConocoPhillips' Polar Texas.

The Polar Texas was in the vicinity of the spill in Dalco Passage, near Vashon and Maury islands, on the night of the October 2004 spill. It was the only oil tanker there that night.

The decision by U.S. Attorney John McKay's office not to prosecute ConocoPhillips, which hasn't acknowledged guilt, doesn't mean the firm is totally off the hook. Federal and state environmental officials are still pushing civil cases against the Houston-based oil company.

And a grand jury in Alaska investigated allegations of criminal conduct by the company in unrelated episodes, including the apparent cover-up of another oil spill. It's unclear whether criminal charges will be brought in that case.

In Seattle, Assistant U.S. Attorney Jim Oesterle would not elaborate on why McKay's office is declining to prosecute, saying commenting might interfere with ongoing negotiations between the company and environmental officials regarding possible civil penalties.

"I'm not prepared at this point to give all the reasons for (declining prosecution), and the reason for not providing more information is I don't want to get ahead of the state or the (Department of Justice) on their resolutions, because I know they're in the midst of those negotiations," Oesterle said.

The state Ecology Department said it and other agencies had been waiting for the outcome of the criminal investigation to launch an effort to recoup damages from the company for the environmental harm done.

The environmental agencies hoped that the company would admit that it spilled the oil and outline how it might have happened, so that the agencies could estimate how much oil spilled, said Dale Davis of the department's oil-spills unit. The oil spill's volume is a key factor in how much the company would have to pay.

"I don't think (waiting for the criminal investigation) helped us any," Davis said. However, there is no time limit on seeking environmental damages.

But there is a two-year time limit for the Ecology Department to pursue a separate process that penalizes the company by making it pay a fine. That expires next month.

"We are aggressively pursuing every option available to make sure justice is done as a result of the Dalco Passage spill," the agency said in a written statement.

The Coast Guard, which investigates oil spills, said it would continue to coordinate possible civil action against the company with a Justice Department unit in San Francisco.

The Coast Guard has declined to provide information about the investigation, rejecting a Freedom of Information Act request by the Seattle P-I on the ground that it has not finished investigating the case.

Lt. Cmdr. Andre Billeaudeaux, a Coast Guard spokesman, said that while he cannot comment on this decision by the U.S. Attorney's Office, "We are true believers in the U.S. attorney's methods."

"They have a measured approach, and they have their methods," Billeaudeaux said. "We do our best and we do a quality job. ... We have so many missions we do and so many irons in the fire. We do our best and move on. If there's process improvements (needed) in hindsight, we take a look at things we could have done better and sharpen the knife."

ConocoPhillips spokesman Rich Johnson said the company had no comment because it would be "inappropriate to discuss" the ongoing negotiations.

"We're continuing to cooperate with the authorities," Johnson said.

While a grand jury in Seattle was investigating the spill in June 2005, a memo distributed by the union representing ConocoPhillips' shipboard workers said, "So far the company is very pleased with the way our members have handled themselves and hope they will continue to be open and honest should they be called to testify in the future."

Members of the Polar Texas crew and the company have steadfastly maintained that they did nothing wrong when the ship took on additional seawater for ballast the night of the spill after unloading some crude oil in Tacoma.

If that operation were done incorrectly, it would be possible for the ship to disgorge oil in its cargo hold into Puget Sound. However, officers and crew members aboard the ship said the operation went well. Ballast water is taken on to keep a ship riding low enough in the water that it will be stable. The forecast on the night of the spill called for 10-foot swells and 30 mph winds in the North Pacific.

A former chief engineer of the Polar Texas and a former president of the Polar Texas fleet have told the P-I that it would be possible for crew members to flub the ballasting operation without knowing it, resulting in a spill.

At the time of the spill, the Polar Texas was just two months from being sent to the scrap yard. It left Tacoma about 6 p.m. that night, but the spill was not discovered until a tugboat captain passed through the area after midnight.

A P-I investigation in March 2005 documented numerous problems aboard ConocoPhillips tankers, including use of alcohol by crew members in apparent violation of company policy and an unreported explosion aboard one of the company's vessels.

The Alaska grand jury investigated problems aboard other ConocoPhillips tankers, including a spill aboard the Polar Discovery in mid-ocean in January 2004, caused when crew members mistakenly piped sludge oil from the engine room onto the ship's deck. Some got onto the side of the ship.

Later, the captain and other officers lowered a crew member over the ship's side with a power sprayer that could be used to clean up the oil.

Crew members said the purpose was to clean off oil on the vessel's side, although officers denied that. An entry in the logbook described it as a man-overboard drill. The captain offered no explanation for that entry.

The oil spill was not reported until a whistle-blower came forward four months later.

Failure to report an oil spill to the Coast Guard immediately is a federal crime.

P-I reporter Eric Nalder contributed to this report. P-I reporter Robert McClure can be reached at 206-448-8092 or robertmcclure@seattlepi.com.

State's Greenhouse Gas Bill Signed (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan And Marc Lifsher

The Los Angeles Times, September 28, 2006

California moved to the front of local government efforts to fight global warming today when Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed legislation calling for a reduction of greenhouse gases.

The bill commits the state to reduce the emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases by 25% by 2020. Greenhouse gases trap heat in the atmosphere and cause global warming.

At an elaborate signing ceremony at Treasure Island in San Francisco Bay, Schwarzenegger put pen to paper, a scene he repeated at a second ceremony at Pepperdine University in Malibu.

"We simply must do everything we can in our power to slow down global warming before it is too late," Schwarzenegger said at Treasure Island.

Both ceremonies were grandiose, bipartisan affairs, heavily laced with the exchange of compliments. The only difference was the weather, with bright sun in Southern California.

At Treasure Island, Schwarzenegger signed the bill into law at an outdoor ceremony under overcast skies with a chilly breeze and the San Francisco skyline as a backdrop. On one side of the stage were 114 flags from nations around the world; on the other, a giant video screen.

Among those onstage with Schwarzenegger were San Francisco Mayor Gavin Newsom, New York Gov. George Pataki, and the bill's cosponsors, California Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez (D-Los Angeles) and Assemblywoman Fran Pavley (D-Agoura Hills).

The signing ceremony gave Schwarzenegger a platform to display his environmental credentials weeks before voters decide whether to give him another term.

DOJ_NMG_0070464

The Schwarzenegger camp touted the signing as a major policy step, and included a live satellite video message of congratulations from British Prime Minister Tony Blair.

"You are showing brilliant leadership that will inspire and excite a lot of people worldwide," Blair said. He expressed hope that leadership on the issue would come from "states within the United States of America" and "hopefully, in time, from the whole of America."

A Japanese diplomat read a letter to Schwarzenegger from Japan's outgoing Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, who commended the governor for "taking a leadership role in protecting the Earth's environment."

"As the world's two biggest economies, Japan and the United States share common responsibility to lead the world in its effort to fight global warming," the letter said.

The bill, AB 32, authorizes the California Air Resources Board and other agencies to begin measuring greenhouse emissions from electric power plants, oil refineries and other sources.

Beginning in 2012, emitters will be assigned firm limits on the amounts of carbon dioxide they can release into the atmosphere. Those caps will be gradually lowered to meet the 2020 target.

The new law relies on a variety of tools to reduce greenhouse gas emissions:

• Direct government regulation.

• Development of new technology, energy efficiency and alternative fuels.

• Creation of a market for companies that have met their emissions targets to sell credits on an open market to other firms. Buyers of pollution credits could continue to release carbon dioxide in excess of their limits.

Supporters of the global warming law concede that California, which is responsible for only about 2.5% of the world's greenhouse gas production, won't make a major difference in combating global warming alone.

Nevertheless, they contend that passage of the bill sets an example for the federal government, other states and countries that shows that action can be taken now to deal with climate change.

Critics, mainly mainline business groups, argue that California, acting on its own, will drive manufacturers and jobs to other states and countries that require less stringent regulation of greenhouse gases.

California: Schwarzenegger Signs Gas Emissions Act (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed into law a global warming initiative that imposes the nation's first cap on emissions of heat-trapping gases. "We simply must do everything we can in our power to slow down global warming before it is too late," Mr. Schwarzenegger said before signing the bill on Treasure Island, in San Francisco Bay. California's efforts on global warming have been in the spotlight since the governor and the state's legislative Democrats reached an accord last month on the bill to cut emissions.

Warming Trend Is Hatching A Business (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

U.S. governors, impatient with federal inaction on global warming, are taking matters into their own hands. The result could add impetus to an emerging industry.

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) yesterday signed legislation to cap greenhouse gas emissions. And seven Northeastern states, which together emit as much greenhouse gas as Germany, have banded together to set rules that would cut their emissions by 10 percent by 2019. Other states may join them.

"There isn't an actor at the table who wouldn't prefer a national program, but we can't afford to wait," says Franz Litz, climate change coordinator at the New York State Department of Environmental Conservation.

So the state leaders are modeling their efforts on the European Union, which has turned limits on greenhouse gas emissions into a multibillion-dollar worldwide industry.

DOJ_NMG_0070465

Companies are already scrambling to take advantage of the E.U. system, which is an outgrowth of the global environmental accord known as the Kyoto Protocol. Arlington-based AES Corp. has dispatched teams to negotiate with Asian palm oil plantations over installing equipment to suck methane -- one of the most potent of a half-dozen greenhouse gases -- out of waste lagoons. The electric power company wants to convert it into energy and less harmful gases. In return, the firm would get credits it could use or sell in Europe.

The European system sets a cap for the continent's emissions of greenhouse gases, such as carbon dioxide. Every company producing significant amounts of greenhouse gases is issued a designated number of "allowances." If power plants and factories spew out more than their quotas, they have to buy allowances from firms that spew less than their allotments. Polluting companies can also buy credits from firms that are cutting emissions in the developing world.

The result: Gases that were once worthless now have a commercial value every bit as solid as coal, pork bellies or Treasury bills -- only with this commodity, companies are paid for what they do not deliver. According to Point Carbon, a research firm, $12.6 billion of greenhouse gas emission rights, called European Union Allowances, were traded in the first half of this year. The value of all existing allowances exceeds $70 billion.

The Northeastern U.S. governors' Regional Greenhouse Gas Initiative plans to begin a similar type of carbon trading by 2009. Schwarzenegger, who appeared last month beside British Prime Minister Tony Blair, said that linking a West Coast plan to Europe's was one option.

The idea of creating a market for trading air pollution rights began in the United States. Legislation passed in 1990 and implemented in 1995 established an acid rain program, which capped sulfur dioxide emissions and let companies trade their assigned shares. Sulfur dioxide emissions fell 30 percent. Economists say such plans meet environmental goals efficiently, without choosing between technologies.

The United States insisted that other countries adopt a cap-and-trade approach for greenhouse gases in the Kyoto accord but then never signed on while Europe moved ahead. Back then, the United States agreed to reach a target 7 percent below 1990 emissions by 2012. Now, the country is churning out 16 percent more than it did in 1990 and 25 percent more than either China or the E.U.

"It is ironic that 10 years after Kyoto was signed, there is a vibrant market in Europe, an emerging market in the developing world, and the U.S. is sitting on the sidelines," says VÃ©ronique Bugnion, Point Carbon's research director.

No one is on the sidelines in Europe. Power generators now count greenhouse gases -- measured in metric tons of carbon dioxide -- as one of their costs. "It's going to change the way you make decisions about deploying capital," says Garth Edward, trading manager for environmental products at Royal Dutch Shell PLC, which has 25 installations in the E.U. system. Energy efficiency projects, he said, "are going to move up the ladder faster."

Stockholm-based Vattenfall, Europe's fourth-largest utility, is building a pilot zero-emissions coal-fired plant in Germany using sequestration, which injects carbon dioxide into the earth instead of releasing it into the air. Vattenfall chief executive Lars G. Josefsson says removing the carbon dioxide will cost more than $25 a metric ton, but he says, "If we're going to have a problem with carbon dioxide, this is a good investment."

While the E.U. carbon trading scheme has given birth to an industry, it has also created controversy over how quotas are assigned and who gets stuck paying the bills. In Germany, utilities raised electricity rates, treating carbon emissions as a cost to pass along. Four utilities made $3 billion to $5 billion in windfall profits, Bugnion says.

There are disputes between countries as well as within them. Britain and Germany are cutting their greenhouse emissions sharply, while Spain's are still growing. Sweden relies mostly on hydro- and nuclear power for electricity; Germany relies overwhelmingly on coal. Countries are currently drawing up new caps for 2008-2012.

Setting baselines for emissions has been tough. Quotas are based on a company's emissions over the five years before the program began. Firms have sought higher baselines to get more allowances. In most nations, utilities were squeezed while industrial firms were given more than enough.

The numbers didn't add up the way people expected. In May, the E.U. revealed that actual emissions were well below the quotas, suggesting that baseline levels were set too high. That shocked the carbon trading market. The price of a ton of carbon dioxide crashed, dropping by two thirds and erasing $36 billion of value. Prices crept back up but tumbled in recent days.

DOJ_NMG_0070466

The credits bought in developing countries pose other challenges. So far, companies find it cheapest to cut the most potent greenhouse gases, mostly in the developing world. A ton of methane, common in landfills and farms, equals 21 tons of carbon dioxide; a ton of hydro-fluorocarbons, a refrigerant byproduct, is worth as much as 11,700 tons of carbon dioxide.

Independent firms and investors are getting into the act. Ecosecurities, whose chief executive Bruce Usher is a former Wall Street derivatives trader, has become a broker and developer of projects in 26 countries, ranging from one to capture methane at a Chinese landfill to small hydropower dams in Honduras.

A London firm called Climate Change Capital has raised $830 million to reduce greenhouse gases for credits to be sold in Europe. AES is putting $325 million into a joint venture to produce 50 million tons of credits by 2012.

These credits need the blessing of the Clean Development Mechanism (CDM), a United Nations agency in Bonn. That process could get messy, and political. One criterion: "additionality," the buzzword for a project that wouldn't have happened without the credit system. That can be hard to figure out when high oil prices make conservation and alternative energy attractive. In July, the CDM rejected four projects, including two proposed by Ecosecurities, without saying why.

Not surprisingly, most credits are generated in countries with the worst environmental track records. China accounted for 62 percent of the CDM credits sold during the first half of this year. That raises a sensitive question: Should Europe be effectively subsidizing investments in pollution control that its economic competitor China hasn't bothered to make? Moreover, China is collecting a 65 percent tax on the sale of credits.

"Scientifically, it makes sense to take [greenhouse gases] out wherever you can do it most cheaply, but politically, it might be better to do it in your country," said AES chief executive Paul Hanrahan.

There is one functioning U.S. carbon market. On Earth Day 2005, Richard Sandor founded the Chicago Climate Exchange, but participation is voluntary. Member companies must trim 6 percent of their emissions by 2010. "The only ones who opt in know they'll meet the targets," says Point Carbon's Bugnion. Members include Ford Motor Co., DuPont Co., Motorola Inc., International Business Machines Corp., American Electric Power Inc. and half a dozen municipal governments.

Mandatory carbon trading may still be adopted in the United States. Cap-and-trade measures have been drafted by a handful of lawmakers. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) co-sponsored an earlier bill.

"This is a big global problem, and we have a deficit in global governance," says Vattenfall's Josefsson. "If we could solve this, it could be a model for global governance."

Heed This Warning (WP)

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

BENEATH ITS dry scientific lingo, a new analysis of global climate change by a group of NASA scientists is terrifying. Headed by climate specialist James E. Hansen, the group argues that recent global warming has been quite rapid -- about 0.2 degrees Celsius over each of the past three decades -- and has largely tracked climate models that predict more dramatic warming in the decades to come. If the world continues increasing carbon emissions at its current pace, by about 2 percent a year, the authors argue that the resulting warming will cause the extinction of about 60 percent of species around the world and "sea level rise of several meters per century with eventual rise of tens of meters, enough to transform global coastlines."

The scientists posit an alternative scenario as well, one predicated on dramatic reductions of carbon emissions. In that case, sea levels would still rise substantially and "cause problems for humanity," and 20 percent of species would still go extinct -- but the most catastrophic effects of warming might be averted. Most distressingly, they contend that humanity doesn't have long to make up its mind whether to pursue policy changes; another decade without emissions being reduced, they said, would probably make the alternative scenario infeasible.

The likely consequences of global warming are a hotly debated subject, and one has to be cautious about predictions concerning hugely complicated systems -- such as average global temperature over time. But there is at least a decent chance that this and the many similar analyses by other reputable climatologists will prove correct. And that means that global warming represents a policy crisis responsible politicians can no longer ignore -- one as potentially existential as the threat of global terrorism, only in slow motion.

DOJ_NMG_0070467

Countering that threat will require regulatory initiatives and societal investments. It will require significant changes in American attitudes toward energy use and conservation. But these may prove far less wrenching than many people imagine. What it certainly also will require is a great deal of political will -- political will of precisely the type the Bush administration has dedicated to a host of other issues but has assiduously avoided devoting to climate change. Most of all, it will require an end to denial -- denial that the problem exists, denial that anything can be done about it if it does and denial that the problem is urgent and requires immediate attention.

Number Of Smoggy Days Falls, Study Says (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

The number of dangerously smoggy days in the Washington area has declined by more than 40 percent since 2003, but the region still does not meet federal standards for healthy air, according to data released yesterday.

From 2003 to 2006, the region has had 63 days in which the levels of ground-level ozone -- a harmful gas formed when the sun heats polluted air -- was high enough for Code Orange, Code Red or Code Purple warnings. From 1999 to 2002, there were 114 such days, according to the Metropolitan Washington Council of Governments.

Officials said yesterday that they were encouraged, believing the reduction in bad air days was a sign that local and national anti-pollution measures were having an effect.

"The air's cleaner," said D.C. Council member Phil Mendelson (D-At Large), chairman of COG's air quality committee. "But not clean enough."

That's because the Washington region, which has exceeded smog limits repeatedly since 1977, still hasn't improved enough to meet the smog standards the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency will begin enforcing in 2009. At that point, a violation could trigger a loss of federal transportation funding.

Moreover, local environmental groups were wary of the report, wondering whether cooler weather, not reduced smog, was partly responsible for the improvement.

This might seem like an odd year to tout progress in reducing air pollution. An early August heat wave caused several Code Orange days, with residents warned against exercising or working outside. In July, the region had a Code Purple day -- the worst rating and its first in more than a year.

Jeff King, an air quality planner at COG, said this summer offered some confirmation that progress was being made: Although it was far hotter than in 2005, it had the same number of unhealthy air days -- 19. That appeared to mean that less smog was around for the sun to heat.

"We did have some pollution problems, but it wasn't as severe as we'd had in the past," King said.

The pollutants that help create bad air days come from sources as diverse as power plants, cars, gas pumps and paint fumes. In explaining the reductions in bad air, local officials cited changes almost as varied.

Mendelson credited new federal rules limiting the amount of nitrogen oxide in power-plant emissions and curbing auto pollution, as well as several local policy changes. Montgomery County bought more energy from wind power. The District required power companies to derive more of their electricity from renewable sources. Fairfax County retrofitted its school buses to produce cleaner emissions.

Mendelson said moves such as those could continue to reduce smog, even as the region adds millions of residents and thousands of miles of roads.

"So far, the region has continued to grow significantly, and yet we're polluting less," he said.

Frank O'Donnell of Clean Air Watch said the apparent good news was tempered by the fact that the Washington area still regularly suffers through Code Orange days and worse.

"If we're still seeing eight or 10 dirty air days in the area, that to me is still a sign that we're not there yet," O'Donnell said.

American Indians Await Trial On Lawsuit (AP-Y)

By James Macpherson, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070468

American Indian rancher Keith Mandan says he could double the size of his black Angus herd if he had the money — or if he were white.

Mandan, 53, and his wife, Claryca, 52, say they've struggled financially to keep their ranch in North Dakota's Badlands since the late 1970s because of a pattern of discrimination by the federal government.

The Mandans are among the plaintiffs in a lawsuit that accuses the U.S. Department of Agriculture of discriminating against American Indians in the granting of loans since 1981. During that time, Claryca Mandan said, the federal government "wiped out a whole generation of Indian farmers and ranchers because of racism."

USDA officials refused to respond to specific questions from The Associated Press about the allegations. In a statement, J. Michael Kelly, an attorney for the USDA, said the case is still ongoing and the agency is working to provide documentation requested by the Indians' attorneys.

Earlier this month, attorneys for the American Indian ranchers and farmers filed a motion to bring the case to trial next year — eight years after the lawsuit was filed.

A hearing on their motion is set for Thursday.

Keith Mandan said if he could get the financing, he'd buy about 300 more cows and build a calving barn and a machine shed to keep his cattle and farm implements protected from the harsh North Dakota winters. Instead, Mandan uses a heavily wooded gulch for calving. His machinery is exposed to the elements.

"My white counterparts across the road don't have the problems we have," he said. "We just don't receive the subsidies that non-Indian farmers and ranchers do."

The USDA's Farm Service Agency lends to farmers and ranchers who can't get credit from commercial lenders. The agency, known as the lender of last resort, is the largest agricultural lender in North Dakota.

Mandan believes the USDA has denied and delayed loans to American Indians to squeeze them out of business.

"They just want to close you out and take the land and put it in their inventory," he said.

The lawsuit was granted class-action status in 2001 but the case has floundered in federal court since.

Attorneys estimate the number of Indian farmer and rancher plaintiffs could be in the tens of thousands. A settlement figure has not been calculated, but would likely be in the "hundreds of millions," said Joe Sellers, the American Indians' lead attorney in Washington, D.C.

The lawsuit mirrors a civil rights case brought by black farmers in 1997 that settled two years later.

The federal government has paid out about $930 million to about 14,000 black farmers so far, said Anurag Varma, a Washington, D.C., attorney who helped represent the farmers and is involved in the American Indians' lawsuit.

"The underlying bad acts by the defendants are virtually identical," Varma said.

Sellers accuses the government of delaying resolution of the lawsuit filed by the American Indian ranchers and farmers.

"They have employed every tactical maneuver I can conceive of to postpone the day of judgment," he said.

But government attorneys said the case has been delayed in part by their appeal of the class action decision.

"We do take exception that we are dragging our feet," said Charles Miller, a spokesman for the Justice Department, which is representing USDA.

Meanwhile, Sellers said, the USDA continues to foreclose on Indian property.

"They have accelerated debt collection," Sellers said. "It seems to me it's an effort to drive the final nail in the coffin."

Three Affiliated Tribes Chairman Tex Hall, who also is a rancher, calls it economic racism.

"It's illegal, racist and discriminatory," Hall said. "Every day this continues, we lose another native farmer or rancher."

FBI Agent (DESERET)

By Lucinda Dillon Kinkead, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, September 28, 2006

MONTEZUMA CREEK — From the northernmost tip of the massive Navajo Nation, 13-year-old Elsha Black surveys the arid expanse of his grandmother's property in San Juan County.

Lucinda Dillon Kinkead, Deseret Morning News

Elsha Black, age 13, on the Navajo Indian Reservation. Black has strong ties to Utah's Indian Country. He is one of the few young people who speak fluent Navajo. He learned it living with his grandmother on the land where she was born. He says he'd prefer to live here now and swears he will come back. But for now, this young man must live off the reservation. He needs a good education. His mom needs a good job. His family says neither can be found here today.

A few years ago, Black was attending the local school in Montezuma Creek and living with his grandmother. Back then, his mom was living off the reservation in Farmington, N.M., during the week and coming home to the Navajo Nation on weekends. Sue Philemon's security job at a local college paid a better wage than anything she could find on the reservation.

Black remembers fifth-grade, when his fellow students were learning remedial words like "cat" and "bat." The textbooks were ancient, and even at age 10 Black knew he wasn't getting a good education.

So his mom moved him to New Mexico. Now she carts him to the Curtland community west of Farmington to the best public school she could find. The boy is flourishing in middle school, his mom says, getting good grades and making plans for his future.

Black wants to be an FBI agent. He wants to work out of the Shiprock, N.M., office to help members of the tribe and solve crimes.

"I want to be close to my people. I don't want to be anywhere else," he says. "This is still my homeland."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Chargers Safety Kiel Arrested On Drug-Related Charges (ESPN)

ESPN, September 27, 2006

San Diego Chargers safety Terrence Kiel was arrested Tuesday on drug-related charges.

Kiel was arrested on two charges of transporting a controlled substance and three charges of possession for sale of a controlled substance — Codeine-based cough syrup.

The law enforcement sources told ESPN's Chris Mortensen that several plain clothes DEA agents appeared at the Chargers' facility Tuesday morning with an arrest warrant, searched his locker and car, and took Kiel away.

The Chargers, who are coming off a bye week, were on the practice field at the time.

In a statement, team spokesman Bill Johnston said: "We're aware of an off-the-field situation involving Terrence Kiel and we're monitoring the situation. Due to the personal nature of the ongoing legal investigation, the Chargers are withholding further comment until the matter is resolved legally."

Kiel was booked and released after posting $150,000 bond.

Chargers officials were not returning phone calls Tuesday night. Kiel and his agent also could not be reached for comment.

Kiel, a fourth-year veteran from Texas A&M, is the starting strong safety for the 2-0 Chargers, who play the 3-0 Ravens on Sunday. Kiel's status for the game is unclear.

Drafted in the second round in 2003, Kiel was expected to start that season for the Chargers before he was shot three times in an attempted carjacking in Houston in July of that year.

Kiel is making $500,000 this year and has two years left on his contract.

This is the second major off-field incident of the season for the Chargers. Linebacker Steve Foley was shot three times Sept. 3 when he confronted an off-duty police officer who had followed his vehicle on suspicion of drunken driving.

Chargers' Kiel Arrested For Trafficking Of Prescription Drugs (BLOOM)

By Mason Levinson

Bloomberg, September 27, 2006

(Bloomberg) -- Terrence Kiel, a starting safety for the San Diego Chargers, was arrested yesterday for trafficking prescription drugs by U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents.

Kiel, 25, was arrested at the team's practice facility and charged with two counts of transporting Codeine-based cough syrup and three counts of possession with intent to sell the controlled substance, the agency said in a statement.

Kiel admitted to shipping to Texas two packages containing the substance, according to the release. He was released on $150,000 bond, said DEA spokesman Dan Simmons, and will be arraigned in District Court on Oct. 3.

``How unfortunate, once again, that a professional athlete makes a choice which detracts from his talent and ability, drawing attention instead to poor decision making," DEA Special Agent in Charge John Fernandes said in a statement. ``Actions like those of Mr. Kiel simply add fuel to the already raging fire of prescription drug abuse in our country."

A telephone message left at the office of Vann McElroy, Kiel's agent, was not returned.

``Due to the personal nature of the ongoing legal investigation, the Chargers are withholding further comment until the matter is resolved legally," the team said in a statement.

The DEA in Texas said there has been widespread abuse of Codeine-based cough syrup. When mixed with soft drinks, a pint bottle, known as ``lean," can cost between $200 and $325 on the street, the DEA said in its release.

Kiel, a fourth-year veteran out of Texas A&M and a native of Lufkin, Texas, was the Chargers' fourth-leading tackler last season despite missing four games with an ankle injury.

It's the second time this month a Chargers' player has been involved in an off-field incident. On Sept. 3, linebacker Steve Foley was shot three times by an off-duty police officer who suspected him of driving under the influence of alcohol.

The Chargers, who are 2-0 this season, face the Ravens in Baltimore on Oct. 1.

Kiel Is Arrested In Cough Syrup Case (AP)

AP, September 27, 2006

Chargers strong safety Terrence Kiel admitted to shipping two parcels of prescription cough syrup to Texas, DEA officials said Wednesday, a day after the player was arrested at team headquarters.

While Kiel did not tell the DEA his motive, the agency in Texas has found widespread abuse of codeine-based cough syrup mixed with soft drinks or drugs and referred to as "lean," said John S. Fernandes, the special agent in charge of the San Diego office. A pint bottle of "lean" can cost between $200 and $325 on the street, he said.

Kiel was arrested on two counts of transporting a controlled substance and three counts of possession for sale of a controlled substance.

The DEA is investigating where Kiel got the cough syrup, who else may be involved and the intent.

An arraignment was scheduled for Tuesday.

Team officials have not commented, beyond a statement released late Tuesday night.

"We're aware of an off-the-field situation involving Terrence Kiel and we're monitoring the situation," the statement said. "Due to the personal nature of the ongoing legal investigation, the Chargers are withholding further comment until the matter is resolved legally."

Kiel's status for Sunday's game at Baltimore was not immediately known

It was the fourth run-in with the law by a Chargers player since April.

Outside linebacker Steve Foley was shot outside his suburban home by an off-duty Coronado police officer on Sept. 3. Foley will miss the entire season and forfeit at least $775,000 in pay.

Foley and linebacker Shaun Phillips were each arrested for scuffling with San Diego police officers a week apart in April. Neither was charged.

Copyright 2006 Associated Press. All rights reserved. This material may not be published broadcast, rewritten, or redistributed

Charger Kiel Admits Shipping Illegal Drugs (UPI)

UPI, September 27, 2006

SAN DIEGO, (UPI) -- Federal authorities say San Diego Chargers strong safety Terrence Kiel has admitted to shipping prescription cough syrup from California to Texas.

Kiel did not say why he shipped two parcels of the syrup, but Drug Enforcement Agency officials said there has been widespread abuse in Texas of codeine-based cough syrup mixed with soft drinks, a combination referred to as "lean."

A pint of "lean" can cost between $200 to $325 a bottle on the street, the agency said.

Kiel was arrested Tuesday on two counts of transporting a controlled substance and three counts of possession for sale of a controlled substance.

He is scheduled to be arraigned next Tuesday.

The Chargers did not give Kiel's status for Sunday's game at Baltimore.

DEA: Kiel Arrest Linked To Codeine Diversion (SDUT)

By Brent Schrotenboer And Onell R. Soto, Union-tribune Staff Writers

The San Diego Union-Tribune, September 27, 2006

SAN DIEGO – The investigation that led to the arrest Tuesday of San Diego Chargers safety Terrence Kiel targeted his role in the diversion of codeine-based cough syrup, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration.

Authorities said Kiel, 25, was arrested on two charges of transporting a controlled substance and three charges of possession for sale of a controlled substance based on his having shipped at least two parcels containing the substance to his native Texas.

The DEA said in a statement released Wednesday that Kiel admitted to shipping the two parcels and to knowing their contents.

Kiel did not comment on the motive behind the shipments. But the DEA noted widespread abuse of codeine-based cough syrup in Texas, mixed with soft drinks and referred to as “lean.” A pint bottle can cost between $200-$325 per bottle on the street, according to the DEA.

Kiel was arrested on two counts of transporting a controlled substance and three counts of possession for sale of a controlled substance.

The DEA is investigating where Kiel got the cough syrup, who else may be involved and the intent.

Two federal law enforcement officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation, said quart bottles full of what appears to be prescription cough syrup were found at Kiel's house. Both officials said Kiel admitted to financial difficulties when interviewed by agents.

Kiel first drew attention after FedEx officials here opened a package he shipped June 2 and found 15 pint bottles of codeine-based cough syrup, according to a search warrant affidavit filed in San Diego Superior Court.

But FedEx officials didn't tell agents who work on intercepting drugs shipped out of San Diego until Aug. 1 because of their “busy schedule,” a DEA agent said in the affidavit.

People who use the shipping service must allow their packages to be opened for inspection.

The package also contained a airline boarding pass with the name of a woman who lives with Kiel, the DEA agent said.

FedEx workers told the DEA agents that the package was shipped by a man who looked like Kiel, a frequent customer.

A FedEx manager called the San Diego Narcotics Task Force last Thursday after Kiel shipped another package, and DEA agents took custody of it.

Kiel paid cash to ship the package and used a fake return address and name, according to the affidavit.

When agents opened the package they discovered three pint bottles of the cough syrup with codeine, which is a controlled substance.

If convicted of possession and transportation of a controlled substance, Kiel could face up to five years in state prison, a prosecutor for the District Attorney's office said.

Advertisement

First-time offenders without a criminal record in cough-syrup cases are typically sentenced to probation with some local jail time, said prosecutor Damon Mosler.

Kiel is scheduled to be arraigned in San Diego Superior Court Tuesday, according to a court clerk.

In its court filing, the DEA said that Kiel was arrested in Texas on charges of aggravated assault on a public servant, theft and evading arrest. It's unclear whether he was prosecuted or when the arrest occurred.

Kiel is making $500,000 this year, his fourth with the Chargers.

Chargers general manager A.J. Smith said Kiel would be paid even though he will miss Sunday's game at Baltimore.

"He's been informed to stay home and take care of personal business," Smith said, adding that Kiel is due back with the team on Monday.

"I'm really not interested at this point in commenting on anything about the matter," coach Marty Schottenheimer said.

Clinton Hart, who will start in Kiel's spot, said the defensive backs met Wednesday morning.

"We have to regroup and make that fist a little bit tighter. Kiel's still our boy and we're supporting him 100 percent," Hart said. "We're going to go out there and win this game with him on our backs."

"How unfortunate, once again, that a professional athlete makes a choice which detracts from his talent and ability, drawing attention instead to poor decision making," DEA Special Agent in Charge John S. Fernandes said in a statement. "Actions like those of Mr. Kiel simply add fuel to the already raging fire of prescription drug abuse in our country."

The DEA noted that "doctor shopping," forged prescriptions and pharmacy theft are the most common methods of procuring controlled substances by those with no true medical need.

"We're aware of an off-the-field situation involving Terrence Kiel and we're monitoring the situation," the Chargers said in a statement Tuesday. "Due to the personal nature of the ongoing legal investigation, the Chargers are withholding further comment until the matter is resolved legally."

Kiel's agent, Vann McElroy, said he couldn't comment on specifics of the case.

"Terrence is a good kid. We just have to wait and see," McElroy said.

Fernandes said the two shipments Kiel admitted to sending to Texas each contained prescription cough syrup that had been repackaged in pint-sized water bottles.

On Tuesday, Kiel was called off the practice field after authorities arrived at Chargers headquarters. Kiel was taken into the locker room, detained and read his rights, Fernandes said. His locker wasn't searched, but authorities searched his car, then took him to his house to execute a search warrant.

Fernandes said codeine-based cough syrup can be used to enhance, mitigate or temper other drugs, including cocaine and PCP.

"It goes right to the heart of what really is fueling an already out-of-control, raging fire of abuse of pharmaceutical drugs," Fernandes said.

Feds Arrest Chargers Safety During PracticeInvestigators Say Packages Shipped By Kiel Contained Controlled Substance (KNBC)

KNBC-TV, September 27, 2006

SAN DIEGO, Calif. -- Two FedEx packages shipped by Chargers safety Terrence Kiel contained a controlled substance identified as a Codeine-based cough syrup, according to search warrant affidavit released Wednesday.

Images

Federal agents arrested Kiel, 25, Tuesday during a team practice and booked him on suspicion of three counts of possession of a controlled substance for sale and two counts of transportation of a controlled substance.

He was released on $160,000 bail.

If charges are filed, Kiel could be arraigned Tuesday, according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and the San Diego County District Attorney's Office.

According to the affidavit, FedEx customers consent to have their parcels opened and examined by the company at any time.

On June 2, management at FedEx conducted an audit of a parcel which contained 15 bottles of Prometh with Codeine, considered a controlled substance, according to the affidavit.

FedEx employees told DEA Special Agent Dean Henderson that the shipper of the parcel was a large, muscular, black man, but couldn't positively identify him because it had been a month since the package had been sent.

FedEx employees know who Kiel is because he makes shipments regularly using his FedEx account, according to the affidavit.

Last Thursday, the manager of a FedEx office called Henderson when Kiel shipped a parcel similar to the one shipped on June 2, according to the affidavit.

The return address on the parcels showed an address on Santo Road, not Kiel's real address, and the return name on the shipping label was not the athlete's, the affidavit states.

Kiel paid cash to ship the Sept. 21 parcel, even though he has an account with FedEx, the affidavit states.

Henderson said it is common for drug smugglers to use a different name than their own to avoid detection by law enforcement.

Both the June and September parcels were being shipped to Kiel's home state of Texas, where he was previously arrested for aggravated assault on a public servant, theft and evading arrest, according to the affidavit.

Employees at FedEx copied the license plate of the vehicle Kiel was driving, and a DMV record check showed it was registered to the football player at a residence on Juneberry Court in San Diego, according to the affidavit.

Kiel, a second-round draft pick out of Texas A&M in 2003, was hospitalized that summer after being shot three times in an attempted carjacking in Houston.

The Chargers released a statement, saying they were aware of Kiel's arrest and wouldn't comment further until the case was resolved legally.

It was the second headline-grabbing, off-the-field incident involving a Chargers player this month.

Linebacker Steve Foley was shot three times outside his Poway home Sept. 3 during a confrontation with an off-duty Coronado police officer.

He will miss the entire season.

Feds Reveal Details About Charger Drug Arrest (KNSD-TV)

KNSD-TV, San Diego, September 28, 2006

Player Was Taken Into Custody On Tuesday

SAN DIEGO -- Justice Department officials announced Wednesday that Charger Terrence Kiel, who was arrested Tuesday, is accused of shipping codeine-based cough syrup to Texas.

Codeine-based cough syrup is a Schedule V controlled substance, according to the Justice Department.

"Actions like those of Mr. Kiel simply add fuel to the already raging fire of prescription drug abuse in our country," said Special Agent in Charge John S. Fernandes of the Drug Enforcement Administration.

Kiel, a 25-year-old who plays strong safety, admitted to shipping two parcels of prescription cough syrup to Texas, DEA officials said Wednesday. While Kiel did not tell the DEA his motive, the agency in Texas has found widespread abuse of codeine-based cough syrup mixed with soft drinks or drugs. The mixture is referred to as "lean," said Fernandes, who is in charge of the San Diego office. A pint bottle of "lean" can cost between $200 and $325 on the street, he said.

Kiel was arrested on two counts of transporting a controlled substance and three counts of possession for sale of a controlled substance.

The DEA is investigating where Kiel got the cough syrup, who else may be involved and the intent.

Two federal law enforcement officials said that quart bottles full of what appears to be prescription cough syrup were found at Kiel's house. Both officials said that Kiel admitted to financial difficulties when interviewed by agents.

DEA agents went to Chargers Park with an arrest warrant, reported NBC 7/39. They searched Kiel's locker and car before taking him into custody, according to a report published on ESPN.com.

Neighbors told NBC 7/39 that they saw agents at Kiel's apartment in the 4900 block of Juneberry Court in Kearny Mesa on Tuesday.

Kiel was booked and released after posting $150,000 bond.

Kiel is a four-year veteran with the Chargers. He was a second-round draft pick from Texas A&M in 2003. He has been in the Chargers' starting lineup for the last several years. He is making about $500,000 this year.

In a statement, team spokesman Bill Johnston said: "We're aware of an off-the-field situation involving Terrence Kiel and we're monitoring the situation. Due to the personal nature of the ongoing legal investigation, the Chargers are withholding further comment until the matter is resolved legally."

Chargers general manager A.J. Smith and coach Marty Schottenheimer did not immediately return phone calls from The Associated Press on Tuesday night. DEA spokesman Dan Simmons didn't return a call placed to his cell phone.

It was the fourth run-in with the law by a Chargers player since April.

Outside linebacker Steve Foley was shot outside his suburban home by an off-duty Coronado police officer on Sept. 3. Foley will miss the entire season and forfeit at least $775,000 in pay.

Foley and linebacker Shaun Phillips were each arrested for allegedly scuffling with San Diego police officers a week apart in April. Neither was charged.

Feds Rounding Up Suspected Immigrant Drug Dealers (ADN)

Aspen Daily News, September 27, 2006

The federal Drug Enforcement Agency and Immigrations and Customs Enforcement have been targeting suspected illegal-immigrant drug dealers in the Roaring Fork Valley this week.

Agents with the DEA and ICE are not commenting on the downvalley roundups except to say they are happening and that more information will be released today. A spokesman with ICE said the DEA was the lead agency on the investigation and that ICE was asked to provide assistance.

Marie Munday, the Pitkin County Sheriff Office's liaison to the Latino community, said word of the roundups spread quickly throughout the Latino community and that an announcement of the roundups was made on a Spanish-language radio station.

"Everyone is in a panic again," Munday said. "A lot of employers are calling me because a lot of people aren't showing up for work."

At least one Aspen business was affected. Toppers restaurant did not open Wednesday because its kitchen staff did not show up for work.

Munday said the roundups are targeting illegal immigrants suspected of dealing drugs and that many arrest warrants are being served. Munday said she believed the crackdowns happened on Monday and Tuesday.

"There's more to come," she said.

She said she did not believe anyone without a warrant would be arrested.

Pitkin County Sheriff Bob Braudis said his agency was not asked for assistance in the operation but he believed one person had been arrested as of Wednesday afternoon.

Less clear is if Monday's arrest of a suspected drug dealer is tied to this week's arrests by the DEA and ICE.

On Monday the DEA, with the assistance of the Pitkin County Sheriff's Office, arrested Jose Jesus Sanchez-Ceja, 53, on four counts stemming from allegations he was supervising a cocaine-distribution ring. During the suspect's advisement hearing Tuesday in Pitkin County District Court, Deputy District Attorney Gail Nichols suggested that more arrests would be made based on information in the affidavit.

Later that Tuesday, Judge Erin Fernandez-Ely sealed the affidavit supporting the arrest of the suspect, an attendant at a car wash at the Aspen Airport Business Center.

Two weeks ago, ICE agents rounded up 34 alleged illegal immigrants throughout the valley as part of a nationwide initiative called Operation Return to Sender that led to thousands of illegals being deported. This week's roundups are not connected to Operation Return to Sender, Munday said.

Munday noted a shift in the political climate that has led to more stringent immigration enforcement.

"People are demanding that," Munday said. "Federal agencies are working hard to prove they aren't going to let people get away."

Bill To Criminalize Border Tunneling Easily Finds Support (SDUT)

DOJ_NMG_0070475

By Jerry Kammer, Copley News Service

The San Diego Union-Tribune, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON – At first blush, a bill to criminalize the construction of tunnels under the U.S.-Mexico border seems almost ludicrous.

"It seems like a law that says the sky must be blue," said Frank Sharry of the National Immigration Forum, whose principal border interests center on much more controversial efforts to expand legal immigration and provide legal status to 12 million illegal immigrants in the country.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein said, "It is hard to believe that there is not already a federal (statute) to punish those involved with the financing, construction and use of these tunnels."

But Feinstein, D-Calif., is one of the main advocates of a tunnel-criminalization effort that is reaching fruition with the inclusion of the measure in legislation to fund the Department of Homeland Security.

The Border Tunnel Prevention Act would impose criminal penalties of up to 20 years in prison for those who construct or finance tunnels, which have proliferated in recent years in San Diego County and other border areas. It would permit a 10-year sentence for people who allow their property – including the buildings where the tunnels meet the surface – to be used by the tunnel builders.

The bill would solve a fundamental problem for federal law enforcement authorities. Under current law, they can only prosecute tunnel builders who are implicated in the smuggling of contraband or illegal immigrants through the underground passage.

Rep. David Dreier, R-San Dimas, who carried the bill in the House of Representatives, called it "a common sense reform."

"We have a problem that needs to be addressed, and it's being addressed in a bipartisan way," he said during debate on the measure.

Over the past five years, according to Feinstein's office, at least 44 border tunnels have been discovered, all but one between the United States and Mexico.

While officials suspect the tunnels are primarily used to smuggle drugs, they have raised other concerns about them.

"A tunnel can be used to smuggle drugs, illegal aliens, weapons and possibly weapons of mass destruction into the United States," said special agent Steve Robertson of the Drug Enforcement Administration.

Paul Charlton, U.S. attorney for Arizona, said that Justice Department policy bars him from commenting directly on pending legislation. But, he said, "As we are more successful apprehending those who come (illegally) above ground, there will likely be more people interested in coming across below ground."

Last March, Charlton's office won a conviction against Mexican architect Felipe de Jesus Corona-Verbera, who masterminded the construction of a tunnel between a house in the Mexican border town of Agua Prieta to a warehouse in Douglas, Ariz.

But Verbera was convicted on smuggling charges for his involvement in the movement of 2 tons of cocaine that were brought through the tunnel and shipped to Phoenix, where authorities seized the contraband.

The new legislation is one of the least controversial border measures ever brought before Congress. It sailed through the House of Representatives last week, 422-0. It was then added to a House-Senate conference report for Homeland Security funding, which is expected to sail through both houses on a final vote.

Efforts by Republican lawmakers to pass more comprehensive immigration legislation foundered on intraparty disagreements over whether to get tougher on illegal immigration or create a pathway to citizenship for millions of undocumented immigrants. The border tunnel bill may be one of the only measures to survive the debate before Congress breaks for a pre-election recess.

Plan Colombia: Big Gains, But Cocaine Still Flows (CSM)

By Danna Harman

The Christian Science Monitor, September 28, 2006

CALI, COLOMBIA

DOJ_NMG_0070476

Margarita Consuela Gomez Ricardo and Carlos Murillo met during a police raid on a warehouse of pirated DVDs seven years ago. Later that evening, after they swooped in and made the arrests, he asked her out for coffee. And six months later they were married.

Now, at age 31 and with two small children, Ms. Gomez is a widow. The last time she spoke to Murillo was on Friday, May 19. He said he was coming home that weekend. Their 2-year-old son was watching Power Rangers on TV at full volume and she could barely hear her husband's goodbye.

She went out to get her hair done, and dressed up the kids nicely, but Murillo never showed. She was disappointed, but that wasn't unusual.

On Monday night, as she channel-surfed in their Cali apartment, she caught a newsflash: An elite police unit had been shot in Jamundí. She called the station, but she knew.

Murillo, along with 10 others, most of them US Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) trained counternarcotics specialists, had been killed by a military unit. Colombia's attorney general says the soldiers were on the narcotraffickers payroll.

In the weeks and months ahead there would come the questions, suspicions, accusations, and fears. But right then, with the TV remote in hand, all that Gomez felt was despair.

"What is wrong with this country?" she thought. "Nothing ever changes."

* * *

Sitting in his Washington office a block from the White House, John P. Walters, President Bush's 'drug czar,' sees a different picture. "There is absolutely no question we are winning," he states flatly.

The "winning," in this case, is against narcotraffickers. And the "we" is the US and Colombian governments, inexorably bound together in a multibillion dollar war against the drug trade.

In 1989, when the US drug czar's post (officially, the Office of National Drug Control Policy, or ONDCP) was created, Pablo Escobar, the notorious head of the Medellín cartel, was the kingpin. "Escobar and other drug lords were the most powerful and violent people in the world. They could buy or kill anyone. They could go anywhere. They could do anything," says ONDCP director Walters. Those days, he stresses, are patently over.

"Through years of systematic efforts, and not always without obstacles and setbacks, the Colombians have reconstructed their police, military, judicial, and political institutions," he says, giving much credit, as many in the administration do, to Colombian President Alvaro Uribe, Washington's conservative ally in Bogotá. Mr. Uribe's success in bringing stability to the country, says Mr. Walters, is nothing short of "astounding."

But Walters doesn't downplay the U' role. "You can't build capacities without metal detectors and armored cars and radios and people who are going to teach personnel to use all those things effectively," says Walters. "It could not have been done without our assistance."

The US Embassy in Bogotá, since the launch of the $4.7 billion Plan Colombia in 2000, has grown into the second largest US diplomatic mission in the world, after Baghdad. It employs over 2,000 people, including some 350 US military personnel and 750 contractors.

The cornerstone of Plan Colombia is the massive effort to eradicate Colombia's coca plants before they are processed into cocaine. Some 20 aircraft, piloted by contractors with DynCorp International, headquartered in Falls Church, Va., take turns carrying out daily spray missions. Army and police units assist these efforts by clearing the ground of coca farmers, guerrillas, or traffickers below, and by protecting the spray mission from above - with a fleet of 71 US provided helicopters. The majority of the State Department's counternarcotics and law enforcement budget in Colombia is dedicated - directly or indirectly - to these endeavors.

In 2005, a record-breaking 170,000 hectares (419,000 acres) of coca were destroyed: 138,000 sprayed and 32,000 pulled out by hand or plowed under.

In total, since the program began in 1994 (and particularly since it was ramped up in 2000), 986,925 hectares of coca plant and opium poppy have been eradicated - an area almost equivalent to the size of the states of Rhode Island and Delaware combined.

DOJ_NMG_0070477

Drug seizures are another pillar of the plan, and here too, there are results. Two hundred and twenty-five tons of cocaine hydrochloride and cocaine base were seized in 2005, up from 125 tons in 2002, and the number of clandestine drug labs destroyed soared to nearly 2,000 last year from 317 in 2000, according to a July study by Colombia's National Narcotics Directorate (DNE). Meanwhile, the number of traffickers extradited to the US in the last four years is climbing toward 400.

"We are squeezing them. We are forcing them to change their drug trafficking routes and their methods," says Walters.

A better-trained and -equipped military and police, meanwhile, has meant that overall security in Colombia has vastly improved, especially in the urban areas. From 2002 to 2005, the murder rate fell 35 percent - from 28,837 murders to 18,111 - and kidnappings have dropped from nearly 3,000 in 2002 to 800 last year, according to Uribe's office. As a consequence, nearly 1 million foreigners visited last year, a 21 percent jump compared with 2004, and foreign investment hit $10 billion last year, a fivefold increase since 2002. Microsoft's Bill Gates is scheduled to visit in March, to take a look, he said last week, into business opportunities.

"Plan Colombia," says Michael Shifter of the Inter-American Dialogue, a think tank in Washington, "....has manifestly helped the government restore some measure of authority in a country that was on the verge of being a failed state six years ago."

* * *

But even Plan Colombia advocates admit the impressive statistics do not a complete victory make.

"We're making first downs," US Ambassador to Colombia William Wood is fond of saying, "...but we're not sure how long the football field is."

President Uribe is often even more circumspect. "It is clear we cannot abandon Plan Colombia," he said while in New York last week."But it is also clear that, in comparison to our efforts, we should be seeing better results."

Sometimes, it seems the harder Colombians and Americans fight, the more the drug lords push back and the coca fields reproduce.

When Escobar was shot to death on a Medellín rooftop in 1993, some expected the industry in which he had played such a key role would contract. But, the Medellín cartel was soon replaced by their Cali rivals. And when key Cali cartel leaders were jailed a few years later - the trade was divided up by competing factions of the Norte del Valle cartel and a host of smaller "cartelitos." Mexican cartels meanwhile, moved quickly to fill remaining voids.

Uribe's government, meanwhile, is being criticized for allowing some top drug traffickers to avoid extradition by surrendering themselves as part of the government's peace deal with the paramilitaries. And the rebel Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), in turn, may have been pushed into more remote zones - but they are estimated to still be earning hundreds of millions of dollars a year from their involvement in the drug trade.

There is no lack, after all, of coca. Despite the unprecedented eradication efforts, coca cultivation actually increased last year by 8 percent, according to a study released in June by the UN Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC). More significantly, the amount of cocaine being produced from coca leaves is also increasing. According to DNE, Colombia produced 776 metric tons of cocaine last year, 231 more than previous US estimates, and enough to supply almost 80 percent of the world market.

Why? Growing techniques have improved over the years and farmers in some regions are now able to harvest coca leaf six times a year, instead of the usual four harvests, according to UNODC. Also, aerial spraying has pushed farmers to smaller, more isolated plots deeper in the countryside, making spray operations more complicated and less effective. While coca was concentrated in three provinces at the start of Plan Colombia, today, it has spread to at least 23 of the country's 32 provinces.

This geographical expansion also feeds a different problem, explains Pablo Casas, a security expert at the Security and Democracy Foundation in Bogotá. In the past, counternarcotics work was concentrated in a few areas, he says, but "everyone touches drugs now. Which means there are more police, military, and local authorities for the narcos to try to corrupt."

Even worse - as far as Washington is concerned - is that the most expensive US foreign aid program outside the Middle East has apparently failed to significantly change the availability, price, or quality of cocaine on American streets.

The question of cost and purity of street cocaine in the US remains contentious, due both to methods of gathering statistics, and ways in which those statistics are interpreted. When the White House drug czar's office announced last November that the price of a gram of cocaine was slightly higher (a sign of less availability), it was quickly attacked with statistics showing the opposite.

DOJ_NMG_0070478

Sen. Charles Grassley, (R) of Iowa, chairman of the Senate Caucus on International Narcotics Control, in an April letter to Walters, even suggested the White House was selecting data to paint "a rosier, but not necessarily more accurate, picture" of the achievements of Plan Colombia.

Most sides to the debate agree however with the findings of the 2005 US National Survey on Drug Use and Health released this month. The study shows youth rates of cocaine use have fallen slightly since 2002 - but the number of first-time users is up, as are the number of hard-core addicts. Overall, according to the survey, levels of cocaine use and addiction are at least as high as they were in 2000.

"We need a new a new approach to drug policy," says John Walsh, a drug policy expert at the Washington Office on Latin America (WOLA), an advocacy group. "A reevaluation is long overdue."

* * *

Gomez quit the police force when she got married and lost interest, over time, in the drug war shop talk. But Murillo, her husband, remained a member of the counternarcotics unit, and "he loved being part of the big game ...working with the Americans," she says.

Once, she says, he called her from San Diego, Calif., where he was testifying in a big case. "He was so excited. He felt he was doing something important," she remembers.

In the year before his death, Gomez admits, they had begun to argue a lot. He would say he was going to do something with her and the kids, and would be called away by the unit. He would promise to call, and then be out of touch. When he missed their sixth wedding anniversary because of a drug operation, she had just about had enough: "Tell your Gringo masters I want my husband back!" she had screeched down the phone line.

They talked of separating. She berates herself most now for not telling him she still loved him, the last time they spoke.

Lately, after speaking out in the press against the Colombian military, Gomez has been receiving menacing phone calls late at night. "Prepare coffins for the rest of the family," a muffled voice told her last week.

She is scared to take the kids to the park across the street. She rarely goes out herself. "If I could just speak to Carlos one more time, I would tell him I was never angry with him," she says. "I was just angry with the way everything was being done... I would tell him we needed to do it over again, differently."

• Next part: Is there a better way?

IMMIGRATION:

Armey Blasts Republicans Over Opposition To Guest-worker Plan (MCT)

By Dave Montgomery

McClatchy Newspapers, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - As the No. 2 man in the Republican-controlled House of Representatives for nearly eight years, former Texas congressman Dick Armey never hesitated when it came to assailing Democrats.

But three years after leaving Congress, the former House majority leader is now savaging conservatives in his own party for what he calls "knee-jerk" opposition - "emphasis on jerk" - to the Bush administration's efforts to create a temporary guest-worker program and overhaul the nation's immigration system.

Armey, who is chairman of a Washington-based grass-roots organization called FreedomWorks, was a leading architect of the Republican takeover of the House in 1994 and remains a prominent and outspoken advocate for conservative causes.

But when it comes to the immigration debate that's raged in Congress for much of the past two years, he takes an almost polar-opposite position from many of his former Republican House colleagues, who are pressing for tough border security measures, including a 700-mile fence along the Southwest border.

"This has been rallied up by a lot of people that are very visible, make a lot of noise and have never been guilty of any deep thinking," Armey told reporters Tuesday after an appearance with Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, and Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind., co-sponsors of a proposed immigration compromise that includes a privately managed guest-worker program.

DOJ_NMG_0070479

Unabashedly naming names, Armey described Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., as the "cheerleader of jerkiness in the immigration debate" and said conservative commentator Pat Buchanan "is content to be a rock star" for "10 percent of the most militant voters in America."

Tancredo leads a coalition of House Republicans vehemently opposed to the president's guest-worker plan. Buchanan, who ran for president in 2000 as a Reform Party candidate, wants to defend the borders with U.S. troops and has said that the United States is in danger of becoming "MexiAmerica."

Armey also said he was "disappointed" with House Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., chief sponsor of an enforcement-only immigration plan passed by the House in December.

Several provisions, including the border fence, are being recycled as piecemeal border security measures that House leaders hope will clear Congress before a pre-election recess this week.

"I would have expected more deep thought from Sensenbrenner," Armey said.

Tancredo and Bay Buchanan, Pat Buchanan's sister and the president of his foundation, The American Cause, both fired back with withering responses. Sensenbrenner's office had no comment.

"In Dick Armey's search for relevance in today's political environment, it's disappointing that he has managed to find it as a patriot for profit," said Tancredo, chairman of the Immigration Reform Caucus. "Someone should remind him that the jerks he is speaking of happen to be the heart and soul of the Republican Party."

"Unfortunately, it's Republicans like Dick Armey that did not do the job of securing this nation when they were in office," said Bay Buchanan. "Dick is on the sidelines where he belongs."

Visas For Skilled Workers Still Frozen (WP)

By S. Mitra Kalita

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

For technology companies and research institutions that have spent recent autumns lobbying for permission to hire more foreign workers, this was supposed to be the year that ended the annual rite of desperation.

A bill that passed the Senate this spring would have doubled the number of visas issued every year for highly skilled professionals, such as scientists and engineers. And it would have helped clear a backlog of applications for permanent residency from such workers.

But the attempt by Congress to rewrite the nation's immigration laws has bogged down in controversy over border security and illegal immigration. That means changes in the skilled-worker programs, while less controversial, are also in limbo.

With Congress due to recess tomorrow, advocates of the programs have given up on winning immediate change. Now they're hoping members of Congress will focus on the issue in the lame-duck session late this year.

"It is incredibly difficult to pass major legislative reforms in any areas, and they tried to bite off a lot," said Jenifer Verdery, a policy director for Intel Corp., which has lobbied for more skilled foreign workers. "We've made a strong case, and we're hoping to take that to the finish line . . . if there is any policymaking left to do after the election."

For years, many of the country's largest technology companies and most prestigious research laboratories have said they are unable to find enough U.S.-born scientists and similar workers to fill their openings. They have depended on the H-1B visa to bring overseas talent into the United States. The companies also sponsor such skilled workers for green cards, which allow them to live and work here permanently.

But only 65,000 H-1B visas are issued each year, and demand has been so high recently that all of them are taken instantaneously -- mostly with tech workers from India and China. People from those countries also face among the longest waits for green cards.

The Senate plan would have nearly doubled the H-1B quota to 115,000 a year, and it would have helped clear a backlog of green-card applications.

The technology industry mounted a huge push on the issue this year. Microsoft Corp. Chairman Bill Gates met with members of Congress. A group of computer programmers hired a lobbying firm. An industry coalition handed out fake green cards imprinted with their demands.

DOJ_NMG_0070480

A few professional associations and anti-immigrant groups oppose expanding the skilled-worker programs, contending that they can depress wages, but the programs have historically drawn support from both political parties.

At Microsoft, H-1B and green card reform has emerged as the "top legislative priority right now," said Jack Krumholtz, the company's managing director for federal government affairs. "We are really at a crisis in terms of the industry's ability to hire the best and the brightest and retain them."

A company spokeswoman estimated that about 7 percent of Microsoft's hires over the past five years had H-1B visas. Of the company's H-1B employees, 20 percent a year obtain green cards. The company said the low number stems from delays in processing green cards. An estimated 500,000 green-card applications are pending nationwide.

The employees describe agonizing, life-altering waits. In some cases, marriages, home purchases and retirement investments are put off. Graduates of master's and doctorate programs describe stringing together fellowships and one-year appointments to stay in this country. A spokesman for the National Institutes of Health said those on temporary work visas have trouble qualifying for federal research grants.

Immigrant scientists call the policies crippling and said they had expected relief from a provision in the Senate bill that would have allowed favorable treatment for graduates in the sciences, technology, engineering, and mathematics.

"In the midst of this whole debate, very little is said about legal immigration. And even within legal immigration, little about PhDs and scientists," said Jai Pathak, a research scientist who lives in Washington. "There are a lot of very fine scientists the government would like to keep, but their citizenship status impedes it."

Pathak cited the Hungarian roots of Intel Corp. co-founder Andrew S. Grove, whose work helped create the modern computer industry that employs millions of Americans.

"What would have happened if the United States had decided to close the doors on him?" Pathak said.

In Immigrant Fight, Grass-Roots Groups Boost Their Clout (WSJ)

By Miriam Jordan

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

SAN BERNARDINO, Calif. -- Armed with a computer and less than $100, Joseph Turner two years ago formed a group called "Save Our State." His goal: save California from turning into a "Third World cesspool" of illegal immigrants, he says. The group doesn't have a formal membership, and Mr. Turner counts barely 2,000 people on his email list and message board.

Yet this meager base has proved to be a powerful springboard. Through his Web site, Mr. Turner has recruited supporters to hold confrontational protests outside Home Depot stores, where unauthorized workers often gather to seek jobs. He has also helped ignite a nationwide movement by local governments to crack down on illegal immigration. So far, about 10 towns have passed ordinances to drive out undocumented immigrants after getting the idea from Mr. Turner. Dozens of other towns are considering such measures.

"My idea of activism is aggressive, street-level and in-your-face activism," says Mr. Turner, who strikes a clean-cut look with slicked-back black hair and icy blue eyes. He adds: "I don't believe in turning the other cheek."

Mr. Turner is part of an anti-immigrant brushfire that is gathering force at the grass-roots level around the U.S. Small groups like Mr. Turner's Save Our State are cropping up from coast to coast, recruiting members and devising tactics to tackle illegal immigration in their communities. Critics call many of these groups racist, a charge organizers deny. What no one disputes is that they are tapping into widespread frustration over the federal government's failure to adopt a national immigration policy while a deeply divided Congress clashes over how to deal with 12 million illegal immigrants.

The Center for New Community, a Chicago organization that tracks immigration issues, says there are 211 so-called nativist groups -- groups that advocate protecting the interests of native inhabitants against those of immigrants -- across the U.S., up from 37 two years ago. The Southern Poverty Law Center, which tracks extremist groups, also says nativist groups are on the rise and that several are hate groups, including Mr. Turner's Save Our State. The law center defines a hate group as one that singles out and promotes hatred of another group, based on ethnicity, language, religion, sexual inclination or immigration status. Mr. Turner denies he runs a hate group.

DOJ_NMG_0070481

These grass-roots organizations are having an impact. In North Carolina, state legislators say the fierce opposition of one anti-illegal immigration group torpedoed a bill proposed last year that would have allowed undocumented students who graduate from state high schools to pay in-state college tuition. In Georgia, another group's mobilization efforts were crucial to passing a bill last spring to curb illegal immigration. In Arizona, a group called Protect Our City is pushing for local officials, including police officers, to help federal authorities enforce immigration laws within Phoenix.

The groups are often one-man shows, steered by tech-savvy leaders who creatively use the Web to mobilize support for immigration protests, boycotts, legislation and media coverage in their areas. Their influence is amplified as they find each other online and coordinate their efforts. Save Our State has occasionally joined forces with a North Carolina group as well as the volunteer group Minuteman Project, which patrols the border with the goal of stopping illegal immigrants from entering U.S. soil.

Several budding groups receive funding from older, well-endowed national organizations, such as the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which has been battling immigration for decades. Ron Woodard, head of NC Listen, a North Carolina group, says he improved his public-speaking skills in courses sponsored by FAIR. The Washington, D.C.-based national group, which advocates curbing legal immigration as well as stopping illegal entries to the U.S., also provided his group with "minor" financial support, he says.

Striking a Chord

These groups often strike a chord in small towns and areas where Hispanics are relative newcomers. Immigrants are increasingly bypassing traditional Hispanic centers in big cities, California and the southwest. Instead, they're settling in smaller, homogeneous towns and in Middle America, where many residents are still unaccustomed to them and fear that wages are being undercut by immigrants taking blue-collar jobs in their community.

"The financial costs to Georgia taxpayers of supplying [bilingual] education, incarceration, medical care and social benefits to the hundreds of thousands of people who are here in violation of our laws is becoming impossible to ignore," declared one Web site run by a Georgia grass-roots group, the Dustin Inman Society. "Someone please point to a case of wages in Georgia having gone up because of illegal immigration!"

Anti-immigrant sentiment has swept the U.S. before, targeting Irish, Italian, Jewish, Chinese and Japanese newcomers. In response to public outcry against the influx of immigrants from Southern and Eastern Europe after World War I, Congress passed the Quota Act of 1921 and then the even more restrictive Immigration Act of 1924. These days, hostility is directed at Spanish-speaking immigrants, especially illegal immigrants who are decried as a burden on taxpayers and a threat to national security.

William Gheen, a former conservative campaign strategist and legislative assistant, formed the Americans for Legal Immigration-PAC, or ALIPAC, on Sept. 11, 2004, the anniversary of the terrorist attacks. Hispanic illegal immigrants aren't blowing up skyscrapers, "but they steal American jobs, depress American wages and can wreck American lives," Mr. Gheen says. "They're the enemies in our streets." He says his group, run from his home in Raleigh, N.C., boasts supporters from all 50 states and has raised $40,000 so far this year. "Most contributions come from concerned individuals, checks for $25 to $50," Mr. Gheen says.

The money comes from people like Lisa Mercier, a Hartselle, Ala., homemaker and devout southern Baptist who says the issue piqued her interest when Latino gangs moved into her former neighborhood on the outskirts of Washington, D.C. "With terrorism the way it is, we can't have our border wide open," she says, adding: "All the poor would like to come here."

Last year, four North Carolina lawmakers introduced a bipartisan bill that would entitle undocumented students who graduate from North Carolina high schools to attend universities paying in-state tuition. Mr. Gheen mounted an opposition campaign on the Web, lobbied in the halls of the state legislature and spread his message on a conservative radio talk show.

Several state legislators who signed the bill subsequently asked to remove their names from it. The bill never moved out of committee.

"This little organization got it on talk radio and created a firestorm," says North Carolina State Representative Paul Luebke, a Democrat and a primary sponsor of the bill. "Right-wing talk radio amplified the message. They hammered away on it incessantly. This enraged large numbers of people."

DOJ_NMG_0070482

Mr. Luebke also says Mr. Gheen preyed on the discomfort felt by many white North Carolinians over the increased visibility of Latinos -- the spread of Mexican restaurants and stores, Spanish-language signs and Spanish-language movies at video stores. With manufacturing jobs also moving overseas, "the brown immigrant was an easy scapegoat," says Mr. Luebke.

Mr. Gheen says his is a "moderate group" and denies trying to stir up racial animosities.

In Marietta, Ga., the local grass-roots group is the Dustin Inman Society, named for a teenage boy killed several years ago in a car accident that allegedly involved an illegal immigrant. The group is led by D. A. King, a 54-year-old former Marine who sports a close-cropped haircut and says he was snubbed by Mexicans who moved into a house in his neighborhood in the 1990s. He says he grew even more frustrated when local and immigration officials ignored his calls to take action against the house, which he believed was overcrowded with illegal immigrants.

Mr. King shuttered his insurance business of 20 years in 2003 to devote himself full-time to educating Georgians about the adverse impact of illegal immigration, organize rallies around the issue and work the halls of the Georgia state legislature.

The crowning of his efforts was the passage in April of the Georgia Security and Immigration Compliance Act, a state bill chockablock with provisions to stop illegal immigration that will begin to go into effect in July 2007. "We were sliding down a slippery slope on the way to 'Georgiafornia,' " says Mr. King, referring to California, which is often used as the poster child of excessive Latino immigration.

Effective Weapon

A key proponent of the immigration bill, his single most effective weapon was organizing protests at the Capitol "for the media and state governments to see," says Mr. King. He also praised the bill on radio and in newspaper columns. "I made it impossible for politicians to ignore the issue," he says.

Republican State Senator Chip Rogers, who wrote the Georgia bill, says Mr. King was "instrumental in ensuring people interested in illegal immigration were aware of the bill. He sent lots of email, went on radio often and wrote in local papers about it. He touched just about every potential media outlet."

In the network of anti-illegal immigrant activists, few have risen higher or faster than Joseph Turner. He still relishes a moment 12 years ago, when he took the stage at his half-Hispanic high school in working-class Riverside, Calif., to endorse a controversial ballot initiative to ban illegal immigrants from receiving state benefits. The senior drew such a heated response that he was sequestered in a gym afterward until tempers were calmed.

"I believe in the superiority of America and American culture," he says. If the federal government isn't doing its job, he says, direct democracy should provide solutions. He calls for deporting all illegal immigrants, saying, "the net benefit of illegal aliens is negative."

Mr. Turner grew up in Southern California's so-called Smog Belt, which includes San Bernardino and other working-class towns. His biological father, an alcoholic, walked out of his life when he was about eight years old, he says. His mother remarried a Mexican-American, whom Mr. Turner considers his father. He heard a lot of Spanish growing up. Mr. Turner says his mother was a drug addict who spent time incarcerated, and describes his stepfather as a "former gang banger" who abused drugs and was imprisoned. Both have since been rehabilitated, he says. Mr. Turner's mother, Janice Aguayo, confirms his account.

Incensed by the outcry of civil-rights and Hispanic groups against roundups of undocumented immigrants by U.S. authorities in southern California in 2004, Mr. Turner started his own group to battle illegal immigration, Save Our State. His first target was Home Depot, where immigrants often wait for homeowners seeking an extra hand at gardening or painting.

"With as little as five people you can shut down a day-laborer center," says Mr. Turner, because employers will be too intimidated to stop and hire them. Contractors have been deterred from hiring from these sites during the protests and in several days that followed. Home Depot declines to comment on Mr. Turner.

At a rally outside the day-laborer center in the ritzy coastal town of Laguna Beach, neo-Nazis and white supremacists waved Nazi and confederate flags. Mr. Turner says they weren't welcome at the event but that he couldn't stop them and that Save our State members left shortly after they arrived. Mr. Turner says he also deletes white-supremacist rhetoric when it pops up on his Web site's message board.

DOJ_NMG_0070483

About a year ago, Mr. Turner drafted a three-page ordinance -- the "City of San Bernardino Illegal Immigrant Relief Act." Although it was derailed before it could come to a citywide vote, the ordinance went on to be imitated, and passed, by several towns and cities across the country.

The law as proposed in San Bernardino would have revoked the license of any business deemed to aid or abet illegal immigrants, even unknowingly. It also would have banned landlords from renting to an illegal immigrant, and required that all rental agreements be filed with the city for verification. One provision would have prohibited the city from conducting business in any language other than English.

Over four months, Mr. Turner spent evenings and weekends gathering signatures outside grocery stores and knocking on doors in the more-affluent northern end of San Bernardino. As fear spread in Hispanic-heavy communities, the Archbishop of San Bernardino called an emergency meeting of all parish priests and dioceses to discuss how to counter the measure. Community leaders, interfaith groups and town officials gathered soon afterward. "We wanted to portray this as a human issue, not a political or religious issue," says Auxiliary Bishop Rutilio del Riego.

Before the ordinance could go to a citywide vote, a judge ruled that Mr. Turner hadn't collected enough signatures and granted him 10 days to make up the difference, or nearly twice the original number of signatures. Concluding he couldn't achieve that, Mr. Turner let his hometown effort die.

But over the next few weeks, it sprang back to life -- in the form of copycat initiatives taken up in small towns across the country, including Valley Park, Mo., Riverside, N.J., and Hazleton, Pa. Hazleton Mayor Louis Barletta was searching for ways to crack down on illegal immigration when he found Mr. Turner's petition on the Internet, though he says he isn't familiar with the views of Mr. Turner or his group. Hazleton now prohibits anyone from renting to or hiring illegal immigrants, and has made English the town's official language. Civil-rights groups are challenging the legislation in court.

Mr. Turner, who has a young son with his girlfriend, recently decided to run for the local San Bernardino school board. He says that he plans to challenge the Supreme Court ruling that allowed all children living in the U.S. to attend school, regardless of their immigration status. He also works as a field representative for Republican state assemblyman Ray Haynes, who represents a district on the Mexico-California border about an hour's drive from San Bernardino.

Mr. Haynes says he doesn't agree with all of Mr. Turner's views and rhetoric but admires his work ethic and energy. "He's on fire," says Mr. Haynes.

Herndon Zeroing In On Illegal Immigrants (WP)

By Bill Turque

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

Herndon's decision Tuesday night to seek federal training for some of its police officers so they can enforce federal immigration law is part of a long-term effort by a new mayor and Town Council to aggressively curb the presence of residents who are in the country illegally.

Two proposals on the draft agenda for next week's council session would intensify the town's scrutiny of private employers. One would require anyone seeking a business license to prove legal immigration status. The other would compel contractors doing business with the town to provide evidence that their employees live in the United States legally.

The measures are likely to enlarge Herndon's role as a crucible in the national debate on immigration policy -- a position that town officials say they were forced into because of inaction by the federal government. The proposals also add fuel to charges from immigration advocates and some residents that Herndon, which has the largest proportion of foreign-born residents of any locality in the Washington area, has become implacably hostile to all immigrants, legal and illegal.

Illegal immigration has been the dominant issue in town politics since summer 2005, when the council voted, after bitter debate, to open a publicly funded center to help workers connect with employers. Before the Herndon Official Workers Center was established, laborers had gathered each morning in a 7-Eleven parking lot to find jobs -- an arrangement that neighbors and officials said was chaotic and confusing. Opponents of the center said that by opening it, the town was abetting illegal immigration.

DOJ_NMG_0070484

In May, Herndon voters unseated Mayor Michael L. O'Reilly and two council members who supported the publicly funded facility and replaced them with challengers, including new Mayor Stephen J. DeBenedittis, who were highly critical of the idea.

Vice Mayor Dennis D. Husch, one of two council members who voted against the labor center last year, said that the new proposals are still "notional" at this point but that the council intends to send a message that illegal immigrants are not welcome in Herndon.

"These [proposals] may never see the light of day," Husch said. "But we need to do something."

Business licenses have traditionally served as revenue-raising instruments, with governments charging owners a set percentage of projected gross sales. But in an advisory opinion this summer, Virginia Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell said local governments can withhold licenses from applicants who are not living legally in the United States.

What the contracting measure would accomplish is less clear. Federal law already establishes penalties for employers who knowingly keep illegal workers on their payroll. Herndon's own standard contract language also forbids companies that employ the undocumented from working on major projects. Town Attorney Richard B. Kaufman said the council was interested in "beefing up" the language so that it applied to all contractors who provide services to the government.

The council's 6 to 1 vote late Tuesday authorizes town officials to contact U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement to express interest in enrolling some officers in the agency's "287 (g)" program, a provision of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

If the town is accepted into the program, it would negotiate an agreement covering the scope of the training officers would receive -- often in the areas of document identification and cross-cultural communication -- and what the law would empower them to do. In general, those who pass the five-week course are authorized to question or detain people they believe to be in the country illegally, according to ICE descriptions of the program.

In a hearing preceding the vote, supporters of the program said it would take criminals off the streets.

"You guys were elected because you said you would take action," Brenda Kelley, a 21-year resident of the town, told the council. "We all want safe, secure, happy, respectful neighborhoods."

"Herndon has a chance to lend a helping hand to federal immigration agents," Stacey Brooks said.

Jorge Rochac, a Salvadoran immigrant and former translator for the Herndon police department who ran unsuccessfully for a council seat this year, said adoption of the federal program "would tend to alienate the Hispanic community and makes them less apt to cooperate and trust the police."

Former council member John DeNoyer was also critical. "Would I be profiled as a suspected terrorist or illegal alien because I have a beard and often turn brown toward the end of an outdoor summer?" he asked. "Please do not glorify and nurture the xenophobic hysteria that is affecting our town."

TAX:

How Merck Saved $1.5 Billion Paying Itself For Drug Patents (WSJ)

By Jesse Drucker

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

SOUTHAMPTON, Bermuda -- Merck & Co.'s medications Zocor and Mevacor have been used by millions of people to help lower their cholesterol. But Merck also used the drugs to lower something else: its U.S. tax bill.

Thirteen years ago, Merck set up a subsidiary with an address in tax-friendly Bermuda, in partnership with a British bank. Merck quietly transferred patents underlying the blockbuster drugs to the new subsidiary, according to documents and people familiar with the transaction. Merck then paid the subsidiary for use of the patents.

The arrangement in effect allowed some of the profits to disappear into a kind of Bermuda triangle between different tax jurisdictions. The setup helped Merck slash $1.5 billion off its federal tax bills over roughly the next 10 years.

Now, the complicated transaction -- never publicly disclosed -- has sparked one of the largest tax disputes ever involving a U.S. corporation. The Internal Revenue Service is challenging the tax benefits from the arrangement, which the company code-named "Project Ryland," after a fancy restaurant near the company's New Jersey headquarters. Merck anticipates it will be ordered to hand over a total of $2.3 billion in back taxes, interest and penalties, according to its filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission, which give the amounts in dispute but virtually no other details.

DOJ_NMG_0070485

Merck says it did nothing wrong and that the deal was simply a way of raising financing for its 1993 acquisition of a pharmacy-benefits management firm, Medco Containment Services Inc. "We believe the partnership transaction is in full compliance with IRS rules and regulations and we vigorously disagree with the proposed IRS adjustments," says Merck spokesman Raymond Kerins, who declines to discuss details of the dispute.

The IRS won't discuss its objection to the Merck partnership. But it is pursuing actions against Dow Chemical Co. and General Electric Co. over similar arrangements they set up within a few months of the Merck deal. Those, federal tax authorities have argued, weren't real partnerships with foreign banks but just well-disguised loan agreements, designed to avoid taxes by maneuvering between the tax laws of different countries, with no economic substance.

The Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals last month reversed a trial court and declared that foreign banks in the GE deal were not "bona fide equity partners," a victory for the government in its battle over $62 million in back taxes. GE is seeking a rehearing. Meanwhile, in a little-noticed dispute in U.S. District Court in Baton Rouge, La., the IRS claimed last year that Dow improperly lowered its tax bill by about $130 million by shifting income, through a partnership, to a consortium of German, Dutch, U.K. and Belgian banks. Dow says the arrangement was legitimate financing and is suing the government to try to keep the money.

As part of that case, the Justice Department says in a court filing it anticipates taking "extensive discovery" from investment bank Goldman Sachs Group Inc., which helped structure both the Dow and Merck deals. Goldman spokesman Peter Rose said, "We take enormous efforts to ensure our transactions comply with applicable tax laws."

The cases are part of an attempt by U.S. authorities to crack down on what is often called "tax arbitrage." The usual strategy: lower a company's tax bills by structuring transactions so certain types of income or expenses are classified as one thing by the IRS, but something very different by another country's tax regulators.

Often the strategies are aided by overseas banks or nonprofit organizations that use complex legal structures to effectively share their tax advantages with U.S. companies. U.S. and U.K. banks also have teamed up to devise structures that lower each other's taxes. IRS Commissioner Mark Everson warned a U.S. Senate panel in June that strategies like those are "on the rise."

Mr. Everson named tax arbitrage as among the most significant enforcement problems the agency faces. He said the IRS has formed a team to consider crafting new international treaties, as well as performing tax audits that would simultaneously look at a company's tax obligations in multiple countries.

Proponents of the deals say it's only smart business to take advantage of U.S. loopholes and the differences among tax rules around the world. Technology and pharmaceutical companies, for instance, are aggressively shifting intellectual-property assets to countries with far lower tax rates, such as Singapore and Ireland.

Merck's potentially costly dispute with the IRS comes as the company battles more than 14,000 lawsuits related to its now-withdrawn Vioxx pain reliever, with its projected liability topping $4 billion. Like other big drug makers, Merck's biggest sellers are losing patent protection while its newer drugs are not expected to make up the lost revenue.

Many of the strategies like the ones used by Merck, Dow and GE were inspired by one man.

In 1988, longtime tax attorney and New York University law school professor R. Donald Turlington published an influential article in the proceedings of a tax conference. Subtitled "The Art of Tax Avoidance," the article began with a 1931 quote from the late Chicago Mafia boss Al Capone: "A good lawyer with a briefcase can steal more than ten men with machine guns."

In the article, Mr. Turlington laid out ways companies could lower their taxes by exploiting a loophole in the way income was allocated within partnerships for tax purposes. He focused on the concept of depreciation, a key tool to lowering taxes.

For example, in the U.S. a factory is considered to have a finite life of 39 1/2 years and loses its value gradually during that life. An owner is allowed to deduct a portion of its cost each year, so if the factory cost $39.5 million, the company can deduct $1 million a year from the plant's taxable income. But after that, a company can end up with considerable income from the asset and no offsetting deductions. In the case of pharmaceutical patents, tax write-offs generally are used up during research and development.

DOJ_NMG_0070486

Mr. Turlington pointed to a way around such problems by putting the already-depreciated asset into a partnership, and allocating some of its taxable income to a member of the partnership that for one reason or another wouldn't mind shouldering it. That could reduce the tax bill for the company contributing the assets.

Closing the Loophole

Mr. Turlington called on the government to close this loophole, and in December 1992, the U.S. Treasury Department decided to do just that, proposing an "anti-abuse" regulation. But before the government finalized the new regulations a year later, several companies moved to shift assets and establish partnerships to exploit the loophole.

Mr. Turlington himself helped structure the Merck deal, counseling Goldman Sachs on the transaction, despite his call for the law to be changed.

Merck, GE and Dow Chemical also were aided by some of the country's most prominent partnership tax lawyers, who also once served in high government tax posts. William Nelson, a former IRS chief counsel, advised Merck and GE on their deals, according to people with knowledge of his involvement. The firm he founded with William McKee, a former University of Virginia law professor and U.S. Treasury Department tax legislative counsel, litigated the GE dispute with the government at trial. The firm also is representing Dow in the litigation over its disputed partnership. Mr. Nelson and Mr. McKee declined to comment on the Merck deal.

In July 1993 -- about six months after the government identified the partnership loophole -- Merck announced a $6 billion deal to acquire Medco, the pharmacy-benefits manager. It had cash on hand to fund only part of the giant purchase, and said at the time it would need additional financing.

Sometime before the Medco deal was announced, a Goldman banker named David Ackert, along with Mr. Turlington, presented Merck officials with the partnership idea as a way to raise financing and enjoy significant tax savings. Mr. Ackert, who no longer works for Goldman Sachs, referred questions to the investment bank.

At the time, Merck's Mevacor and Zocor were two of the company's biggest-selling drugs. Merck no longer had deductions to write off against the patents, according to a person familiar with the matter.

A few weeks before the Medco deal was announced, Merck transferred ownership of the patents to a new Delaware subsidiary, MSD Technology LP, and then registered other Merck subsidiaries that were partners in MSD to do business in Bermuda, according to U.S. patent records and Bermuda company records.

For its deal to work, Merck needed a partner willing to absorb taxable income. It chose a midsized British bank, a unit of Abbey National PLC. The negotiations with Abbey took place in London, Toronto and Bermuda, according to people familiar with the talks. They were held overseas to forestall any issue about whether the partners and the partnership were doing business in the U.S., which could jeopardize the deal's tax treatment. Merck and Abbey's lawyers and investment bankers hammered out much of the complex structure between bowls of fish chowder at Bermuda's posh Southampton Princess hotel.

According to a document filed in an unrelated lawsuit, Abbey took a limited partnership interest in MSD. The arrangement, according to people familiar with the situation, involved Abbey contributing several hundred million dollars in cash to the partnership in exchange for a minority stake. Merck then began paying royalties to the MSD partnership to use the patents covering the anti-cholesterol drugs, these people said.

In effect, Merck was paying itself -- its subsidiaries still owned a majority of MSD -- for the right to use drugs its own scientists had developed. The royalties it paid then largely went straight back into its own coffers, as much of the money was lent to Merck through another subsidiary, according to the people familiar with the transaction. A subsidiary of MSD collected the interest, most of which effectively was returned to Merck when the partnership was liquidated.

The convoluted arrangement gave Merck a sizable tax reduction for roughly a decade. On MSD's internal books -- and only there -- a portion of the incoming royalty payments were allocated as taxable income to Abbey. That reduced Merck's tax liability.

Crucial Element

In a crucial element of the deal, Abbey wasn't liable for those taxes either, because U.K. authorities didn't recognize tax allocations within the books of U.S. partnerships.

In return for its initial cash contribution, Abbey received a stream of payments from MSD. Mr. Turlington and companies that have set up similar transactions liken the payments to preferred dividends. The government has called deals like these loan agreements, not partnerships with the foreign banks, and argued that the cash payments to the banks are really loan interest. In that case, the tax burden can't legally be shifted.

DOJ_NMG_0070487

Mr. Turlington, now retired, says the Merck deal with Abbey was a tax-advantaged way to raise significant capital, and not simply a tax-saving measure. "In my mind the question with a deal like Merck was, and still should be, 'Can a taxpayer who decides to do something for a legitimate business reason, like raising [money], do it in a way that's tax efficient by taking advantage of a rule that the government wrote?'" He added: "Merck's obligation is to do the best it can for its shareholders. If you were going to write that Merck is under some higher social obligation to maximize its taxes, that would probably catch Merck by surprise."

The deal also had another benefit: The money raised from Abbey wasn't recorded as debt, so didn't jeopardize the company's stellar credit rating.

Abbey, which has since been purchased by Spain-based Banco Santander Central Hispano SA, said it had no comment on the transaction.

In April 2004, the IRS gave Merck a preliminary notice that it was disputing the company's taxes for four years beginning in 1993, the year the Bermuda partnership was established. Late last year, the tax agency finalized that decision for 1993, and proposed disallowing tax benefits from the following three years, according to Merck's SEC filings. Merck says in the filings that it expects similar final notices for subsequent years.

Write to Jesse Drucker at jesse.drucker@wsj.com1

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Congress To Approve Defense Bill Rivaling Vietnam-Era Spending (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Congress is poised to send President Bush a record $447 billion Pentagon budget that anticipates defense spending next year will exceed annual expenditures at the height of the Vietnam War.

The huge costs weigh heavily on the political landscape this fall and contrast with the more limited Republican domestic agenda before the midterm elections..

With Mr. Bush slated to come to the Capitol today, the party leadership is confident it can deliver both a defense bill and a White House-backed measure authorizing military tribunals to try suspected foreign combatants in the war against terrorism. The House approved the tribunal bill 253-168 yesterday; the Senate, after rejecting an early challenge 54-43, expects to complete action today.

But hopes of some bold pre-election initiative, such as making the child tax credit permanent, have faded. None of the major domestic-appropriations bills will be completed before lawmakers go home. New Internal Revenue Service estimates show 19.2 million taxpayers will be left hanging because of Congress's failure to extend expired tax breaks, such as college-tuition deductions.

Yesterday's action illustrated this mood. An offshore-drilling bill was in jeopardy. And even as the House voted to adjourn this weekend, a $34.8 billion domestic-security measure was stymied by a dispute over language that could delay implementation of post-Sept. 11 border-crossing rules requiring a new passport card for U.S. citizens.

Going into last night, Republicans were hopeful of resolving their differences, but the fact that such a major bill was in any jeopardy at this stage was surprising.

Meanwhile, business allies aren't hiding their impatience with the failure to renew the corporate-research tax credit, which expired at the end of last year. "By standing still, the U.S. is falling behind," said John Engler, Michigan's former Republican governor and president of the National Association of Manufacturers, which released a report estimating that without the credit, the corporate-tax burden on manufacturers could rise 9% annually.

DOJ_NMG_0070488

Republican leaders promise to resolve these and other issues in the post-election session. In trying to avoid fights and protect its majority, the leadership risks appearing content to play it safe. "We are playing not to lose, instead of to win," a top Republican said.

By contrast, the defense-spending bill, which passed the House on Tuesday, is expected to clear the Senate easily today. Its $447 billion total includes $70 billion in emergency funds to pay for operations in Iraq.

Together with earlier Pentagon appropriations, which are to be spent in the fiscal year beginning Oct. 1, the new bill will bring total defense outlays to about $464 billion. That number will surely increase before the end of fiscal 2007, since the administration anticipates another supplemental request in the spring.

The Vietnam War era's high-water point came in 1968, when defense outlays rose to about $470 billion when adjusted to 2006 dollars -- a level unmatched even during the Reagan defense buildup.

Passage of the tribunal bill was never in doubt in the House, and in the Senate, Republicans appeared united and in control. The strongest remaining challenge is an effort by Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) proposing to delete a portion of the legislation that would strip terror suspects of their ability to challenge their detention with a habeas corpus petition.

Costs Of The Wars In Iraq And Afghanistan Could Reach $549 Billion (MCT)

By Drew Brown

McClatchy, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - The total cost of military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan and enhanced security at military bases since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks could reach $549 billion this year, a new report to Congress concludes.

The projection by the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service is based on an update in July from the White House Office of Management and Budget, which estimated that war costs will total $110 billion for fiscal year 2007, which begins Sunday.

In fiscal year 2005, the Pentagon spent an average of $6.4 billion a month in Iraq and $1.3 billion a month in Afghanistan. During fiscal year 2006, it's projected that those costs will have increased to about $8 billion a month in Iraq and $1.5 billion per month in Afghanistan.

"Everybody expects that troops will come home and that next year will be cheaper, but it just never happens that way," said Winslow Wheeler, the director of the Straus Military Reform Project at the Center for Defense Information, a policy-research group in Washington.

The report says war costs are expected to continue to grow in the next decade.

Even if U.S. forces were reduced from 258,000 today in Iraq, Afghanistan and other military operations around the globe related to the war on terrorism to 74,000 by 2010, the Congressional Budget Office estimates that war costs would still grow by $371 billion from fiscal year 2007 to fiscal year 2016.

Given the amount already spent, total war funding could reach $808 billion by 2016, according to the Congressional Research Service report to Congress.

But the true figure may prove to be higher, if current trends hold. The Pentagon had hoped to reduce its troop presence in Iraq to fewer than 100,000 by the end of this year, but military commanders are planning to keep at least 140,000 troops there through the spring because of the high level of violence.

Congress has appropriated about $437 billion so far for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and other anti-terrorism efforts around the world, according to the Congressional Research Service.

This includes money for military operations, base security, reconstruction, foreign aid, embassy costs and veterans' health programs related to the war. Another $2 billion is in fiscal 2007 spending bills for foreign aid and diplomatic operations in Iraq and Afghanistan and veterans' medical programs, the agency reported.

The House approved a record $448 billion in defense spending for 2007 late Tuesday, including $70 billion as a down payment, or bridge fund, for military operations during the next fiscal year. Final passage by the Senate could come Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0070489

The White House expects to ask for at least $50 billion in bridge funding to pay for the war in fiscal year 2008, according to the Congressional Research Service.

The Pentagon hasn't provided Congress with the individual costs of each operation. However, the agency report estimated that Iraq accounts for about 75 percent of all war spending and Afghanistan accounts for 20 percent. Increased base security takes the remaining 5 percent.

Operating, maintenance and procurement costs account for the biggest increases in spending from 2003 to 2006, according to the agency.

Total operating and maintenance costs reached almost $200 billion by fiscal 2006, primarily because of purchases of more body armor, the jump in oil prices, increasing bills to repair aging equipment and money to train Afghan and Iraqi security forces.

The amount spent on replacement weapons and equipment reached almost $61 billion during the same period.

Congress is allocating $23 billion this year to replace worn-out or damaged military equipment. Most of that is going to the Army. Wheeler said the expense could be even higher, and that these costs were likely to climb each year that the war continued.

109th Congress Gets Props For Creativity, If Nothing Else (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

Democrats have a full slate of proposals they would implement if they gain control of Congress in November, but one of their highest priorities will be the acquisition of a new ink pad.

House and Senate Democratic leaders met yesterday to highlight what they call the GOP "Rubber-Stamp Congress" -- by stamping half a dozen posters with the words "Yes, Bush" in red ink. But when they went to perform the deed, in an ornate room off the Senate floor where portraits of John Adams and Thomas Jefferson gazed down on them, there was a prop malfunction.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) attempted to stamp a poster labeled "Social Security Privatization," but the resulting imprint was too faint to read. "I need more ink!" she called. "I need more ink!" She got more ink and tried again, stamping a poster titled "Medicare Part D" -- and got the same illegible result.

Senate Minority Whip Richard Durbin (Ill.) stepped up. "It's time to see if I can get this rubber stamp to work," he said. He could not. His first stamp, on a poster titled "Budget Cuts," came out upside down. Inverting the stamp, he struck the poster anew, this time knocking it off its easel.

"These are tough acts to follow," quipped Rep. Steny Hoyer (Md.), the House minority whip. He held a poster titled "Estate Tax Giveaway" and slammed the stamp on it with all his might. A blurred image appeared.

Batting cleanup was Rep. James Clyburn (S.C.). "I'm gonna make this thing work," he promised. He gave the stamp an extra dab on the ink pad and pressed it firmly to the final poster. But one of the letters failed to appear, leaving the words "Yes, Bus" on the poster.

Durbin promised that the Senate will get better ink pads if Democrats regain the majority. "In the first hundred days," he vowed.

There are just a couple of days left in the life of the 109th Congress, and lawmakers are getting a bit punch-drunk.

The legislature has yet to agree on a single one of its 12 annual spending bills, but the House managed to find time yesterday to consider H. Res. 748, "Recognizing the 225th anniversary of the American and French victory at Yorktown."

Congress still hasn't worked out immigration legislation or lobbying reform, but the House yesterday moved to embrace H. Res. 991, "Congratulating the Columbus Northern Little League Baseball Team from Columbus, Georgia."

There's nothing doing on port security or Social Security, but there was broad agreement yesterday on H. Res 973, honoring "the financial planning profession for their adherence and dedication to the financial planning process."

Measured by days in session or legislative output, this Congress has secured its place as one of the most lethargic of all time. But if historians choose to award points for creativity, the 109th could go down in the books as a most prolific body.

DOJ_NMG_0070490

Consider Rep. David Dreier (R-Calif.), the dapper chairman of the House Rules Committee. On Tuesday, his committee ruled that the House would not consider some 15 amendments the Democrats had proposed to legislation on military commissions. Then, on the House floor yesterday, Dreier scolded the Democrats for not offering an alternative.

Or consider Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), who, in front of the microphones yesterday, quarreled with the Democrats' characterization of this as a "do-nothing Congress." Asked for tangible achievements, Frist responded with a 650-word answer that listed only two items that had cleared Congress: the confirmation of Supreme Court Justice Samuel Alito and Chief Justice John Roberts.

Democrats, shut out of legislative deliberations this week as they have been for most of the session, looked for other ways to draw attention to themselves. Frequently, this involved the use of props.

Sen. Patty Murray (Wash.) went to the Senate floor with a poster about veterans. Sen. Patrick Leahy (Vt.) followed with a poster about Colin Powell. Sens. Frank Lautenberg (N.J.) and Barack Obama (Ill.) went to the Senate television studio with a poster about chemical plant security.

Topping all efforts was Rep. Cynthia McKinney (Ga.), who sponsored a session in the Capitol basement at which participants displayed posters of naked and hooded prisoners with dogs. An aide to McKinney, reading an academic paper, provided the narration. "The legs swelled, the skin erupted in suppurating lesions, the kidney shut down, hallucinations began," he read.

But if McKinney had the best props, Sen. Kent Conrad (N.D.) and Rep. John Spratt (S.C.) had the most. They arrived in the television studio toting no fewer than 13 foam-board posters in six bright colors. As aides hurriedly raised and lowered the posters, the lawmakers read the titles. After Conrad displayed his posters and Spratt showed off his, Conrad realized he had forgotten one and ordered it hung.

"How 'bout putting a chart up?" Spratt retaliated, instructing an aide to hang one about a "Bleak Outlook" that Spratt said was a favorite of his 6-year-old granddaughter.

And the sight gags continued. Each reporter received a manila envelope containing a "Report Card" awarding the GOP Congress one D, five F's and one "incomplete." "You're a pretty generous grader there, John," Conrad remarked.

"I'm on a curve," Spratt explained.

Bush Visits Hill To Rally Senate Troops Before Election (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, September 28, 2006

With most analysts predicting an uphill battle for the GOP in November's mid-term election, President Bush plans to rally Senate Republicans this morning as they prepare to leave town and hit the campaign trail.

A Senate Republican aide said the president would likely discuss the GOP's accomplishments, particularly in the realm of national security, an issue the White House is trying to draw attention to in the six weeks before the election.

As 2 Bushes Try To Fix Schools, Tools Differ (NYT)

By Sam Dillon

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

DAYTONA BEACH, Fla. — Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida has long played the dutiful younger brother.

Well before President Bush signed his No Child Left Behind law, Jeb Bush poured his own ideas into a school improvement program for Florida.

Over the years since, Governor Bush has mostly held his tongue about the president's very different law, even as detractors of all stripes have attacked it.

But in recent weeks — perhaps seeking to cement his legacy as a school-policy expert as he prepares to leave office — Governor Bush has been speaking out about the federal law, mixing dollops of praise with measured criticisms — and taking an occasional potshot. He has been caustic, for instance, about the requirement that 100 percent of the nation's students be proficient in reading and math by 2014.

DOJ_NMG_0070491

"I mean perfection is not going to happen," Mr. Bush said Sept. 12 at a news conference in Orlando, arguing that achievement targets are important but that unrealistic ones discourage educators. "We're all imperfect under God's watchful eye, and it's impossible to achieve it."

He followed up in an interview with criticisms of other provisions.

"With all due respect to the federal system," the governor said, "our accountability system is really the better way to go."

Other figures also say the federal law, which comes up next year for Congressional reauthorization, could use some improvement. But Bush vs. Bush may be the most striking part of the debate.

It is natural, of course, that the brothers might feel a bit of fraternal rivalry on this topic, because each built a political career — George in Texas, Jeb in Florida — around promises to improve their states' schools.

Still, this is more than a brotherly squabble, as Governor Bush's comments could well provide the president's opponents with ammunition against his signature law.

No Child Left Behind and the Florida law, the A-Plus plan, differ in many ways. For one, the federal law grades schools pass-fail, while Florida's gives schools A to F grades.

One reason the governor may be wading into the debate over the federal law is that every year since it took effect in 2002, the school-grading systems have contradicted each other. Hundreds of schools have received an A from Florida while flunking under the federal system, often because they narrowly missed testing targets.

At the Orlando news conference, Paul E. Peterson, a professor of government at Harvard, urged Congress to make the federal law more like Florida's.

"Florida's school-grading system is clearly superior to the one used under No Child Left Behind," said Dr. Peterson, who with a colleague, Martin R. West of Brown University, expands on that argument in the current issue of Education Next, an academic journal.

In the article, Drs. Peterson and West described the federal system as so "badly flawed" that it might err with nearly 3 of every 10 schools it classifies as low performing.

The federal law also puts sanctions on schools that do not meet testing goals, but does not reward ones that do. The Florida law, on the other hand, gives large cash bonuses to schools that help low-performing students improve their scores.

"Punitive actions don't work nearly as well," Governor Bush said in the interview. Accountability, he added, "works better when it's viewed as a reward."

In criticizing No Child Left Behind, Governor Bush signaled disagreement with the position staked out by Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, who told reporters on Aug. 30, "There's not much needed in the way of change."

"I talk about No Child Left Behind like Ivory Soap," Ms. Spellings said. "It's 99.9 percent pure."

Governor Bush said that when he had lunch in early September with Ms. Spellings in Washington "I was loaded for bear, to go in and say, 'What was that quote about?' "

"But she disarmed me completely before I got around to my attack," he recalled. "She is eager to reform, to reauthorize N.C.L.B. There's still work to do, and she knows it."

In an interview, Ms. Spellings said that in characterizing the law as "99.9 percent pure" she meant to convey only that no changes were needed to its "core principles." She cited several changes she hoped for, including extending the reach of the law into high schools.

Months after Governor Bush took office in 1999, the Florida Legislature approved his education plan. It requires schools to administer tests in reading and mathematics every year in Grades 3 through 10 and assigns grades based mainly on the results.

Two years later, a legislative audit found that the A-Plus plan was improving student performance, but noted a weakness in its comparing scores at each grade with the previous year scores from the same grade, measuring a different set of students.

Florida overhauled the plan to track the achievement of individual students from grade to grade, allowing the state to calculate how much specific students had learned in a given year. That has made it possible for the state, for instance, to reward schools for raising the achievement of the lowest-performing 25 percent of students.

No Child Left Behind has broad similarities with the A-Plus plan, but the two plans also differ in important ways.

DOJ_NMG_0070492

Rather than tracking individual students, the federal plan measures whether schools have made "adequate yearly progress," based on whether the percentage of students who demonstrate proficiency at each grade level, and within racial and other groups, increases by a required amount. For example, the system, like A-Plus before its revision, compares scores this year from fourth graders with those from last year. The federal law took effect just as Florida was rolling out its revised plan. Sharp contradictions emerged almost immediately in many states between the federal and state ratings given to local schools.

These contradictions became especially notable in Florida in the summer of 2003, when 1,200 of the state's 3,050 schools earned A's from the state. At the same time, more than 950 of the top-rated schools failed to make adequate yearly progress under the federal law. Similar discrepancies re-emerged in 2004, 2005 and 2006.

R. J. Longstreet Elementary School here in Daytona Beach is an example. The tidy one-story building near the Atlantic Ocean has fallen short on the federal yardstick every year, but Florida has given it an A for five years straight.

It earned its latest A because on tests in spring 2006 tests 80 percent of students met "high standards" in reading, math and writing, and because 60 percent of students, and nearly 80 percent of the lowest-performing students, increased their scores. In August, the school received a $42,800 reward check.

"Congratulations on your outstanding performance," Governor Bush wrote to the school.

But it fell short on 2 of 17 federal requirements, and that was enough to fail under the federal system. On a writing test administered to 55 fourth-grade students, 50 needed to show proficiency; 48 did. On math tests administered to 42 disabled students, 21 needed to score at grade level; 20 did.

Having failed the school four years running, each time because it barely missed a target or two, the federal law requires the Volusia County District to make plans this year to replace the staff at Longstreet or to undertake another form of corrective action, said Chris Colwell, a deputy superintendent.

"We're not opposed to measuring achievement in our schools, but our point is, measure accurately," Dr. Colwell said. "Longstreet has a high-performing faculty. Why would we change them?"

In their Education Next article, Drs. Peterson and West used test figures to calculate how much students learned, on average, in each school in Florida in the 2003-4 school year and compared the gains in schools with adequate yearly progress with those in schools that did not.

Their conclusion?

The federal accountability system does not perform as well as Florida's "in distinguishing schools where students are learning more from those where they are learning less," the professors wrote.

At the Sept. 12 news conference, called to publicize a broad review of education initiatives, Governor Bush listened approvingly as Dr. Peterson praised the A-Plus plan and criticized No Child Left Behind. But the governor has been careful to note what he considers to be the federal law's contributions.

Florida, for instance, began focusing increased attention on disabled and limited-English students after the federal law required states to improve those students' achievement, Governor Bush said.

He approaches the law, he said, "not from the standpoint of saying it's bad, but that it's good and needs to be better."

Connecticut Lawsuit Is Cut Back (NYT)

By Sam Dillon

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

A federal judge yesterday dismissed much of Connecticut's closely watched legal challenge to President Bush's education law, No Child Left Behind, but allowed the state to go forward with its claim that Washington treated the state unfairly in negotiations over how to carry out the law.

"The court has decided that it lacks jurisdiction over most of the state's claims, though one claim will remain pending after this ruling," the judge, Mark R. Kravitz of Federal District Court in New Haven, wrote.

Connecticut's lawsuit, filed in August 2005, challenged the federal law as an unfunded mandate that was costing the state tens of millions of dollars more to carry out than it was receiving from Washington. It was the first legal challenge to the federal law by a state.

DOJ_NMG_0070493

Both sides expressed satisfaction with Judge Kravitz's ruling.

"The Department of Education is pleased that the federal district judge dismissed three of Connecticut's claims in its lawsuit," said Katherine McLane, the department's press secretary. "The goal of No Child Left Behind is nothing more than what parents deserve and are demanding: that their children read and do math at grade level."

Judge Kravitz ruled that Connecticut could not challenge the law's constitutionality until it had exhausted all available administrative appeals to the Department of Education.

The judge permitted the state to proceed with a separate argument that the secretary of education "acted arbitrarily" in denying Connecticut's request for an exemption from the law, after the state had concluded that it would receive insufficient financing to carry out the law's testing mandates.

The Connecticut attorney general, Richard Blumenthal, said, "The judge has preserved our rights to pursue our claim that the secretary is violating our rights, so we're alive and well."

The nation's largest teachers union filed a similar challenge last year, which a federal judge in Michigan dismissed outright last November.

Judge Dismisses Most Of No Child Lawsuit (AP)

AP, September 28, 2006

A federal judge dismissed most of the claims in Connecticut's challenge to the No Child Left Behind law Wednesday on jurisdictional grounds, the state's attorney general said.

Connecticut became the first state to try to block the 2002 law when it filed the lawsuit in August 2005. Attorney General Richard Blumenthal argued that the law was unconstitutional, an unfunded federal mandate costing more than the state received in federal aid.

Judge Mark Kravitz dismissed three counts, saying state officials can't challenge the law until they have violated it, Blumenthal said.

The judge is allowing the state to proceed with a fourth claim that the U.S. Department of Education unfairly denied Connecticut's proposed amendments to testing rules, he said.

The law, the cornerstone of President Bush's education platform, requires annual standardized tests for students in grades 3 through 8, but Connecticut wants to continue its program of testing students every other year, in grades 4, 6 and 8.

"This is a jurisdictional ruling," Blumenthal said Wednesday. "Our challenge is alive and well."

Attorneys for the U.S. Department of Education had asked for a dismissal of the entire lawsuit, arguing that the state understood the law when it accepted hundreds of millions of dollars in education funding.

Key Democrats Blast GOP For Failure To Rein In Budget (MCT)

By James Rosen

McClatchy Newspapers, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - Sen. Kent Conrad, senior Democrat on the Senate Budget Committee, said Wednesday that some of the tax cuts enacted under President Bush might get "trimmed" if his party regains control of Congress.

Conrad and Rep. John Spratt, ranking Democrat on the House Budget Committee, sharply criticized Republicans for failing to adopt a budget or to pass any of the 12 annual appropriations bills.

"We face red ink as far as the eye can see, with the nation's debt continuing to grow out of control," Conrad told reporters at the Capitol. "The debt is skyrocketing, and there's been a failure among the Republicans themselves to arrive at a budget."

Conrad responded cautiously when asked whether Democrats would extend the tax cuts that Congress passed in 2001 and 2003 if they gain control of the House of Representatives or the Senate in the Nov. 7 elections.

The North Dakota Democrat said his party would likely retain "middle-class tax cuts" such as the child tax credit started under President Clinton and the repeal of the "marriage tax penalty" enacted under Bush.

But the senator added that Democratic lawmakers might have to revisit the broader income tax reductions that Bush pushed through Congress during his first 30 months in office.

DOJ_NMG_0070494

"Maybe some of the tax cuts that go to the wealthiest among us are going to have to get trimmed because, you know, we've got to pay our bills," Conrad said.

A broad series of disputes, some of them among Republicans, has stymied movement of the 12 appropriations bills, which fund most government programs. The Senate has passed only the defense and homeland security spending measures, with more progress possible during a lame-deck session later this year after the elections.

Federal spending is projected to increase this year by 9 percent to about $2.7 billion, according to the White House budget office. It's the largest percentage increase since 1990.

While Conrad and Spratt, a South Carolina Democrat, said the budget surplus Bush inherited in January 2001 has turned into a sizable deficit, their figures show that the deficit is shrinking, from a high of $413 billion in 2004 to a projected $260 billion this year.

Tony Fratto, White House deputy press secretary, said strong economic growth is fueling increased federal tax receipts, which are helping reduce the deficit.

Bush's pledge to cut the deficit in half by 2009, Fratto said, is being fulfilled ahead of schedule.

"We're bringing the deficit down from where anyone would have anticipated it would have been," he said. "We inherited a recession and a collapsing equity market, and the impacts of those and September 11th and the corporate scandals were really shocks to the economy. Then having to deal with the war on terror - it's all obviously had an impact on necessary spending and on tax receipts."

Spratt said the accumulated federal debt has increased from almost $6 trillion when Bush took office to almost $9 trillion this year, with an increasing share - now more than $2 trillion - held by foreign countries and other overseas investors.

"Foreigners are amassing more and more of our debt and therefore control over our fiscal and financial future," Spratt said.

Nov. 15 Set For Vote On House GOP Leaders (HILL)

By Patrick O'connor

The Hill, September 28, 2006

House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) has set the date for GOP lawmakers to elect their leaders for the next Congress, Republican aides said yesterday.

The Speaker and other GOP leaders have scheduled an organizing conference for Wednesday, Nov. 15, the week Congress resumes after the hotly contested midterm election.

The elected leaders made their decision earlier this week after wavering on the date of the post-election contest in the face of a potentially devastating midterm, even though the conference was already scheduled to meet that Wednesday.

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) has already sent a letter to the Clerk of the House to notify that office of the date for the elections. Once the Clerk has confirmed the receipt of that letter, the office of Republican Conference Chairwom an Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) will notify members officially.

“Leadership has decided to hold the election on Nov. 15,” Conference spokesman Geoff Embler confirmed yesterday. “Once it’s official with the Clerk, the conference office will send an official notification to the members.”

Each of the eight elected leaders must stand for reelection for the new Congress. The Speaker and Boehner should be safe, even if Republicans lose the House by a narrow margin, but other posts could be up for grabs even if the GOP holds the House.

The announcement of leadership elections is part of a coordinated effort to project confidence before members leave town for the stretch run heading into the November election.

With many Republicans fighting for their political lives this fall, Hastert laid out a few of his legislative priorities for the next Congress. They include simplification of the tax code, increased energy independence and legislation to “give Americans more individual control over their healthcare, lowering costs and increasing choices,” an aide said afterward.

Hastert has not definitely indicated that he will serve in the next Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0070495

"It's our last legislative week, ladies and gentlemen," the Speaker told his Republican colleagues during yesterday's regularly scheduled conference meeting, according to the notes of leadership aide in attendance. "Just one more week to set the tone for October. Just 41 days until Election Day. Just a little over a month until we defeat the Democrats – AGAIN."

"We've got to get back home and remind people why it matters that we maintain the majority," Hastert said. "We've had many successes this Congress, but we still have work to do together next year."

During that same meeting, Republican National Committee (RNC) Chairman Ken Mehlman contrasted the current election cycle with that of 1994, when the GOP upended the Democratic majority in the House for the first time since 1954, to ease Republican concerns that Democrats will retake the House this fall, members and aides present said afterward.

In addition, Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.), a former Republican National Committee executive director, assured members that the national committee's voter turnout program will be even more effective this year than it was in 2004 when it effectively drove Republicans to the polls to reelect President Bush.

In preparation for the elections, GOP lawmakers continue to raise big dollars as part of the National Republican Congressional Committee's (NRCC) Battleground Program.

Rep. Eric Cantor (R-Va.), who chairs the effort on behalf of the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) Chairman Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.), has already eclipsed his initial goal of $17.5 million by raising $18.6 million as of yesterday, numerous aides said. That total includes the $2.7 million members gave Cantor during yesterday's closed-door conference meeting.

Rep. Thad McCotter (R-Mich.) was this week's surprise contributor by offering the NRCC $250,000, and Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton (R-Texas) exceeded his own promised target of $4.2 million by presenting Cantor and Reynolds with a large novelty check for $4.4 million to represent the money he and the members of his Energy and Commerce Committee have contributed to the reelection drive. Barton and his committee members contributed much of that before today's meeting.

In addition, Hastert and Boehner upped their own pledge amounts, vowing to raise $850,000 for the program. Boehner is raising that money in addition to the $70,000 he has pledged to contribute on behalf of Ohio Reps. Steve Chabot (R), Deborah Pryce (R) and Jean Schmidt (R).

The other big surprise was the revelation that Rep. Ron Paul (R), the iconoclastic Texan who rarely sides with his own leadership on tight votes, is on a monthly payment plan to contribute "a significant" amount to the Republican election drive. Cantor would not disclose an exact dollar amount.

Rep. Jim McCrery (R-La.) contributed another $150,000 to bring his Battleground total to $650,000, GOP aides said.

Although most polling and pundits suggest the GOP will lose significant seats in the House this year – and potentially its majority – many members are now projecting more confidence on their prospects.

Republicans circulated polling yesterday by GOP pollster David Winston that showed a sharp jump in the confidence suburban voters have with regard to the economy.

Since July, the right-track/wrong-track numbers have swung 24 points in a positive direction among the suburban voters polled, from 38-57 to 50-45.

That jump coincides with the steady decline of gas prices during September. The suburban voters polled still give Democrats a 10-point advantage on the issue of "energy and gas prices," 38-48, but the September poll represents a 13-point jump for the GOP since July, when Democrats had a 23-point advantage over Republicans on the issue.

"One of the problems that Republicans were having was that they were highlighting their successes with the economy and people were going to the gas pump and seeing the opposite was true," Winston said. "Now, what you're seeing is that message is working."

Other polls from the beginning of the month showed voters are believe the country is still going in the wrong direction.

An NBC/Wall Street Journal poll of 1,000 registered voters conducted by Peter D. Hart Research from the beginning of the month, just as gas prices started to fall, showed the right-track/wrong-track numbers were still at 31-54.

Even Winston's poll suggested suburban voters believe the country overall is heading in the wrong direction, 35 percent to 55 percent, although that is a 5-point jump from July.

DOJ_NMG_0070496

Boehner Looks Secure In 110th (RC)

By Susan Davis

Roll Call, September 28, 2006

One year ago today, then-Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) announced he would temporarily step down as Majority Leader after he was indicted by a Texas grand jury. Now, the man who was elected to replace him in that post, Rep. John Boehner (R-Ohio), appears to be on solid ground to keep his seat at the leadership table in the 110th Congress — even if it's in the minority.

Boehner has been Majority Leader for eight months in a session of Congress marked by leadership upheavals, ethical and criminal scandals and few major legislative victories, and yet — in the estimation of his colleagues — he has emerged largely unscathed.

A number of potential leadership shake-ups could present themselves after the results of Election Day come down. Depending on the outcome, there could be surprise retirements, upstart challenges and calls for retribution.

But of the nearly two-dozen Members and aides across the ideological spectrum of the House Republican Conference interviewed for this story, not one said they believed Boehner would be left without a seat at the table when the GOP Conference gathers on Nov. 15 — the date that has now been chosen to hold leadership elections.

"I have not heard one complaint about him," said Rep. Jo Ann Emerson (R-Mo.) who publicly backed Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) in the contest between Blunt, Boehner and Rep. John Shadegg (R-Ariz.) for Majority Leader earlier this year.

"The one thing that [Boehner] does that is quite good is he listens to all sides. It's not as much a top-down style, it's like a breath of fresh air," she said.

Members frequently cited Boehner's mid-session elevation as a reason to give him another chance to make his own mark in the 110th Congress.

One senior House Republican with ties to Boehner said there is a growing sense in the Conference that Boehner will "exert himself more" next year, whereas this year has been spent navigating problems that existed before he took over the job.

"We were just drifting for several months," observed another House Republican, in reference to the period between when DeLay stepped down and Boehner was elected to replace him. "Boehner walked into a very difficult situation."

Education and the Workforce Chairman Howard McKeon (R-Calif.), a loyal Boehner ally and his predecessor to the committee's gavel, said he was confident Boehner would remain in leadership next year. "I don't think there is any question," McKeon said, who credited Boehner's role in passing the fiscal 2007 budget in the House.

"He didn't want to twist any arms, that's not his style. ... He keeps his word, and he builds consensus."

While it is no surprise that Boehner's public supporters in the leadership race still back him, he also has reached out to Blunt supporters as well.

One public Blunt supporter, who asked not to be identified, said they were surprised at how gracious Boehner was after the leadership election.

"His attitude towards everything is like, 'Well you weren't with me that time, but can you be with me next time?'" the Member said. "He doesn't hold grudges — or at least he doesn't show it."

Rep. Patrick McHenry (R-N.C.), another Blunt supporter, also credited Boehner for sending the message that there would be no hard feelings held over from the leadership race.

"Based on both on style and performance, Boehner has secured his position in the next Congress," McHenry said, "In a tough environment he's excelled, and I think Members see his ability to get stuff done."

While DeLay's and Blunt's offices often clashed behind the scenes, leadership sources insist that Boehner and Blunt — and their aides — have more or less put rivalries aside.

Even those House sources sympathetic to Blunt acknowledged that Boehner is most likely to survive the GOP's worst-case scenario if they lose the House majority on Nov. 7.

It is widely believed on Capitol Hill that Hastert will not remain in Congress under that scenario — although Hastert has shown no indication of that publicly — and there are already leadership elections anticipated for the Republican Conference posts.

DOJ_NMG_0070497

Sources suggested that Blunt could be vulnerable to a challenge as well if he chose to run for Minority Whip, yet Chief Deputy Majority Whip Eric Cantor (R-Va.), like Boehner, is widely viewed as a current leader who could survive in the minority, if he chose to run.

And while it is possible that a Member could step up to challenge Boehner, particularly if Republicans lose the majority, there is a general consensus that Boehner would be difficult to defeat in a leadership race.

One caveat to that scenario is if Republicans lose the majority by a massive margin, similar to when Republicans swept control in 1994. "Then all bets are off," observed a senior GOP aide. But at this point, a majority of House Republicans do not believe a tidal wave is on the horizon.

And if Republicans can hold control of the House, Boehner would be re-elected easily to his current post or — if Hastert decides to retire next year — potentially to the Speakership.

Rep. Tom Feeney (R-Fla.), an active member of the Republican Study Committee who initially supported Shadegg in the leader's race, said Boehner would "absolutely" be reelected to leadership.

"John inherited the environment we've got today, he didn't cause it," Feeney said, adding that win or lose, Boehner is likely secure. "If things go poorly, he'll get none of the blame, and if things go well, he'll get a great deal of credit."

Stylistically, Boehner runs his operation in stark contrast to how DeLay did business —which is a welcome relief to many Members who were tiring toward the end of DeLay's tenure of his heavy-handed manner.

"John Boehner's leadership brings some of the vision back from when we first got here," said Rep. Zach Wamp (R-Tenn.), referencing the 1994 takeover. Wamp similarly credited Boehner's affability and media-friendly style. "His stock is extremely high among House Republicans right now," he said.

Boehner is the only member of the top elected leadership since Republicans won in 1994 who has served as a committee chairman — experience that Members say has provided for a more inclusive approach to moving legislation.

A GOP leadership aide noted that Boehner has worked diligently on "Member management," to build consensus for the agenda and to avoid forcing vulnerable Members into tough votes before the election.

For instance, Boehner pulled a trade package from the floor this week involving African and developing nations because Members from textile states, particularly North Carolina, did not want to face a trade vote seven weeks out from an election.

On Tuesday, Boehner offered this self-evaluation: "I feel good about doing over the last several months exactly what I told Members I would do in terms of bringing us back to the basics, being more inclusive, involving more Members, and, frankly, lowering the temperature around here. And I guess to sum it all up, I would say so far, so good."

'Concern' In Murtha Camp (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, September 28, 2006

Liberal House Democrats are not lining up behind Rep. Jack Murtha's (D-Pa.) leadership candidacy in the numbers he had hoped despite his outspoken stance against the Iraq war.

Murtha's failure to line up staunch opponents of the war could prove a blow to his hope of denying the majority leadership to Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (Md.) in the event of a Democratic takeover of the House in the 110th Congress.

Rep. Jim Moran (D-Va.), a friend of Murtha who has been helping him with the race, said tepid support among some progressives was a worry to him. "It does concern you when people you think are going to be with you turn out not to be. Some of that's cultural issues, guns and abortion," he said. "But we still have the votes."

Liberal Reps. Maxine Waters (D-Calif.), Barney Frank (D-Mass.), Bill Delahunt (D-Mass.), Tom Lantos (D-Calif.), John Lewis (D-Ga.), Jerry Nadler (D-N.Y.), Lucille Roybal-Allard (D-Calif.), Diane Watson (D-Calif.) and Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) are all backing Hoyer even though many admire Murtha's stance on the war. All but Lewis opposed Hoyer in a 2001 leadership race against House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

Some liberals believe Murtha's record on social issues is too conservative, especially on such topics as gun rights, gay marriage and abortion. Others avow that they are happy with Hoyer's performance as minority whip and want to maintain the status quo in their leadership.

DOJ_NMG_0070498

Until now, many liberals had been wary of giving Hoyer a promotion. Many took a dim view of him in previous leadership races, opposing his failed campaign against Pelosi in 2001 and voting against his chosen candidate in the caucus vice-chair race earlier this year.

Some saw him as harboring a continuing desire to undermine Pelosi even years after their race, while others were upset when he sided with party centrists on such legislative issues as the 2005 overhaul of bankruptcy laws. Murtha, meanwhile, has been a key Pelosi backer in spite of their ideological differences.

But for Nadler, none of those factors mattered.

"I was annoyed. I am annoyed," he said of Hoyer's support of the bankruptcy bill.

"But so what?...He's done a great job as whip. Between Nancy and Steny, we've had an extraordinarily united caucus. If we win, we're going to need that same unity next year."

Nadler called Hoyer an "attractive spokesman" for the caucus who could speak on a wide range of issues.

Waters, a nationally known liberal who founded the Out of Iraq Caucus in 2005, said she was supporting Hoyer but declined to comment further. She serves as a chief deputy whip in Hoyer's whip operation but was appointed to the post by Pelosi. She was so opposed to Hoyer in 2001 that she served as a nominator for Pelosi.

Waxman pointed to ideological differences as his reason for backing Hoyer.

"When you look at the two on contrast, there are distinct differences between them on abortion, on the environment, on guns. I expect Hoyer will win. I think he's way ahead," he said.

Lewis called Hoyer a "bridge-builder" who was working "for the whole Democratic caucus." Roybal-Allard said he was "a Democrat in every positive sense of the word."

But not all progressives will do the same about-face. Liberal Rep. Mike Capuano (D-Mass.), a Murtha backer, said he thought the "majority of the Progressive Caucus" would end up supporting Murtha, as would, he said, "a majority of the Blue Dogs" and "a majority of the New Democrats," two groups of moderates.

He had "no concern at all" about defections to Hoyer. "Everyone's going to be split 100 ways to Sunday."

Moran said Murtha would lead from the center.

"If Jack were majority leader, he is obviously going to provide every opportunity for people, where they feel there's a difference, to have their voices heard on abortion or other issues," he said.

He added that Murtha had "a slight advantage" among current House Democrats, not including members who refused to weigh in yet on the race and those that could be elected in November.

Both sides acknowledged that the race was shaping up far differently than Hoyer's 2001 contest against Pelosi.

Rep. Artur Davis (D-Ala.), an ardent Hoyer ally, said Hoyer had support among the progressives and among his usual base of Blue Dog centrists.

"Steny's support is broader than ideology, broader than region. That's the problem from a tactical perspective for John Murtha. Where does he find his base? This is not a Pelosi-Hoyer race."

Big Cuts At NASA Threaten Aviation (USAT)

By Alan Levin

USA Today, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — A series of steep cuts in aeronautics research at NASA threaten to undermine the nation's aviation industry and delay a new air traffic system needed to prevent gridlock in the skies, according to members of Congress, industry officials and scientific leaders.

Groups of lawmakers from both parties, academics and aerospace leaders say the reductions are hampering NASA's ability to develop new aviation technology.

"I think its almost criminal," said Roy Harris, retired head of aeronautics at NASA's Langley Research Center in Virginia. "We are dropping the ball."

NASA has lost hundreds of millions of dollars in aviation funding over the past decade and is struggling to pay for repairing the space shuttle and for President Bush's plan to send people to the moon and Mars. Next year, the agency faces a proposed

DOJ_NMG_0070499

20% cut in aviation research. That means that, after adjusting for inflation, it could lose nearly two-thirds of that research funding since it peaked in 1994 at the equivalent of nearly $2 billion.

The agency is planning to cut $54 million — or 31% — from its effort to study emerging technologies required for a new national air traffic system. NASA is the primary agency researching the Next Generation Air Traffic System, an ambitious program to replace radars with satellite-based technology. Without increased capacity from the new system, airlines can expect increasing flight delays, according to government estimates.

Current NASA funding falls as much as $200 million to $300 million a year short of what is actually needed, according to the Aerospace Industries Association. Retired Air Force major general William Hoover, who co-chaired a government study on aeronautics research needs, told the House subcommittee on space Tuesday that NASA must boost work on the air traffic system now or face problems in the future.

NASA's leaders insist that the agency has the money it needs to help modernize the air traffic system and to maintain its place as a leading research institute, said Lisa Porter, NASA's aeronautics head.

"I consider myself an advocate for a strong aeronautics program within NASA, and I believe that's what we have," she told the House subcommittee.

Though known primarily for putting people into space, NASA has been the birthplace of many of aviation's greatest innovations. The products of its labs and wind tunnels include more efficient wing designs, quieter jet engines and widely copied pilot safety training.

Rep. Mark Udall, D-Colo., part of a bipartisan coalition that is trying to restore funding to the agency, said the cuts threaten to make NASA "irrelevant" to the aviation world.

According to more than 20 lawmakers, academics and industry and government officials, much of the agency's work has been severely curtailed.

Among the issues:

•NASA programs that study pilot fatigue and how people make critical safety errors are being trimmed. The budget for all aviation safety programs is being cut by about one-third.

•While European nations are increasing funding on aviation research, NASA is cutting back. Porter is reorganizing the agency to focus on what she calls "fundamental research."

Veterans' Group Wants Larger Raise For Military (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

Concerned that Congress is moving toward providing a 2.2 percent pay raise for the military next year, a leading veterans' group said that with troops fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan, this is not the time to skimp on a raise.

The House approved a fiscal 2007 defense appropriations bill late Tuesday that would raise military pay by 2.2 percent, effective in January. Senate negotiators have signed off on the raise, but the full Senate has not voted on the spending bill.

More than just the military raise may be at stake because the military raise usually spills over into the civil service. Congress in most recent years has adopted a "pay parity" policy that calls for equal raises for the two workforces.

The Military Officers Association of America, known as MOAA, yesterday urged Congress to approve a 2.7 percent across-the-board raise for the armed forces. "As a nation, we ought to do better for our military than we are about to do," said Norb Ryan Jr., president of MOAA and a retired vice admiral.

MOAA and other military groups made some progress toward a 2.7 percent military raise earlier this year when the House approved it as part of a fiscal 2007 authorization bill for defense programs. The Senate version, however, stuck with the White House's recommendation for a 2.2 percent raise.

The bill moving this week through Congress, for appropriations, provides funds for defense operations for the coming year. The authorization bill, in contrast, sets broad policy and spending guidelines. In most years, they are in sync on raise and other personnel issues.

DOJ_NMG_0070500

House-Senate negotiators on the defense authorization bill will not comment on the status of the pay raise or any other item until they have wrapped up their agreement, known as a conference report, a spokesman for the Senate Armed Services Committee said.

Ryan said that regardless of which proposed raise gets adopted, it would be the smallest military raise in 11 years. Over much of the past decade, MOAA and other advocates for military personnel have pushed to close a salary gap with the private sector, and from 2000 through 2006 Congress approved increases slightly higher than the average wage growth in the private sector, as measured by a Labor Department index.

Approving the proposed 2.2 percent raise for 2007 will send the wrong message to military families, Ryan said, noting that some U.S. forces in Iraq have been extended involuntarily and that some troops are being asked to return to Iraq after less than a year at home.

The raise issue is also complicated by a separate appropriations bill that covers federal workforce issues. The House approved a 2.7 percent raise for the civil service in that bill. The Senate version, which awaits a floor vote, recommends the same size raise.

The chairman of the key Senate subcommittee, Sen. Christopher S. Bond (R-Mo.), has warned that, given the difference with the proposed 2.2 percent military raise, there could be pressure to "bring civilian pay down to that level."Curbing NSPS

In a move that may be more about symbolism than substance, House and Senate negotiators on the defense spending bill have prohibited the Pentagon from spending money on disputed parts of the new National Security Personnel System (NSPS).

The provision, sponsored by Reps. Jay Inslee (D-Wash.), Walter B. Jones Jr. (R-N.C.) and Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.), would prevent the Defense Department from carrying out plans to restrict union rights and revise procedures for disciplining civil service employees.

A federal district court has blocked those parts of the NSPS on grounds that they fail to ensure collective bargaining rights, do not provide an independent third-party review of labor relations decisions and would leave employees without a fair process for appealing major disciplinary actions. The case is on appeal.

The Pentagon has contended that the Inslee amendment is unnecessary because NSPS officials are complying with the court's injunction.

After Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii) and others proposed a compromise, House and Senate negotiators narrowed the original Inslee amendment so that the Pentagon can go ahead with changes in how the department's civil service employees are evaluated on their job performance. If the Pentagon wins on appeal, the spending ban would be lifted, according to the provision.

"The Defense Department never should have implemented a personnel system that denies basic worker rights," Inslee said.

Gregory Junemann , president of the International Federation of Professional and Technical Engineers, said the funding ban "is reflective of key lawmakers' growing frustration that management's unilateral creation of NSPS has been one fiasco after another."

Diary associate Eric Yoder contributed to this report. E-mail Stephen Barr atbarrs@washpost.com.

Goodbye, Dr. Frist (HILL)

By Dick Morris

The Hill, September 28, 2006

Dick Morris

If Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) were still in his former occupation, he could well be sued by his 54 fellow Republicans, 99 senators, and the American people at large for malpractice. When he took the job as majority leader, I wrote in this space that the only thing in common between his new and old occupations was breaking ribs. But he failed to do even that!

Running the House of Representatives is like commanding the Prussian Army. All you need is a sense of discipline, a well-used firing squad, and a mentality that will allow you to march congressmen at double time across mine fields in order to clear them. The House political leadership's monopoly on power, money, policy, and, through the state leadership, on district lines, makes these demands easy to get fulfilled. The only problem in the House is that discipline will be too tight and will allow the kind of corruption that appears to flourish in an environment in which nobody can ask any questions.

DOJ_NMG_0070501

But the traditions and procedures of the Senate are quite different. When Americans speak of congressional gridlock and frustrating inaction, they usually mean the Senate. Sen. Trent Lott's (R-Miss.) memoir is aptly titled, Herding Cats. The task requires a delicate mix of political sensibility and a capacity to tolerate but also to discipline the cranky needs of 54 prima donnas and 45 part-time adversaries and potential allies. One has to have a deft political hand and an instinct for such things.

Frist performed about as well as a heart surgeon with mittens on. He failed utterly to provide the leadership necessary and managed to so mangle the reputation of the legislative wing of the Republican Party in the process that it may take several elections, and perhaps a Hillary Clinton presidency, to recover.

Trying to respond to the conflicting demands of the white angry men and women who oppose illegal immigration and the sensitive Hispanics who worry about racism, he succumbed to the temptation to load up a bill with everything, from both sides, which stood no chance of passage. Then, he was so incapable of engineering consensus that he couldn't even convene a conference committee to iron out the differences with the House.

Asked to lead the ethically challenged House in lobbying reform, he did nothing.

He managed, despite a compliant House, a supportive president, and 55 votes, to pass very little and achieve almost nothing.

Now he leads his majority into the general election virtually certain of losing four seats and hoping desperately not to lose six. That's some record!

He couldn't even use the job as a springboard to a presidential candidacy. He failed in this regard not the same way Howard Baker or Bob Dole did (doing so good a job in the Senate that they sullied their chances for the White House) but by acquiring a reputation for ineffectuality and inability.

So what is the lesson for the future? A majority leader must not just be from the Senate. He must be of the Senate. He or she need not only sit in the body, but they must ooze its traditions, savor its tempo, grasp its inhibitions, and challenge its institutional lethargy. A good leader needs to grasp that each Senator is really more like a head of a country than a legislator. House members travel in groups. Senators walk alone and above it all. He needs to grasp what their political needs are and figure out how to appease them while, at the same time, leading them.

Indeed, it may be impossible, in this age of minute media coverage, to have one person fill the dual roles of presenting the majority's public face and organizing its private operations. There may need to be a Mister Inside and a Mister Outside – perhaps with the former as whip and the later as leader.

But, in any case, the leader and the whip both need to be politicians, not doctors.

Morris, a former political adviser to Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and President Bill Clinton, is the author of "Condi vs. Hillary: The Next Great Presidential Race."

With Love To Dear Ol' Dad (WP)

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

The Senate majority leader's wife, Karyn McLaughlin Frist, was at the White House, at a small dinner for the king of Spain. President Bush's daughter Jenna walked in late. At first, the president seemed irritated. But one look at Jenna as she hurried into her seat, and Bush "absolutely melted," Frist recalled. "He broke into a big, proud smile."

Fathers and daughters captivated Frist, in part because she missed her own father, who had died. Frist invited women -- senators, heads of state, Olympic medalists and a soldier -- to write about their fathers, in a book to be published next week, "Love You, Daddy Boy: Daughters Honor the Fathers They Love."

Many of the essays peek into the foyers of political homes. President Lyndon B. Johnson's daughter Lynda Johnson Robb writes that she sold Girl Scout cookies door to door in the Senate. H. Ross Perot's daughter Nancy Perot Mulford recounts ski trips "with Dad always in the lead, racing ahead." And Frist, whose father signed letters to her while she was away at college "Love U, Daddy Boy," confesses: "On a starry evening I often walk to a dark spot on the lawn and look at the full moon and say, 'I love YOU, Daddy Boy.' "

DOJ_NMG_0070502

-- Laura Blumenfeld

* * *

When other three- and four-year-olds were taken to the playground, I went to the Senate Rackets Committee Hearings.

-- Former Maryland
lieutenant governor
Kathleen Kennedy Townsend, about Robert F. Kennedy

* * *

When I was about seven or eight years old, my father wanted me to perform in my elementary school talent show. He hired the drama teacher to give me tap dancing lessons and bought me a costume. . . . I was embarrassed because I was not very good. But on the day of the show, there was my father -- with all of his imposing height, and weight, and strength -- standing at my side and staring at the audience, as if daring them to laugh. No one made a sound.

-- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, about John Rice Jr.

* * *

Squandering time was not appreciated. My hours of playing with a "Betsy Wetsy" doll were greeted by my father's question, "How can you waste so much time with a doll whose sole function is to wet her pants?"

-- Hadassah Lieberman,
wife of Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.), about Rabbi Samuel Freilich

* * *

When my mother, sisters and I, finally arrived in America [from Taiwan], I entered the third grade not speaking a word of English. Every day, I copied whatever was on the blackboard into my notebook. Every night, after his long and exhausting day of work, my father sat with me at the kitchen table, trying to decipher my childish scribbles so he could explain that day's lessons to me. That was how I learned English!

-- Labor Secretary Elaine L. Chao, about James S.C. Chao

* * *

Profoundly devoted to family, he also provided firm discipline. When my family moved into a new house that Dad had designed, I decided to paste thirteen valentines on the walls. . . . He took me to each valentine and asked, "Who did this?"

At first, I blamed it on my imaginary playmate, Denaw. "No," Dad said, "Denaw hasn't been here today."

"Johnny did it," I said, blaming my brother John, who is 13 years my senior and stands six feet, two inches tall. "No, Johnny would have put them way up high," Dad replied.

Finally, I had to admit, "Elizabeth did it." At each valentine, as I acknowledged responsibility, Dad gave me a few pats with a switch from the back yard hedge -- a simple lesson in honesty I have never forgotten.

-- Sen. Elizabeth Dole (R-N.C.), about John Van Hanford

* * *

Daddy told me that there were only three things you really give your children: 1. The best education you can. 2. set a good example. 3. all the love in the world.

-- Former first lady Barbara Bush, about Marvin Pierce

* * *

One night my parents were watching a television show that featured gay characters. When my father expressed his disapproval of homosexuals, my mother said, "What about Dillard and Larry?"

DOJ_NMG_0070503

"What do you mean?" he asked. So my mother explained to my father that his dear friends and neighbors were a gay couple in a long-lasting committed relationship. One of my father's last stereotypes fell. Larry and Dillard visited my father in the hospital as he lay in a coma. One night Larry relieved my mother for a few hours so she could go home and get some rest.

And it was Larry who held my father's hand and said good-bye as he died.

-- Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), about Hugh Rodham

* * *

My father was a professor of surgery at the University of California Medical Center. . . . He used to say, "Get to your work a half hour early; don't take a coffee break; and be the last one out at night."

When I held my first job in "Notions" at the Emporium Department Store at the age of sixteen, that's exactly what I did."

-- Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.),

about Leon Goldman

* * *

Once upon a time, in a land far away and a time long ago, before speed records, space flights, and political campaigns, lived a young girl. She had auburn hair and freckles like her father's. He told her that if someone asked, "Where did you get all of those freckles, little girl?" she could reply, "It rained and I rusted."

-- Lyn Glenn, about John Glenn

* * *

Da expected not only the cowboys but also his children and any visiting cousins to do a share of the ranch work. . . . I offered to drive the truck with the lunch to the place the crew would be in the late morning, branding cattle. . . .

As a result of a flat tire I arrived at the round-up destination about two hours later than expected, but I was rather proud of myself for having been able to change the tire. . . .

"You're late," said Da. "I know," I said. "I had a flat tire and had to change it."

"You should have started earlier," said Da.

"Sorry, Da. I didn't expect a flat."

I had expected a word of praise for changing the tire. But, to the contrary, I realized that only one thing was expected: an on-time lunch. No excuses accepted.

-- Former Supreme Court justice

Sandra Day O'Connor,

about Harry A. Day

* * *

One of my most treasured photos of my father is not one of him with me, but one of him with my two oldest girls snuggling in his arms, as he sits in his most comfortable recliner reading "The Night Before Christmas" to them, something he never had time to do with me!

-- Lynda Johnson Robb, about President Lyndon B. Johnson

* * *

I have never been able to talk about my dad in public speeches -- when I would so like to pay public tribute to him. . . . I always get a catch in my throat.

-- Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Tex.),

about Allan Bailey

How To Deploy Paulson Might Be Bush's Biggest Economic Policy Decision (WSJ)

By David Wessel

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070504

President Bush faces a big decision in coming weeks: how best to deploy his energetic, impatient new Treasury secretary, Henry Paulson, after November's congressional elections.

Although his presidency will be defined by Sept. 11, 2001, and the Iraq war, Mr. Bush and his chief of staff, Josh Bolten, surely are beginning to ponder whether they can accomplish anything economic in the two years Mr. Bush has left in office. If they decide to be ambitious -- and that is a big if -- Mr. Paulson is eager to be the field marshal.

"When there is a big problem that needs fixing, you should run toward it, rather than away from it," Mr. Paulson said in his first speech. "That is one of the reasons I decided to come to Washington."

Humble, he's not. But Hank Paulson is emerging as the brightest bulb in a Bush cabinet with a few dim ones and a few others (think Don Rumsfeld) who have lost their luster. He has mastered the easy stuff: managed to avoid rattling financial markets, figured out that courting Congress takes as much time and care as courting customers at his former employer, Goldman Sachs, and marched through China triumphantly, greeting old acquaintances and posing for photographs as if he were at a Dartmouth reunion.

Now what?

China obviously looms large in the Paulson portfolio, and he plans to return there before year end. But that is a long-term investment, not one likely to pay dividends in the next two years. Mr. Paulson, alarmed that so many companies are choosing to make their initial public offerings outside the U.S., is serious about making America's capital markets "more competitive," a goal widely welcomed by business as a way to roll back some rules imposed after corporate scandals. But that isn't presidential-legacy material.

For now, the White House is paralyzed by the prospect of losing control of one or both houses of Congress. If Republicans lose big, recriminations will begin immediately, and the party may abandon Mr. Bush for a new leader -- perhaps Sen. John McCain -- unless the president takes the initiative. Even if Republicans end up with thinner majorities, accomplishing anything substantial will require courting Democrats, not this administration's strength.

As a newcomer, Mr. Paulson has the advantage of being unscarred by the partisanship of the past few years. (He also is rich, which gives him credibility with politicians who tend to equate net worth with intelligence.) In contrast to predecessor John Snow, Mr. Paulson is neither campaigning nor fund raising for Republicans -- and making sure everyone knows it, especially Democrats with whom he will have to do business.

"If you see me in Ohio, I'll be there for reasons other than political," Mr. Paulson quipped while in China. "And I've got no plans to go to Ohio in the immediate future."

Whether Mr. Paulson can do anything depends largely on the president.

One bold stroke would be to team Mr. Paulson with Trade Representative Susan Schwab to resuscitate the stalled Doha Round of world trade talks, sending him around the world to do what he did at Goldman Sachs: Close the deal.

After all, Mr. Paulson has called the Doha Round "an historic opportunity to generate economic growth, spark development and raise living standards across the world" and "just too important to let slip away." He isn't versed in the intricacies of trade, but then those so-versed have failed. And he could invite television cameras to the Barrington, Ill., farm where he grew up to sell a deal to U.S. farmers, a major political obstacle to compromise.

An even bolder stroke would be for the president to tell Mr. Paulson to tackle long-term budget issues, reopening the conversation about fixing Social Security, perhaps tying it to some kind of tax reform.

Moving on fiscal issues, though, would require Mr. Bush to give Mr. Paulson negotiating authority to consider things the president, so far, has sworn to avoid. Without that, Mr. Paulson would be well-advised to spend more time in China and less in Washington.

The odds of success are long. But even some administration insiders are growing uneasy about proclaiming for two more years that the nation faces a terrifying demographic tsunami that will overwhelm its budget and doom its children unless something is done, and then insisting that there is only one way to fix it -- our way -- and that everything is on the table except tax increases.

DOJ_NMG_0070505

Seared by its close encounter with Paul O'Neill, the first Bush Treasury secretary, the White House fortified itself against the Treasury and kept John Snow on the road, on TV and out of the inner circle. The question now is whether Mr. Bush will use the third corporate chief executive to take the job to get something done or relegate him to making speeches for two years.

Prescription For A Stronger F.D.A. (NYT)

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

A prestigious advisory group has put its weight behind criticism that the Food and Drug Administration is pitifully weak when it comes to removing dangerous prescription drugs from the market. Last week, a panel appointed by the Institute of Medicine, part of the National Academy of Sciences, issued a slew of recommendations to strengthen the beleaguered F.D.A. as it struggles to regulate a huge array of medications whose ill effects sometimes show up only after years of wide use.

The institute's report, which was requested by the F.D.A., deplores the big imbalance between the money and staff devoted to approving new drugs and the much smaller resources for monitoring drugs after they are on the market. The imbalance results in part from the pharmaceutical industry's providing user fees that pay for expediting the approval process, but not for monitoring the aftereffects. Worse yet, even when it spots a problem, the agency has very little power to regulate drugs on the market unless there is overwhelming evidence that they are unsafe, which is seldom the case.

Although the nation is mired in budget deficits, the institute was wise to call for a large increase in financing and personnel for this crucially important regulator of public health. If Congress is too stingy to ante up more money, it should at least divert some of the drug industry's user fees to surveillance after a drug's approval.

The panel calls for the F.D.A. to evaluate the safety and effectiveness of drugs that are truly new, not just copycats, at least once every five years. It wants the agency to be given explicit power to compel post-marketing studies and to impose fines, injunctions and withdrawals to enforce its decisions. In a departure from conventional wisdom, the panel also urges the F.D.A. to require that a substantial majority of the members of each of its advisory panels be free of significant financial involvement with companies whose interests might be affected. That undercuts the agency's claims that there are not enough experts without ties to the drug industry.

OTHER NEWS:

11,722.98 (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, September 28, 2006

Dow still trying to pierce record close from 2000, before the bubble burst

The Dow is still one rally away from making history.

The Dow Jones industrial average made a gallant but unsuccessful run at an all-time high Wednesday, coming within 2.21 points of its record close before sellers spoiled the party. The 30-stock barometer ended less than 34 points short as buying exhaustion set in amid a nearly $2 rise in oil prices and news that orders to factories that make durable, big-ticket items such as refrigerators and dishwashers fell a second straight month.

"It was a big tease," says Price Headley, chief market analyst at BigTrends.com. "But I think it will get through the record soon because the market is acting so strong."

The iconic Dow is trying to become the first major U.S. stock index to recoup all its losses suffered during the painful 2000-2002 bear market that followed the bursting of the technology stock bubble. The Dow fell almost 38% in the three-year market swoon and is much closer to breaking even than the Standard & Poor's 500, still down 12.5% from its high, and the Nasdaq composite, off 55.2%, from its peak.

Posting its third-straight day of gains, the Dow rose 19.85 points to close at 11,689.24, just 33.74 points shy of its record close of 11,722.98 hit on Jan. 14, 2000. The blue-chip index, which is filled with well-known U.S. companies such as Wal-Mart, McDonald's, IBM and JPMorgan Chase, is up 9.1% for the year.

DOJ_NMG_0070506

The celebration was put on hold as one of the main culprits that have put a lid on stock prices the past year — rising energy prices — again gave investors a reason to sell. A barrel of crude rose $1.95 to $62.96.

Investors have bid stock prices up recently due to a growing belief that the Federal Reserve, which has raised its target for short-term interest rates 17 times since June 2004, is finished raising rates. Wall Street also is betting that the Fed will be successful in slowing the economy without causing a recession or taking a big bite out of corporate profit growth.

Market experts say it's not unusual for major indexes such as the Dow to have trouble breaking through previous highs. One explanation is what Wall Street calls the "get-even" syndrome. In short, it is investors who bought at the top finally getting a chance to get out with their initial investment intact.

"To get through an old high, you have to go through all the people who are just thanking the Lord that they are back to even," says Gary Kaltbaum, president of money management firm Kaltbaum & Associates.

Hugh Johnson, chief investment officer at Johnson Illington Advisors, says the market, which has been taking small steps forward and small steps back in the current rally, just couldn't "take the big step to a new high in (Wednesday's) negative news environment."

Blue Chips Inch Closer To Record (WSJ)

By E.S. BROWNING

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

Stocks took a swing at a record for the Dow Jones Industrial Average, but didn't quite connect.

After surging Tuesday to their second-highest finish ever, the Dow industrials edged up another 19.85 points, or 0.17%, leaving them at a second-best close of 11689.24. The Dow industrials are up 9.1% for 2006, 33.74 points short of the record close of 11722.98 hit in January 2000. The industrials are up 2.7% in September and 4.8% for the quarter, with two trading days left.

The day's gains came despite disappointing economic news. Orders for durable goods -- long-lasting items such as appliances and machinery that people and companies buy when they are investing in the future -- unexpectedly fell in August.

Perhaps even more worrisome, crude-oil futures surged $1.95 to $62.96 a barrel. Falling energy prices have been one of the underpinnings of the rally that has been going on since midsummer. Hopes have spread that lower oil, gasoline and natural-gas prices would take pressure off consumers and spur spending. Some investors thought the Dow industrials were headed for a record yesterday until oil prices reversed early declines and headed up.

Early in the day, the Dow industrials were 2.21 points short of a record, but they never moved higher.

One bit of good energy news: Natural-gas prices fell 7.2% to $4.201 a million British thermal units, the lowest finish since 2002. Traders said weak demand and heavy supplies are holding back natural-gas prices, while continued worries about the Middle East and about refining capacity supported oil prices.

Traders took the market's ability to rise in the face of negative news as a sign that investors have at least temporarily put aside worries about the economy, and have concluded that the Federal Reserve is succeeding in slowing economic expansion without causing a recession.

In addition, many fund managers are required to be fully invested at quarter's end, which can lead them to buy stocks late in the month. That, together with the Dow industrials march toward a record, is helping to spur buying.

"People wanted to take stocks higher, but they had to deal with the durable-goods orders and the oil going up," said Todd Leone, head of listed trading at New York brokerage firm Cowen & Co. He said the market mood remains optimistic. Many investors consider a new Dow industrials record a foregone conclusion.

"Everyone is reading the economic numbers to say it is going to be not too hot and not too cold," Mr. Leone said. "Goldilocks is good for the market. People figure the Fed is done raising rates and think they have done it right."

Some traders recalled the dance the market performed in March 1999, when the Dow industrials approached 10000 for the first time. It took several days of backing and filling to clear the barrier, as some investors used the landmark number as a reason to take some profits and consider how much higher the market could go. During the following years, the Dow industrials bounced up and down around 10000, something that many are hoping wouldn't be the case with this milestone.

DOJ_NMG_0070507

Aside from the Dow industrials, which were the focus of speculation on the part of short-term traders, major indexes were little changed. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index inched up 0.02%, or 0.25 point, to 1336.59, ahead 7.1% this year and up 5.2% for the quarter.

The Nasdaq Composite Index rose 0.09%, or 2.05 points, to 2263.39. It is up 4.2% for the quarter, which has pulled it back into the plus column for the year, with a gain of 2.6% for 2006.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 1.22%, or 2.65 points, to 219.87.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks advanced. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.75 billion shares, as 2,066 stocks rose and 1,285 fell.

Bond prices declined. The 10-year Treasury note fell 4/32, or $1.25 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.602%. The 30-year bond was down 12/32 to yield 4.743%.

The dollar was mixed. Late in New York, it traded at 117.50 yen, up from 117.15, while the euro rose against the dollar to $1.2703 from $1.2690.

Write to E.S. Browning at jim.browning@wsj.com1

URL for this article:

http://online.wsj.com/article/SB115940927092976275.html

Hyperlinks in this Article:

(1) mailto:jim.browning@wsj.com

Copyright 2006 Dow Jones & Company, Inc. All Rights Reserved

This copy is for your personal, non-commercial use only. Distribution and use of this material are governed by our Subscriber Agreement and by copyright law. For non-personal use or to order multiple copies, please contact Dow Jones Reprints at 1-800-843-0008 or visit www.djreprints.com.

Orders For Big-ticket Items Fall, Indicating Cooling Economy (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — More evidence of a slowing economy came Wednesday as the government said orders for costly manufactured goods fell in August while sales of new homes rose, but remained at a subdued level.

New orders for durable goods, such as cars, computers and machinery intended to last three years or longer, fell 0.5% in August after adjusting for seasonal fluctuations, the Commerce Department said. That followed a 2.7% plunge in July and marked the first back-to-back monthly drops in the often volatile data since spring 2004.

Also in August, sales of new homes rose 4.1% at a seasonally adjusted annual rate after falling in the prior three months, Commerce said. But the sales data for July were revised lower, tempering enthusiasm. Despite the increase, sales of new homes last month were down more than 17% from August 2005.

The report followed data Tuesday that showed a drop in both sales and prices of previously owned homes, a much bigger segment of the housing market.

“The economy has cooled off and we're heading for a sustained slowdown,” A.G. Edwards chief economist Gary Thayer says. “But we don't expect that things are going to get a lot worse.”

Investors shrugged off the data. After flirting with the record earlier in the day, the Dow Jones industrial average finished up 19.85 points at 11,689.24.

Thayer noted there were several reasons to be confident the economy is slowing, not falling off a cliff. Notably, energy prices have recently dropped sharply from record levels, giving businesses and consumers more money to spend on other things. Despite rising Wednesday, oil prices are down nearly 20% from the record, not adjusted for inflation, hit during the summer.

The decline in oil prices has pushed down gasoline costs. The U.S. average retail price for a gallon of unleaded was $2.356 Wednesday, according to motor club AAA. That was down more than a penny from Tuesday and nearly 50 cents lower than a month ago.

The price of natural gas trading for October delivery, meanwhile, has dropped sharply to the lowest level since late 2002 in response to high inventory levels. Lower prices could help the millions of U.S. households that use natural gas to heat their homes.

Also providing a boost to consumers are lower mortgage rates. The U.S. average rate on a 30-year fixed mortgage was 6.18% last week, down from 6.36% in the prior week and the lowest in seven months, the Mortgage Bankers Association said Wednesday.

Lower rates are encouraging homeowners to refinance their mortgages. The MBA said the percentage of mortgage activity that was related to refinancing last week was the highest in a year.

Durable-Goods Orders Fall But New-Home Sales Rise; A Hard Or Soft Landing? (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena Morales

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

The latest readings on business investment and housing muddied the economic picture: Orders for big-ticket goods fell unexpectedly in August as new-home sales rose unexpectedly.

The Commerce Department reported that durable-goods orders declined 0.5% in August to a seasonally adjusted $209.75 billion, following a revised 2.7% decline in July. That marked the first back-to-back decline since April and May 2004. Orders for non-defense capital goods excluding aircraft -- a barometer of business equipment spending -- fell 0.3% in August, following a 0.9% gain the two preceding months.

The durable-goods report was "far more bearish than anticipated," said Jason Schenker, an economist at Wachovia Corp. in Charlotte, N.C. "This raises concerns about how much economic growth is poised to slow. ... We'll need more data to see if the economy is coming in for a hard or soft landing."

The durable-goods report showed that demand fell for machinery, computers and electronics, primary metals and commercial aircraft, although motor-vehicle orders were up. Durable goods are items intended to last three years or more, such as cars and computers. While durable-goods orders can be volatile, economists closely monitor them because they are considered an indicator of future production activity.

Consensus Among Analysts

Many economists are counting on business investment to help offset the effect of a cooling economy and housing market, and softer consumer spending. The consensus among analysts is that second-half economic growth will slow to below 3%, at a seasonally adjusted annual rate, following a 2.9% advance in the second quarter and a 5.6% gain in the first quarter.

Meanwhile, the Census Bureau reported that sales of new homes rose 4.1% in August from a month earlier, to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.050 million. The unexpected jump ran counter to other recent data depicting slowing sales. But analysts cautioned not to focus too much on a one-month statistic. Indeed, compared with August a year ago, new-home sales were down 17.4%. And earlier this week, the National Association of Realtors said existing-home sales in August fell for the fifth consecutive month, while the national median price fell, year over year, for the first time in 11 years.

"It's hard to get overly excited about an increase like this," said David Seiders, chief economist at the National Association of Home Builders. "The weight of evidence shows that the housing market was trending downward in August."

The NAR sales data are based on closings of previously owned homes. In contrast, Mr. Seiders said, the new-home sales data are based on a relatively small sample of sales contracts or deposits and fail to capture cancellations on contracts, which home builders say have been surging in recent months.

Frequent Revisions

New-home sales are frequently revised. (On average, the Census Bureau says preliminary estimates are revised by about 3%.) July sales were revised yesterday to 1.009 million from a preliminary estimate of 1.072 million.

DOJ_NMG_0070509

In fact, some builders say conditions got worse in August, not better. On Tuesday, Stuart Miller, the chief executive of Lennar Corp, one of the nation's largest home builders, said in a conference call, "August might have been the weakest month yet." The Miami builder said that its cancellation rate was running at more than 30% and that it was using incentives to drive sales. Lennar cut its earnings guidance for the fourth quarter.

Similarly, the National Association of Home Builders/Wells Fargo Housing Market Index declined in August and September, reaching the lowest reading since February 1991.

Economists say new-home sales may have gotten a slight bounce last month as mortgage rates eased and builders offered more incentives to entice buyers. The median price of a new home was $237,000 in August, compared with the median price of $240,100 in August 2005. The average price of a new home was $304,400 in August, compared with the average price of $295,000 in August 2005.

However, analysts noted yesterday that durable goods orders are volatile and can offer imprecise monthly readings. Moreover, some economists said durable goods orders remain healthy on a year-over-year basis: In the eight months through August, orders were 8.5% higher than the same period a year ago, on an unadjusted basis, and business equipment spending is up nearly 10% from a year ago.

Report Shows Home Sales Rising, But Skeptics Abound (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

A report yesterday showing that sales of new homes rose for the first time since March was — at first glance — welcome news for homebuilders.

But economists warned that underneath the headline numbers, signs of a weakening housing market were more prevalent than ever.

The Commerce Department reported yesterday that new-home sales in August rose to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.05 million, 4.1 percent higher than in July.

That helped push down the inventory of unsold new homes 5.7 percent, to a 6.6-month supply, meaning that at the current selling rate, it would take 6.6 months to sell all the new homes currently on the market.

But sales figures for July were revised to show that fewer homes were sold than the government first reported. As a result, the August sales data probably exaggerates the resiliency of the market.

Stuart Hoffman, chief economist with PNC Financial, called the August increase a “dead-cat bounce.”

The August numbers could also be inflated. Because new-home sales are recorded when the contract is signed, not when the deal is closed, the data does not factor in cancellations. Builders have said recently that cancellation rates are running as high as 30 percent, suggesting that the Commerce Department’s numbers make the housing market appear healthier than it actually is.

Yesterday’s report showed that builders are indeed having more and more difficulty selling homes. The median price of a new home fell to $237,000, down 1.3 percent from August 2005.

Prices for previously owned homes are also falling. This week, the National Association of Realtors reported that for the first time in 11 years, the median price of a previously owned home fell from the price a year earlier.

In August, prices slipped to $225,000, down 1.7 percent compared with August 2005. Sales of previously owned homes, which make up about 85 percent of all home sales annually, fell for the fifth consecutive month.

Few experts express confidence that these trends will reverse anytime soon.

“It certainly is possible that for a variety of reasons you could have a one-month upturn, but I doubt that will reverse the trend that seems to be occurring,” said Kenneth Simonson, chief economist for the Associated General Contractors of America.

Mr. Simonson noted the possibility that the August sales numbers could be revised downward, just as the July numbers were. “I think we could still wind up seeing that this month is a continuation of the downturn.”

Although it is unwelcome news for anyone trying to sell a home, the slowdown in the housing market is just what policy makers at the Federal Reserve have been looking for.

DOJ_NMG_0070510

As inflation quickened over the last several months, members of the Fed, led by the chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, have said that a slowing economy, led by cooling in the housing market, would be essential to holding prices down. So far, the Fed's economic forecast has been realized, with inflation slowing and home sales and prices falling.

There was further evidence yesterday that the economy was slowing, as the Commerce Department reported an unexpected drop in orders for durable goods, a wide-ranging category that includes household appliances and factory machinery. The orders, a closely watched barometer of business investment, fell for the second consecutive month, dropping 0.5 percent, to $209.7 billion. It was first back-to-back decrease in more than two years.

Economists disagree on whether the decline in August suggests a looming slowdown in business investment.

"Today's report points to a slowing in the manufacturing sector," wrote Peter E. Kretzmer, senior economist with Bank of America. "Capital spending momentum remains solid but nonexceptional."

Still, others said the disappointing numbers were a result of the pessimistic business climate in the second half of the summer, fed by high energy prices and worries over inflation.

"There has been a significant improvement in the overall investment climate in the past several weeks," wrote Brian Bethune, an economist with Global Insight. "Steep declines in gasoline and diesel fuel prices should relieve recent downward pressure on margins, and provide a second wind to the profitability cycle. This should provide a lift to business confidence."

Hispanic Unemployment Down, Study Finds (WP)

By Karin Brulliard

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

Unemployment among Hispanics fell sharply this year, and their wages rose after a two-year decline, according to a national study released yesterday.

Bolstered by immigration, the Hispanic labor force is growing rapidly, and those workers are having little trouble finding jobs -- especially in construction, said the report by the Pew Hispanic Center.

"In terms of employment, there are strong gains for Hispanics," said Rakesh Kochhar, the center's associate director for research and author of the report.

Latinos, who represent 13 percent of the U.S. labor force, accounted for 40 percent of all new workers in the year ending June 30, the report said. Eighty percent of jobs filled by Hispanics went to immigrants, who make up the biggest share of the Latino labor force.

The findings come as Congress debates proposals for immigration laws, some addressing the immigrant workforce and the hiring of illegal immigrants, and immigration authorities step up work site arrests and border security.

Kochhar said the number of immigrant workers and the market for them seem to be "stronger than what we may do at the borders."

Although the report did not examine labor trends for illegal immigrants, it noted that previous studies have found that many new Latino immigrants are in the country illegally.

The Latino labor force is growing about three times the rate for all workers, the report found. Hispanic unemployment fell this spring to 4.9 percent from 5.8 percent in the same period last year. Median weekly wages for Latinos rose from $423 in 2005 to $431 in 2006 -- still lower than those of any other ethnic group.

This decade's construction boom drove the Latino job growth, particularly for the foreign-born, the report said. Half the new jobs for Latinos in the past year were in construction, and nearly all those jobs were generated in the South and the West, according to the report, which did not examine trends at the state or city level.

Since 2003, nearly 90 percent of Latinos workers hired in construction have been immigrants, the report found.

That came as no surprise to Hugo Carballo, business manager for Laborers International Union Local 11, which organizes construction workers in Northern Virginia.

"You just go through any job. That's all you see right now. A majority of them are Latino who are working on construction," Carballo said. "It might be that in a couple of years it'll be somebody else, but right now we are the ones."

DOJ_NMG_0070511

Yet the labor landscape was not all rosy for Latinos. Although they landed more jobs, wages dropped for foreign-born Hispanic workers. Hispanic immigrants' median weekly wages declined from $400 to $389.

That is probably because as more immigrants have arrived, competition for the jobs they perform has stiffened, Kochhar said.

"High growth in employment may have come at the price of wages," Kochhar said.

The report also noted that the nation's construction industry appears to be slowing. That is especially true in places such as the Washington region, which were booming a year ago but are now "screeching to a halt," said Mark Zandi, an analyst with Moody's Economy.com.

Growth in commercial construction is softening the blow for workers, Zandi said, but will probably not make up for all the jobs lost as home building cools.

Carballo said he has seen that play out locally.

"On the residential part, like houses and condominiums, that's where I see that it's the most people getting laid off," Carballo said. "On [commercial] buildings, we are at least pretty good right now. Buildings are going up everywhere."

The report, based on recent data from the U.S. Census Bureau and the Labor Department, found that unemployment dropped over the fiscal year from 4 percent to 3.5 percent for Asians, from 4.1 percent to 3.9 percent for non-Hispanic whites and from 9.9 percent to 9 percent for blacks.

The Reliable Source (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

With 'Dragon Fire,' Can Cohen Slay Hollywood?

Former defense secretary Bill Cohen is an expert on Washington, but he's a rookie when it comes to Hollywood. The author of "Dragon Fire" knows all the power players of Capitol Hill, the White House and Pentagon, but missed the perfect chance to team up with megabucks producer Jerry Bruckheimer.

Shortly after he left the Clinton administration in 2001, Cohen and his wife, Janet Langhart , wrote a proposal for a television series set in the Pentagon-- think "West Wing" goes to Arlington. They called it "E-Ring," a DOD insider term for the Pentagon's outer offices, and sent it to their agent. No bites. Two years ago, they flew to L.A. and pitched it to several studios, while Bruckheimer ("Top Gun," "The Amazing Race," "CSI") shopped a similar Pentagon-based show. Cohen's proposal went nowhere; Bruckheimer's turned up on NBC's 2005 schedule with a familiar name: "E-Ring." Cohen thinks someone at NBC nabbed his title: "It's hard to protect an idea."

Bruckheimer's rep said his version was inspired by a visit to the Pentagon in 2004, and wasn't aware of Cohen's proposal until after the show aired. "Had he known about Bill's project, he would have gone with [it]," said spokesman Paul Bloch. (Probably should have: "E-Ring" was canceled after one season.) Ah, the what-ifs . . .

Cohen has higher hopes for "Dragon Fire." His 10th book is a geopolitical thriller (fictional defense secretary dies in anthrax attack, former POW modeled after John McCain hunts the bad guys) full of Inside-the-Beltway color. "It's the old axiom: You write what you know," says Cohen. "I don't have a lot of time for research."

Next up: in February, "Love in Black and White," a memoir authored with his wife about their interracial marriage. In the meanwhile, Cohen is in serious talks with producer Thomas Schuhly for a movie version of "Dragon Fire." And yes -- he's getting smarter about show business: "I've learned about copyrights," he said with a chuckle.Red and Blue and Green All Over

We knew this would happen sooner or later -- Tuesday night, secluded Whitehaven Street in Northwest was clogged by dueling fundraisers. President Bush and Karl Rove mingled with donors at the home of White House social secretary Lea Berman and husband Wayne, raising $1.5 million for the GOP in Iowa, Arkansas and Wisconsin. Two doors down, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton presided over a low-key event for about 50 $2,000 donors to her senatorial reelection bid. Limo lock!HEY, ISN'T THAT . . . ?

Â· Mya getting her hair flat-ironed at Bang Salon on U Street yesterday between a shopping trip and a workout. The D.C.-born singer-actress, who was in town visiting friends, tipped $30 on a $30 treatment.

DOJ_NMG_0070512

Â· Bruce Willis , wearing baseball cap and jeans in downtown Baltimore, between takes while filming "Live Free or Die Hard." Huge blocks of Charm City are cordoned off for shooting these days. The Sun reported yesterday the star was spotted at the "business casual" Morton's wearing jeans and T-shirt.SURREAL ESTATE

Seller: Jim Dunning

Asking price: $1.1 million

Details: For 15 years, this four-bedroom brick Colonial in Alexandria's trendy Del Ray neighborhood was the home of prominent real estate agent Nancy Dunning and her husband, the city's longtime elected sheriff. In December 2003, she was found shot to death in their home, in what remains one of Alexandria's most notorious unsolved murders. Jim Dunning, who ended the last of his five terms in office last year, still lives in the house and put it on the market early this month.THIS JUST IN . . .

Two different men are claiming to be the father of Anna Nicole Smith 's newborn daughter. Howard K. Stern , a lawyer for the former Playboy model, told CNN's Larry King Tuesday that the baby is his -- which prompted photographer Larry Birkhead , who has made similar claims, to demand a DNA test yesterday, according to Us magazine.

Also yesterday, People reported that Smith's 20-year-old son, Daniel , who was found dead by her bedside in a Bahamas hospital three days after his sister's birth, was killed by a lethal combination of methadone and the antidepressants Lexapro and Zoloft. The magazine cited a pathologist hired by Smith.

John Danforth (CSM)

By David Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, September 28, 2006

Posted September 28, 2006 - http://www.csmonitor.com/2006/0928/p25s01-usmb.html John Danforth By David Cook

John Danforth looks like a quintessential Republican insider but he is calling for a radical change in how his party operates.

During his appearance at Wednesday's Monitor-sponsored breakfast, the tall, silver-haired, deep-voiced, impeccably tailored Danforth looked and sounded like Hollywood's vision of a senator.

He comes with an impressive resume. Danforth's career includes two terms as Missouri's attorney general, three terms in the US Senate, heading the federal investigation into the Waco siege in 1999, serving as President Bush's special envoy to Sudan, and being named US ambassador to the UN. An ordained Episcopal priest, Danforth presided with eloquence and grace over memorial services for Katherine Graham, Ronald Reagan, and John Chafee.

But beneath the polished and calm exterior is a man upset with his party. Danforth is traveling the country promoting his new book, "Faith and Politics: How the Moral Values Debate Divides America and How to Move Forward Together." The book argues that Republicans have transformed their party into a political arm of conservative Christians.

"The name of the game has been not to compete for the center of American politics but to appeal to the base of each party and to attempt to energize the base," Danforth told reporters over breakfast. "For the Republican party, the base of our party now is the Christian conservatives.... The Republican party has done everything it can to appeal to that part of the base ... I think this is bad for the country and ultimately it is going to be bad for the Republican party because I think when the American people reflect on this they do not want a sectarian political party in this country. So what I am trying to do is encourage them to reflect on it."

Would his call for Christians to stress reconciliation and humility lead to a squishy version of Christianity with hard demands and radical stands removed? Danforth says it wouldn't.

"I think [Christianity] is basically reconciling. I don't think there is anything squishy about following the admonition of St. Paul to be ministers of reconciliation," he said. "I don't think there is anything squishy about believing in a God who is bigger than our political agendas and who is the judge of our political agendas.... What is weak is the notion that our faith is the servant of our politics."

Danforth, a graduate of Princeton, and both Yale's law and divinity schools, says he will not leave the party despite his unhappiness with its current course. "I am a Republican," he said. "I am a well-established Republican. I am not going to give up on my party. I just want it to get back to its moorings ... I just want them to disengage themselves from the Christian right."

DOJ_NMG_0070513

A key issue for Christian conservatives recently was the Marriage Protection Amendment to the Constitution, which the Senate considered and rejected earlier this year. It would have defined marriage as the union between a man and a woman.

"The gay marriage issue is an issue that on its merits has no real substance," Danforth said. "That is an issue that is brought forward simply in order to make people angry.... If it is a political issue, it is an issue at the state legislative level. It is clearly not a constitutional issue. The constitution is about the structure of government and the relationship between government and the American people. The constitution is not about addressing social issues. We tried that with prohibition. That lasted 13 years. This is not a constitutional issue and to try to raise this as a constitutional issue is to be simply pandering and gay bashing."

With President Bush now in the final two years of his term, Danforth offered some observations on what direction the party should take next. "I would like to see our party debate whether or not we are a religious party ... I would like you in the media to raise that," he said. "Do we attempt to energize a base or reconstitute a center in American politics? Is there any possibility of creating a center on a bipartisan basis where we can help to resolve real issues?... The real questions do not concern whether there are crèches on public premises or whether gays in Massachusetts get married.... I would like to have a more centrist party and I would like to have a party that is less interested in making its election points than in trying to improve our way of dealing with very serious questions."

Danforth Warns Of Christian Right But Says Tide Will Turn (WP)

By Peter Slevin

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

CHICAGO. Sept. 27 -- The potency of the Christian right in the Republican Party is limited, former senator John C. Danforth of Missouri is telling audiences this month. A lifelong Republican moderate disturbed by his party's direction, he contends that the political center has a future.

Describing himself as a "a Republican for the old reasons," Danforth, 70, is promoting a new book that describes religion as a divisive force in the United States today and accuses the religious right and its political supporters of creating a sectarian party.

The GOP leadership habitually strives to please its base at the expense of meaningful compromise, he maintains, proving to be neither humble Christians nor effective politicians. His reasoning holds that social conservatives cannot prevail because a majority of Americans do not share their views or appreciate their style.

"I'm trying to shed light on it," Danforth told a gathering of more than 100 people at Chicago's Union League Club on Tuesday, ". . . but I'm really encouraging people to get mad, to speak out on this and express themselves. That's when politics will change."

Danforth is an ordained Episcopal priest and onetime Bush administration ambassador to the United Nations. He is probably best known for ushering Clarence Thomas through the grueling nomination process to become a Supreme Court justice. Danforth served in the Senate when Republicans were outnumbered and outmaneuvered by Democrats, a point noted dismissively by opponents who dispute his argument.

Richard Land, a prominent conservative at the Southern Baptist Convention, said in an interview earlier this year that Danforth is "what was wrong with the Republican Party and why they were a minority party."

Danforth is getting some radio and television airtime since the Sept. 19 release of "Faith and Politics: How the 'Moral Values' Debate Divides America and How to Move Forward Together." He has spoken to audiences in Texas and New York and gave a lecture Wednesday night at the Washington National Cathedral, where he had presided over the funerals of former president Ronald Reagan in 2004 and longtime Washington Post publisher Katharine Graham three years earlier.

His book emerged by design in a political season in which the organizing strength of conservative Christians is expected to be tested by motivated Democrats and moderates dismayed by the country's direction.

This year, there have also been revealing speeches about personal faith and politics by Democratic politicians, notably Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.), Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.) and Robert P. Casey Jr., who is seeking to unseat religious conservative Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.).

DOJ_NMG_0070514

"The problem with many conservative Christians is that they claim that God's truth is knowable, that they know it, and that they are able to reduce it to legislative form," Danforth writes. "The popular question, 'What would Jesus do?' can be difficult enough to contemplate with respect to everyday interpersonal relations. It is mind boggling when applied to the complex world of politics."

Although an opponent of abortion, Danforth has become an activist for a Missouri ballot initiative that would explicitly legalize embryonic stem cell research, an issue adopted increasingly by Democrats and some Republicans to show their differences with the Christian right.

He also favors government recognition of "committed same-sex partnerships." He believes the proposed constitutional amendment to outlaw same-sex marriage amounts to gay-bashing.

Criticizing Republicans and Democrats at extreme ends of the political spectrum, Danforth told his Chicago audience that "most people don't want it to be this way." In allowing it to happen, he said, "the rest of us have been too silent."

Thomas has a place in Danforth's book. A questioner asked if he has changed his view of one of the court's staunchest conservatives.

Danforth, who has said he never questioned Thomas about serious allegations of sexual harassment, replied: "I have exactly the same view of Clarence Thomas that I have had for 30-some years. . . . I know him, and I love him as a human being. I stood by him, and I am proud of that."

Big Openings For Democrats (RC)

By David M. Drucker

Roll Call, September 28, 2006

While predictions of a Democratic wave on Nov. 7 may be overblown, Republicans are clearly on the defensive in three open seats that could prove key to their ability to retain the House majority in the 110th Congress.

Until recently, Republican-held seats in Arizona, Colorado and Iowa were seen as major battlegrounds. But now they are in serious jeopardy of going Democratic, with the 7th district in Colorado and the 1st district in Iowa, in particular, signifying the decline of the GOP brand name in the eyes of voters this cycle.

"I think districts like that are still winnable [for Republicans]. But they are definitely a bigger challenge in this environment," said GOP strategist Dave Gilliard, who steered now-Rep. Brian Bilbray (R) to a close win in a California special election earlier this year in a tough atmosphere for Republicans. "You have to latch onto local issues and catch the imagination of voters separate from the party label."

Democrats are clearly benefiting from the decision by the GOP incumbents who hold these seats to retire from Congress. But it is telling that the Republicans running in their stead find themselves down significantly in public opinion polls to their Democratic opponents.

In the Republican-leaning, southern Arizona 8th district, Rep. Jim Kolbe (R) has been re-elected by comfortable margins 11 terms running. Yet former state Sen. Gabrielle Giffords (D) seems poised to easily dispose of former state Rep. Randy Graf (R).

The eastern Iowa 1st district and Denver-area 7th district of Colorado have repeatedly voted Democrat for president while choosing Republicans to represent them in the House. In Iowa's 1st, voters chose Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) over President Bush by 7 points in 2004, despite their long-standing preference for Rep. Jim Nussle (R), who was elected in 1990.

To replace Nussle, however, voters appear to be favoring a Democrat, trial attorney Bruce Braley. He led wealthy businessman Mike Whalen (R) by 7 points in the latest independent poll.

Colorado's 7th is more narrowly Democratic, giving Kerry a 3-point edge over Bush in 2004. But former state Sen. Ed Perlmutter's (D) early and healthy lead over former state official Rick O'Donnell (R) — despite a bruising Democratic primary — indicates the GOP isn't getting the benefit of the doubt from voters this year, as opposed to the previous two cycles, when Rep. Bob Beauprez (R) won competitive races.

Both Nussle and Beauprez are running for governor. Kolbe has not announced his future plans.

DOJ_NMG_0070515

K.C. Jones, spokeswoman for the O'Donnell campaign, acknowledged that a national political environment that is difficult for Republicans has made for a tougher road for the former chairman of the Colorado Higher Education Commission. But as a veteran of Beauprez's 2002 campaign, Jones stressed that she always figured on a come-from-behind race and is pleased with O'Donnell's progress thus far.

"Unaffiliated voters in this district are turned off by both parties. Does that affect us right now because Republicans are in control of the White House and Congress? Yes," Jones conceded.

Braley spokesman Jeff Giertz said a favorable national political environment is making the Democrat's effort easier than a similar push might have been in 2002 or 2004, though he added that Braley's policies would be highly appealing to the electorate regardless of the political atmosphere.

Presidential approval ratings hovering in the low 30s in the 1st district and a motivated Democratic base hungry for change are distinct advantages Braley has in his contest with Whalen, who could otherwise benefit from the district's socially conservative sensibilities.

"Certainly the winds in this district are at our backs," Giertz said. "Voters are unhappy with the policies of the Bush administration ... Being that there's a Democratic registration advantage here, it energizes that advantage even more."

Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, sought to downplay the difficulties Republicans face in Arizona, Colorado and Iowa, though he appeared to acknowledge in his comments the GOP is in trouble in each.

"They're difficult seats because they're open. It's always harder to keep an open seat than one with an incumbent," Forti said. "Colorado 7 and Iowa 1 are Democrat-leaning, so we've been swimming upstream from the get-go. But both are winnable."

Forti said Arizona's 8th is going to be a tough battle — the NRCC's preferred candidate lost in the GOP primary — but cautioned not to count out Graf, calling him a "true fighter."

The Tucson-area 8th district delivered 53 percent of its vote for Bush in 2004, and Republicans have an edge in registered voters there of approximately 20,000. But Graf has emerged as a heavy underdog to Giffords, though this appears to have little to do with national political trends and more to do with how the two candidates are viewed by voters — and party leaders.

Illegal immigration is a top issue in the Arizona race, and Graf is the candidate who has focused the most on securing the border with Mexico. But two candidates with more moderate views on the issue — the second and third place finishers — garnered more votes collectively in the primary than Graf, who challenged Kolbe in 2004 and is seen as a strident conservative regardless of whether that label is deserved.

Giffords may not be as moderate of a Democrat as she lets on. But early polling on this race suggests that 8th district voters see her as the political heir to the moderately Republican Kolbe — at least when the choice is between her and Graf. The NRCC apparently agreed, as it spent money in the Republican primary touting the campaign of Kolbe endorsee and former state Rep. Steve Huffman (R).

Earl de Berge, an independent pollster based in Phoenix, said Graf is being hurt by the perception — rightly or wrongly — that he is a hardliner, noting that he's been getting calls from reporters in recent days asking about rumors that allege connections between the former state Representative and racist groups.

"Those are serious, and can have a hard impact on a candidate right away," de Berge said, explaining that Graf was the Democrats' choice because "they viewed him as an extremist candidate who would be easier to beat in a moderate swing district."

A Forfeited Battleground District (WP)

By Chris Cillizza And Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

CALDWELL, Ohio -- Four months ago, state Sen. Charlie Wilson (D) was teetering on the edge of defeat in his campaign for Ohio's open 6th District. Today he is strolling toward Nov. 7, when, if current trends continue, he will be elected to Congress.

No television ads for Wilson or his Republican opponent, state Rep. Chuck Blasdel, are airing. For the moment, the national party organizations, which swarm into the most competitive races, are nowhere to be found.

DOJ_NMG_0070516

And Wilson's schedule is not exactly full. His only public event so far this week was a dinner for the Noble County Democratic Party on Tuesday night here in rural southeastern Ohio.

"We don't hear anything" from national Republicans, Wilson said as he relaxed amid the red-white-and-blue bunting that decorated the tables at the Noble County Community Center. "We are very happy they are looking elsewhere."

This is a race the 2006 midterm elections forgot. The seat in the pastures and Appalachian foothills of eastern Ohio has been held for a decade by Rep. Ted Strickland, who this year is the Democrats' nominee for governor. His departure once tantalized Republicans, who regarded this seat -- carried narrowly by President Bush in 2004 -- as their most promising chance to take a congressional seat from the Democratic column.

Some promise. Blasdel's campaign never gained much traction after Wilson, considered the strongest of three contenders, won the Democratic primary in May.

Like any game, politics tends to be more fun on offense than defense. Republicans are not having much fun this election season.

While Democrats have targets around the country where they could gain a seat, Republicans have the barest handful.

A combination of an adverse national environment and the need to devote their resources to defending at-risk GOP incumbents gives the national party few opportunities to invest heavily in challengers, such as Blasdel, who face an uphill fight.

Ask Republicans where they see takeover opportunities this fall and they will rattle off seats such as Georgia's 8th District -- held by Rep. Jim Marshall -- Iowa's 3rd or even the open at-large seat in strongly Democratic Vermont. But none of those races look particularly dire for Democrats at the moment, as many Republican strategists privately acknowledge.

Republicans' receding chances in the Ohio 6th provide a microcosm of this trend.

For much of 2005, Blasdel, the second-ranking Republican in the Ohio House, was the golden boy of GOP recruitment efforts. National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Thomas M. Reynolds (N.Y.) regularly singled out him as a star in the making and the 6th District as a pickup opportunity.

Republicans' optimism only increased after Wilson did not collect the necessary signatures to qualify for the primary ballot, necessitating a write-in candidacy. Sensing opportunity, the Republican Congressional Committee poured hundreds of thousands of dollars into the district in hopes of killing Wilson's candidacy. Television ads accused Wilson of supporting the dumping of raw sewage in the Ohio River, among other not-so-nice allegations.

The strategy backfired. Wilson, who knocked on 40,000 doors and sent out 4,000 personal letters during the primary race, rolled up 66 percent of the vote, winning 4,500 votes more than the four Republican candidates combined.

"To do that is unheard of," said Noble County Democratic Party Chairman Larry Woodford. Republicans "saw the writing on the wall."

It certainly looks that way. After Wilson's win, Blasdel went from hot to "who?" in the eyes of many Republicans.

The 6th District "on paper does look like it should be competitive," Wilson said. Certainly, judging by the pickup trucks in the parking lot and camouflage on the attendees at the Noble County gathering, this is not a typical Democratic stronghold.

Most Democrats in this part of the world are conservative on social issues such as abortion and guns, and tend to identify more with Larry the Cable Guy than with Larry David. "Southeastern Ohio is Appalachia," said Woodford. "A lot of people don't want to say that, but it is."

Wilson, like Strickland, has so far been able to bridge that cultural divide between local and national Democrats. Instead, he is emphasizing his conservative credentials and past service for the area.

A poll conducted for his campaign last month shows that the strategy has been effective, as Wilson led Blasdel 49 percent to 25 percent. Blasdel campaign manager Ryan Stenger conceded that the Democrat is ahead at the moment but added that his candidate is seeing monthly improvements in private polling. "Things are definitely getting better," Stenger said. "We definitely have our challenges ahead of us."

Still, the Republican Congressional Committee has not promised an end-of-the-campaign advertising blitz that earlier this year seemed a given. Stenger argued that once the national party is satisfied with where its incumbents stand, the money will begin to flow to offensive opportunities in open seats.

DOJ_NMG_0070517

In the meantime, Blasdel plans to capitalize on lower gas prices -- they have dropped below $2 in some parts of the district -- and the stock market, which is nearing a new high. "The other side will be caught napping on this one," promised Stenger.

Democrats Decide They Don't Need 'Contract' To Win (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, September 28, 2006

The 12th anniversary of the Republicans' 1994 "Contract with America" came and went on Wednesday without a 2006 Democratic counterpart. And there won't be one.

Instead, Democratic House and Senate leaders held yet another press conference to denounce the Republican Congress' "rubberstamping the Bush administration's misguided agenda."

Despite repeated urging from various quarters, including from former President Bill Clinton, that the party needs to make clear what it stands for and not just against, Democrats contend that off-year elections are referenda on the party in power and that a Democratic alternative agenda would only provide targets for the GOP to attack.

Just to underscore the point, the Senate Democratic leadership's "war room" sent out an e-mail Monday declaring that "much hype surrounds the 1994 Contract with America. The Contract is often incorrectly credited with playing a large role in the Republican victory in the mid-term elections. Evidence shows that this was not, in fact, the case: Candidates did not campaign on the Contract with America, and most Americans were unfamiliar with the document's existence."

Still, it's a fact that then-House Minority Leader Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) gathered 337 GOP Members and candidates on the West Front of the Capitol on Sept. 27, 1994, and issued a 10-plank platform that included welfare reform, a balanced-budget constitutional amendment, tort reform, Defense budget increases, middle-class tax cuts and term limits for Members of Congress.

It's undoubtedly true that the GOP won the election largely because of disgust with Democratic management — the failure of Clinton's health care reform plan and Congressional scandals — but the contract did provide a legislative roadmap for the GOP once it won a 52-seat victory and had to help govern the country.

This year, Democrats have issued a two-page positive agenda, "New Direction for America," but there's been no Capitol steps rally, and the document has all the earmarks of being just a handout designed to be an answer to the question, "But what do Democrats stand for?"

It calls for "beginning the phased re-deployment of U.S. forces from Iraq in 2006," doubling U.S. special forces "to destroy Osama Bin Laden and terrorist networks like Al Qaeda" and upgrading homeland security.

It pledges to block a Congressional pay raise until the nation's minimum wage is raised, to make college tuition tax-deductible, to foster energy independence, to force Medicare to negotiate lower drug prices and to "enact real pension reform to protect employees' financial security from CEO corruption and mismanagement."

The document says nothing about economic policy, although Rep. Charlie Rangel (D-N.Y.), who's in line to be chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee if the Democrats take over, said he has not ruled out the possibility of eliminating President Bush's tax cuts, which included some cuts for middle-class Americans as well as vastly more for the rich.

Separately, Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) has co-written a 200-page book, "The Plan," with a former Clinton White House colleague, Bruce Reed, which does lay out a positive agenda; although it, too, is loaded with anti-Bush invective and is short on bipartisan outreach.

The book's "big ideas for America" include "universal citizen service" that calls for all Americans between 18 and 25 to spend three months learning civil defense procedures, "universal child health care" coverage and "universal retirement savings" that requires all employers to offer 401(k) plans to their workers.

The book also advances Emanuel's tax reform plan, introduced with Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.), that calls for reducing the number of tax brackets from six to three, guaranteeing that all families with incomes under $100,000 pay only a 10 percent rate and taxing capital gains and dividends at the earner's income tax rate — an increase from 15 percent to, presumably, 35 percent for high-bracket earners.

DOJ_NMG_0070518

Emanuel and Wyden also want to eliminate the Alternative Minimum Tax, institute a corporate flat-tax rate of 35 percent and create a base closing-style commission to eliminate corporate tax loopholes. The total package, Emanuel says, could reduce the budget deficit by $100 billion over 10 years.

Emanuel's book also calls for massive research efforts and tax credits for the purchase of hybrid cars to cut gasoline consumption in half over 10 years and reduce global warming. And it calls for tax credits to make college and/or advanced skills training affordable for all.

The book gives Bush practically no credit for any worthwhile advance, including his No Child Left Behind school reforms, but it does endorse, rather courageously, pay-for-performance for teachers as well as an extended school year.

You get little sense from the book that if Democrats did win control of the House or Senate, their margins would be so narrow they'd have to get GOP support to pass anything. Emanuel told me in an interview, "I believe in bipartisanship, but his administration makes it impossible. They reject all our ideas."

Emanuel is making no public predictions about the outcome in November, just saying, "I'd rather be in our situation than theirs," and disputing GOP claims that they will have a money and get-out-the-vote advantage.

Emanuel clearly thinks his party needs a positive message this year — otherwise he would not have written the book — but he told me that 2006 is still shaping up to be a "normal" off-year "referendum" election.

The exceptions were 1998, when the GOP was set to impeach Clinton and Democrats gained five seats, and the 2002 post-terrorism election, when the GOP picked up eight seats.

The average midterm loss for the party controlling the White House from 1974 through 1994 is nearly 26 seats. Eliminating the GOP's post-Watergate 49-seat drubbing, the average is 21. Factoring in the post-2000 Census gerrymandering of seats, Democrats would seem to be just on the edge of the 15 seats they need to take the House.

A positive message of purpose — saying where they'd lead instead of just how much trouble they'd inflict on Bush — could push them over the top. Maybe Democrats don't need a Contract, but they could use a plan.

Warning: Races May Not Be As Close As They Appear (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, September 28, 2006

Democratic pollsters are pushing lots of polls that show second- and third-tier candidates performing surprisingly well. If most of these challengers win, the Democrats will gain 30 or 40 House seats.

Obviously, that's unlikely. Extremely unlikely.

So what are we all supposed to make of Democratic polling memos asserting that Paul Hodes (New Hampshire's 2nd), John Hall (New York's 19th), Jason Altmire (Pennsylvania's 4th), Victoria Wulsin (Ohio's 2nd), Charlie Brown (California's 4th), Nancy Skinner (Michigan's 9th) and Dan Maffei (New York's 25th) are breathing down the necks of incumbent Republicans?

Some of these numbers stem from the fact that the Democratic base has solidified early on and Democratic candidates are getting the vote that normally comes to them only in October. The folks over at Public Opinion Strategies, I believe, coined the term "premature partisan polarization" to refer to the current tendency of voters to pick their party's Congressional candidates earlier and earlier, even if they know nothing about them.

Consider Maffei, a Democrat challenging Rep. Jim Walsh (R-N.Y.) in a district that includes Syracuse and the eastern end of Rochester.

A recent Maffei poll shows him trailing Walsh by only 4 points, 44 percent to 40 percent. Yet Maffei's favorable rating was just 24 percent. That means a large percentage of respondents who said they would vote for Maffei don't have a favorable impression of him. But they are for him, whomever he may be.

Presumably, most of these respondents are Democrats who want to send a message to President Bush and figure that voting for Maffei is a good way of doing so. After all, Democratic presidential hopeful Sen. John Kerry (Mass.) won the district in 2004, defeating Bush 50 percent to 48 percent.

Maffei looks pretty irrelevant in all this, and the poll suggests that at this point, a slice of white bread with a (D) after its name would have a good chance of holding Walsh under 50 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0070519

Maffei is not the only Democratic candidate running far ahead of his or her name identification. In New Hampshire's 2nd district, a Democratic poll pegs Hodes' total name identification as 27 percent, yet has him drawing 42 percent in the ballot test against Rep. Charles Bass (R).

In New York's 20th district, a Global Strategy Group poll for Kirsten Gillibrand shows her favorable name ID at 34 percent even as she draws 39 percent of the vote against Rep. John Sweeney (R).

In Pennsylvania's 4th district, Altmire's total name identification is 21 percent, yet he is drawing 44 percent of the vote in a ballot test against incumbent GOP Rep. Melissa Hart.

In each of these districts, there are enough Democratic voters to provide a solid Democratic Congressional vote, and Maffei, Hodes, Gillibrand and Altmire apparently are getting their share early — even prematurely. But are these races as close as they would seem?

Count me as skeptical, and not only because most of these poll memos contain the dreaded "and when voters were read short descriptions about the candidates" second ballot that allegedly measures a challenger's fundamental strength. If wishes were horses, beggars would ride.

The Maffei poll memo includes at least a couple of things that caught my eye and deserve mention. First, despite Maffei's move in the ballot test, Walsh still has a name ID of 51 percent favorable/36 percent unfavorable. In other words, in a district won by Kerry and where Walsh's "re-elect" has plummeted from 42 percent to 34 percent, the Congressman still is viewed favorably by a majority of respondents.

Granted, Walsh's negatives have risen since a previously unreleased March Democratic survey, but that's not surprising given the national and state environments, which strongly favor Democrats. Walsh's favorable ratings have slipped only slightly, from 56 percent in March to 51 percent now.

Equally noteworthy is that district voters, who have a very unfavorable view of Bush (25 percent favorable/62 percent unfavorable), seem willing to make a clear distinction between Bush and Walsh.

That willingness to make a distinction is crucial, since it demonstrates that Walsh has, to a considerable extent, personalized the district. In an environment like this, and in a district such as New York's 25th, Walsh's success in building his own image is crucial.

The memo goes on to make a generalized assertion: "Voters in the 25th District are clearly looking for change."

Well, I've seen that message, in one way or another, in almost every Democratic polling memo that comes across my desk. They almost always cite Bush's standing. They almost all argue that voters want change or are dissatisfied with the direction of the country. And they are right, but only so far.

The problem for Democrats is that in most cases, that won't be enough by itself to get voters to fire GOP incumbents. That's particularly true if Republicans pound away at their challengers, making them the issue in their races and decreasing their appeal as vehicles for change. Of course, not all Republican incumbents are doing that yet. And that's a mistake that some Republicans could well come to regret.

Stuart Rothenberg is editor of the Rothenberg Political Report (www.rothenbergpoliticalreport.com).

Calls Grow For Release Of Intelligence Report (WSJ)

WSJ Online's "Washington Wire", September 26, 2006

Leading congressional Democrats along with the Republican chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee are pressing the White House to release an intelligence report that concluded the Iraq war had helped create a new generation of Islamic militants.

Democrats pushing for the National Intelligence Estimate to be released publicly include House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California; Sen. Jay Rockefeller of West Virginia, the ranking member of the Senate Intelligence Committee; and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, arguably the party's most prominent elected official.

Santorum

Meantime, Sen. Pat Roberts of Kansas, chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, said he wants the report to be declassified and released publicly "so the American people can see the material for themselves and come to their own conclusions." Other Republicans, including Sens. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania and George Voinovich of Ohio, said they are considering making a similar request.

DOJ_NMG_0070520

At issue is the National Intelligence Estimate that made headlines last weekend when its conclusions about the war in Iraq appeared on the front pages of the New York Times and Washington Post. The White House has ruled out declassifying the entire report, though it has left open the possibility of selectively declassifying excerpts.

The sparring during the election season highlights Democrats' desire to use the unpopular war in Iraq to hammer away at Republicans' electoral advantage on national security issues. The White House is casting the war in Iraq as an essential part of the war on terror, while Democrats are trying to separate the two issues and argue that Iraq has been a costly distraction from the broader fight against Islamic extremism.

In the meantime, the Bush administration got a political boost from Iraq's president. In an interview on the PBS show "The NewsHour with Jim Lehrer," Iraqi President Jalal Talabani said he disagreed with the report's contention that the Iraq war had worsened the global terrorist threat. "I think the invasion of Iraq reduced the danger of terrorism on the United States of America because all terrorist groups are now concentrating on Iraq," he said. –Yochi J. Dreazen

House GOP Pushes Its 'Suburban Agenda' (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 28, 2006

While House Republicans trumpeted elements of their suburban agenda, Democrats yesterday said Congress will have failed the American people if it adjourns without increasing the minimum wage.

"The battleground is in the suburbs, and it is wise policy and wise politics to directly meet the needs of families in those areas," said Rep. Mark Steven Kirk, Illinois Republican, chairman of the party's Suburban Agenda Caucus.

Mr. Kirk said both parties for too long have focused on rural or urban voters. The country now is 54 percent suburbanites who face similar challenges, he said.

"In the middle is where the majority is," he said.

Republicans outlined seven "suburban agenda" measures for 2007 aimed at improving education and health care. They also are pushing the Alternative Energy Act of 2006, which funds research for plug-in electric hybrid car technology and studies solar and wind power.

Democrats, meanwhile, tried to force a vote on increasing the minimum wage, a move many centrist Republicans support.

"The Democrats want to take the nation in a new direction, one where the needs of all Americans are addressed," said Rep. Eddie Bernice Johnson, Texas Democrat.

They threatened to resist the adjournment scheduled for the end of the week until Republican leaders allow a clean "up or down" vote on the minimum wage. Most Democrats opposed an August bill that the House passed, which raised the wage but also offered numerous tax cuts. That bill was stalled in the Senate.

"We should not leave town when there is serious business the Republican leadership has failed to complete," said Rep. Jim McGovern, Massachusetts Democrat.

But Rep. Pete Sessions, Texas Republican, said his party is targeting "people in America who get up every day [and] go to work."

"We intend to make sure that voters in November see the suburban caucus and the agenda that we have that's good for their families and good for our Republican Party," he said.

"Suburban agenda" items that overwhelmingly passed the House this year include a measure to block sites like MySpace.com from schools and libraries and a bill allowing schools to do FBI background checks before hiring employees.

A new poll of 1,000 suburban voters released by Republicans yesterday shows 50 percent think the economy is on the right track, up from 38 percent in July. It also shows Republican popularity ratings have increased -- from 40 percent in July to 43 percent this month. Negative ratings decreased from 53 percent in July to 49 percent this month. The poll was conducted by the Winston Group, a firm used by Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0070521

"While Democrats talk the talk, these numbers show that suburban folks increasingly like Republicans because they walk the walk with our plan to fight terrorism and grow jobs," said Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert.

But the Democrats, who need just 15 seats to wrest control of the House from Republicans, say the majority party did nothing for the American people this year.

"The 'Do-Nothing Congress' did more substantive work than we have done," said Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland. He said Republicans and President Bush "demand that it is either done their way or not done at all."

President Truman dubbed lawmakers in 1948 the "Do-Nothing Congress" because they met less than 110 days. When this Congress adjourns it will have met for less than 95 voting days.

Several Democrats during floor speeches yesterday attempted to get unanimous consent to consider the minimum-wage bill immediately. Republicans controlling the proceedings denied them.

New Hope For Democrats In Bid For Senate (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 27 — Six weeks before Election Day, the Democrats suddenly face a map with unexpected opportunities in their battle for control of the Senate.

In Virginia, a state that few expected to be seriously competitive, Senator George Allen looks newly vulnerable after a series of controversies over charges of racial insensitivity, strategists in both parties say. In Tennessee, another Southern state long considered safely red, Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., a Democrat, has run a strong campaign that has kept that state in contention.

Elsewhere, Democratic challengers are either ahead or close in races in five states held by the Republicans: Missouri, Montana, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Rhode Island, according to political strategists in both parties and the latest polls.

All of these races could shift direction in a matter of days, let alone six weeks, and Republicans are counting on their superior finances and large blocks of television advertising to hold the line. Democrats also have their own vulnerabilities, particularly in New Jersey, where Senator Robert Menendez is in a tight race with his Republican challenger, State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr., according to recent polls.

Democrats must win six Republican seats to regain a Senate majority, meaning they would have to win nearly every close race. Even the most optimistic Democrats acknowledge that such a feat would require a big anti-Republican wave, a lot of money and a lot of luck.

Still, a shift in the Senate was always considered a long shot this year. Some analysts now say, however, that there are enough Republican seats facing serious challenges to make it at least plausible.

“There’s a big difference in talking about six seats in play and not five,” said Stuart Rothenberg, an independent analyst.

In Pennsylvania, Rick Santorum, the No. 3 Republican in the Senate, has been lagging behind Bob Casey, the state treasurer, for months. In Rhode Island, Senator Lincoln Chafee, a Republican, overcame his primary challenge, but remains locked in a tight race with Sheldon Whitehouse, the Democrat and former state attorney general.

Senator Mike Dewine, Republican of Ohio, is fighting an unhappy political mood in his state, stoked by local Republican scandals and economic unease.. Independent polls suggest Mr. Dewine remains in a tight race with his Democratic challenger, Representative Sherrod Brown.

In Montana, Senator Conrad Burns, the Republican, has been considered vulnerable for months to his Democratic challenger, Jon Tester, a farmer and state senator. And any route to a majority for the Democrats would have to include Missouri, where Senator Jim Talent, the Republican, is being challenged by Claire McCaskill, the state auditor.

Republicans’ hopes for a pickup look strongest, at the moment, in New Jersey. But another target is the open Democratic seat in Maryland, where Lt. Gov. Michael Steele is running against Representative Benjamin L. Cardin, a Democrat still trying to unify his party after a competitive primary campaign.

Republican strategists acknowledge the intensely competitive map but say they are ready for it.

DOJ_NMG_0070522

"Anybody who says there's no way the Democrats could regain control of the Senate, that's just wishful thinking," said Glen Bolger, a Republican pollster active in numerous House and Senate races. "But there's a long way between could and would, and the Republican resource advantage is just now coming to bear."

Democrats are upbeat but wary.

Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, said: "We will pick up seats. And if the stars continue to align, we can take back the Senate."

Republicans say they have the money not only to defend their seats, but also to put Democrats on the defensive in Maryland, New Jersey and elsewhere.

"We obviously knew all along many of our Republicans were going to have difficult races, and they've known that as well, which is why they have more resources than their counterparts and are able to push back," said Brian Nick, spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee.

Republican Senate candidates are getting a major boost from the Republican National Committee, which is financing an advertising campaign so far focused largely on Missouri, Ohio and Tennessee. This is widely viewed as a firewall strategy: If Republicans hold onto even one of those seats, it stymies the Democrats' hopes of regaining a majority.

Mr. Schumer said, "The 800-pound gorilla is the money the R.N.C. is pouring into those races."

Republicans also argue that six weeks out, many voters are only beginning to pay attention. In Tennessee, for example, Ben Mitchell, campaign manager for the Republican Senate candidate, former Mayor Bob Corker of Chattanooga, said voters would reject Mr. Ford when they learned about his voting record, which Republicans assert is at odds with his centrist image.

Pete Brodnitz, a pollster for Mr. Ford, countered that Tennessee voters had a "big appetite for change."

Perhaps the most unexpected development this year is the competition in two Southern states. Democrats have fared poorly in the South in recent years, which has accounted, in large part, for their difficulty in gaining a Senate majority.

Tennessee, where the seat is held by the retiring majority leader, Bill Frist, is drawing intense interest from national Republicans. President Bush was in Memphis on Wednesday to raise money for Mr. Corker.

The Virginia race — between Mr. Allen and Jim Webb, the Democrat — looked safe for the Republicans until Mr. Allen made a demeaning reference to a young American man of Indian descent — a Webb campaign worker — at a rally in August. Then, last week, Mr. Allen reacted angrily to a reporter's question about whether his mother had been born Jewish, which began another distracting episode for his campaign.

This week, he has faced accusations that he used racist slurs in the 1970's and 1980's — allegations that Mr. Allen has flatly denied.

This week, Mr. Allen's campaign manager, Dick Wadhams, described the race as "competitive," but asserted that would change as it became clear that Mr. Webb "stands with John Kerry, Ted Kennedy, Chuck Schumer and Hillary Clinton."

Steve Jarding, an adviser to Mr. Webb, described the race as a dead heat, and said that while Mr. Allen retained a financial advantage, Mr. Webb's fund-raising had soared of late.

Both parties are watching to see if Mr. Webb can take advantage of his new opening.

Analysts say the level of Senate competition should come as no surprise; Senate races are more likely to reflect national trends, they say, whereas most House districts are so carefully drawn on partisan lines that "they are safe against anything but a hurricane," said Gary C. Jacobson, a political scientist at the University of California, San Diego.

Controversy Clouds Allen's Re-election Bid (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, September 28, 2006

LEESBURG, Va. — Michael Johnson is a swing voter in a swing county in what's turned into one of the hottest Senate races in the country, and he's swinging away from George Allen, the man he voted for in 2000.

Johnson, 35, a football fan attracted six years ago by Allen's family (his father was a Washington Redskins coach) and "positive, honest" image, says he probably won't vote for Allen this fall. The reason is a videotape showing Allen taunting a volunteer of Indian descent for his Democratic rival as "macaca" — considered an ethnic slur in some cultures.

DOJ_NMG_0070523

"It was horrible," says Johnson, a planner for fast-growing Loudoun County. "Definitely disheartening."

In interviews here Wednesday, many Republicans said they're sticking with Allen.

"He's a wonderful man. A good family man. A good Christian," said Patsy Harrington, 40, a part-time real estate agent.

Until Aug. 11 and the "macaca" comment, Allen had a wide lead in the polls over Democrat Jim Webb, Navy secretary in the Reagan administration, and seemed ready to coast to re-election. Since then, however, his campaign has been slowed by Allen's reactions to the revelation his maternal grandparents were Jewish and allegations that he used racial slurs to refer to black people.

"It has been one misstep and meltdown after another" for the Allen campaign, Mark McKinnon, a strategist for President Bush, said Tuesday at a panel discussion on political advertising in New York sponsored by USA TODAY.

Democrats, who need six new seats for a Senate majority, are poised to invest heavily here. "With each day that goes by, Virginia looks increasingly winnable," says Phil Singer, spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. He declined to give details on spending plans.

Federal campaign reports for June 30, the most recent available, showed Allen with a formidable financial edge: $6.6 million on hand vs. $424,000 for Webb.

Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd said the third-quarter report will show "a fundraising flurry" as a result of celebrity help and national attention, but Allen will have more money.

Both candidates have had 1970s flashbacks. Three of Allen's University of Virginia college football teammates told the online magazine Salon this week that Allen often used a racial slur to describe blacks.

Allen is sending mailers to Virginia women highlighting articles and speeches in which onetime Republican Webb argued, in colorful language he now says was immature, against women in the military.

Webb went on to marry a fellow Vietnam War veteran and change military policies to help women serve. "I've tried to show by my conduct when I had positions in government that I am open to assisting women succeed in all the areas where that's possible," he said this month on NBC's Meet the Press.

Allen pushed for aid to historically black colleges and a Senate apology for failing to outlaw lynching. Last spring, he skipped the high-profile White House Correspondents Dinner to attend a racial reconciliation weekend with Democratic Georgia Rep. John Lewis, a civil rights hero. A former head of the state NAACP has endorsed him.

Allen has apologized repeatedly for the "macaca" incident, and this week, he denied the allegations that he used a racial epithet in college. "It is not who I was, and it is not who I am," Allen said. "It is contrary to every fiber of my being."

Allen was not available for an interview this week. Webb declined Tuesday to comment on the allegations from Allen's classmates.

Virginia conservatives remain solidly behind Allen. "We vote the party, not the person," said Delrose Winter, 48, co-owner of a materials analysis lab. "I don't care what he did as long as it wasn't criminal. He seems very moral and sensible."

The question for Allen is whether there are enough people like Winter in counties such as Loudoun, a magnet for newcomers from Washington and its inner suburbs. Steven Cox, 58, a farmer and baker, moved here seven years ago. "I have mixed feelings about Webb, but I know too many things about Allen," Cox said Wednesday at the Leesburg Restaurant. "I'm just disgusted with the way things are going," particularly regarding Iraq.

Across the room, several friends held forth on the Senate race as they finished lunch. Wayne Wilmot, 64, co-owner of an insurance agency, said comments Allen might have made 30 years ago are "immaterial." He said Allen deserves a second term as senator. He's not sure about the White House.

Michelle Martinson, 50, a title underwriter, said she's a lifelong Republican who voted for Allen in 2000 but won't this year. Her reasons include his closeness to Bush, his support for a state ban on gay marriage, and "he comes across as kind of mean-spirited." As for Webb, his "woman thing is just bizarre." She is still mulling whether to support Webb or no one.

Webb Denies Ever Using Word As Epithet (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070524

RICHMOND, Sept. 27 -- Democratic Senate candidate James Webb on Wednesday sought to explain remarks he had made a day earlier, in which he refused to say whether he had used the "N-word," but he insisted he has never used it as a racial epithet aimed at anyone.

"I don't think that there's anyone who grew up around the South that hasn't had the word pass through their lips at one time in their life," he told the Richmond Times-Dispatch on Tuesday. "If you read 'Fields of Fire,' that word and a lot of other words are in the book." "Fields of Fire" is a novel Webb wrote about the Vietnam War.

Spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd said Webb, an author and former Marine, "did not want to make any blanket statements that he has never, ever uttered the word. Jim has not used the word directed at another person. He's never used it himself as a racial slur."

Allegations about race continued to roil Virginia's Senate race this week, as Webb and his opponent, George Allen (R-Va.), confronted fresh accusations and their campaigns struggled to shift the conversation to other subjects.

Political scientists who specialize in the history of the South said Webb's careful comments about the N-word, and the controversy over its alleged use by Allen, reflect the word's transformation from a common political term to the third-rail of electioneering.

"The Voting Rights Act transformed that word. It eradicated it," said Jack Bass, a professor of humanities and social science at the College of Charleston. "The crowd that [used it in the 1970s] either quit using it or they were gone. Blacks were voters by then."

Charles Bullock, a professor of political science at the University of Georgia, said that "in much of the South, there was this tremendous transformation from a time when it was a term widely used by politicians making successful appeals to now where it is something that no politician would dare utter."

Webb's comments to the Times-Dispatch prompted Allen campaign officials to direct a reporter to Dan Cragg, a former acquaintance of Webb's, who said Webb used the word while describing his own behavior during his freshman year at the University of Southern California in the early 1960s. Webb later transferred to the U.S. Naval Academy.

Cragg, 67, who lives in Fairfax County, said on Wednesday that Webb described taking drives through the black neighborhood of Watts, where he and members of his ROTC unit used racial epithets and pointed fake guns at blacks to scare them.

"They would hop into their cars, and would go down to Watts with these buddies of his," Cragg said Webb told him. "They would take the rifles down there. They would call then [epithets], point the rifles at them, pull the triggers and then drive off laughing. One night, some guys caught them and beat . . . them. And that was the end of that."

Cragg said Webb told him the Watts story during a 1983 interview for a Vietnam veterans magazine. Cragg, who described himself as a Republican who would vote for Allen, did not include the story in his article. He provided a transcript of the interview, but the transcript does not contain the ROTC story. He said he still remembers the exchange vividly more than 20 years later.

Webb, who is in Texas for fundraising events, did not respond to repeated requests for comment. Todd said Webb denied the allegations in a conversation with her.

"He said it's not true. It's not even close to being true," Todd said. She quoted Webb as saying: "In 1963, you couldn't go to Watts and do that kind of thing. You'd get killed. So of course I didn't do it. I would never do that. I would never want to do that."

Todd condemned the allegations as politically motivated by the Allen campaign.

"They are pathetic individuals. They are beneath it. They are slime," she said. "Here we are trying to talk about the issues. They are completely and totally desperate."

Cragg, a former Army sergeant major, described himself as a longtime friend of Webb's who worked for him when he was assistant secretary of defense under President Ronald Reagan. Cragg said he approached the Allen campaign through a friend after hearing Webb's answer to the Times-Dispatch reporter's question about using the N-word.

"The fact is he has. He used it in my presence," Cragg said. "I don't think he's a racist any more than George Allen is. But he's not frank in admitting that he grew up in a culture where that was common and he used it."

Allen campaign officials declined to comment on Cragg's story. But political adviser Chris LaCivita responded to Todd's criticism. "They wouldn't know an issue if it hit them square in the face," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0070525

Cragg's accusations come as Allen continued to battle charges he used the same racial epithet during college and was racially insensitive.

On Monday, a college football teammate, Ken Shelton, said Allen used the N-word referring to black people. He also said that he, Allen and Billy Lanahan, another teammate, once cut the head off of a deer and, at Allen's urging, stuffed the head into a black person's mailbox.

Lanahan is dead. But his former roommate came forward Wednesday to say that he recalls Lanahan telling him the story without mentioning that the mailbox was a black person's.

"He told me they went hunting," said George Beam, 53, who lives in Charlottesville. "All he said was we cut the deer head off and stuck it in somebody's mailbox."

And late Wednesday, Allen's campaign launched a multimedia barrage against Webb that included testimonials from former female midshipmen at the Naval Academy. The women, who came forward several weeks ago, said an article Webb wrote in 1979 created a hostile environment for academy women.

"It was demoralizing from a perspective that only a woman could understand," one of the women says in the ad.

Todd called the ad "completely erroneous" because Webb created opportunities for women as secretary of the Navy.

Is There Life After 'Macaca'? (WSJ)

By Fred Barnes

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. -- Suddenly, for George Allen, mere re-election has become a perilous business. As recently as six weeks ago, he was expected to glide to an easy victory in his Senate re-election campaign, with an eye fixed on seeking the Republican presidential nomination in 2008. But instead of a cakewalk, he has been subjected to extraordinary scrutiny and a raft of unfavorable publicity.

The national press hasn't treated Mr. Allen as an ordinary candidate. He's in a different category: Likely Presidential Contender. His re-election bid thus floats beyond local Virginia matters, becoming a test of Mr. Allen's viability as a national candidate for 2008. The media grew still more interested when Mr. Allen got a serious Democratic opponent, James Webb, a well-known novelist, Vietnam veteran and angry ex-Republican.

Then Mr. Allen made a crude mistake that may ultimately doom his presidential aspirations and perhaps even his Senate career -- the notorious "macaca" incident. At a rural rally in mid-August, Mr. Allen digressed and singled out a young Webb aide videotaping his speech, a common practice these days in hopes of catching gaffes or blunders. Mr. Allen certainly delivered. He referred to the aide as "macaca," a racial slur in some cultures.

The tape was picked by liberal bloggers and circulated by YouTube, and eventually found its way to the Washington Post, never friendly to Virginia conservatives or to Mr. Allen in particular. The paper played the story as a major scandal, running 44 stories over the next month, including seven on the front page. Almost instantly the rest of the national media glommed onto the story.

Mr. Allen was thrown on the defensive, appearing increasingly rattled. He made things worse by giving several confusing, contradictory explanations and declined to apologize for several days. Then he apologized, over and over again. His lead in polls dropped to a slim four-point advantage.

Would Mr. Allen's gaffe have become a huge issue absent his presidential ambitions? Probably not, even with attention focused so closely on 2006 congressional races. Would the Post have hyped the macaca story day after day? I doubt it.

The cycle, however, is self-stoking. Mr. Allen's views on race and ethnicity have become the target of press frenzy. Ten days ago, he was asked if his mother, Etty, is Jewish. He said no. But when a reporter caught up with her, she said her parents were indeed Jewish, a fact she'd kept from her family, including Mr. Allen, until recently. That story made the front page of the New York Times.

This week ginned up a new controversy: Several acquaintances of Mr. Allen accuse him of having used the "n-word" years ago as a young man. Their stories were uncorroborated and disputed by Allen allies.

DOJ_NMG_0070526

Given Mr. Allen's status as a presidential possibility, the media's concentration on his personal life was not surprising. Reporters are famous for scrutinizing the past of presidential candidates and ferreting out old embarrassments and long-held secrets. When Gary Hart ran for president, it was discovered he'd changed his name and fudged on his age. In 1992, an old letter written by Bill Clinton surfaced in which he condemned the military.

Mr. Allen's campaign has seemed unprepared for the way that presidential races, with their high visibility, draw out personal information. His two previous statewide races (for governor in 1993 and the Senate in 2000) were largely uneventful and revealed little besides that he's a likeable conservative with a libertarian streak and without the slightest hint of racism. The perils, I suppose, of a possibly premature coronation.

With Mr. Allen under sharp attack from all corners, Mr. Webb has become something of a bystander. He joined Mr. Allen for two contentious debates in which neither man gained an advantage. But otherwise he's been ignored. Since Mr. Webb is first-time candidate and an awkward campaigner, he may be better off out of the limelight.

But his obscurity will be short-lived. Mr. Allen is going on TV today with an ad zinging Mr. Webb for a 1982 article critical of women in the military, especially in combat. The article used vivid language that shows, according to the ad, Mr. Webb is disrespectful and insulting to women. "This is a severe problem for Webb with moderate voters, particularly women," says Dick Wadhams, Mr. Allen's chief strategist.

But that, as well as the policy proposals set to drop like confetti, won't be enough to restore Mr. Allen's credibility. He needs to remind voters of his success as governor. He abolished parole, reformed welfare and championed education reforms. New voters, many of them in Northern Virginia (which has one-third of the state's voting population), know little of Mr. Allen's impressive political background.

He must also shift the spotlight to Mr. Webb, whose views are vague but liberal enough for Mr. Allen to contest. Virginia no longer votes like a Southern state, but it's still more conservative than not. The anti-Webb message won't catch on, however, so long as the media remain focused on Mr. Allen's alleged personal flaws. It is going to be exceedingly difficult to overcome that hurdle.

The curdled conventional wisdom on the race is twofold: Mr. Allen is still favored to win re-election, but he should give up any thought of seeking the presidency in 2008. But Mr. Allen refuses to budge. He won't rule out a presidential race, and it remains very much in the cards.

Many conservatives are souring on Virginia's junior senator as a presidential candidate. Still: Should Mr. Allen overcome the media onslaught, effectively counter Mr. Webb's call for a withdrawal from Iraq, finish the campaign without breaking ranks with President Bush, and win a slugfest by a modest margin, he may emerge as a tough-minded survivor. The press won't like him any better, but he might earn the respect of Republican voters around the country. Candidates have been "misunderestimated" before, and stranger things have happened in politics.

Mr. Barnes, executive editor of the Weekly Standard, is author of "Rebel-in-Chief," released in paperback this week by Crown Forum.

A Platform Of Bigotry (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

George Allen, the clownish, Confederate-flag-loving senator from Virginia, has apparently been scurrying around for many years, spreading his racially offensive garbage like a dog that should be curbed. With harsh new allegations emerging daily, it's fair to ask:

Where are the voices of reason in the Republican Party — the nonbigoted voices? Why haven't we heard from them on this matter?

Mr. Allen has long been touted as one of the leading candidates for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008. But this is a man who has displayed the quintessential symbol of American bigotry, the Confederate battle flag, on the wall of his living room; who put up a hangman's noose as a decoration in his law office; who used an ethnic slur — macaca — in an attempt to publicly embarrass a 20-year-old American student of Indian descent; and who, according to the recollections of a number of his acquaintances, frequently referred to blacks as niggers.

DOJ_NMG_0070527

The senator has denied the last allegation. But his accusers are low-keyed, straight-arrow professionals who have no obvious ax to grind. They, frankly, seem believable.

Dr. R. Kendall Shelton, a North Carolina radiologist who played football with Mr. Allen at the University of Virginia in the 1970's, recalled a number of incidents, including one in which Mr. Allen said that blacks in Virginia knew their place. Dr. Shelton said in a television interview that he believed then, and still believes, that Mr. Allen was a racist.

Beyond the obvious problems with the senator's comments and his behavior is the fact that he so neatly fits into the pattern of racial bigotry, insensitivity and exploitation that has characterized the G.O.P. since it adopted its Southern strategy some decades ago. Once it was the Democrats who provided a comfortable home for public officials with attitudes and policies that were hostile to blacks and other minorities. Now the deed to that safe house has been signed over to the G.O.P.

Ronald Reagan may be revered by Republicans, but I can never forget that he opposed both the Civil Rights Act and the Voting Rights Act of the mid-1960's, and that as a presidential candidate he kicked off his 1980 general election campaign in Philadelphia, Miss., which just happened to be where three civil rights workers — Andrew Goodman, Michael Schwerner and James Chaney — were savagely murdered in 1964.

During his appearance in Philadelphia, Reagan told a cheering crowd, "I believe in states' rights."

The lynching of Goodman, Schwerner and Chaney (try to imagine the terror they felt throughout their ordeal) is the kind of activity symbolized by the noose that Senator Allen felt compelled to put up in his office.

One of the senator's Republican colleagues, Conrad Burns, is up for re-election in Montana. He's got an ugly racial history, too. Several years ago, while campaigning for a second term, Mr. Burns was approached by a rancher who wanted to know what life was like in Washington. The rancher said, "Conrad, how can you live back there with all those niggers?"

Senator Burns said he told the rancher it was "a hell of a challenge."

The senator later apologized. But he has bounced from one racially insensitive moment to another over the years, including one occasion when he referred to Arabs as "ragheads."

You don't hear President Bush or the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, or any other prominent Republicans blowing the whistle on the likes of George Allen and Conrad Burns because Republicans across the board, so-called moderates as well as conservatives, have benefited tremendously from the party's bigotry. Allen and Burns may have been more blatant and buffoonish than is acceptable, but they have all been singing from the same racially offensive hymnal.

From the Willie Horton campaign to the intimidation of black voters in Florida and elsewhere to the use of every racially charged symbol and code word imaginable — it's all of a piece.

The late Lee Atwater, in a 1981 interview, explained the evolution of the Southern strategy:

"You start out in 1954 by saying, 'Nigger, nigger, nigger! By 1968 you can't say 'nigger' — that hurts you. Backfires. So you say stuff like forced busing, states' rights and all that stuff. You're getting so abstract now [that] you're talking about cutting taxes, and all these things you're talking about are totally economic things and a byproduct of them is [that] blacks get hurt worse than whites."

It's been working beautifully for the G.O.P. for decades. Why would the president or anyone else curtail a winning strategy now?

Tennessee Battles For Senate (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, September 28, 2006

Tennessee is living up to its reputation as a battleground state with Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., a Democrat, running neck and neck with Bob Corker, Chattanooga's Republican mayor, in their race for the Senate.

Mr. Corker's early double-digit polling lead in his bid to hold for Republicans the seat being vacated by Majority Leader Bill Frist has dwindled into a statistical dead heat, and Democrats now think they can capture the seat in this Republican-leaning state.

DOJ_NMG_0070528

Republicans have underestimated the effectiveness of Mr. Ford's campaign, said Merle Black, political science professor at Emory University.

"It just looks like Ford wants this a lot more than Corker does," he said.

The stakes are high for Mr. Ford.

A victory by the son of former Rep. Harold Ford Sr. would give Democrats an unexpected victory in their effort to pick up six seats to win back the Senate majority in November.

It also would mark the first time a black person in the South has won an open election to the Senate and could be seen as the first chink in the armor of the Republican's Southern fortress. Republicans control both Senate seats in 10 of the 13 Southern states. Only Florida and Louisiana have split-party Senate representation, and only Arkansas has two Democrats.

Mr. Ford dismisses all of that.

"I'm not fighting for any legacy or any party pride or anything like that; I'm fighting for a seat on the U.S. Senate for the people of Tennessee. It's not any party's seat; it's the people's seat," he said.

Corker's campaign manager Ben Mitchell said financial support from Tennesseans will translate to votes in November.

"Our fundraising shows a tremendous amount of support from right here in Tennessee ... in contrast to Mr. Ford, who has a majority of his money coming in from out of state," Mr. Mitchell said.

"Bob Corker represents Tennessee values while Congressman Ford represents the values of out-of-state donors from California and New York who are funding his campaign."

The election is much closer than Republicans expected and they are having a tough time developing a strategy that can work against Mr. Ford.

"What we have to do is contend with a guy who is a very gifted talker and who will say just about anything to score political points," said Dan Ronayne, National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) spokesman.

Mr. Ford has also proven to be an effective counter-puncher.

The NRSC yesterday, using his voting record, pegged Mr. Ford as a flip-flopper on border security. He voted against legislation to create a 700-mile fence on the border that he said could not be done. But last week he voted for it, saying the bill presented was more comprehensive, including things other than the fence alone.

Mr. Ford immediately countered with the help of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee that put up an ad saying that Mr. Corker's construction firm has been cited for hiring illegal aliens.

Early on in the campaign the Republicans attempted to paint Mr. Ford as "Fancy Ford" who likes to live lavishly on the taxpayer's dime, but that quickly fizzled out.

"I've just finished paying off my college loans, and this guy is worth upwards of a quarter-billion dollars or more with a 40-room house in the Chattanooga mountains and 10 cars," Mr. Ford said.

One thing Mr. Ford cannot shake is limited residency in the state.

"Ford is like Al Gore," Mr. Ronayne said. "In 2000, we were able to show that Gore was more D.C. than Tennessee and Ford has the same problems."

Mr. Ford has worked hard to counteract that problem telling audiences that it isn't his fault that he came to the District with his mother and father when he was nine, "and since I didn't have a job or any money to pay my rent in Memphis, I decided to come with them."

Mfume Endorses Cardin, But Adds Caveat (WP)

By Ann E. Marimow

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

Senate candidate Benjamin L. Cardin received the critical endorsement yesterday of Democratic primary opponent Kweisi Mfume, whose blessing came with a blunt warning about the lack of diversity among candidates for statewide office in Maryland.

The main attraction at Cardin's campaign rally at the University of Maryland was supposed to be Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.), a rising star in the Democratic Party. But Mfume -- who lost to Cardin on Sept. 12 -- left a stark impression, telling the Baltimore congressman and fellow Democrats, "We have a problem."

DOJ_NMG_0070529

On stage at an outdoor amphitheater filled with college Democrats, the former NAACP president enthusiastically put his arms around Cardin, saying: "I know what he's done in the past, and I know what he'll do in the future. He's going to make a damn good senator."

But Mfume cautioned that the party had much work to do to energize black voters. The Democratic nominees for the top four jobs, he noted, look no different than the ticket 50 years ago.

"We need women in leadership positions in the state. We've got to find a way that African Americans and other minorities are represented statewide in office," he said, standing with Obama and other officials.

Cardin, who is white, faces Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele (R) in the general election Nov. 7 to succeed Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D), who is retiring.

In 2002, Steele became Maryland's first African American elected to statewide office and has tried to make inroads with black voters in the overwhelmingly Democratic state. He dismissed the significance of the high-profile endorsements yesterday and picked up on Mfume's theme.

"The challenge of the opportunity is to build a bridge to communities the Democratic Party has taken for granted and has, by its choice of nominee," decided to tell to wait, he said during an afternoon event in Largo. "I'm here to say, 'You don't have to wait any longer.' "

The issue of race has been at the forefront of the Senate contest since the primary, in which Mfume finished second in a crowded contest. Cardin lagged far behind Mfume in parts of the state where blacks are the majority. Mfume won nearly 70 percent of the vote in Prince George's County and 64 percent in Baltimore.

Cardin's challenge, said Democratic legislators in Prince George's, is to overcome disappointment in the black community. African Americans represent one of the most loyal Democratic voting blocs in Maryland, but resentment among some black voters lingers from the 2004 election, when the Democratic nominee for governor, Lt. Gov. Kathleen Kennedy Townsend, did not pick a black running mate.

"The fact that we don't have an African American" at the top of the ticket, said Sen. Ulysses Currie (D-Prince George's), "doesn't help Ben." Currie, one of the few lawmakers in the battleground county who endorsed Cardin in the primary, hopes to convince his constituents that "there isn't anyone I've met who better understands or is more effective in government."

One Democratic African American is on the statewide ballot: Del. Anthony G. Brown of Prince George's, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley's running mate in the governor's race.

Nonetheless, the Rev. Grainger Browning, pastor of Ebenezer AME Church in Fort Washington, said it would take more than appearances for some African Americans to mend relations with the party because of the sense that black Democrats have been underappreciated.

"The key thing is that we have not been at the table of influence," said Browning, who was on stage yesterday. "We want to be at the table at the time of the conception of ideas and not just when it is time to campaign."

Terry Lierman, the state Democratic Party chairman, acknowledged that the party needs "much more diversity, and we're working towards it." But he said it was important to consider the large number of female and minority nominees for lower level offices, such as General Assembly seats. Montgomery County Democrat Isiah "Ike" Leggett, he noted, would be the first black county executive in the state's largest jurisdiction.

About 28 percent of Maryland's residents are black -- among the highest percentages in the nation. The Democratic Party expects black voters to make up about 20 percent of the general election vote. For that reason, said Ronald Walters, a U-Md. government and politics professor, Cardin cannot afford to cede a significant percentage of the black vote to Steele.

If there is muted enthusiasm for the party, it is because of the question of whether black Democrats turn out in large numbers for Cardin. A Baltimore Sun poll this week showed 24 percent of black voters favor Steele, a strong showing for a Republican.

How involved Mfume will be in the campaign is unclear. Mfume said he was following up on a commitment he made to Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.), who began planning the unity event months ago.

"I am here to fulfill my commitment and my obligation," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0070530

There was certainly enthusiasm yesterday as Cardin told the crowd: "Michael Steele stands with George Bush. I stand with the people of Maryland." Obama followed, praising Cardin's experience in Annapolis and in Congress.

"There aren't too many people who could replace Senator Sarbanes and not miss a beat, and yet somehow, Maryland, you all found him," he said. Referring to Steele, he added: "I know the other guy is taller, and he's got that kind of local news anchor style about him. . . . But I tell you what, that's not what this election is about."

The Democrats' Charisma Doctor (WP)

By David Montgomery

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

It's one thing for Ben Cardin to joke about his charisma deficit. "Who says I'm not flashy?" he quips in a campaign commercial when a supporter suggests: "Ben's not flashy, but he never stops."

It's quite another for him to invite Mr. Democratic Charisma himself onstage for a rally yesterday in the Cardin quest to become U.S. senator from Maryland.

Barack Obama didn't even have to open his mouth to have a crowd of a few hundred under a powerful spell in a grassy outdoor amphitheater at the University of Maryland in College Park. The junior senator from Illinois -- part Kenyan, part Kansan -- stood tall and youthful and bronze in a black suit and a baby-blue tie, his eyes half-closed, studying the audience with a kind of seductive lassitude. His arrival sparked an ovation, and he shot a quick amiable wink to the many pols and hopefuls crammed behind him on the stage, mute witnesses to the magic.

Beside Obama stood Cardin. Comparisons aren't polite, but the Democratic congressman from Maryland was asking for it: He looked older, shorter, pudgier and pinker.

Suffice it to say, when Cardin delivered his speech ahead of Obama -- the candidate was the warm-up act for the superstar -- a female voice from the crowd did not interrupt him with the ecstatic cry, "We want to meet you!" Obama won that populist bouquet. Squinting, pretending he didn't hear it, he continued his passionate call to "put on your marching shoes" to elect Cardin.

So the man lacks charisma, fine: He can borrow it. That may have been the point of this sunny morning tableau on the campaign trail. In his race against the current lieutenant governor, Republican Michael Steele -- who has been featuring a puppy in his campaign commercials -- Cardin contends he is running a campaign of substance over style. Cardin's style is anti-style, the recitation of issues, the requests for debate.

"We're bringing in charismatic popular leaders to show their support for Ben Cardin," says Oren Shur, the campaign's spokesman. "It's still our banner they're standing in front of. . . . People like Barack Obama transcend politics. They attract people and engage people into political events" they otherwise might ignore.

Obama, whose fans say he delivers substance with style, has been electrifying Democrats since his 2004 presidential convention keynote address, before he was even in the Senate. Cardin admires that speech so much he quoted a line in his own yesterday: "I believe that we have a righteous wind at our backs, and that we stand on the crossroads of history."

Sprinting Dems everywhere have been demanding an Obama jolt of energy, inspiration, star power. In the past two weeks, the senator has addressed campaign events in Kentucky, Iowa, West Virginia and Virginia, where he rallied supporters of Senate candidate Jim Webb against incumbent Republican George Allen, and he'll quicken his pace as Election Day approaches, said Obama spokesman Robert Gibbs. To many of the party faithful, the question is not if, but when, Obama himself will run for president.

The air in College Park was thick with Obama thrall.

"I've just always admired everything Mr. Obama says," said Kate Turner, a Maryland student who attended the rally on her 19th birthday just to hear him. "I'm excited about politics because he's involved."

Turner lost her sandal chasing Obama after he left the stage. She wanted a birthday picture with him.

"It's your birthday?" said the senator. "Where's your shoe, though?"

Cardin will get her vote, Turner says, but Obama will enjoy a far more personal honor. The snapshot of Obama and her will become her new Facebook picture.

More Obama giddiness:

DOJ_NMG_0070531

"I decided to take time off from work to see my role model," said Joseph Eyong, 43, a native of Camaroon living in Silver Spring.

And this:

"Dude, I shook his hand."

That's Robert Hardin, 20, a Maryland junior from Fort Washington, to Alan Coleman, 20, a junior from Silver Spring. The night before the rally, one of their friends said he'd never heard of Obama. So they logged on to YouTube.com and had a viewing of the 2004 keynote speech.

"We were inspired to get up at 9 o'clock" for the rally, Coleman said. "If Obama wasn't here, I'm sure we wouldn't have half the turnout. I support all the politicians who are up there, but I don't know if I'd come out and hear them speak."

And what of that shortish white guy onstage with Barack Obama? After the speeches, Cardin was mobbed by a different crowd. Mostly reporters. But, his spokesman Shur affirmed, some people did seek Cardin's autograph on the back of campaign signs.

"If you talk about stentorian speaking," said Frank Bell, 80, of Kettering, ranking the rally speechifiers, "Obama's first, [Kweisi] Mfume's second, [retiring Sen. Paul] Sarbanes is third, and Ben's is somewhere down the line. . . . If he wins . . . it's going to be because he's standing for things people desperately need." (Bell didn't rank Sen. Barbara Mikulski, who also spoke.)

To win, Cardin is "going to have to do more," said Jennifer Lowery-Bell, 59, Frank's wife. "He can't be an Obama. We're not asking that." But Cardin will have to reach for some passion, she said, and he will have to keep pounding those issues, such as universal health care.

So, issues and passion: They matter. How they fit together is a politician's business. Sarbanes has been an issues guy, but a little bland. Obama meant it as a compliment when he said: "There aren't too many people who could replace Senator Sarbanes and not miss a beat. And yet somehow, Maryland, y'all found him." And the crowd cheered.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

The Washington Times, September 28, 2006

Big house

"Leaking classified information is a crime punishable with prison time. The statutes are on the books, folks. Those who leak classified information and those who publicize it should go to jail," writes Ralph Peters of the New York Post.

"The latest example was a selective leak from a National Intelligence Estimate. ... The leak wasn't about some phony 'right to know.' It was a political stunt performed for political gain. And now our enemies know what our intelligence community thinks. Gee, thanks. We don't need to know what intelligence documents say. What matters is what our leaders do or fail to do.

"What will it take to inspire a nonpartisan crackdown on those who betray our secrets, who selfishly expose our country to mortal danger?" Mr. Peters asks.

"This shouldn't be a Democratic or Republican issue. It's an American issue. Keeping our country safe is more important than Senator Sweetspot's re-election campaign or a Pulitzer Prize for another self-adoring, America-loathing journalist. Put 'em in the slammer. Where these criminals belong. Enforce our laws. And maybe -- just maybe -- folks in Washington will start obeying those laws again."

California dreaming

Just six weeks before the midterms, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger holds a double-digit edge over Democratic nominee Phil Angelides in two independent voter surveys.

The Governator held a 17-point lead over Mr. Angelides -- 48 percent to 31 percent -- in a survey released Tuesday by the Public Policy Institute of California. A Field Poll released yesterday put Mr. Schwarzenegger's advantage at 10 points, 44 percent to 34 percent.

Another Field survey in February found the rivals tied at 39 percent.

"We're at or exceeding what we need to have to win when it comes to men, women and Latinos," Schwarzenegger adviser Matthew Dowd told the Associated Press, crediting the lead to bipartisan dealings and well-targeted campaign messages.

DOJ_NMG_0070532

The policy institute's poll of 1,091 likely voters was conducted Sept. 13 to 20. The margin of error was two percentage points. The Field survey of 557 likely voters was conducted Sept. 14 through Sunday, with an error margin of 4.3 percentage points.

California dreaming No. 2

Heads up, Al Gore. California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger may steal some of that environmental thunder. Mr. Schwarzenegger signed into law a sweeping initiative yesterday that imposes the nation's first cap on greenhouse-gas emissions.

"It will begin a bold new era of environmental protection in California that will change the course of history," he said.

And talk about a Hallmark moment: The Republican governor stood shoulder to shoulder with San Francisco Mayor Gavin Newsom, a Democrat; New York Gov. George E. Pataki, a Republican; and a spate of Democratic legislators, according to the San Francisco Chronicle, which called the ceremony a "major political victory." British Prime Minister Tony Blair joined via video link.

"Nothing is more important than protecting our planet," Mr. Schwarzenegger said.

A vote for Swanson

One of the young stalwarts at the Heritage Foundation is about to take on former Vice President Al Gore. James Swanson, author of "Manhunt: the 12-Day Chase for Lincoln's Killer," has been nominated for a Quill Award for best book of the year in the historical/current events category. His competition? The author of "An Inconvenient Truth."

Mr. Swanson, who works as senior legal scholar for Edwin Meese III at Heritage, counts President Bush, Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and other political heavyweights among his readership. The book was on the New York Times best-seller list for four months and will be made into a movie by Walden Media, starring none other than Harrison Ford as Col. Everton Conger, the man who led the search for John Wilkes Booth.

The Quill Awards are the "people's choice" of the publishing industry. Mr. Swanson could use a little grass roots-support from those who appreciate a candid take on history. Balloting is open until Sept. 30 at www.quillsvote.com. The awards will be broadcast on NBC in October.

Wounded also-rans

News that Cleveland lost its bid to host the 2008 Republican National Convention "broke some hearts" in the strongly Democratic-leaning city yesterday, the Akron Beacon Journal reported. The chairwoman of the nine-member site-selection committee, Jo Ann Davidson, contacted Ohio Republican Party Chairman Bob Bennett personally to deliver the news that Minneapolis-St. Paul had won the convention derby.

"I'm terribly disappointed in that," Mr. Bennett said.

Things weren't much better down in Tampa, Fla., which has been "jilted" despite "good vibes" from the Republican National Committee, according to the Tampa Bay Business Journal.

"Picking Minneapolis at this time goes against information distributed by the RNC on site visits," the journal said.

Pastry faced

To drive home Democrats' argument that the Republican-approved Medicare prescription-drug program contains gaps, or "holes" in coverage, Rep. Pete Stark yesterday brought a box of doughnut holes to share with Republican colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee, reports The Washington Times' Amy Fagan.

With dramatic flair, Mr. Stark, California Democrat, complained that most of the 40 million Medicare beneficiaries "are still suffering through the doughnut hole" of coverage that Republicans created in the program.

Committee Chairman Bill Thomas, California Republican, replied that the program is designed to allow the private market to fill any gaps in drug coverage, just like the real doughnut industry figured out a way to make money from doughnut scraps. "If you allow the private sector to perform, they will," he said.

Rep. Nancy L. Johnson, Connecticut Republican, said low-income people don't have coverage gaps under the program and only a "minority" of beneficiaries do. Despite the political squabble, real doughnut holes are a bipartisan dish: Democrats and Republicans alike passed around the box and polished off the contents.

Ballot ballet

DOJ_NMG_0070533

Their hanging chad detectors will be in full working operation, no doubt. Democrats are busy lining up teams of lawyers across the country to "fight what they allege could be GOP efforts to suppress voters" on Election Day, the Columbus (Ohio) Dispatch reports.

The Democratic National Committee has set up a toll-free hot line for voters "with problems" on Nov. 7 and boasts it has volunteer lawyers poised in 18 states "to fight ballot challenges." Republicans remain unruffled.

"They're going to have an awful lot of people standing around with nothing to do," said Bill Todd, a Republican lawyer in Ohio who expects to help out his state party on the big day.

Arnold's Turnaround (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

SACRAMENTO -- The Terminator has rescued himself from political ruin by reinventing his approach to government, thus demonstrating in the most dramatic way possible the value of political independence.

Just 10 months after California voters rejected all four of the ballot initiatives he put before them and sent his personal approval ratings crashing to dangerous depths, Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is riding high, poised to win a full term come November.

Instead of the partisan assault on public employee unions and Democratic legislators (a.k.a. "girlie men") that marked his rhetoric in 2005, Schwarzenegger has negotiated agreements this year on a minimum-wage increase, higher school spending, curbing air pollution and a mega-bond sale designed to meet overdue highway, flood-control and school-construction needs.

Democratic leaders of the legislature, who a year ago were ready to cut Schwarzenegger's throat politically, now sing his praises and join him on the platform at bill-signing ceremonies, while the unions debate whether it is worthwhile to put money into the rival campaign of the struggling Democratic nominee, state Treasurer Phil Angelides.

This turnaround, likely to yield a notable Republican victory in a year of widespread GOP losses, began within a week of Schwarzenegger's humiliation in the November 2005 special election he had called in hopes of trumping the legislature and passing four initiatives that would have curbed the unions and expanded his power to run the state his way.

He immediately and publicly said that he had misjudged the electorate but had heard the voters' message: Cut the partisan rhetoric and get back to work on the real problems facing the state.

He signaled the change by hiring as his new chief of staff Susan Kennedy, a lifelong Democrat who had served as executive director of the state party and a key aide to former governor Gray Davis, the man Schwarzenegger beat in the recall election of 2003.

The other day, puffing a cigar in the smoking tent Schwarzenegger built in the courtyard of the smoke-free capitol, Kennedy talked about the new regime.

The governor still has very large goals, she said, citing the billions in construction bonds he has placed on the ballot in November. Those goals, she said, proved irresistible to the Democrats, "who salivate at the thought of spending $50 billion." But they also represent a political risk -- it will be a struggle to pass even one or two, polls show -- by a man "who is not afraid to fail, because he picks himself right up and goes back for more."

Were Schwarzenegger not that resilient and resourceful, he never would have made it out of Austria, to the top of the body-building world, to a business career, Hollywood stardom and now striking success in politics, all of which Joe Mathews describes in his excellent new political biography, "The People's Machine: Arnold Schwarzenegger and the Rise of Blockbuster Democracy."

Along the way, as one of the governor's aides told me, Schwarzenegger became an expert at marketing himself, "and to market yourself, you have to reinvent yourself."

The biggest reinvention came inside the governor's own head. A year ago, when I interviewed him on the eve of the special election, Schwarzenegger expressed burning frustration with the political, bureaucratic and interest-group barriers to his accomplishing great goals for his state.

DOJ_NMG_0070534

After the failure of his effort to bypass all those barriers through direct appeal to the voters, an old Sacramento hand was summoned for help by the governor and his wife, Maria Shriver. Schwarzenegger was told he needed to learn one thing: patience.

Amazingly to some, he has learned it, and now works comfortably, convivially, on forging compromises with the very same Democratic legislators and lobbyists he once tried to run out of town. In turn, they have responded by cooperating instead of conniving to defeat or embarrass him.

Schwarzenegger's abandonment of a partisan posture has not cost him significant support in his own party, for a simple reason. As the only major Republican elected in this Democratic capitol, he stands as the barrier to higher taxes and more stringent regulation of business.

More important, his current political posture mirrors the makeup of this complex state, where the only growing political group consists of those who decline to state a party preference and where myriad competing racial, ethnic and geographic forces require political leadership with dexterity and flexibility.

Schwarzenegger is providing his party -- and the country -- with an object lesson in how to survive and thrive in that kind of independent political environment. Others will have to learn.

Democrats Follow Clinton's Lead In Ripping Fox News (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, September 28, 2006

Nearly a week after Bill Clinton's angry appearance on "Fox News Sunday," Democrats have turned their vitriol on the Fox News Channel, in what some consider a calculated move to boost the left's enthusiasm before midterm elections.

"It fires up our base, because they're glad someone is fighting back and setting the record straight," said Democratic strategist Donna Brazile.

Since the former president's interview with Fox's Chris Wallace was taped last Friday, high-profile Democrats, including California Sen. Barbara Boxer and strategist James Carville, have joined Mr. Clinton's criticism of the cable news network. Fox's critics say the persistent questioning of Mr. Clinton's record on terrorism is indicative of what they consider a conservative bias.

"I do think this is helpful to Democrats for Clinton to go after Fox directly. It's a smart play," said Brendan Nyhan, former co-editor of the nonpartisan online watchdog Spinsanity. "Liberals are excited to see someone high-profile go after Fox News explicitly."

Politicians attacking the media is nothing new. A perceived liberal bias in the mainstream press has been a staple of Republican strategy for decades.

"A reporter has a right to ask tough questions about the issues of the day," said Michael X. Delli Carpini, dean of the Annenberg School for Communication at the University of Pennsylvania. "The real question is the larger context it's being done in. It's not an unreasonable feeling on the part of Democrats."

Mr. Nyhan says Mr. Clinton's continued popularity with Democrats helps give his criticism of Fox legitimacy.

On Tuesday, Mrs. Boxer told Fox News anchor Jane Skinner, "I hear that you agree with the [President Bush]. I am not surprised."

Meanwhile, during an appearance on MSNBC, former Democratic National Committee (DNC) Chairman Terry McAuliffe told host Tucker Carlson, "I know Chris Wallace, I have appeared on the Fox Sunday show many times with Chris Wallace. Let me be crystal clear: Roger Ailes [conservative president of Fox News] pays his paycheck. He is a tool of the Republican Party. ... He is what he is, and let's not deceive ourselves."

Many of Mr. Wallace's colleagues have defended his journalistic credentials, noting his previous stints with ABC and NBC. Nonetheless, DNC Chairman Howard Dean echoed Mr. McAuliffe's sentiment in an e-mail to supporters on Monday, in which he accused Fox of engaging in "right-wing revisionist history from the propaganda machine."

Despite all the criticism, some think Fox stands to gain as much from the controversy as the Democrats. The interview with Mr. Clinton gave "Fox News Sunday" its highest ratings since the capture of deposed Iraqi strongman Saddam Hussein in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0070535

"It's the Howard Stern effect," Mr. Nyhan said. "You have half the audience listening because they love it and half listening because they hate it."

Giuliani Comes To Clinton's Defense Over Terrorism Preparedness (BRAH)

By Matt Sedensky

The Bradenton Herald, September 28, 2006

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. - Former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani defended Bill Clinton on Wednesday over the former president's counterterrorism efforts, saying recent criticism on preventing the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks is wrong.

Political bickering over which president - Clinton or George W. Bush - missed more opportunities to prevent the attacks has been escalating since Clinton gave a combative interview on "Fox News Sunday" in which he defended his efforts to kill Osama bin Laden.

"The idea of trying to cast blame on President Clinton is just wrong for many, many reasons, not the least of which is I don't think he deserves it," Giuliani said in response to a question after an appearance with fellow Republican Charlie Crist, who is running for governor. "I don't think President Bush deserves it. The people who deserve blame for Sept. 11, I think we should remind ourselves, are the terrorists - the Islamic fanatics - who came here and killed us and want to come here again and do it."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice challenged Clinton's claim that he did more than many of his conservative critics to pursue bin Laden, and she accused the Democrat of leaving no comprehensive plan to fight al-Qaida.

Giuliani said he believed Clinton, like his successor, did everything he could with the information he was provided.

"Every American president I've known would have given his life to prevent an attack like that. That includes President Clinton, President Bush," the former mayor said outside a firehouse here. "They did the best they could with the information they had at the time."

Giuliani also said a recently declassified report that said the Iraq war had become a "cause celebre" for Islamic extremists demonstrated the need to continue the fight there.

"The jihadists very much want a victory in Iraq. They feel that if they could defeat us in Iraq they will have a great victory for terrorism," Giuliani said. "What that should do is organize us to say if they want a big victory in Iraq then we have to deprive them of that victory."

Giuliani said he was "very interested in considering" a run for president but would not make a decision until after the November election.

Is There Life After 'Macaca'? (WSJ)

WSJ letter – LATimes, 9/11 movie, September 28, 2006

In regard to Howard Dean's Sept. 22 editorial-page commentary "'Democrats Offer a New Direction'":

I thought, this is it. Here is the op-ed piece that lays out the specifics of the Democratic agenda. After all, this is the chairman of the DNC proclaiming "a new direction." Nope. Howard Dean simply bashes the Bush administration with undocumented, cherry-picked economic data and then follows it up by saying the Democrats will offer, among other things, "honesty in government" and "a defense policy that is tough and smart." That certainly started the heartbeat racing. And, oh yes -- the Democrats will also "have a jobs agenda that includes good jobs. . . ."

Until now I thought Sen. John Kerry's contributions to this page were short on substance, but Howard Dean just set the bar even lower.

Timothy O. Corkery

South Boston, Mass.

We can smell November coming just by the general political rhetoric in the air. Mr. Dean's attacks and numbers twisting is the same old game played by the party out of office. Nothing is mentioned about the fact that 70% of Americans now own their own homes, that interest rates are the lowest in our lifetime, and that unemployment is at a decades low of 4.7%. Further, we see Mr. Dean is in the pocket of the same unions that brought us $80,000-a-year useless job banks at GM and Ford. Where can I sign up for that job?

DOJ_NMG_0070536

Not that I can sit here and say the Bush camp has done everything right; they would have trouble explaining a multiplication table to a Harvard graduate. I am just troubled that as the political silly season starts it's the same old game, just with different players.

Kenneth Schnoll

Mahwah, N.J.

Mr. Dean devotes 11 paragraphs to why the Democrats don't like President Bush or the Republicans and three paragraphs of liberal pabulum with no substance nor explanation of how the Democrats will actually accomplish anything. He ends with, "We are ready to lead with a thoughtful, fiscally responsible long-term vision," but, as usual, never attempts to explain what that cherished vision is. Hello? Anybody home?

Richard A. Hansen

Carmel, Ind.

Asserting that the middle class fared better under Bill Clinton, Mr. Dean provides carefully selected data (from "Clinton's final year," Clinton's "last five years," and from 1980), implies causation by ignoring distortions (late 1990s bubble vs. 2001 recession, defense spending cuts vs. War on Terrorism), and contradicts history (the pay-as-you-go budgeting he favors leads to tax increases).

Curiously, he bemoans the increased cost of tuition. He then promises to reverse cuts in tuition aid, which would only fuel tuition inflation. And then he promises to keep good jobs in the U.S., though the abundance of good jobs is the reason people invest so in education.

Ted Riley

Washington

The only thing said by Howard Dean that could be remotely construed to be a concrete proposal is his pledge to "redeploy" U.S. troops from Iraq. Translation: "I, Howard Dean, propose that the Democrats cut and run in Iraq." And that's about as concrete as Democrats get when they try to address issues affecting their countrymen.

The rest of Mr. Dean's commentary focused on how "bad" our economy is. But with unemployment at historic lows, gas prices dropping, inflation in check, productivity high and Americans keeping more of what they earn (instead of paying it as income tax to the federal government), the U.S. economy is the envy of the world. Regarding the budget deficit: It is being steadily reduced because total tax collections are higher than ever before, thanks to a healthy economy that produces greater economic activity than ever before. So what is Mr. Dean complaining about? Does he really believe all this pre-election hot air?

Patrick Curry

Irvine, Calif.

Should Shareholders Nominate Directors?

In "SEC-Saw" (editorial page, Sept. 15), Ira M. Millstein and Harvey J. Goldschmid urge the SEC to continue its efforts to provide shareholders a voice in the director election process. It is worth clarifying that it is the director nomination part of the voting process that has been the focus of recent SEC attention, not voting itself.

Also, a point the authors use as an underpinning of their argument is that shareholders are still the providers of capital in our economy. While that is true for some companies, especially startups and IPOs, Adolf Berle recognized as early as 1932 that the primary sources of capital for the mature corporation come from retained earnings and debt, not from direct shareholder input. Shareholders in mature corporations provide liquidity in secondary markets, which is a very important function, but it isn't providing capital to the company. There may well be good arguments for greater shareholder involvement in director nominations, but their being providers of capital should not be one of them.

Finally, the authors recognize potential abuses of providing greater access to the director nomination process and suggest safeguards such as minimum holding periods. While I agree with that, I believe the potential abuses of greater access outweigh the benefits. But if the SEC does go forward with this I would suggest it consider another safeguard, one that would limit nomination authority to shareholders who do not own significant quantities of a competing corporation's stock in order to avoid, for example, major owners of Ford stock nominating directors to General Motors with all the potential conflicts of interest that would entail.

DOJ_NMG_0070537

Donald Margotta
Associate Professor of Finance
Northeastern University
Boston

L.A. Times Statement Regarding 'Path to 9/11'

On your Sept. 18 editorial page, Cyrus Nowrasteh wrote "The Path to Hysteria," in which he chronicled his experience of the scandal surrounding the television movie he wrote, "The Path to 9/11."

In his account, Mr. Nowrasteh wrote: "The L.A. Times, for one, characterized me by race, religion, ethnicity, country-of-origin and political leanings -- wrongly on four of five counts. To them I was an Iranian-American politically conservative Muslim. It is perhaps irrelevant in our brave new world of journalism that I was born in Boulder, Colo. I am not a Muslim or practitioner of any religion, nor am I a political conservative. What am I? I am, most devoutly, an American. I asked the reporter if this kind of labeling was a new policy for the paper. He had no response."

He was referring to a front-page article in the L.A. Times ("ABC Stands By Its 9/11 Story -- Almost," Sept. 9) in which Scott Collins and Tina Daunt described the writer as "a politically conservative Iranian American Muslim."

We would like to set the record straight, one point at a time.

Mr. Nowrasteh, as he wrote in The Wall Street Journal, has Iranian parents. Which would make him Iranian-American.

Mr. Nowrasteh's politics have been widely characterized as conservative in the Washington Post and elsewhere. Additionally, last October he appeared on a panel at the Liberty Film Festival that was named "Rebels With a Cause: How Conservatives Can Lead Hollywood's Next Paradigm Shift. "

In a Q&A interview with Libertas: A Forum for Conservative Thought on Film (http://www.libertyfilmfestival.com/libertas/index.php?p=462), Mr. Nowrasteh identified himself as "Islamic-American."

And finally, in his piece in the Journal, Mr. Nowrasteh also implied that he contacted the reporter about his complaints, and was ignored. This is not the case: Scott Collins spoke on the phone with Mr. Nowrasteh after the article came out.

AIDS Bill Is Dilemma For Clinton (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, September 28, 2006

An AIDS funding bill that has stalled on the Senate floor has put Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) in a difficult position — forcing her to choose between the interests of her home state and those of battleground states in the 2008 presidential election.

Elected officials and AIDS activists from Iowa, South Carolina, and Ohio are urging senators to pass the Ryan White Comprehensive AIDS Resources Emergency Act, which would increase their state's funding for people infected with HIV, the virus that causes AIDS.

A group of activists and officials are focusing their efforts on Clinton because she has the highest profile among the bill's opponents. They may also be calculating that they have most leverage with her because she is expected to run for president.

Iowa and South Carolina will host two of the earliest contests of the 2008 Democratic presidential primary, and Ohio is expected to be a crucial battleground.

The bill, also known as the Ryan White Care Act, reauthorizes federal funding to fight AIDS. It would steer money away from major urban areas in New York, New Jersey and California to smaller, more rural states that have seen a dramatic increase in HIV infections in recent years.

The bill, which was originally passed in 1990, expires at the end of this week, the end of the 2006 fiscal year. Without a reauthorization, federal funding will continue at current levels.

Clinton and her New York colleague, Sen. Charles Schumer (D), outlined their objections to the new funding formula in a recent letter to Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-N.Y.).

"New York State stands to lose more than $78 million in Ryan White Title II funds over four years," they wrote. "Without modifications to address our concerns, we stand united on behalf of New Yorkers living with HIV/AIDS in objecting to this bill."

DOJ_NMG_0070538

Clinton and Schumer also wrote that the bill would reduces grants to Buffalo and Albany and could cost New York City as much as $17 million in lost federal funds next year. They stated that they support providing funds needed by other areas of the country, but not at the cost of established programs in their state.

That position puts Clinton at odds with Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D), who urged for AIDS funding to be restructured in a letter to Sens. Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.), the chairman of the Senate health committee, and Edward Kennedy (Mass.), the panel's ranking Democrat.

"Iowa is one of many rural states that receive no Title I funding at all," Vilsack wrote. "[M]any states, including Iowa, have been forced to institute waiting lists for treatment or other cost-containment measures. This is unacceptable. The CARE Act should fully fund all 50 states' [AIDS Drug Assistance Programs]."

If Vilsack does not run for president himself, he could help one of the Democratic presidential contenders gain an edge in the January 2008 Iowa Caucuses. Even if he does run, Vilsack would still be influential in the outcome of the contest.

Enzi attempted and failed to get agreement to bring up the bill on the Senate floor Tuesday and will try again, said an aide.

Three prominent Democratic public officials from Ohio, a state that narrowly decided the 2004 presidential race, have pressured Clinton recently.

Donald Plusquellic, mayor of Akron, Rhine McLin, mayor of Dayton, and Mark Mallory, mayor of Cincinnati, have each written letters to Clinton since mid-August urging her to support the revised formulas in the reauthorization bill.

"The current act disproportionately rewards larger cities at the expense of medium sized cities such as Cincinnati," wrote Mallory. "This is especially important in states like Ohio with multiple urban centers. The reformed act would go a long way to address these funding deficiencies and greatly increase funding for many medium sized cities, including a potential increase of $79,000 to Cincinnati."

McLin highlighted the effect on African Americans, a substantial Democratic constituency in Ohio as well as in South Carolina.

"Here in Ohio, African Americans were 45 percent of new AIDS cases in 2004, according to the Centers for Disease Control. Nationally, African Americans were 48 percent of new AIDS cases that year, while in some Southern states the percentage reaches as high as 75 percent," wrote McLin.

Clinton is one of a small group of Democrats holding up the bill, said Craig Orfield, a spokesman for Enzi. He said that in addition to Clinton and Schumer, New Jersey Sens. Frank Lautenberg (D), Robert Menendez (D) and Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) are thought to oppose the bill.

Dr. Kent Stock, an infectious disease physician from Charleston, South Carolina, who has helped lobby local state legislators on the economic costs of not stopping the spread of HIV, said Clinton has emerged as the most prominent opponent in the eyes of local AIDS activists.

"Hillary has taken a lot of heat because a lot of people are saying that it's Hillary who's putting her foot down on this act. In reality, it's not just Hillary.

"She has become the figurehead. There are a lot of people saying that Hillary has the ability to move it forward or hold it up in Congress…She's protecting her turf as any good senator would do."

But Clinton's position may require her to answer tough questions if she campaigns in the South Carolina next year or in early 2008.

"I think its going to hurt persons with HIV first and foremost where African Americans in my state represent 73 percent of the people affected," said Dr. Bambi Gaddist, executive director of the South Carolina HIV/AIDS Council.

African Americans are estimated to make up a third or more of the Democratic electorate in the state.

State Rep. Joe Neal, an African-American Democrat from South Carolina, said about 300 people in his state diagnosed with HIV are on a waiting list to receive medical treatment. Passage of the Ryan White Care bill would eliminate the list, he said.

"The AIDS crisis is now shifting to the south fairly dramatically," said Neal, who has advocated for more funds. "I understand that the political reality that the senator faces in protecting her own state and her interest but this is a larger interest than just New York and I hope she would think about it in that context."

Clinton's staff did not respond to several requests for comment.

DOJ_NMG_0070539

Bill Clinton's 60th Birthday Benefit Blowout (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

Baby boomer and former president Bill Clinton is laying plans to celebrate his 60th birthday in grand style with a charitable fundraising extravaganza in New York late next month that will include an invitation-only concert by the Rolling Stones and contributor packages that run to $500,000 and higher.

Clinton's daughter, Chelsea, who has generally avoided high-profile participation in her parents' political and philanthropic activities, is serving as co-host of the three-day party. She will host a Saturday brunch on a weekend that also features a golf tournament at the Bayonne (N.J.) Golf Club, multiple receptions and a dinner at the American Museum of Natural History with the former president, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Chelsea.

"My mother and I are planning a weekend of events to commemorate his [Clinton's] 60th birthday," Chelsea Clinton writes in the invitation. "I know that he would want you to share this milestone -- so I hope you can join us in New York City this October 27th through the 29th."

The 2,100 invitations began arriving this week. Weekend packages start at $60,000 (Hint: $1,000 for every year of Clinton's age). Next is the "Vice Chair Package," for those who contribute $100,000 or raise $250,000. Those who pledge $500,000 or more will receive the "Birthday Chair Package," which includes the "Backstage Pass" dinner and photo with Clinton and platinum seating at the Saturday dinner and the Stones concert.

The Rolling Stones will perform at the Beacon Theater, an art deco landmark on upper Broadway that seats about 3,000 people. According to the invitation, the concert will be taped for an upcoming Martin Scorsese movie about the band. Organizers of the event would not say whether the Stones will be paid for their appearance.

Space in the theater is expected to be at a premium, and members of the extended Clinton network who may not be able to afford the hefty price of admission for the weekend events already are maneuvering to find a way into the concert.

"It's a birthday party," Clinton spokesman Jay Carson said yesterday. "It's the New York birthday celebration for President Clinton."

Clinton turned 60 in August but organizers delayed the birthday fundraising event until late October to avoid any complaints from other Democrats that solicitation of money for the former president's foundation would soak up money that could otherwise be used to try to win back the House and Senate in November.

The proceeds will go to the William J. Clinton Foundation, the umbrella organization that oversees the Clinton HIV-AIDS initiative, the Clinton Global Initiative and several other programs launched by the former president since he left office almost six years ago.

Clinton collected more than $7 billion in commitments to his Global Initiative project last week in New York. His foundation staged an event similar to the planned October fundraiser in Toronto recently and collected approximately $20 million. Organizers won't put a figure on what they expect to raise in New York next month but are anticipating a significantly larger take than the Canadian event generated.

Former Democratic National Committee chairman Terry McAuliffe is listed as the co-host with Chelsea Clinton.

The celebration of all things Clinton will come less than two weeks before Hillary Clinton is expected to cruise to reelection, after which she will turn her attention to a possible 2008 presidential campaign.

She is widely expected to seek the presidency, although her husband and other advisers say she will not make a final decision until the 2006 campaign is over. No doubt the weekend celebration will prompt further speculation that she already has decided.

Twin Cities To Host 2008 GOP Convention (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, September 28, 2006

Republicans will hold their 2008 presidential convention in the Twin Cities of Minneapolis-St. Paul, choosing a location in the politically pivotal Midwest.

DOJ_NMG_0070540

Party and state officials announced the selection Wednesday. The convention is slated for Sept. 1-4, 2008.

"This is fantastic news," Republican Gov. Tim Pawlenty said. "We're very, very pleased."

Losing out were New York City, Cleveland and a joint bid from Tampa and St. Petersburg, Fla., other cities that had sought the convention.

The four-day event will be held at the Xcel Energy Center in St. Paul, Minn., a concert venue and the home of the National Hockey League's Minnesota Wild.

Democrats also had been considering holding their convention in the Twin Cities, but the Republican announcement left Democrats with two competing cities to choose from _ New York and Denver.

The Republican National Committee will vote in January to affirm the decision of the party's site selection committee. GOP officials say approval is assured.

By picking the Twin Cities for 2008, the GOP will ensure plenty of news coverage in media markets in Minnesota, Wisconsin and Iowa _ all battleground states in the 2004 election and ones expected to be competitive in the next presidential race.

"The heartland of America," said Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn. "Whoever wins those states is going to be the next president of the United States."

Minnesota had been seen by some as an unlikely host, with just 10 electoral votes and the nation's longest streak of voting for Democratic presidential candidates.

In 2004, Democrat John Kerry won the state 51 percent to 48 percent. The last Republican to win a presidential race in the state was Richard Nixon in 1972 and the last national convention happened in when the GOP backed President Benjamin Harrison in his unsuccessful re-election bid.

Minnesota's political landscape, however, has shifted right in recent years. It has become less of a Democratic bastion and more of a swing- voting state, a change attributed in part to population growth in the Twin Cities suburbs.

The state was a hard-fought battleground in the 2004 and 2000 presidential elections, and in 2002, Minnesota elected Pawlenty, a Republican, as governor and Coleman as senator.

"Our stereotype is that we're cold and liberal and Democratic, and we're still cold," said Steven Schier, a political scientist at Carleton College in Northfield, Minn.

In the 2004 general election, 38 percent of Minnesota voters identified themselves as Democrats, while 35 percent called themselves Republicans, according to exit poll data. Twenty-seven percent identified as independents or "something else."

With the convention, the GOP hopes to court voters in a region Republican and Democratic strategists alike say will play a critical role in winning the White House in 2008. The GOP held its last convention in New York City, a Democratic stronghold where GOP delegates nominated President Bush for a second term.

Democrats, who last met in Boston, plan to hold their convention Aug. 25-28, and will announce a location later this fall. A spokesman said 11 sites expressed interest in having the party's convention, but only four completed the proposals. New Orleans later withdrew its bid, leaving Denver, New York City and Minneapolis-St. Paul.

But Minneapolis Mayor R.T. Rybak has said that because of timing and logistics, the Twin Cities can't host both conventions. The two conventions are scheduled for consecutive weeks.

Democrats said the competition for their convention now is between two cities.

"The DNC was thrilled to have three great American cities submit strong bids for the 2008 Democratic National Convention. We are looking forward to working with Denver and New York as we make our final decision," said Stacie Paxton, a Democratic party spokeswoman.

Denver's chances, however, may be hampered by their lack of unionized hotel workers. Democrats acknowledge that labor, a strong party constituency, could object to a site that didn't have unionized hotels.

The Twin Cities are the two largest in the state with a combined population of more than 650,000, and the metropolitan region straddles the Mississippi River.

DOJ_NMG_0070541

In Minnesota, the effort to woo a national political convention has been a bipartisan affair, with the two big-city mayors, both Democrats, joining forces with top Republicans. They argued that Minnesota is a critical part of an Upper Midwest region that combined offers 27 electoral votes.

The GOP convention will coincide with the Minnesota State Fair, and state officials have predicted a national political convention would boost the Twin Cities economy by about $150 million.

____

Associated Press Writers Philip Elliott and Fred Frommer in Washington and Martiga Lohn in St. Paul, Minn., contributed to this report.

____

Republican National Committee: http://www.rnc.org

Xcel Energy Center: http://www.xcelenergycenter.com

Copyright 2006 The Associated Press. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed.

NEWS WEB

BREITBART FINANCE

Symbol Lookup

©2006 BREITBART.COM, LLC.

ALL RIGHTS RESERVED.

Advertise | Contact Us | Design by Marc Atlan

Republicans Pick Twin Cities For 2008 Presidential Convention (MCT)

By Rob Hotakainen And Kevin Diaz

McClatchy Newspapers, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - Minnesota's emergence as a presidential battleground state paid off Wednesday when the Republican Party announced that it had chosen Minneapolis and St. Paul to host its 2008 National Convention.

The Twin Cities beat three other finalists: New York, Cleveland and Tampa, Fla. It will be the first time the Twin Cities have hosted a national convention since 1892, when Republicans nominated Benjamin Harrison for president.

The convention is scheduled for Sept. 1-4, 2008, at the Xcel Energy Center in St. Paul, a week after Democrats nominate their candidate. The Twin Cities also had been competing against New York and Denver to host the Democratic convention, but that bid is now dead.

"We want to congratulate the Twin Cities. ... We are looking forward to working with Denver and New York as we make our final decision," said Stacie Paxton, a spokeswoman for the Democratic National Committee.

Republican National Committee co-chairwoman Jo Ann Davidson said the GOP chose the Twin Cities in a voice vote of the nine-member selection committee. She declined to disclose the final tally but said "it was not unanimous." The deciding factor, she said, wasn't politics, but rather logistics such as arenas, work space, transportation, security and the number of hotel rooms.

"This was a strictly business decision on our part," she said. "The committee decided that Minneapolis was the best choice."

RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman credited the Twin Cities' bipartisan host committee, but particularly Republican Sen. Norm Coleman, the former St. Paul mayor, who faces his first re-election bid in 2008.

"The house that Norm built is likely to be the place where the next president of the United States is introduced to the American people," Mehlman said.

Coleman said he was thrilled by the decision, saying it would "showcase Minnesota to a worldwide audience."

"When we built the Xcel Energy Center, we dreamed of bringing hockey back to Minnesota, but never the Super Bowl of politics," he said.

The GOP's decision, expected to be ratified in January by the party's national committee, drew an angry response from some Democrats, who expected their national convention to be in the Twin Cities.

Rick Stafford, a member of the executive committee of the Democratic National Committee from Minneapolis, said negotiations set for next week "would have pretty much cemented the deal." He said the GOP's decision showed that Republicans "cannot keep their honor in the site-selection process." He said as the non-incumbent party, the Democrats should have chosen their site first in keeping with tradition.

"It just follows their whole scorched-earth ... philosophy that's running true to form this year," said Stafford, adding that "all the signals" indicated that Republicans were going to allow Democrats to choose their site first. He speculated that word got out that Democrats wanted the Twin Cities and that local Republicans pressured the RNC to act quickly if it wanted to nail down the Twin Cities as its site.

"I'm kind of angry about it," Stafford said. "I mean, all is fair in love and war and politics, but I think it sets a tone: Are we going to go through this every four years now, this kind of game?"

Republicans rejected Stafford's arguments, noting that they picked first when they took their convention to New York in 2004.

"Quite frankly, that's nonsense," Davidson said. "I have no idea what tradition they're discussing."

In Minnesota, city officials seemed inclined to put politics aside in favor of local boosterism.

"What this confirms to us is that the Twin Cities can compete with any region in the country, any city in the country, " said St. Paul Mayor Chris Coleman, a Democrat. "We're going to host this convention in grand scale."

Civic boosters say landing a national political convention could bring 20,000 people and $150 million to the Twin Cities metro area. That will include thousands of journalists and media organizations from around the world. Some 95 hotels in Bloomington, Minneapolis and St. Paul are expected to hold an estimated 17,000 delegates, donors and staff.

Analysts said the GOP's choice will allow the party to capitalize on major media markets in Minnesota, Wisconsin and Iowa, three states that figured prominently in the 2004 election.

"The Midwest has become strategic ground," said David Schultz, who teaches politics at the Hamline University in St. Paul. "Bring the convention here, get the faithful excited and spotlight that you care about the Midwest and farmers."

Schultz said it's also a "symbolic black eye" to Minnesota Democrats trying to keep alive the spirit of Hubert Humphrey and Paul Wellstone.

"It's a purple state now, and Republicans increasingly view this as a winnable state," he said.

GOP Picks Minnesota For 2008 Convention (USAT)

By John Bacon And Sarah Elkins

USA Today, September 28, 2006

Republicans will hold their 2008 national convention in the Twin Cities of Minneapolis-St. Paul, party and state officials said Wednesday. The convention is scheduled for Sept. 1-4. Losing out were New York City, Cleveland and Tampa-St. Petersburg. The event will be held at the Xcel Energy Center in St. Paul, home of the National Hockey League's Minnesota Wild. Democrats also had been considering the Twin Cities. The announcement left Democrats with two competing cities to choose from: New York and Denver. By picking the Twin Cities, the GOP will ensure plenty of news coverage in Minnesota, Wisconsin and Iowa, all of which were close in the 2004 election, said Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn. “Whoever wins those states is going to be the next president of the United States.”

Obama rallies for Md. Senate candidate

Sen. Barack Obama, D- Ill., traveled to College Park, Md., to endorse the Democratic Senate bid of Rep. Ben Cardin. Cardin's opponent, Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, would join Obama as the only black senators if elected. Cardin, who is white, defeated former NAACP head Kweisi Mfume for the nomination. A political analyst who tracks black voting behavior, David Bositis of the Washington-based Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies, said Cardin is “probably taking special care” to reach out to black voters.

Snow a headliner for GOP fundraising

DOJ_NMG_0070543

White House spokesman Tony Snow is in high demand on the Republican fundraising circuit. Snow will speak at several fundraisers before the Nov. 7 elections. The former TV and radio host said the White House political office contacted him and said GOP groups wanted him as a speaker. Calling such activity "unplowed ground," Snow said he checked with the White House counsel's office before agreeing. He has spoken in Pennsylvania and has dates with Republicans from Minnesota, Ohio and Kentucky. Snow said he will be promoting President Bush's policies, not "railing against Democrats." — David Jackson

Lamont cuts $750K check to campaign

Connecticut Democratic Senate nominee Ned Lamont directed $750,000 toward his campaign this week. Lamont, who spent almost $4 million of his own money defeating Sen. Joe Lieberman in the primary, has written checks totaling $2.25 million for the general election. Lamont estimates his net worth at $90 million to $300 million. Lieberman is running as an independent in the fall campaign.

GOP To Go To Minnesota (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, September 28, 2006

Republicans chose the Twin Cities in Minnesota over Cleveland, Tampa, Fla., and New York as the site for their 2008 presidential nominating convention.

The convention proper will be held in Xcel Energy Center in St. Paul, where the Minnesota Wild National Hockey League team plays, but Minnesota officials said the decision holds broad economic impact for the region. The convention could bring in as much as $150 million, officials said.

Democrats were also considering holding their convention in 2008 in the Twin Cities. But the Democratic mayors of St. Paul and Minneapolis expressed no regret that their cities would host the showcase event for the rival party.

"Republicans have more money than Democrats," said St. Paul Mayor Chris Coleman.

The Twin Cities last hosted a national political convention in 1892, when Republicans nominated Benjamin Harrison for president.

Minnesota traditionally votes for the Democratic candidate for president, but the margin has narrowed in recent years.

G.O.P. Picks Twin Cities As '08 Site Of Convention (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 27 — Republican officials announced Wednesday that they had chosen Minneapolis and St. Paul as the site of the party's 2008 presidential nominating convention.

It is the first time in nearly three decades that they have selected a site in the Midwest, which has become increasingly contested by both parties.

The decision prompted Democrats to drop their consideration of the Twin Cities, leaving them to choose between just two remaining contenders — Denver and New York City, where Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg is making a forceful push. Democratic officials are expected to make their decision within several weeks.

Republicans insisted their choice had not been politically driven. But in choosing Minneapolis and St. Paul over three other bidders — Tampa, Cleveland and New York, where President Bush had his re-election convention in 2004 — the party guaranteed itself widespread news media attention in three adjoining swing states, Minnesota, Iowa and Wisconsin. The convention is scheduled for Sept. 1-4, 2008.

In a nod to Senator Norm Coleman, Republican of Minnesota, who championed the proposal put forward by his home state, the Republican National Committee chairman, Ken Mehlman, said: "The house that Norm built is likely to be the place where the next president of the United States is introduced to the American people."

The site selection is often a delicate dance for the two parties, who frequently consider some of the same cities and compete for attention at every step of the planning process. In making their announcement on Wednesday, Republican officials beat Democrats in laying claim to Minneapolis, which submitted proposals to both parties. Minnesota narrowly voted for Democratic presidential contenders in both 2000 and 2004, but was considered a target state in both races.

DOJ_NMG_0070544

While Democratic officials originally had four cities to choose from, an early contestant, New Orleans, took itself out of the running when it became clear that its hurricane damage would not be repaired in time.

With Minneapolis out of contention, Democrats are now weighing whether Denver — an appealing Western spot in an increasingly volatile state — has enough union-run hotels to play host to their convention, which is sometimes larger than that of the Republicans. New York City has cleared the logistical bar for having the convention, officials said, but as a widely Democratic state, New York holds less political appeal than Colorado. And a potential Democratic presidential candidate, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, represents New York.

The last time Republican officials headed to the Midwest for a convention was 1980, when Ronald Reagan was nominated in Detroit. Democrats, who held their last conventions in Boston and Los Angeles, held their last middle-of-the-country convention in Chicago in 1996.

With Eye On Midwest In '08, GOP Picks Twin Cities For Convention (WP)

By Peter Slevin And Dan Balz

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

CHICAGO, Sept. 27 -- The Twin Cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul will host the 2008 Republican National Convention, the GOP announced Wednesday in an early signal of the likely significance of the Midwest in the next presidential election.

Moving away from the coasts for the first time in 16 years -- and choosing the Twin Cities for the first time since 1892 -- the Republicans also preempted the Democrats, who had narrowed their own convention selection to three sites, including Minneapolis-St. Paul.

The Democrats will now choose between New York and Denver, a spokeswoman said.

Steven Schier, a prominent Minnesota political commentator on the faculty of Carleton College, said the timing and the tactics suggest that the national Republican Party hopes to help its Minnesota candidates this year and appeal to voters in a swath of battleground states in 2008.

"This should not be considered just a Minnesota choice," he said. "You've got three swing states: Minnesota, Wisconsin and Iowa. We're very much a battleground state. We were in '04 and we will be in '08. Same in Wisconsin, same in Iowa."

In 2004, President Bush squeaked past Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) in Iowa by 10,000 votes, while Kerry finished 11,000 votes ahead of Bush in neighboring Wisconsin. Kerry beat Bush in Minnesota by 100,000 votes out of 3 million cast. Even so, that Minnesota was competitive at all was a sign of changing times in a state that for decades was dominated by nationally prominent Democrats such as Hubert H. Humphrey, Eugene McCarthy and Walter F. Mondale.

Parties tend to consider convention locations a symbol, although the effect is often minimal. In 1980, the last time the Republicans chose the Midwest, delegates convened in Detroit to highlight Ronald Reagan's determination to win blue-collar votes, a successful strategy.

The GOP chose Philadelphia in 2000, hoping to boost Bush's chances in a tightly contested state, but he lost there in 2000 and 2004.

This time around, Republicans had narrowed the choice to the Twin Cities or Tampa after ruling out Cleveland. With memories of Hurricane Katrina still fresh, Florida's chances were hurt by the fact that the Sept. 1-4 convention comes in the heart of storm season.

The Democrats, who expect to choose a host city by the end of the year, will focus on two that have potentially serious liabilities, said one Democrat familiar with the search.

New York's principal drawback is its cost, while Denver's primary problem centers on its trade union status.

Although the Democrats see the Rocky Mountain West as an area of potential electoral growth, Denver has labor problems, including a shortage of union hotels. That could make it difficult for a party that relies heavily on union campaign money and muscle to justify choosing the Mile-High City as its host.

Officials from the party and the city are working to see if these obstacles can be overcome.

DOJ_NMG_0070545

As the political leadership of Minnesota and the Twin Cities celebrated their victory on Wednesday, St. Paul Mayor Chris Coleman (D) said he thinks the Democrats would have chosen the Twin Cities if Republicans hadn't. "The good news about the Republicans choosing us instead of the Democrats," Coleman joked, "is they have more money."

Balz reported from Washington.

GOP Will Convene In Battleground (RC)

By Tory Newmyer And Jamie Weinstein

Roll Call, September 28, 2006

The GOP has chosen the Twin Cities of Minneapolis-St. Paul for its 2008 presidential convention, Republicans announced Wednesday.

In choosing the Gopher State's metropolitan center, the party passed over New York City, Cleveland, and a joint bid from Tampa and St. Petersburg, Fla., and signaled that the upper Midwest could be a focus of Republican efforts to hold the White House in two years.

The selection pre-empts Democrats, who also were considering Minneapolis-St. Paul for their convention. Though the parties occasionally have held their conventions in the same city, Democratic Party rules now dictate that they hold their confab in a separate location, a DNC official said.

That means Democrats now must choose between the remaining two finalists, New York and Denver. That decision is expected in coming weeks. The two conventions are scheduled to be held within days of each other.

In a conference call, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said, "The fact is [Minneapolis] is likely to be the place the next president of the United States is introduced to the American people."

Political observers immediately began to speculate about the selection's meaning for Republican strategy during the next presidential campaign.

Minnesota, with a modest 10 electoral votes, hasn't backed a GOP presidential candidate since Richard Nixon in 1972. But margins in the state have narrowed, and it was a key battleground in the 2004 election, with Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) carrying it by just 3 points.

By convening in Minnesota, Republicans also would be able to reach media markets in Iowa and Wisconsin, several observers noted.

"I think it's the new Minnwisiowa of politics," said Sarah Janecek of the online newsletter Politics in Minnesota.

Blois Olson, of the same publication, said Republicans "think they can win Minnesota. They want to show their strength here."

Minnesota lawmakers from both parties welcomed the news as well as the expected economic boon it promises. But they were divided about the impact the convention is likely to have on regional politics.

Republican Rep. John Kline said the event will help throw the region into play. "It's going to help bring attention to a very important part of the country," he said.

But retiring Democratic Rep. Martin Sabo predicted that any Republican candidate will have a hard time in the state.

"I think the Bush legacy will have an impact on the 2008 elections," he said. "He's not very popular in Minnesota."

Lobbyist David Norcross, a partner at Blank Rome, was one of eight members on the RNC's site selection committee. He said the committee took its vote Wednesday morning at the RNC's offices.

Norcross said the region's Xcel Energy Center, where the main festivities will be held, stood out as a key factor in the decision. "It is state of the art," said Norcross, who served as chairman of the committee on arrangements for the Republican National Convention in 2004 in New York City.

"The media work space is really really spectacular. It's all very impressive." Norcross said now Republicans will "begin to negotiate the finer points" of holding the convention in the Twin Cities.

Though the Democrats might have been a good fit with the Twin Cities, they "would have presented a serious logistical problem because they have many more delegates than the Republicans do," said Carleton College professor Steven Schier.

DOJ_NMG_0070546

"There would have been a real shortage of hotel rooms. They would have had to put people in Rochester, two hours south, and bused them in."

In the meantime, the selection of the Twin Cities puts extra pressure on Republican candidates to perform well in the state this fall, so as not to be embarrassed going into 2008.

GOP Rep. Mark Kennedy, who's running for a Senate seat being vacated by Democrat Mark Dayton, is widely thought to be trailing Democrat Amy Klobuchar by double digits even though he began the race as a highly touted recruit. Republican Gov. Tim Pawlenty appears to have a modest lead over Democrat Mike Hatch in his bid for a second term, while two GOP-held House seats, one held by Gil Gutknecht and the one being vacated by Kennedy, are considered competitive. Democrats also have high hopes of flipping the GOP-held state House.

In 2008, Sen. Norm Coleman will be up for re-election. Comedian and author Al Franken, a liberal Democrat, has sent strong signals about his interest in running for the seat. Such a matchup would be a marquee race.

RNC Picks Twin Cities For 2008 (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, September 28, 2006

Minnesota's Twin Cities, Minneapolis and St. Paul, will host the Republican Party's 2008 nominating convention from Sept. 1 to Sept. 4, Ken Mehlman, the party's national chairman said yesterday.

The RNC's site-election committee rejected elaborate bids from New York -- the site of the highly successful 2004 Republican convention and secret favorite of many Republican officials and operatives -- as well as from Cleveland and a joint bid from Tampa and St. Petersburg, Fla.

Party leaders yesterday called their choice a strategically important decision.

"Republicans will choose their presidential nominee in the heart of the heartland -- the Twin Cities will host the Republican National Convention, which says Republicans care about the Midwest," Sen. Norm Coleman, Minnesota Republican, told The Washington Times.

"Whoever takes my state and two of the other states next to us that the Democrats won last time will be the next president," said Mr. Coleman, a Republican who defeated former Vice President Walter Mondale in 2002 after incumbent Sen. Paul Wellstone died in a plane crash.

Mr. Coleman noted the Twin Cities media markets extend into not only Minnesota, but Wisconsin and Iowa and part of Illinois, prime battlegrounds last time. Iowa narrowly went Republican in 2004, but Minnesota, which hasn't backed a Republican presidential candidate since Richard M. Nixon in 1972, preferred Democrat John Kerry by 3.5 percentage points.

President Bush also lost the other big Midwestern states last time. Illinois's 21 electoral votes went to Mr. Kerry, as did Michigan's 17 electoral votes and Wisconsin's 10, although Mr. Kerry carried that state by less than one percentage point

"You need a broad-based community to make this [convention] work, and we have Democratic mayors in Minneapolis and St. Paul and a Republican governor and a Republican senator," Mr. Coleman said.

The decision to go with Minnesota also showcases one of the Republican Party's rising young conservative stars, Gov. Tim Pawlenty, 45, who was going to run for the Senate in 2002 until Vice President Dick Cheney persuaded him to run for governor instead so that Mr. Coleman could make his run against Mr. Wellstone without a primary fight.

All smiles yesterday, Mr. Pawlenty, a favorite of Mr. Mehlman's for vice president in 2008, called the choice of the Twin Cities "fantastic." Mr. Coleman used the same word to describe the convention accommodations, at the Xcel Energy Center in St. Paul.

The Democratic National Committee momentarily put partisanship aside to "congratulate the Twin Cities," which the Democrats had also been considering.

DNC spokeswoman Stacie Paxton said her committee "was thrilled to have three great American cities submit strong bids for the 2008 Democratic National Convention. We are looking forward to working with Denver and New York as we make our final decision. The Twin Cities is a great community and this announcement is good news for the cities."

Scientists Form Group To Support Science-Friendly Candidates (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0070547

By Cornelia Dean

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

Several prominent scientists said yesterday that they had formed an organization dedicated to electing politicians "who respect evidence and understand the importance of using scientific and engineering advice in making public policy."

Organizers of the group, Scientists and Engineers for America, said it would be nonpartisan, but in interviews several said Bush administration science policies had led them to act. The issues they cited included the administration's position on climate change, its restrictions on stem cell research and delays in authorizing the over-the-counter sale of emergency contraception.

In a statement posted on its Web site (www.sefora.org), the group said scientists and engineers had an obligation "to enter the political debate when the nation's leaders systematically ignore scientific evidence and analysis, put ideological interest ahead of scientific truths, suppress valid scientific evidence and harass and threaten scientists for speaking honestly about their research."

The group's organizers include John H. Gibbons and Neal Lane, who were science advisers in the Clinton administration, the Nobel laureates Peter Agre and Alfred Gilman, and Susan F. Wood, who resigned from the Food and Drug Administration last year to protest the agency's delay in approving over-the-counter sales of the so-called Plan B emergency contraception.

"The issues we are talking about happen to be issues in which the administration's record is quite poor," Dr. Lane said. But he said the goal was to protect "the integrity of science" so that Americans could have confidence in the government's science-based decisions.

Mike Brown, the group's executive director, said it would be a 527 organization under tax laws, meaning that it could be involved in electoral politics, and that contributions to the group would not be tax deductible. He said it would focus its resources — Internet advertising, speakers and other events — on races in which science issues play a part.

The group is looking at the Senate race in Virginia between George Allen, the incumbent Republican, and James Webb, a Democrat; a stem cell ballot issue in Missouri; the question of intelligent design in Ohio; and Congressional races in Washington State, Mr. Brown said.

In what it described as a Bill of Rights for scientists and engineers, the group said that researchers who receive federal funds should be free to discuss their work publicly, and that appointments to federal scientific advisory committees should be based on scientific qualifications, not political beliefs. It said the government should not support science education programs that "include concepts that are derived from ideology," an apparent reference to creationism and its ideological cousin, intelligent design.

And it said the government should not publish false or misleading scientific information, something Dr. Wood said occurred when the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention briefly posted an item on its Web site suggesting that abortion was linked to breast cancer.

Checkout For An Undemocratic Checkoff (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

Unalloyed good news is rare, so rejoice: The foremost achievement of the political speech regulators -- a.k.a. campaign finance "reformers" -- is collapsing. Taxpayer financing of presidential campaigns, which was in parlous condition in 2004, will die in 2008.

In 2000 and 2004 George W. Bush declined public funding -- and its accompanying restrictions on raising and spending money -- for the primaries, as did Howard Dean and John Kerry in 2004. In 2004 candidates accepting taxpayer funding were restricted to spending $45 million before the conventions. Bush and Kerry raised $269.6 million and $234.6 million, respectively, before the conventions. Any candidate who accepts public funding in the 2008 primaries will be considered second-tier. And almost certainly neither party's nominee will accept public funding for the fall campaign.

Taxpayer funding, enacted in 1974, empowered taxpayers to direct, by a checkoff on their income tax forms, that $1 of their tax bill be used to fund presidential campaigns. Even though the checkoff did not increase anyone's tax bill, participation peaked in 1981 at 28.7 percent -- a landslide "vote" of 71.3 percent against it. In 1993 Congress increased the checkoff's value to $3, thereby enabling fewer people to divert more money from the government's pool of revenue collected from everyone, including the 90 percent of taxpayers who now decline to participate.

DOJ_NMG_0070548

It is delicious that the McCain-Feingold law, the reformers' most recent handiwork, is helping kill taxpayer financing of presidential campaigns. Before McCain-Feingold, limits on contributions of private money -- set in 1974 and not indexed for inflation -- became steadily more restrictive, so candidates accepted public funding. But McCain-Feingold, by doubling the permissible size of campaign contributions, made it easier for candidates to raise sums far larger than taxpayer funding provides.

Public funding was supposed to increase voter turnout by decreasing the cynicism supposedly caused by privately financed politics. But Bradley Smith, former chairman of the Federal Election Commission, notes that turnout did not surge until 2004. Then, the dramatic increase correlated with a surge of private money, much of it devoted to voter turnout efforts. Reformers considered this surge evidence of increasing corruption and, of course, evidence of the need for more regulation of speech.

John Samples of the Cato Institute, in his new book, "The Fallacy of Campaign Finance Reform," demolishes the argument that taxpayer funding has increased voters' choices by increasing the number of presidential candidates. The seven elections before 1976 had an average of 10.7 candidates who received at least 1 percent of the votes in the two major parties' primaries. Since taxpayer funding was enacted, the average has been 7.8 candidates. In the 15 elections since 1945, the two most successful independent candidates -- George Wallace in 1968 and Ross Perot in 1992 -- did not use government funds. Taxpayer financing, which liberals love, did help Ralph Nader win 2.7 percent of the 2000 vote, including 97,488 Florida votes that cost the liberals' candidate, Al Gore, the presidency.

Does anyone argue that the $1.3 billion in tax dollars given to candidates since 1976 has purchased more elevated campaigns? About 10 percent of public funding pays for the two parties' conventions -- vacuous festivities for a few thousand activists. Major broadcast organizations no longer cover conventions extensively because the public, which considers them unimportant, will not watch.

Sen. Mitch McConnell rightly says that taxpayer funding of politics has been the subject of the largest, most sustained and most accurate polling in American history. The polling occurs every year when 90 percent of taxpayers refuse to participate. Could it be that Americans recoil from funding political advocacy with which they disagree -- Republicans funding Democrats, Democrats funding Republicans, everyone funding fringe candidates such as the felon Lyndon LaRouche, who got infusions of taxpayers' money for a campaign he ran while in jail for fraud and conspiracy?

Nevertheless, reformers want to again enlarge the value of the checkoff -- the lever by which a small minority spends general tax revenue against the wishes of a vast majority. The reformers' ultimate objective is to make government the sole source of money for all federal elections. Then government money, supplied in much smaller amounts than voluntary contributions provide, would fund the (much reduced) amount of political speech about government that the government deems appropriate.

Reformers desperate to resuscitate taxpayer funding cite the supposedly scandalous fact that each party's 2008 presidential campaign may spend $500 million. If so, Americans volunteering to fund the dissemination of speech about candidates for the nation's most consequential office will contribute $1 billion, which is about half the sum they spend annually on Easter candy. Some scandal.

The Road To Inefficiency (WP)

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

IT BEGAN WITH an eagle-eyed auditor who, glancing at a garage maintained by Fairfax County's government for its huge fleet of official cars, noticed that too many of them spent their days parked, unused and apparently unneeded. The auditor rightly wondered whether the county bureaucracy -- 11,500 strong -- really warranted one vehicle per three employees. So it seemed perfectly rational when Fairfax decreed in 2004 that it would confiscate cars driven fewer than 4,500 miles a year -- a mere 18 miles per weekday over the course of a year, give or take.

Alas, the road to waste, inefficiency and bureaucratic scheming is paved with good intentions. On the one hand, the mileage minimum has helped prune the county's fleet by 167 vehicles, most of them in the year after the policy took effect. But, as reported by The Post's Lisa Rein, it has also prompted county workers and managers to devise ingenious methods to hang on to their county-owned cars -- by hook or by crook.

DOJ_NMG_0070549

In some cases, managers have busied themselves coordinating vehicle swaps among their employees to ensure that vehicles hit the magic 4,500-mile target; in others, workers have been urged to drive more. (So much for lightening the load on the county's clogged roads or saving on gas.) A few brazen officials have even asserted that their vehicles' odometers must have malfunctioned.

Many public workers in Fairfax need county-issued cars, to transport surveying equipment or citizens with special needs or for many other legitimate uses. But e-mails unearthed by The Post also suggest that in some instances managers have done everything short of odometer-tampering to avoid parting with prized vehicles. "We need to think about scheduling with Tricia to use her vehicle for everything we can think of, so she won't lose it," wrote one supervisor.

In response to such chicanery, the county's Board of Supervisors voted to increase the minimum to 5,000 miles annually. We wonder if that won't just increase the incentive for subterfuge by a few unscrupulous managers. A better follow-up would be for the county to scrutinize the deployment of its remaining vehicles, tighten procedures governing their use and encourage more employees to use their own cars when possible (and claim reimbursement by mileage) -- a much more cost-efficient option.

Oh, No, Low Prices (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

Last week's announcement by Wal-Mart that it will offer many generic drugs for $4 is welcome news for American consumers. Strangely, however, this isn't winning Wal-Mart any applause from its left-wing critics.

Take Paul Blank, director of the union-funded Wake Up Wal-Mart, who declared that "Wal-Mart cruelly ignores the fact that it fails to provide company health care to over half of its employees. . . . The Wal-Mart health care crisis grows everyday, and sadly this prescription drug initiative will not insure one additional Wal-Mart employee, one uninsured child, or reduce the billions of cost for taxpayers."

Or consider Ron Pollack, director of the Families USA lobby for government-run health care, who conceded that lower prices are "a limited good thing," but then dismissed the price reduction as being as much "a part of Wal-Mart's public-relations efforts to blunt the deserved criticism of its poor health coverage for its workers as it is a substantive improvement."

These and other Wal-Mart critics are the same folks who've complained for years about high drug prices, using the issue to argue for government price controls, shorter patent lives on new drugs, and reimportation of drugs from Canada and Mexico. The Service Employees International Union held a "Boston Pill Party" in July 2004 declaring that "Americans have an unalienable right to cheap Celebrex and Lipitor."

Wal-Mart isn't a charity, and its $4 decision is designed to lift its own sales by undercutting prices at competing retailers. But that's the way the market works, driving prices lower with competition. It turns out that Wal-Mart's critics really didn't care about prices; what they want is more union clout, and more government control over health care.

Ahmadinejad: We Won't Forgo Nuke Rights (AP)

AP, September 28, 2006

Iran's hard-line president said Wednesday Iran won't give up "one iota" of its right to pursue a peaceful nuclear program.

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad reiterated his uncompromising stance as Iran's top nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani held talks with European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana in Berlin, described by an EU official as "very intense."

"In negotiations, they tell us to suspend (uranium) enrichment even for a day on the pretext of a technical problem so that they continue talks," state-run television quoted Ahmadinejad as saying Wednesday. "Our response to them is that no one has the right to give up the rights of the Iranian nation."

Ahmadinejad said the U.S. and its European allies want to force Iran to suspend uranium enrichment but won't succeed.

"They want to create propaganda about it and tell the world that they forced Iran to suspend (enrichment), but they are mistaken. The Iranian nation won't retreat from its right one iota," he was quoted as saying.

DOJ_NMG_0070550

Solana and Larijani are holding talks over a package of incentives that six countries — the United States, China, Russia, France, Britain and Germany — are offering Tehran in return for suspending its uranium enrichment program and returning to full-scale negotiations.

Their meetings are scheduled to continue Thursday.

Iran violated the United Nations demand to halt uranium enrichment by Aug. 31. Enrichment can produce either fuel for a reactor or material for a warhead. The United States and several of its allies believe Iran is seeking to develop nuclear weapons. Tehran maintains its program is peaceful and merely aimed at generating electricity.

Iran, EU Negotiators Hold Nuclear Talks (AP)

By Stephen Graham, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 28, 2006

Negotiators for Iran and the European Union held five hours of "very intense" talks Wednesday over Iran's disputed nuclear program and planned to meet again Thursday, officials said.

EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana and chief Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani went into their meeting at a Foreign Ministry facility by the side of Lake Tegel on the outskirts of Berlin without making statements to reporters.

German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier, who was not participating in the Berlin talks, said he was optimistic progress could be made.

"I have the expectation that the talks today will be successful," Steinmeier said. "I think that today we will not get any final news, but hopefully in the course of tomorrow."

Solana would report back to the six countries trying to persuade Iran to give up its program to enrich uranium, he said, "and then it will be decided together if there are conditions for a return to the negotiating table."

But in Tehran, Iran's hard-line president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said his country won't give up "one iota" of its right to pursue a peaceful nuclear program.

Ahmadinejad said the U.S. and its European allies want to force Iran to suspend uranium enrichment but won't succeed.

"They want to create propaganda about it and tell the world that they forced Iran to suspend (enrichment), but they are mistaken. The Iranian nation won't retreat from its right one iota," he was quoted as saying.

The negotiators met for five hours of "very intense" talks before adjourning until Thursday, said Solana spokeswoman Cristina Gallach.

"The talks just broke off and we will resume tomorrow (Thursday) morning," Gallach said, describing the talks as "very intense."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told reporters in Washington that she telephoned Solana on Wednesday and renewed U.S. support for his talks with Iran.

Solana and Larijani are holding the latest round of talks over a package of incentives that six countries — the United States, China, Russia, France, Britain and Germany — are offering Tehran in return for suspending its uranium enrichment program and returning to full-scale negotiations.

Iran missed an Aug. 31 Security Council deadline over the issue. The six are considering seeking sanctions in the U.N. Security Council if Tehran does not comply.

Rice said if Larijani agreed to a suspension of processing uranium "we would be on a course for negotiations."

But, Rice told reporters, she had told Solana "clearly this won't go on very much longer."

"I did wish Solana well, and we are all awaiting the outcome of these discussions," she said.

Earlier, U.S. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said whether Iran was agreeable to a temporary and verifiable suspension would not be known until Solana concludes his meetings with Larijani.

"It may require several meetings to find out," the spokesman said. "There may be an opportunity here," he said.

The administration's sanctions strategy is to impose a series of increasingly potent penalties against Iran, beginning with curbs on technology that could be used in military programs.

Enriched uranium can be used for power plants or for weapons, depending on the level of enrichment.

DOJ_NMG_0070551

Associated Press Writer Barry Schweid contributed to this report from Washington.

U.S. To Wait 'A Few Weeks' On Iran Move (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, September 28, 2006

The Bush administration yesterday postponed its pursuit of U.N. sanctions against Iran for "a few weeks" to allow its European allies time to try to negotiate a suspension of Iran's nuclear fuel production.

Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, told Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in a telephone conversation before meeting with Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani in Berlin that Mr. Larijani "seems to be sincere" in trying to find a compromise, U.S. officials said.

The five-hour talks between the EU representative and the Iranian negotiator were described as intensive. The two men planned to meet again today, Solana spokeswoman Cristina Gallach said.

The United States has said it would join the Europeans in direct negotiations with Iran on incentives only if it stopped enriching uranium. Uranium can be used to produce atomic bombs or to fuel nuclear power plants.

Officials said that Mr. Solana suggested a little more time to negotiate a suspension of Iran's uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities might pay off, and that Miss Rice agreed.

"Our response was, 'Absolutely, if it's a matter of a few days, a few weeks here to see if there is a possibility of keeping open a negotiated diplomatic solution,' " State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters. "We want to give that every opportunity to succeed."

The administration had given Tehran an Aug. 31 deadline and threatened to push for sanctions. China and Russia have been firm in refusing to join in any punitive move.

On Tuesday, The Washington Times reported that Iran was close to reaching a compromise with the Europeans but was seeking a way to keep any enrichment suspension secret. Tehran denied it was considering such a deal.

Mr. McCormack said yesterday that the Iranians' "disposition to this point has not been to give clear answers," but he expressed hope that their behavior might be changing.

"There may be an opportunity here, there may be a little opening if we just give the Iranians a little time and space," he said. "Perhaps they will come through with a positive answer."

He declined to answer directly the question about a secret deal, saying that, if the United States showed up for negotiations with Iran, everyone would know that enrichment suspension -- Washington's only condition for participation -- had taken place.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad suggested during a seminar in Tehran that the West has proposed a quiet understanding that would help both sides save face.

"In negotiations, they tell us to suspend uranium enrichment for one day on the pretext of some technical problem and let us continue negotiations with you," Mr. Ahmadinejad was quoted as saying by the official Islamic Republic News Agency. "The Iranian nation will not give up its right."

The Iranian Students News Agency reported the president as saying: "They say, 'You should suspend uranium enrichment on the surface, helping us to say that Iran accepted suspension,' but I have to say we are men of negotiation but we do not demand negotiation."

Miss Rice warned that, despite her willingness to wait a few more weeks, "clearly this won't go on very much longer."

"Obviously, if we can come out of this with an Iranian decision to suspend its enrichment and reprocessing activity completely and verifiably, then we would be on a course of negotiations -- that's the course we would all like to pursue," she said.

One of the issues that Mr. Solana and Mr. Larijani discussed was how long any suspension would last, diplomats said.

The Iranian official, they added, is constrained by conflicting views in his government between those who do not want confrontation with the West and those for whom uranium enrichment is a source of pride.

"I have the expectation that the talks today will be successful," German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier told reporters in Berlin. "I think that today we will not get any final news, but hopefully in the course of tomorrow."

Mr. Buffett's Excellent Idea (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0070552

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

At the center of the current showdown with Iran is one chilling technical fact: The same technology that can make fuel for a nuclear reactor can also make the core of a nuclear bomb.

Add to that the legal fact that the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty guarantees all members in good standing the right to make their own reactor fuel and you have a pretty good idea why the United States and Europe are having such a tough time blocking Tehran's nuclear ambitions.

Enter Warren Buffett, the billionaire investor and philanthropist. He is pledging $50 million for a fuel bank — run by the International Atomic Energy Agency — to be a supplier of last resort for any country that chooses not to get into the risky reactor fuel business and gets the I.A.E.A. seal of approval.

Right now countries can argue — sincerely or not — that without their own fuel plants they can be easily blackmailed by foreign suppliers with whom they have political disagreements. Iran has been caught lying about its nuclear program too often to believe that all it wants is reactor fuel. But its talk of nuclear cartels still gets a sympathetic hearing from many of the nuclear have-nots.

Mr. Buffett, who is working with the nonprofit Nuclear Threat Initiative, headed by former Senator Sam Nunn, is a man who understands leverage. He won't kick in his $50 million unless some government or governments ante up $100 million in cash or fuel. And the project has to come together within two years or he will take his money off the table.

In early 2004, President Bush rightly called for a ban on all new sales of sensitive nuclear fuel technology. But the idea has gone nowhere, with the have-nots charging discrimination and even friends like Argentina, Australia and South Africa talking about getting into the business.

American officials publicly welcomed Mr. Buffett's proposal as one way to persuade countries that they don't need to make their own fuel. But there's no talk of matching his largess. The White House — which has long criticized the I.A.E.A. for not being tough enough on Iran — is not eager to give the agency more power.

Instead, the administration has joined with Russia and four other major fuel producers to offer overlapping supply guarantees, with each promising to make up for the others' possible shortfall. That's a start. But we suspect that any plan that has governments — rather than the more neutral I.A.E.A. — offering guarantees won't calm suspicions or take away Iran's excuse.

More than 50 years ago, President Eisenhower first proposed setting up an international nuclear fuel bank, the original concept for the I.A.E.A. Washington would do well to take a harder look at Mr. Buffett's — and Mr. Eisenhower's — excellent idea. And then come up with the cash.

Egypt Developing Nuclear Energy Program (MCT)

By Miret El Naggar

McClatchy Newspapers, September 28, 2006

CAIRO, Egypt - Determined to lead the Arab world into the nuclear club, Egypt is working on a nuclear energy program intended to reduce the country's dependency on oil.

The program, announced last week by Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, is expected to cost as much as $2 billion and will take more than a decade before the plants produce electricity. While other Arab nations also are looking into nuclear research and development, Egypt already has two low-level reactors, a half century of research and the remains of a comprehensive plan that was scrapped after the nuclear accident at Chernobyl in 1986.

Egypt is looking for alternative power sources because of the rising cost of oil and its increasing energy needs. The government estimates that oil reserves in Egypt, the Arab world's most populous country, will be depleted within 20 years unless new oil fields are discovered.

Egypt has signed the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, the cornerstone of international efforts to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons. Countries that sign the treaty agree not to produce or otherwise acquire nuclear weapons. They also accept safeguards meant to prevent the diversion of spent nuclear fuel to weapons production. Egypt also has agreed to inspections by the United Nations' nuclear watchdog, the International Atomic Energy Agency.

DOJ_NMG_0070553

Egypt has two outdated, research-level reactors in Inshas, 38 miles north of Cairo. Energy Minister Hassan Younis told a state-backed newspaper this month that the government is in talks over how to finance the construction of a 1,000-megawatt power plant that would cost as much as $2 billion. Egypt also plans to build three power stations, each producing 600 megawatts, in the north coastal region of Dabaa.

Nuclear development is a point of pride for Egypt. Arab nations are caught between two less-than-friendly rivals when it comes to nuclear development: Israel and Iran.

They complain that Israel was allowed to amass an undeclared nuclear arsenal, while Muslim nations fall under strict scrutiny for research into even peaceful uses of nuclear energy. Arab governments are equally wary of Iran's Shiite Muslim theocracy, which they blame for sidelining the Sunni populations of Iraq and Lebanon.

"It's hard to be in a region where one country owns nuclear weapons and another is developing them while claiming it won't use them," said Wael el Assad, nuclear specialist at the Arab League. "This security deficiency is unacceptable to states."

But unlike Iran, Egypt, led by Western-backed Mubarak, has U.S. support for the proposed program. That wasn't the case for other Arab leaders who delved into nuclear activities: Former Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's main reactor was destroyed by Israel, while Libyan President Muammar Qaddafi renounced his program in hopes of getting removed from the U.S. list of states that sponsor terrorism.

"We are prepared to provide technical know-how for peaceful nuclear energy to friendly nations such as Egypt, with whom we share deep cooperation," Francis Ricciardone, U.S. ambassador to Egypt, told Egyptian television. "There is no comparison between Iran and Egypt, since Iran has a nuclear weapons program. Using nuclear energy for peaceful purposes, that is something different."

Iran says its nuclear program is also strictly for energy, but the IAEA has said Iran hasn't cooperated sufficiently so that its claim can be independently proved.

Egypt hasn't yet disclosed details of its nuclear plans.

It could purchase nuclear fuel from abroad to power its reactors and sell the spent fuel back to the supplier, so that there would be no possibility of using it for weapons production. Alternatively, Egypt could develop the capacity to produce its own fuel. The same production method, at a higher level, can produce highly enriched uranium for nuclear weapons.

Egypt, Tunisia and the United Arab Emirates are the only Arab nations currently on file with the IAEA as pursuing atomic programs as an alternative to traditional energy sources such as oil and natural gas. Algeria has two research reactors, but isn't actively pursuing nuclear capabilities, according to regional experts.

"Some Arab countries are showing interest in nuclear energy for generating electricity, water purification, and in other fields also, as health and agriculture," said Mahmoud Nasreddin, director of the Tunisia-based Arab Atomic Energy Agency.

In Egypt, however, there are murmurs that the timing of the announcement has less to do with renewable energy and more to do with positioning Mubarak's son to succeed his father as president. Mubarak's ruling National Democratic Party adopted the resolution to pursue a nuclear energy program at the party's annual convention last week.

"The whole world - I don't want to say all, but many developing countries - have proposed and started to execute the issue of alternative energy," Gamal Mubarak, the president's son, said at the conference. "It is time for Egypt to put forth this proposal for discussion about its future energy policies, the issue of alternative energy, including nuclear energy as one of the alternatives."

Critics of the government, led by the powerful Islamists in the Muslim Brotherhood, called the proposal "a big show" intended to bolster support for the younger Mubarak. Since 2002, Gamal Mubarak has served as head of the party's influential policies committee and has been crafting his image as a reformist.

Though both Mubaraks have repeatedly denied that Gamal has any intention of becoming president, his frequent public appearances and his rising influence within the NDP are convincing Egyptians he will take over after his father.

"This talk of nuclear program is only to grab the world's attention and point it at Gamal Mubarak," said Mohamed Habib, deputy leader of the Muslim Brotherhood.

El Naggar is a special correspondent for McClatchy Newspapers.

Envoy: Nuclear Talks Enter Crucial Phase (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0070554

By Foster Klug, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 28, 2006

The chief U.S. envoy to stalled North Korean nuclear disarmament talks said Wednesday that negotiators are entering a crucial phase and suggested Washington is stepping up efforts to break a nearly year-long impasse.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill also urged the North to show it was serious about returning to the talks aimed at ridding Pyongyang of its self-professed nuclear weapons production program.

"I just want to know: Are they serious about making progress in this next round?" Hill said to an audience at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "I just want to get some idea of whether they're" preparing seriously for talks that have been stalled since November.

"We're trying to get ready to fulfill our obligations" for whenever the talks resume, Hill said. "I just would like some indication from (North Korea) that they're doing something similar."

Hill said the next weeks would be "critical" and spoke of a "certain sense of urgency" involved in efforts to resume negotiations that include both Koreas, China, Russia, Japan and the United States.

His comments come as U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice contemplates a possible trip to Asia in the next month or so. Rice recently promised to "make another push to see what we can do" to resolve the impasse.

Hill met this week with his South Korean counterpart, Chun Yung-woo, and has been talking on the phone with his Japanese counterpart.

"When things are stopped for so long, you really want to find ways to restart them," Hill said. "We are in a rather crucial phase. We've not made any progress."

North Korea, meanwhile, says Washington is responsible for the deadlock, refusing to return until the U.S. lifts financial restrictions imposed for the regime's alleged money laundering and counterfeiting.

The North has raised alarms that it might be preparing for a nuclear bomb test. In July, it test-launched seven missiles, including some that might reach the American continent.

Despite the sense of urgency he mentioned in his comments, Hill said the United States would not talk with North Korea — officially called the Democratic People's Republic of Korea — "in the absence of the six-party process."

US Warns Against North Korea Nuclear Test (AFP)

By Stephen Collinson

AFP, September 28, 2006

The United States warned that any nuclear test by North Korea would be viewed by world powers as a "very serious" escalation of the crisis over the Stalinist state's weapons programs.

Christopher Hill, US point-man on the six-party nuclear talks process, also said Washington was considering whether to impose new sanctions on Pyongyang, despite warnings by several congressmen such a move would enflame the showdown.

Hill said the United States had been talking to China, Russia, South Korea and Japan about how to deter any nuclear test by North Korea.

"All parties have made it clear that this would be a very, very serious step," Hill told a congressional hearing.

"It is a very small piece of the world ... it is frankly speaking, rather shocking that anyone would even think of exploding a nuclear weapon on the Korean peninsula."

Pyongyang declared in February 2005 it had nuclear weapons, but there have been no reports of a test. Speculation has been mounting the Stalinist state may be preparing such a step.

Last July, North Korea defied international warnings and test fired seven ballistic missiles, including its long-range Taepodong-2, believed to be capable of striking America's western seaboard.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in an interview released Monday that time was running out to bring North Korea back to the negotiating table.

Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific Affairs, was testifying before the Committee on International Relations of the House of Representatives.

DOJ_NMG_0070555

Several congressmen warned in dire terms that a rumored move by the Bush administration to impose a new set of sanctions on the Stalinist state, could spell further bad news for the stalled six-party talks process.

"Let the administration think long and hard before taking this dramatic step," said veteran Democrat representative Tom Lantos, arguing that any such measures wouldn't hurt North Korea due to paltry US investment in the impoverished nation.

"If the South Koreans, Chinese and Japanese will not follow suit, a unilateral US trade and investment ban will be ineffective and counter-productive to the prospects for a negotiated solution on the Korean Peninsula.

"Pyongyang will undoubtedly cite these new sanctions as evidence of hostile intent, and strengthen its refusal to return to the six party talks," Lantos said.

But Hill said that Washington was considering whether to impose new sanctions on North Korea over the missile tests.

"We are of course looking at the issue particularly in the light of the fact that the North Koreans had a missile moratorium, some measures were relaxed ... and they violated the moratorium."

The Clinton administration lifted some economic sanctions on North Korea in 1995, one year after it agreed to freeze its nuclear activities.

More bilateral sanctions were lifted in 2000, when Pyongyang agreed to a moratorium on missile tests.

Hill pledged that any new measures would be imposed only after close consultation with other members of the six-party talks and key members of Congress.

Hill's comments came a day after a top North Korean official told the UN General Assembly his country's nuclear arms were for "self-defense."

In a rare North Korean explanation on the international stage of its policy, Deputy Foreign Minister Choe Su Hon reiterated Pyongyang could not resume the six-party talks as long as it remains subject to US sanctions.

The UN Security Council, including the North's only major ally, China, responded by unanimously adopting a resolution condemning its actions and imposing missile-related sanctions.

In September last year, Pyongyang joined the United States, South Korea, China, Russia and Japan in signing a joint statement under which it pledged to abandon its nuclear program in return for energy and economic aid, eventual diplomatic benefits and security guarantees.

But two months later, North Korea boycotted the forum to protest US sanctions on a Macau bank which allegedly helped it pass counterfeit US dollars and launder funds.

U.S. Weighs Moves Against Sudan Over U.N. Force (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

The United States is considering a series of punitive steps if the Sudanese government fails to agree to a U.N. peacekeeping force to end the violence in Sudan's Darfur region, U.S. officials said yesterday. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice signaled the new approach in a speech yesterday in which she demanded an immediate cease-fire and warned that Khartoum faces "a choice between cooperation and confrontation."

U.S. officials said the options under consideration include reimposing sanctions that had been eased when Sudan signed a peace agreement last year with southern rebels, as well as taking action against top Sudanese officials who have been implicated in what the United States has labeled acts of genocide in Darfur.

Another option that has received renewed consideration is establishing a "no-fly zone" over Darfur, mainly because the Sudanese military has restarted attacks. But there are practical obstacles to a no-fly zone, including the effect it may have on humanitarian missions, so officials said that decision is not imminent.

Although Rice's Washington speech to the African Society's National Summit on Africa held out the prospect of improved ties between the two countries, relations have worsened dramatically in recent weeks.

U.S. officials detained Sudan's deputy foreign minister at Dulles International Airport for several hours last week and also restricted the travel of Sudan's president, Lt. Gen. Omar Hassan al-Bashir, and his entourage when he came to address the U.N.

DOJ_NMG_0070556

General Assembly. Bashir was so angry that when he returned to Khartoum, he announced restrictions on the travel of U.S. diplomatic personnel and official U.S. visitors.

U.S. officials suggest that the visa restrictions imposed on Bashir were a mistake, generated mainly because he got the visa on a Sunday afternoon in Havana, where the U.S. routinely issues restricted visas to Cuban diplomats. "There was no policy decision to restrict them," a senior administration official said, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue. "I think they simply didn't reset the machines for non-Cubans."

A senior Sudanese diplomat scoffed at that explanation. "Such mistakes are becoming very common for our American friends," the diplomat said. He confirmed that deputy foreign minister Ali Ahmed Karti had been detained for several hours and that Bashir was upset at the restricted visas. Speaking on the condition of anonymity, he said U.S. diplomatic movements were being restricted because "reciprocity is one of the golden principles of diplomacy."

U.S. officials are still trying to figure out the practical aspects of Sudan's restrictions, including whether they will apply to diplomats or official visitors.

U.S. officials gave varied explanations for Karti's detention, which included that he was carrying cash in excess of $10,000 to finance Bashir's travels and that he turned up on a Homeland Security watch list because of his association with the Janjaweed, the marauding militias implicated in the Darfur violence.

Human rights groups say that Karti, though he now holds the title of state minister for foreign affairs, was the head of the Popular Defense Forces, a paramilitary group that fought alongside the Janjaweed during a campaign of terrorism that has resulted in as many as 450,000 deaths and has driven more than 2 million from their homes. Some experts have said they think he is on the secret list of 51 names referred by the United Nations to the International Criminal Court for possible prosecution for war crimes.

The Darfur conflict broke out in early 2003 when African rebel groups attacked police stations and military outposts. The United Nations and human rights groups accuse the central government of supporting the Janjaweed in an effort to crush the rebellion. About 2,000 villages have been destroyed across Darfur, an area the size of France.

The Bush administration has pressed to replace an undermanned, 7,000-person peacekeeping force headed by the African Union with 20,000 U.N. troops, but Sudan has refused to accept a Security Council resolution mandating the force.

In May, under the leadership of then-Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick, the U.S. persuaded Khartoum and one rebel group to sign the Darfur Peace Agreement. But Zoellick left the administration, along with many of his Sudan advisers, and U.S. policy was adrift over the summer. Last week, President Bush named former USAID administer Andrew S. Natsios as special presidential envoy to Sudan.

Human rights groups have criticized the Darfur agreement, saying that it did not have the support of a rebel group representing the majority of the Darfur population and that the Sudanese government has used it as an excuse to attack rebel groups that did not sign.

Rice demanded yesterday that Khartoum accept the U.N. force. While the Darfur agreement will not be negotiated, she said, "we are conferring with rebels who want peace."

Rice added: "We are seeking to address their legitimate concerns, and we will support them if they choose peace. If the rebels refuse, then they will face serious consequences, including targeted U.N. sanctions."

Rice Says Sudan Could Face More Sanctions Over Darfur (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 27 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Wednesday raised the threat of more international sanctions against Sudan if the government did not stop military operations in the Darfur region and unconditionally accept a United Nations peacekeeping force.

“If the Sudanese government chooses confrontation — if it continues waging war against its own citizens, challenging the African Union, undermining its peacekeeping force, and threatening the international community — then the regime in Khartoum will be held responsible, and it alone will bear the consequences,” Ms. Rice said during a speech to the Africa Society.

DOJ_NMG_0070557

"The international community must make clear to the leaders of Sudan that this is the choice they face," she said.

The 53-nation African Union has about 7,200 peacekeeping soldiers in Darfur and was scheduled to hand over its task to a larger United Nations force in September. But President Omar Hassan al-Bashir has fiercely opposed such a move, and in the meantime, the union has announced that it will send more troops to the region while pressure on him continues.

The union force has not had much success in stopping violence in Darfur that has continued despite a cease-fire in May. Ms. Rice was blunt during her speech, laying the blame for the bloodshed at the feet of Mr. Bashir's government.

"Citing attacks by rebels in the area, the government of Sudan recruited a tribe of Arab nomads, known as the janjaweed, who have long resented the Africans of Darfur," Ms. Rice said. "Funded, armed and encouraged by the Sudanese government, the janjaweed attacked village after village in Darfur — torturing and executing the men and the boys; beating and raping the women and the girls."

Ms. Rice challenged Mr. Bashir's authority to refuse the United Nations peacekeeping force. "We cannot, we will not, accept Sudan's opposition," she said. "Since the Sudanese government will not save the lives of its own people, then the United Nations must act."

Rice Calls For Cease-fire In Darfur (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, September 28, 2006

The U.S. will not sit still while innocent people are killed in Sudan's Darfur region, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Wednesday, urging an immediate cease-fire and deployment of U.N. peacekeepers.

The top U.S. diplomat said Sudan's government could cooperate with the United Nations or face a confrontation. She warned of consequences if Sudan chose a fight and hinted at further U.N. penalties against the Khartoum government or rebel groups.

"We're not going to sit by and allow this kind of death and destruction to continue," Rice said during a question-and-answer session after her speech at the Africa Society's National Summit on Africa. "We'll use whatever tools are necessary, through the U.N, to be able to stop that."

Fighting between government-backed Arab militias and non-Arab rebels in Darfur has left more than 200,000 dead and 2.5 million displaced since 2002.

More than two years have passed since the Bush administration labeled the atrocities in Sudan as genocide. But the killing has accelerated in recent weeks as the Sudanese government has launched a new offensive.

A poorly funded African Union force in Darfur has been unable to contain the violence and the U.N. Security Council has sought to take over the operation to provide better resources. Sudan opposes such a step.

"I would hope that the message that is going out to Sudan, not just from us but from every country in the world, is that this is now a real fork in the road," Rice said.

President Bush used his address to the U.N. General Assembly last week to announce a new envoy for Sudan and to decry the violence. Rice's address Wednesday was the most comprehensive high-level assessment of the problem to date.

In her speech, Rice said that long-term stability and safety for people in Sudan will come only when the many overlapping political and factional fights are addressed. She accused Sudan's government of hoarding wealth and power at the expense of much of the rest of the country, Africa's largest and about the size of the U.S. from east of the Mississippi River.

Rice said that if Sudan "works with the United Nations and welcomes a U.N. force into Darfur then it will find a dedicated partner in the United States."

Bush has told Sudanese President Omar el-Bashir that the U.S. was prepared to examine all aspects of its relationship with Sudan, Rice said. U.S. lawmakers are close to approving penalties against Khartoum.

"If the Sudanese government chooses confrontation — if it continues waging war against its own citizens, challenging the African Union, undermining its peacekeeping force and threatening the international community — then the regime in Khartoum will be held responsible and it alone will bear the consequences," Rice said.

Little Pressure On Hezbollah To Disarm (AP-Y)

DOJ_NMG_0070558

By Hamza Hendawi And Henry Meyer

AP, September 28, 2006

Six weeks after the end of the Lebanon war, the militant Hezbollah group is facing little on-the-ground pressure to give up its weapons and disarm — despite a U.N. cease-fire resolution demanding just that.

The leaders of a U.N. peacekeeping force in south Lebanon say the job is not theirs. And Lebanon's ill-equipped army, some of whose soldiers wear tin-pot helmets and carry outdated M-16 rifles, shows no signs of diving into a confrontation with battle-hardened Hezbollah fighters.

For now, all sides say it's likely full disarmament will happen only in the future as part of a political solution — despite the U.N. resolution that ended the 34-day war on Aug. 14 and required disarmament.

The commanders of the U.N. force say that under the resolution, their job is merely to assist the Lebanese army in regaining control of southern Lebanon and to ensure the area cannot be used for launching rocket attacks into northern Israel.

Meanwhile, Lebanese security officials say the army's mission in the south is based on what they call an "understanding" with Hezbollah that the army will not search for and seize weapons, but only confiscate those shown in public.

At one Lebanese military checkpoint near the town of Marjayoun, some eight miles from the Israeli border, soldiers recently waved most cars through — although some were stopped so identity papers and registration documents could be checked.

The Lebanese government, which for years allowed Hezbollah to run a "state within a state" in the south, has long argued that disarming the militants could be done only through agreement among the country's major political groups.

Israel says the resolution makes clear that Hezbollah must be disarmed south of the Litani River. Mark Regev, an Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman, said of the current situation, "It's a process."

Israeli soldiers have been instructed to shoot Lebanese stone-throwers along the border if they feel their lives are in danger. The order came after dozens of yellow-clad Hezbollah supporters threw stones at Israeli soldiers Friday.

Regev said Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, at a rally last week, "publicly stated that he is out to flout the will of the international community and to prevent the implementation of what was an unanimous resolution of the Security Council."

At the rally in the Beirut suburbs Friday, Nasrallah vowed his guerrillas will not surrender their weapons and said: "There is no army in the world capable of making us drop our weapons as long as there will be people who believe in this resistance."

The current U.N. peacekeeping contingent is far larger and better-armed than a previous 2,000-member force. Some 15,000 troops, more than half from Europe, will eventually be deployed with tanks, artillery cannons and other heavy armor.

But the multinational troops, who now number 5,000, are acutely aware that their presence could become unpopular if they are viewed as supporting Israel's attempts to eliminate Hezbollah's arms.

French peacekeepers setting up base near the town of Deir Kifa noted they had encountered a less-than-friendly reception from some residents, who defiantly waved yellow Hezbollah flags.

"We mustn't be seen as an occupying force — the people can reject us very quickly," said Col. Jerome Salle.

He said the U.N. troops would mount patrols but would not establish checkpoints on public roads, to avoid inflaming residents.

Gen. Alain Pelligrini, the French officer who commands the U.N. force, said the peacekeepers wouldn't even act if they saw weapons being carried openly by Hezbollah fighters.

"No, I would ask the Lebanese army to intervene and if the Lebanese army has difficulties in intervening, then we would see what we need to do," he said last week.

Halim Sarhan, who runs a dental laboratory in the market town of Nabatiyeh, expressed a common sentiment when he said no one should try to disarm Hezbollah by force. "There must be political consensus on the issue first," he said.

Hezbollah has said it would agree to disarm only if the government is strong enough to defend Lebanon against Israel — a stance that reflects its own ambitions to become the country's dominant political force.

It has also linked the issue to Israel's return of the Shebaa farms, a 25-square-mile contested area where Lebanon, Syria and Israel meet.

Some weapons and explosives have been found in a few Hezbollah positions that were either overrun or abandoned during the fighting, said Lebanese security officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the subject.

DOJ_NMG_0070559

Hezbollah is thought to have a great deal of experience in concealing its weapons. Many are believed to be in underground tunnels, buried in groves or in remote parts of the mountainous south.

The U.N. forces and the Lebanese army are likely to have more teeth when it comes to preventing new weapons shipments.

A German naval force is to patrol the waters off southern Lebanon and Lebanese authorities are tightening controls at the country's only international airport in Beirut and on the Syrian border.

But Syrian President Bashar Assad, whose country has long been a route for arms deliveries to Hezbollah believed to come from Iran, said this week that it was "Mission Impossible" to cut off the guerrillas' supply of weapons altogether.

Israel Releases High-Ranking Hamas Official (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

JERUSALEM, Sept. 27 — An Israeli military court today released the Palestinian deputy prime minister, Nasser al-Shaer, one of more than 30 Hamas lawmakers and cabinet ministers who have been detained by the Israelis over the past three months.

Mr. Shaer, who was the highest-ranking official held, was arrested on Aug. 19 but was not charged with any crime, and the court cited a “lack of evidence” in ordering his release today.

“My arrest was not justified,” Mr. Shaer told The Associated Press. “It was part of the aggression waged against the Palestinian people.”

Mr. Shaer headed to his hometown of Nablus, in the West Bank, where he was greeted enthusiastically by supporters at a reception hall. However, the court said that for the next two weeks, Mr. Shaer would not be allowed to go to Ramallah, where his office is located and which serves as the Palestinian political headquarters in the West Bank.

Israel began rounding up the Hamas legislators in the West Bank after Palestinian militants, including the armed wing of Hamas, seized an Israeli soldier on June 25 and took him into the Gaza Strip. The soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, is still being held, despite an Israeli military incursion in Gaza and the crackdown on Hamas lawmakers.

Israel, which classifies Hamas as a terrorist organization, has charged many of the Hamas lawmakers with belonging to an illegal organization.

A military court ruled on Sept. 12 that 18 of the Hamas legislators should be freed. But on Monday, a military appeals court reversed the ruling, and those legislators and others remain in jail while awaiting trial.

At an Israeli cabinet meeting today, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and top security officials said they were prepared to intensify military operations in Gaza if Palestinian militants continue to fire rockets from the territory into southern Israel.

Earlier today, an Israeli airstrike killed a 14-year-old Palestinian girl, Dam Hamad, near the border of the Gaza Strip and Egypt.

The Israeli military said it had intelligence that a home along the border was being used to hide the entrance to a smuggling tunnel linked to Egypt.

The military called the home and told residents to leave, because the house was about to be bombed. Shortly afterward, the military dropped two bombs, destroying the home and leaving a huge crater, Palestinian witnesses said.

However, falling concrete and other debris killed the girl, who was in a home nearby, according to Dr. Ali Musa, head of Al Najar Hospital in Rafah.

In the West Bank, Israeli security officials said they arrested two 17-year-old Palestinians and seized a 22-pound bomb belt they were planning to use in a suicide attack. After soldiers arrested Abduallah Qatawi and Jihad Dukan, the two teenagers took the soldiers to the place where the bomb was hidden, the security officials said.

In another development, an Israeli court sentenced a Jewish settler to four life sentences for a shooting spree that killed four Palestinians in the West Bank.

The settler, Asher Weissgan, killed the four Palestinians in an industrial zone in Shiloh on Aug. 17, 2005, the day that the Israeli military began forcibly removing all Jewish settlers from Gaza.

DOJ_NMG_0070560

Prosecutors said that Mr. Weissgan carried out the killings in an attempt to prevent the Gaza withdrawal from taking place. Mr. Weissgan was convicted of the killings earlier this month.

Israeli Military Court Frees Hamas Deputy PM (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, September 28, 2006

An Israeli military court on Wednesday freed the top-ranking Hamas official seized in a round-up of the ruling Palestinian party's political leadership but 34 others, including four cabinet ministers, remained in jail.

Nasser al-Shaer, deputy prime minister in the Palestinian Authority government, was released more than a month after his arrest at a hiding place in the West Bank city of Ramallah.

Mr Shaer had gone underground after the Israeli military seized much of the Hamas leadership following the June kidnapping in Gaza of an Israeli soldier, Corporal Gilad Shalit.

There has been speculation that Hamas leaders still in jail might be freed as part of a prisoner exchange deal for the abducted soldier.

An Israeli military court in the West Bank on Monday overturned an earlier ruling to free 21 detained Hamas officials. A hearing on the fate of 13 others is scheduled for next week.

Mr Shaer's lawyer, who said his client had not been charged, said Wednesday's ruling barred the deputy prime minister from returning to his office in Ramallah.

His release was not viewed as a significant step in securing the freedom of Corporal Shalit. Egyptian efforts to free the captive soldier have been complicated by internal tensions within the PA, where attempts to set up a Hamas-Fatah government of national unity are in stalemate.

Shimon Peres, Israeli vice prime minister, on Wednesday blamed Hamas's exiled leadership in Damascus for increasing tensions in Gaza by prolonging the Shalit affair.

Unity talks on establishing a government that would be acceptable to the international community and lead to a lifting of the political and economic embargo on Hamas have foundered on the Islamist party's refusal either to recognise Israel or accept existing agreements between Israel and the PA.

Mahmoud Abbas, the PA's Fatah president, travelled to Qatar on Wednesday after delegating the latest round of contacts with Hamas to more junior officials.

Political sources in Gaza said that reports circulating there that Mr Abbas might dissolve the existing Hamas government or form an emergency administration had exacerbated factional tensions in the territory.

Medical officials in Gaza said a 14-year-old girl was killed in the latest Israeli air strike on the territory in which the air force on Wednesday attacked a house believed to be used as cover for a weapons smuggling tunnel.

They said the house was targeted after its owner, an alleged weapons dealer, had obeyed Israeli orders to leave. However, a second missile struck after children had gathered at the scene. Apart from the dead girl, seven other children were wounded, they said.

Israel Releases Palestinian Deputy PM (AP)

By Ali Daraghmeh, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 28, 2006

Israel on Wednesday released the Palestinian deputy prime minister, the highest-ranking of more than 30 officials in the Hamas-led government jailed as part of a crackdown on the Islamic militant group.

The detention of much of the Hamas-led government has been a major sore point in rapidly deteriorating relations between Israel and the Palestinians since Hamas took power.

Nasser Shaer, who was held without charge for more than a month, was ordered freed by an Israeli court, which banned him from going to his government office in the West Bank city of Ramallah for two weeks.

Shaer said Wednesday he was not mistreated in jail, but added: "There is nothing dearer than being free. They came and took me from my house in front of my children, wife, and family. They had no reason to do it."

DOJ_NMG_0070561

Israel and the West, labeling the violent Islamic movement a terror group, have cut off funding to the Palestinian government, plunging the Palestinian areas into a deep financial crisis.

Violence flared June 25 when Hamas-linked militants attacked an Israeli army base near Gaza, killing two soldiers, capturing a third and triggering a large-scale Israeli offensive in the coastal strip.

Israel also rounded up dozens of West Bank officials from the Hamas-led government. Though Israel said they were suspected of involvement in terrorism, it was widely assumed they were meant to be traded for the soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit. But no progress has been reported in mediation efforts.

Shaer managed to evade detention for more than a month, but was caught Aug. 19.

After Israeli soldiers dropped him off at a checkpoint Wednesday, he hitched a ride home to Nablus, where he was greeted by dozens of supporters who chanted, "God is great," and held a party in his honor at a local restaurant.

Thirty lawmakers and four Cabinet ministers remain in Israeli custody, charged with belonging to an illegal group. On Monday, a military court in the West Bank declined to release 21 of the detainees on bail. A hearing for 13 others is scheduled for Oct. 5.

Palestinian government spokesman Ghazi Hamad said Shaer's detention was "political and illegal," and the charges against the other officials were "fabricated."

Shaer, who did not run for parliament on the Hamas ticket but joined the government after the Islamic group's election victory, said he refused to talk politics in prison and denied he is a Hamas member.

Breaking with Hamas ideology that refuses to recognize a Jewish state in the Middle East, Shaer told reporters that if Israel renewed its 2000 offer of 95 percent of the West Bank and all of Gaza for a Palestinian state, leaving Israel intact, "I would ask the Palestinian people."

The late Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat rejected the offer, and Israel took it off the table after violence erupted later in 2000.

Egypt has unsuccessfully tried to broker a deal trading Shalit for hundreds of Palestinian prisoners in Israeli jails.

Egypt recently sent a letter to Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal, based in Damascus, Syria, demanding Shalit's immediate release to avoid a worsening crisis, Palestinian officials and Arab diplomats said.

But Moussa Abu Marzouk, deputy leader of Hamas' political bureau, denied Hamas was under pressure to release the soldier.

"We are keen to make the Egyptian mediation a success," he said, but added: "Until now, we are not any closer to having the requests of Hamas for the soldier's release met."

Meanwhile, Israel pushed on with its Gaza offensive, destroying the house of a weapons dealer in the southern town of Rafah, in an attack that killed a 14-year-old girl, Palestinian officials said.

The army called the owner 15 minutes before a first air strike and told him to leave, witnesses said. That air strike caused no injuries, but as children gathered near the rubble, a second Israeli missile struck, killing the teenager and wounding seven other children, hospital officials said.

The army said the house was used as cover for a weapons smuggling tunnel being dug under the nearby border with Egypt.

The chief of Israel's Shin Bet security service, Yuval Diskin, accused Egypt Wednesday of allowing Palestinian militants to smuggle 19 tons of weapons into Gaza — much of it through tunnels — since Israel withdrew from Gaza last year.

"The Egyptians know who the smugglers are and don't deal with them," Diskin told Israel's Cabinet, according to a participant in the meeting. "They received intelligence on this from us and didn't use it."

Egyptian forces destroyed another tunnel Wednesday, Egyptian police said.

Early Thursday, Israeli aircraft fired two missiles at the house of a Palestinian weapons dealer on the Gaza-Egypt border, destroying it completely, Palestinian secucrity officials said.

The owner received a warning by telephone before the air strike, and residents left the building, the officials said. Two people were lightly hurt.

Israeli has carried out a series of such strikes against homes of suspected weapins dealers in recent weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0070562

For Kazakh Leader's Visit, U.S. Seeks A Balance (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers And Ilan Greenberg

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

ASTANA, Kazakhstan, Sept. 26 — When Vice President Dick Cheney came to this oil-rich Central Asian nation this spring he expressed admiration for what he called its "political development." Yet just a day before his visit began, the authoritarian government effectively shut down the two most prominent American democracy organizations working here.

While American officials are negotiating to reverse the government's decision, they have yet to complain about it publicly.

As President Bush prepares to receive the Kazakh president, Nursultan A. Nazarbayev, at a state dinner in Washington on Friday, the episode reflects the delicate balance the administration has struck with a country of growing strategic importance that has a record of corruption, flawed elections and rights violations, including the killings of two opposition leaders in the last year in disputed circumstances.

Critics here say the episode also illustrates the Bush administration's willingness to sacrifice democracy, a centerpiece of its foreign policy, when it conflicts with other foreign policy goals.

"There are four enemies of human rights: oil, gas, the war on terror and geopolitical considerations," said Yevgeny A. Zhovtis of the Kazakhstan International Bureau for Human Rights and Rule of Law, an organization that has received financing from the American Embassy and the National Endowment for Democracy. "And we have all four."

The Bush administration has promoted democratic reforms in Kazakhstan for years, but it also appears eager to mollify a president who has been a comparatively moderate Muslim leader in Central Asia, who has allowed NATO aircraft headed to Afghanistan to fly over the country and sent a company of soldiers to Iraq, and who controls vast resources of oil and gas, much of it extracted by American companies.

In a meeting on Monday in New York with Foreign Minister Kasymzhomart Tokayev, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice spoke generally about democracy and human rights in Kazakhstan, a senior State Department official said, but did not raise the matter of the two democracy groups — the National Democratic Institute for International Affairs and the International Republican Institute.

In Washington, Frederick Jones, a spokesman for the National Security Council, said the White House was aware of the problem with the institutes but added that he could not say whether President Bush would raise it this week, since the discussions were not scripted in advance. Still, he said, "Democratization is a very important part of the agenda."

The backlash against promotion of democracy is by no means limited to Kazakhstan. The institutes, which are nonprofit, nonpartisan groups financed by the United States government, have been eyed warily not just here but in Russia, China and an array of authoritarian Central Asian countries that were alarmed by the "color revolutions" in Serbia, Georgia and, particularly, Ukraine.

As outlined in a recent report by the National Endowment for Democracy, many of them, including Kazakhstan, have followed the lead of Russia and severely restricted nongovernmental organizations. Some countries, notably Belarus, but also the Persian Gulf state of Bahrain, have closed them down altogether.

For Kazakhstan, as for the Bush administration, the coming visit has created an opportunity for improving relations that have been strained in recent years, even as Russia has taken advantage of its own political and economic influence.

The strains have stemmed from American concerns over corruption, restrictions on the news media and President Nazarbayev's consolidation of political control.

The Kazakh government has its own concerns with American policy. They include a criminal case in New York against James H. Giffen, an American businessman, that implicates Mr. Nazarbayev in a bribery scheme dating from the 1990's, and lukewarm American support for Kazakhstan's bid to preside over the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe.

Here in Kazakhstan, Mr. Nazarbayev's visit has been portrayed as a chance for him to enhance his international prestige by improving relations with the United States. "The time has come when we can raise our relations to a completely new level," Mr. Nazarbayev told reporters in Astana earlier this month.

Kazakhstan, the ninth largest country in the world in area but with only 15 million people, the majority of them Muslims, has experienced an energy-fueled economic boom that has transformed it into a regional power.

DOJ_NMG_0070563

Mr. Nazarbayev is genuinely popular inside the country, though that popularity is certainly nurtured by the government's control of television, which provides lavish, uncritical coverage. Even independent surveys of voters leaving the polls showed him winning re-election handily last December, with a vote as high as 82 percent, compared with the official result of 91 percent. The lower figure came from a poll financed by the International Republican Institute.

Mr. Nazarbayev's opponents said the government's need to pad what would have been a clear victory anyway highlighted a growing trend toward authoritarianism. Oraz Jandosov, a co-chairman of a democratic opposition party, True Bright Path, said the most disturbing consequences of the power and impunity enveloping Mr. Nazarbayev's government were the deaths of two opposition leaders.

One, Zamanbek N. Nurkadilov, was found shot three times, once in the head, last November. His death was subsequently declared a suicide. The other, Altynbek Sarsenbaiuly, was killed in February along with two bodyguards on a road outside Almaty, the country's biggest city.

In August, an aide in the upper house of Parliament, Yerzhan Utembayev, and several officers of the secret services were convicted of those killings, though few here believed the declared motive: that Mr. Utembayev had been angered that Mr. Sarsenbaiuly had accused him of being a drunk in a newspaper interview three years earlier.

The actions against the American democracy programs followed soon after Mr. Sarsenbaiuly's killing, reflecting a trend to stifle any open discussion of the country's problem.

In a letter to the American Embassy, a copy of which was shown to The New York Times, Kazakh prosecutors charged the two institutes under a law that forbids "material assistance" to political parties. The institutes were accused of "the handing over of materials" and "illegal instances of transport" during their work with political and civic groups.

The accusations fit a pattern of harassment in the months leading up to last year's election, when government tax and financial agencies repeatedly investigated and audited dozens of private organizations. The Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, the institution Mr. Nazarbayev hopes to lead as chairman in 2009, criticized the election for "a number of significant shortcomings," including "an atmosphere of intimidation."

Four American officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the continuing negotiations over the institutes, said neither institute had paid for or otherwise supported partisan activity.

Two people involved in the discussions said former Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright and Senator John McCain of Arizona, the chairwoman and chairman of the Democratic and Republican institutes respectively, had written a letter to Mr. Bush urging him to raise the issue with Mr. Nazarbayev during his visit.

American officials continue to express support for Kazakhstan's opposition and for democracy here in general.

Mr. Cheney, when he visited, met over breakfast with opposition leaders for an hour and 20 minutes in a hotel in Astana, the capital. Mr. Jandosov, who was there, said he welcomed the chance to explain "what the real situation was," but expressed regret that the meeting came the morning after Mr. Cheney appeared in public with Mr. Nazarbayev and expressed support for him.

"Kazakhstan has gone along with a lot of the American oil agenda with the unspoken understanding that the Kazakhstan population is not going to be provoked," said Murat Laumulin of the Kazakhstan Institute of Strategic Studies, a research organization with close ties to the government. "There isn't to be a 'color revolution' here, and for five to seven years we don't have to worry about needing to introduce genuine democracy. We get a strategic pause."

Kazakh Leader's Visit To Require Diplomatic Finesse (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin, Usa Today

USA Today, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush meets Friday with the leader of oil-rich Kazakhstan, a visit made awkward by the country's poor human rights record and questions about its commitment to democracy.

Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbayev's trip to the White House is the second diplomatic balancing act for Bush this week. On Wednesday, Bush hosted the quarreling presidents of Afghanistan and Pakistan in an attempt to get them to jointly fight terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0070564

Nazarbayev and Bush will discuss energy, Kazakhstan's economy and efforts to fight terrorism and narcotics trafficking, the White House says.

Bush also will be "encouraging Kazakhstan to accelerate progress on democratic reform," says Frederick Jones, a spokesman for the National Security Council.

Nazarbayev, 66, has ruled Kazakhstan since 1989, when it was still a Soviet republic. The State Department's latest human rights report calls Kazakhstan's record "poor." It says the regime puts "severe limits on citizens' rights to change their government."

Rachel Denber, deputy director of Human Rights Watch for Europe and Central Asia, says Nazarbayev has stayed in power by rigging elections, the latest in December.

For Nazarbayev, the visit confirms the Bush administration values Kazakhstan's oil and strategic position between Russia, China and the Caspian Sea. Kazakhstan produces 1.2 million barrels of oil a day but has the potential to be a top producer in a decade.

U.S. companies such as Chevron have spent $6 billion there since 1993 — more than a third of the country's foreign investment, the State Department says.

Nazarbayev has sided with the United States on major issues. He bypassed Russia with an oil pipeline, despite intense pressure from the Kremlin. He also has given up the country's Soviet-era nuclear weapons.

The Kazakhstani leader has made strides in alleviating poverty and promoting secular education in a largely Muslim society, says Frederick Starr, head of the Central Asia program at the Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced and International Studies.

Two opposition leaders have died in suspicious circumstances in the past year. Zamanbek Nurkadilov was shot twice in the chest and once in the head. An official inquiry ruled his death a suicide. In the death of Altynbek Sarsenbayev, members of the Kazakh security service were among 10 people convicted of murder. Nazarbayev denies involvement. For months before he died, Sarsenbayev said he welcomed U.S. "moral support" for democracy, but he said "very soft phrases and inaction" were encouraging the country's authoritarian leadership "to oppress their own people."

Richard Boucher, assistant secretary of State for Central and South Asia, said the U.S. raises human rights concerns with Kazakhstan "regularly" but can't have "single-dimensional policies." He said the two countries have "a well-balanced relationship based on security cooperation, economic development and moving toward democratic stability."

Mexico Chides Rice For Political Remarks (AP-Y)

By Will Weissert, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 28, 2006

Mexico said Wednesday that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was out of line by suggesting that its democracy was just now maturing, saying it wasn't up to her to voice such opinions publicly.

In a Monday interview with The Wall Street Journal's editorial board, Rice said Mexico was beginning to put its disputed July 2 election behind it.

"Mexico has come through this crisis and I think it's been a real vote of confidence in the Mexican democratic system, which after all, is relatively — it's just now maturing in a kind of two-party system," Rice said.

Ruben Aguilar, spokesman for President Vicente Fox, said Wednesday that "we shouldn't be surprised that other countries salute Mexican institutions," but said Rice shouldn't comment on Mexican democracy.

"We don't agree with the declaration of the secretary of state because, in accordance with the construction of Mexico's political system, it's only up to Mexicans themselves to voice those opinions," he said told a briefing for reporters at the presidential residence.

Mexican officials have expressed even stronger disapproval of comments by Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, who recently questioned the legitimacy of the presidential election.

Rice's suggestion that Mexico is headed toward a two-party system may have been her most controversial remark. The Institutional Revolutionary Party controlled Mexico's presidency from 1929 until a stunning loss to Fox in 2000. But the country has three major political parties, and several others are represented in its Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0070565

Former Energy Secretary Felipe Calderon, of Fox's conservative, pro-business National Action Party, was declared the winner of the July 2 election by about 0.6 percent and will take office Dec. 1.

But leftist runner-up Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador has rallied hundreds of thousands in street protests alleging election fraud and he has declared a parallel government.

Aguilar would not say if Mexico planned to lodge an official complaint with Washington.

During the Wall Street Journal interview, Rice said support for Lopez Obrador appeared to be fading, noting that "while Chavez continues to say he'll support Lopez Obrador and all of that, the question is will Mexicans."

"And it doesn't appear that they will. It appears that the Mexicans wish to get back to reality here, to a stable political environment."

China Asks US To Drop Tariff Bill (FT)

By Alan Beattie And Mure Dickie

Financial Times, September 28, 2006

China's foreign ministry on Wednesday called on US senators to drop a bill that would impose 27.5 per cent tariffs on Chinese imports in retaliation for Beijing's alleged undervaluation of the renminbi.

"We hope the US senators will view objectively and rationally the problems that have emerged in the process of rapid development of Sino-US trade . . . and will cease deliberation on a bill harmful to Sino-US economic co-operation," the ministry said.

The statement was the ministry's most direct opposition yet to the legislation sponsored by senators Charles Schumer and Lindsey Graham, who are considering whether to press ahead with their bill.

Their reluctance to call for a vote this week represents a qualified vote of confidence in Hank Paulson, Treasury secretary, who has announced a high-level dialogue with the Chinese authorities that he says signals China's greater willingness to listen.

But both senators made it clear that their patience even with Mr Paulson's efforts was limited. "We believe in him," Mr Schumer said after meeting Mr Paulson on Tuesday. "On the other hand, we have seen for three years that China doesn't like to move."

He added: "We believe China is close to an immovable object. The question is whether Secretary Paulson is an unstoppable force."

Officials close to the China-US talks say the Schumer-Graham bill in itself has lost the power to shock and threaten the Chinese, not least because, they say, the two senators have indicated the bill is intended to raise the issue more than actually becoming law. But it does underline the protectionist mood in Congress, they say.

The confidence in Mr Paulson relative to his predecessor as Treasury secretary, John Snow, whose entreaties to China failed to produce much movement, was echoed by Charles Grassley, chairman of the Senate finance committee, which oversees trade. "What is wrong with [the] Schumer and Graham [bill] at this point as opposed to six months ago is that their efforts will be undercutting the negotiations that Secretary Paulson has taken forth", Mr Grassley told the FT on Tuesday. "Undercutting Paulson is a heck of a lot different from undercutting his predecessor."

The bill, however, reflects growing frustration with China's obduracy in making only small incremental changes to its exchange rate regime. Sixty-seven senators out of 100 voted for the original bill. Following the slight adjustment and move towards a floating rate system last summer, the renminbi has appreciated by only 4.3 per cent since the first vote on the Schumer-Graham bill.

The 27.5 per cent number came from what the senators said was the average estimation of the renminbi's overvaluation at the time of the bill's introduction.

The bill is very unlikely to become law, both because the House of Representatives has already passed a China trade bill and will be reluctant to undertake another, and because the White House would probably veto any bill that did make it through Congress.

A unilateral imposition of tariffs to compensate for alleged competitive currency manipulation would be flatly illegal under World Trade Organisation rules and would almost certainly spur litigation by China at the WTO.

DOJ_NMG_0070566

Tom Gallagher of the ISI Group, a Washington-based consultancy, said the symbolic impact was still important. "Once senators have gone on record twice there is a higher hurdle to reverse their votes in the future," he said. "It could highlight protectionism risks next year if the Democrats take the House."

NASA Chief, On First China Trip, Says Joint Spaceflight Is Unlikely (NYT)

By Warren E. Leary

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 27 — Any joint human spaceflights involving China and the United States will have to come in the future when there is more trust and openness between the countries, the NASA administrator, Michael D. Griffin, said Wednesday.

Speaking in Shanghai toward the end of the first visit to China by top officials from the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, Mr. Griffin said there were "no current plans to work with China on the space shuttle and space station programs."

Mr. Griffin, who characterized the five-day visit as enjoyable and informative, said that it was too early to talk about any cooperative programs between the nations, but that the first steps probably would be in data sharing and some type of joint effort with robotic spacecraft.

"We did discuss closer cooperation in our nations' science programs," Mr. Griffin said during a news conference in which American reporters participated by telephone. "We're all very encouraged by those initial discussions."

Mr. Griffin said earlier that the International Space Station program involving the United States and 15 other nations had well-established partnerships after almost 13 years and that he would not propose changing it. And since the space shuttle program is to close down in 2010 with the retirement of the three remaining orbiters, there is little prospect of Chinese involvement, he said.

China, only the third nation, after Russia and the United States, with the capacity to send humans into space, has been seeking more international cooperation in space projects, but Washington has been reluctant because of such issues as technology transfer, trading weapons technology and human rights.

The biggest difficulty, Mr. Griffin said, was with a civilian agency like NASA working with a Chinese space program dominated by that country's military. Aside from concerns about national security issues, like missile technology proliferation, human space cooperation "requires a great deal of trust and openness."

Partners in human space flight have to understand one another's equipment, systems and procedures completely, as the United States and Russia have learned to do, he said.

"We have to have a great degree of trust. If not, there is a real danger in the mix," Mr. Griffin said. "If we're going to fly together, we're going to have to depend on each other."

Mr. Griffin said the NASA group chose not to visit the Jiuquan Satellite Launch Center, an extensive rocket-launching complex in the Gobi Desert from which the Chinese prepare and fly their manned spacecraft and keep an extensive inventory of rockets.

NASA officials had received permission to visit the base, which is operated by the People's Liberation Army. But they were told that the tour would be limited to the launching pads and that they would not have access to the buildings where spacecraft are tested and prepared for launching. Mr. Griffin said that if he had been allowed to see the engineering facilities and have "eye-level discussions" with fellow engineers, he would have gone.

"I am not a tourist; this is, in fact, my profession," Mr. Griffin said at the news conference. "I have seen a lot of launch pads in my time and didn't need to go that far to see another one."

Mr. Griffin said his "get acquainted" visit, during which he met Chinese space officials and toured a number of science centers, had generally been "very enjoyable" and informative.

"Our hosts could hardly have been nicer," he said. "This is our very first visit. It's not our last visit."

Chinese Corruption Or Competition? (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0070567

THE CHINESE GOVERNMENT wants its people to believe that no one is beyond the reach of its sweeping anti-corruption campaign. That is the message behind the sacking and detention of Shanghai's Communist Party leader, Chen Liangyu, on Sunday. But few in China or anywhere else are likely to buy the notion that this is a principled crackdown on corruption.

Chen stands accused of misappropriating funds in the city's pension fund and using his position to enrich friends and family members. The member of the national Politburo may have done all that, but his real misfortune is to be associated with former President Jiang Zemin's Shanghai power base at a time when President Hu Jintao is trying to consolidate his control, partly by emasculating Shanghai's power within the party.

Chen is the highest-ranking official to be arrested or fired as a result of the anti-corruption investigations launched last spring, and other party leaders in Shanghai have been put on notice that they may be next in what could turn out to be a widespread purge. Such purges aren't uncommon when a new leader takes power in China; Jiang did much the same by prompting the resignation of Beijing's party secretary in 1995.

Getting rid of Chen serves a variety of political purposes for Hu. He eliminates a potential rival ahead of next year's party congress, sends a message to other Shanghai officials that they need to take Beijing's dictates on slower economic growth more seriously and reassures resentful residents of impoverished rural areas that the central government is concerned about all that bourgeois hedonism in China's glitziest city.

Never mind that a self-proclaimed campaign against corruption can itself be corrupt if politically driven; it still can reap dividends. In China, corruption and double-dealing are endemic throughout society. As Times staff writer Mark Magnier pointed out Sunday in an article on the country's growing crisis of trust, cheating is rampant in business relationships, false advertising is an everyday fact of life, kickbacks are ubiquitous and counterfeiting is so common that even the smallest stores are equipped with machines to authenticate currency.

Corruption, it's often said, is one of the viruses that could kill off China's economic miracle. Indeed, in most parts of the world, such an environment would have already sent investors fleeing for the exits. There is usually a direct link between corruption and poverty. Those nations at the top of Transparency International's annual list of the world's most corrupt countries tend also to top the lists of the world's poorest. But China, because of its sheer size and promise, has been able to grow spectacularly despite the corrupt practices of many government functionaries turned capitalists.

The country has an "anything goes" frontier mentality that Californians of a bygone era might have recognized. That's not sustainable forever. Lawless frontiers are a great place to make a quick buck, but eventually the citizenry gets fed up and starts screaming for a sheriff — one who isn't just going after his political rivals.

At German Conference On Muslim Relations, One Vote Is Unanimous: Mozart Must Go On (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

BERLIN, Sept. 27 — Amid all the issues that divide Germany's Muslims and non-Muslims — from women's rights to the teaching of Islam in schools — there was one point on which the 30 participants in a landmark conference held here on Wednesday could agree, according to its organizer.

They would like to see the Deutsche Oper of Berlin reinstate the Mozart opera it canceled earlier this week after receiving an anonymous threat that the production — which features a scene with the severed head of the Prophet Muhammad — could put the opera house at risk.

The 30 representatives, drawn equally from the German government and Germany's Muslim population, could even go see the opera together, said Wolfgang Schäuble, the interior minister, who organized and served as chairman of the conference, held in an 18th-century baroque palace.

With that suggestion, made at a news conference after the session, Mr. Schäuble artfully linked the public uproar over the cancellation of Mozart's "Idomeneo" to this long-planned gathering, which was meant to demonstrate Germany's resolve to reach out to its more than three million Muslims.

"We have, in a very tolerant tone, laid out quite different positions," Mr. Schäuble said. "That was the point."

DOJ_NMG_0070568

In some ways, the opera affair galvanized the meeting — underlining the urgency and complexity of the issues facing Germany, as it seeks to integrate a Muslim population that is growing in size and, in the view of some, growing farther apart from mainstream German society.

"There was general agreement that we would like to see the opera come back," said Mehmet Yildirim, the general secretary of the Turkish-Islamic Union. "But there were different perspectives on the issue."

He said that while the atmosphere on Wednesday was positive, he was less sure that Germany and its Muslim population would be able to work together over a period of years to solve their more basic differences.

The conference, which had been planned soon after Angela Merkel was elected chancellor last fall, comes at a time of heightened debate over whether Germans have been too quick to compromise their values in the face of anger, or merely the threat of anger, on the part of Muslims.

Even before the cancellation of the opera, there were misgivings here about the repeated expressions of regret by Pope Benedict XVI, a German, for his recent remarks about Islam and violence.

On Wednesday, Mrs. Merkel added her voice to a chorus of political and cultural leaders who criticized the Deutsche Oper.

"I think the cancellation was a mistake," she said to reporters. "Self-censorship does not help us against people who want to practice violence in the name of Islam. It makes no sense to retreat."

A top cultural official in Berlin, Thomas Flierl, said the city would like to stage "Idomeneo" as soon as possible. The Deutsche Oper said it was open to rescheduling it, provided that a "suitable date" could be found. On Tuesday, the director of the opera house, Kirsten Harms, said she would first have to resolve the political and diplomatic implications.

Ms. Harms has been roundly scorned. But critics said the Berlin government, particularly its chief security official, Ehrhard Körting, should have given her more advice.

At the conference, the issues were no less sensitive, ranging from the teaching of Islamic religion in public schools to the training of imams in Germany, and from the construction of mosques to the discrimination against Muslims living in this country, the majority of whom are of Turkish origin.

The meeting was a necessary step because the government needs to get a feel for the Islamic point of view, said Ayyub Axel Köhler, chairman of the Central Council of Muslims.

Complicating attempts at dialogue, Muslims in Germany are a fractured group. The government took note of that by inviting independent figures like Seyran Ates, a Turkish-German lawyer who represents victims of domestic abuse. Mr. Schäuble, an experienced and influential member of Mrs. Merkel's Christian Democratic Party, supports teaching Islam in schools. But he also insists that Muslim schoolgirls be allowed to take physical education — an activity some conservative Muslim families resist.

Mr. Schäuble, who oversees antiterrorism policy, warned Muslim leaders that they must abide by the German Constitution and the principles of a democratic society if they wanted to be included in the conference.

In an interview with Der Spiegel this week, he made clear the limits of his tolerance. "I can promise you this," he said, "anyone who calls me an infidel at the conference will be in for a fight."

The session was closed to the news media, but judging by the conciliatory tone afterward, it did not seem likely that anybody called him one.

Exhuming The Past In A Painful Quest (WP)

By N.c. Aizenman

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

NEBAJ, Guatemala -- A decade after the conclusion of the long civil war that ravaged this Central American nation, Guatemalans are literally trying to dig up their past.

Spurred by a surge of requests from victims' families this year, dozens of forensic anthropologists have been fanning out across the countryside to search for remains of the 200,000 people -- most of them Mayan Indian civilians -- who were killed or abducted during the 36-year conflict.

Many were massacred by military forces and dumped into mass graves. Others were buried hurriedly in unmarked, secret locations by relatives anxious to avoid rampaging troops.

DOJ_NMG_0070569

About 40,000 victims simply disappeared after being seized by government operatives.

Nearly every day brings another grisly discovery: skulls of toddlers executed with gunshots to the head; corpses of young men whose necks are still looped with the garrotes used to strangle them. Nearly every week brings another funeral packed with weeping relatives: once-youthful widows now wrinkled and gray, children long since grown to adulthood.

Meanwhile, in a cavernous, damp warehouse in Guatemala's capital, investigators wearing protective masks and surgical gloves are combing through piles upon piles of mildewed documents from a recently discovered secret police archive, hunting for clues to the fate of the disappeared.

The current effort is hardly the first probe of wartime atrocities since peace accords ended the conflict in 1996. But its scope and pace are unprecedented in a country where those responsible have enjoyed near impunity. Only two military officials have been imprisoned for war crimes, according to human rights activists, despite findings by a U.N. commission that government and allied paramilitary forces committed nearly all of the atrocities.

Much of the bloodletting occurred in the late 1970s, when the military-backed dictatorship that had been battling leftist guerrillas expanded its targets to include anyone critical of the government -- including students, priests and union members. But the slaughter reached its peak in the early 1980s, when the military launched a scorched-earth campaign through the countryside to eliminate any potential support for the guerrillas from the long-oppressed Mayan Indians. Hundreds of villages were burned, livestock destroyed and tens of thousands of people killed.

The remains of fewer than 5,000 victims have been returned to their families.

The anguish of those still searching was palpable among the two dozen Mayan Indians who attended a recent exhumation near this town in the central Guatemalan department of Quiche.

Most were subsistence farmers and manual laborers who could speak only their native Mayan language and could ill afford to take time off from work. Yet day after day they hiked to the grave site atop a mist-shrouded mountain -- the women bearing small children strapped to their backs with colorful blankets, the men shouldering shovels to help the forensic team dig for bodies.'I Don't Think It's Her'

Jacinto Bernal, a 56-year-old with weathered skin, blinked back tears as he watched an anthropologist brush away dirt from the skeleton of a woman who appeared to be in her thirties and may or may not have been his wife, Maria Perez. She was gunned down by a military helicopter in 1985, he said, leaving him to raise their four young children on his own.

"I don't think it's her," Bernal muttered miserably. "She was struck in the back of the head, but it looks like this skull has a hole in the front."

There was little else to go on.

Like others who used the spot as a secret burial ground during the 1980s, Bernal had been forced to sneak there after dark and could no longer remember exactly where he had buried his wife's body.

A few feet away, in a different group of peasants, Petrona Bernal, 45, squatted by a grave containing the tiny bones of a young child whom she hoped would prove to be her baby boy. He was born in 1982, shortly after Bernal's village was destroyed.

"We lived on the run," she recalled. "All we had to eat was herbs and flowers."

Malnourished and weak, she had given birth to her son in the forest, only to watch the infant die of hunger days later. Ever since, Bernal said, she has ached to recover the boy's body and give him a proper Christian burial.

Until now, she had not dared to return to the secret grave site. Many members of civil defense patrols who carried out atrocities at the military's behest still live among the communities they once terrorized. Many military leaders who directed the war remain powerful -- including Gen. EfraÃ-n RÃ-os Montt, the former dictator who today heads one of the largest parties in the legislature.

RÃ-os Montt has repeatedly denied ordering the hundreds of massacres documented during his 1982-83 tenure and has even questioned whether they took place. Forensic workers, lawyers and activists seeking to uncover war crimes have also faced repeated threats. Several have been killed.

But thanks in part to an infusion of foreign funds, private forensic teams and grass-roots organizations dedicated to helping indigenous peoples have expanded their efforts to file claims with the state to authorize exhumations.

DOJ_NMG_0070570

The campaign also received a boost in 2004 when the newly elected president, Ã“scar Berger, publicly apologized to the victims of wartime atrocities on behalf of the government. He has established a commission to compensate them as well as help fund some of the forensic work this year.

Back in the late 1990s, noted Fredy Peccerelli, head of the Guatemalan Forensic Anthropology Foundation, his organization was a tiny outfit able to conduct only about 10 exhumations a year. This year his staff of 80 has already reached 120 sites. They expect to recover about 450 bodies by the end of this year, and about 1,000 per year in the near future.

Even so, at that rate it will take decades to recover even a fraction of the total number of victims.

Finding and identifying the 40,000 who went missing is an even greater challenge. Many were pulled off buses or back roads and taken to military bases far from their home provinces to be tortured by interrogators.

Of the 650 bodies Peccerelli's group has recovered from exhumations at military bases, only 220 have been identified. The rest are being stored in stacks of cardboard boxes at the foundation's headquarters, awaiting a new initiative to collect and compare DNA samples from victims and their relatives that Peccerelli hopes to begin soon.A Massive Police Archive

Another potential source of leads is the recently discovered secret police archive. Deputies of Guatemala's human rights ombudsman stumbled upon it accidentally in July 2005 when they were investigating complaints that explosives were being unsafely stored in the area.

The documents number more than 80 million pages and date as far back as the 1880s. Stacked from floor to ceiling in room after room, they have been badly damaged by water, rats and insects, and do not include records from precincts in several regions where the worst atrocities occurred. However, buried in the mountains of paper are priceless finds like death certificates for unidentified bodies found by police. By comparing the fingerprints on the certificates with those on the national identity cards of missing victims, said Peccerelli, "you can find if there's a match and then search for the body at a specific cemetery."

Alberto Fuentes, who is overseeing the preservation and analysis of the archives, said investigators have also come across a few arrest warrants for people detained for "political crimes" who later turned up dead -- including grandmothers and babies.

But he cautioned that it would take time to find enough documents in the archives to mount a legal case against their killers. "This is a project of 20 years," he said.

The evidence generated by the recent exhumations has also failed so far to spur a rise in prosecutions.

"We still have a weak state that is scared of the military," said Frank LaRue, one of Guatemala's leading human rights advocates. "Local prosecutors are authorizing the exhumations. But when the results come in, they don't initiate criminal proceedings. So we're having all these exhumations but no trials."

Even if prosecutors were to open cases, convictions could be hard to achieve. While Guatemalan judges have sentenced some members of the civil defense patrols, suits against those who issued their orders have been tied up in legal wrangling or languished in the attorney general's office for years.

Efforts by Guatemalans to obtain justice from foreign courts have also met with obstacles. In July, Judge Santiago Pedraz of the Spanish National Court issued arrest warrants for eight former military officials, including RÃ-os Montt, on charges of genocide, torture, terrorism and illegal detention. Guatemalan authorities have not acted on the warrants, and Guatemalan courts blocked Pedraz from deposing the accused during a fact-finding trip in June.

Nonetheless, Peccerelli remains hopeful, pointing out that it took years of activism and hundreds of exhumations just to get the government to admit that civilians had been killed. "Now it is accepted that those massacres occurred," he said. "We're just waiting for the next step, and we know that the work we're doing will contribute."

Clinton Warns Divided Labor (WT/AP)

By Beth Gardiner

The Washington Times, September 28, 2006

MANCHESTER, England -- Former President Bill Clinton sought yesterday to boost Britain's badly divided Labor Party, warning supporters not to let it suffer the same fate as America's defeated Democrats.

Delegates at Labor's annual conference gave a celebrity's welcome to a leader they love far more than President Bush, who is widely despised in the party.

DOJ_NMG_0070571

Mr. Clinton charmed a packed auditorium with a 40-minute speech in which he lavished praise on Prime Minister Tony Blair and treasury chief Gordon Brown, Mr. Blair's likely successor.

In a reference to the political damage that Mr. Blair suffered at home because of his relationship with Mr. Bush, Mr. Clinton thanked him for maintaining Britain's alliance with the United States "through quite a lot of storm as well as occasional sunshine."

He said that because Labor had been so successful in strengthening Britain's economy and modernizing its society, there was a danger that voters would assume the improvements were "just a part of the landscape" and that any party that came to power would make similar choices.

"I have been there," he said, recalling that his administration cut the U.S. deficit drastically, only to watch it balloon under Mr. Bush. "I say that to remind you that it can change quickly."

With the departing Mr. Blair, Labor's most successful leader ever, the party faces a perilous future. Infighting has tarnished its image, and the opposition Conservative Party is surging after nearly a decade in the doldrums.

A fierce party rebellion forced Mr. Blair to announce Sept. 7 that he will quit within a year. In his emotional final conference speech Tuesday, he warned the party to stop its internal battles or risk being punished at the polls.

Some Labor backers worry that Mr. Brown, who lacks Mr. Blair's charm and polish, will be unable to beat back Conservative leader David Cameron. But a battle to keep the finance minister from getting the top job could be divisive.

Mr. Clinton told the delegates that they should be proud of all they had accomplished to change Britain.

"Your prime minister, his government, your party, have been a stunning success," he said, praising Labor for creating jobs and leading the way internationally on fighting poverty and global warming. "None of this is an accident."

He argued that the party would always have to change its policies to keep up in a fast-moving world and urged them not to let themselves be cast as supporters of the status quo while their opponents are seen as advocates of change.

Delegate Christopher Wellbelove, a local council member in southern London, said Mr. Clinton's reminder of the Democrats' defeat by Mr. Bush and his Republicans was chilling.

"We got a very clear warning that if we don't stick together, we could lose everything" and give the Tories a shot at winning elections expected in 2009. "It can all be taken away."

Risky Wishes At The U.N. (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

The 15 nations that will gather in New York today to conduct a straw vote on who is to be the next U.N. secretary general should reflect on a durable lesson of political life: Be careful what you wish for. You may get it.

That warning of the dangers of answered prayers applies particularly to President Bush and his support for Ban Ki Moon, South Korea's reliably stolid foreign minister, in the highly competitive race to succeed Kofi Annan at year's end. Bush -- pilloried by Third World radicals at last week's General Assembly opening -- may be picking up a lightning rod instead of a shield.

Bush's decision rewards a long-established U.S. ally, South Korea, rather than a new U.S. strategic partner, India, which supports favorite son Shashi Tharoor. Tharoor, a U.N. civil servant, novelist and historian, is as presentationally polished as Ban is laconic.

In two previous polls of Security Council members, Washington has voted to encourage both the leading candidates to stay in the race. A shift to voting only for Ban -- a move that Bush indicated he would make to South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun at a White House meeting this month -- would probably doom the hopes of Tharoor and the other candidates.

It is unusual for the competition to end so early for a job that provides the world's biggest diplomatic megaphone and little else in terms of real power. But everything else about this year's contest has been unusual and, alas, probably seminal.

The campaigning for votes from the Security Council members has been unusually open, political and intense, with candidates crisscrossing the globe for the past two months to drum up support. South Korea's generosity in foreign aid and investment decisions may work in Ban's favor with some nations, it is said in diplomatic understatement in the corridors of the United Nations.

DOJ_NMG_0070572

Bush has other motivations. Supporting Ban smooths Bush's once-troubled relations with Roh. Helping secure the top diplomatic job at the world body for an American ally would be an important first and an asset for Bush's growing concern with his legacy. There may be hope as well in Washington that Ban would be more tractable -- or at least quieter and more remote -- than was Annan, who made jarringly public his disagreements with Bush over international law and the war in Iraq.

Annan in fact worked hard to protect U.S.-U.N. relations and came under fire from Third World radicals for being "too responsive" to Washington as they sought to play up a widening North-South divide in the world body.

The headlines on the diatribes that Iran's Mahmoud Ahmadinejad delivered last week in any forum available in New York, including the General Assembly hall, concentrated on his attacks on Bush. But Ahmadinejad was even more confrontational about the United Nations, whose legitimacy the Iranian directly challenged. Having such a highly visible American ally in charge of the U.N. Secretariat might complicate the vital negotiating role that the world body will play in resolving the Iranian crisis or in the confrontation with North Korea over its nuclear arms.

Those are not sufficient reasons for Washington to drop its support of Ban, who is a well-respected diplomat. But they are reasons for the Bush team to be careful in building expectations about what Ban's election would mean for U.S. strategic interests. At a time when the United Nations itself needs defending and explaining to many skeptical audiences throughout the world, traditional diplomacy may not be the best qualification for a new secretary general.

Security Council ambassadors will not actually vote for or against anyone today. They will mark ballot sheets to encourage, discourage or express no opinion on declared candidates. It is still possible that last-minute horse-trading could produce a muddled outcome that would encourage new candidates to get into the race.

Top jobs are also open at the World Health Organization, where China is making a strong push, and the World Food Program, where Europe hopes one of its citizens will replace previous American directors. The temptation will be strong to barter votes in a package deal.

Reserving or rewarding such high-responsibility jobs on a regional or national basis -- or because of a history of alliances -- is an obsolete luxury in the age of globalization. Merit and suitability should be the only criteria in a game that must be played by transparent rules.

DOJ_NMG_0070573

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

House Passes Detainee Bill As It Clears Senate Hurdle (NYT).... 4
Rules For Terror Detainees Near Final Passage (USAT) 5
House Clears Way For Passage Of Military-tribunal Legislation (HILL) 6
House Approves Bill On Terror Detainees (AP) 7
US House Passes Controversial Bill On Terror Suspects (AFP) .. 8
House Approves Bill On Detainees (WP) 9
House Approves Bush Proposal On Tribunals For Gitmo Suspects (WT) 10
Detainee Bill Now Goes To Senate (LAT) 11
Rushing Off A Cliff (NYT) 13
Don't Suspend Habeas Corpus (LAT) 14
The White House Warden (LAT) 14
Judge Rejects Ashcroft's Immunity Claim (AP) 15
Domestic Spying Showdown Set For Detroit Court (FREEP) 16
Yassin Aref Takes The Stand (CAP9) 16

Patriot Act:

Terror Laws Cut Resettlement Of Refugees (NYT)..... 16
More Refugees Are Settling In Mid-Size Cities, Study Finds (WP) 17

Homeland Response:

Report To Criticize White House Over Local Effort In Terror Fight (WSJ) 18
Sources: Homeland Agent Who Made Cuts Is Out (NSDY) 19
Package Prompted D.C. Courthouse Evacuation (WP) 20
D.C. Courthouse Reopens After Bomb Scare (AP)..... 20
Crowded ERs Raise Concerns On Readiness (WP)..... 21
Chemical Plant Security (1 Letter) (NYT) 21
N.J. Congressman Asks For FBI Briefing Over 2001 Anthrax Scare (AP) 22
Johanns: Americans Shouldn't Take Safe Food Supply For Granted (BVND) 22

War News:

White House Refuses To Release Full NIE (AP-Y)..... 23
Dispute On Intelligence Report Disrupts Republicans' Game Plan (NYT) 24
Iraq And Jihad: A Consensus Surfaces (CSM) 25
White House Refuses To Release Full Report On Iraq, Terrorism (WSJ) 26
Iraq Report Is Due In '07; Skeptics Want To See It Now (NYT).. 28
White House Holds Ground On Terror Study (LAT)..... 29
Lessons Of The NIE (WSJ) 30
A Good Estimate (WP)..... 31
Declassifying The Obvious (LAT) 31
Infidel Documents (WSJ) 32
The Grand Delusion (NYT) 34
At Dinner Table, Bush Plays Role Of Mediator (WP) 35
Bush Urges Karzai, Musharraf To Unite To Defeat Terrorism (WSJ) 36
Bush Plays Chaperon For Awkward Encounter (NYT)..... 37
Bush Hosts Tense Dinner For Karzai, Musharraf (WT)..... 38
Hold The Vinegar, Bush Urges (LAT) 39
Taliban Strikes On U.S. Troops Triple After Truce (WT/AP) 40
In Tribal Pakistan, An Uneasy Quiet (WP)..... 41
Bush Urges Karzai, Musharraf To Put Terror Fight Before Feud (USAT/AP) 43
Nato 'must Speed Up Reaction' To Taliban (FT)..... 43
American Commanders Question Political Will Of Iraqi Prime Minister (WP) 44
Military Officials Add To U.S. Criticism Of Iraq's Government (NYT) 45
Iraq Impeding Efforts To Go After Shiite Militias, U.S. Military Says (LAT) 46
U.S. General Warns That Iraq Is Close To Dissolving Into Civil War (MCT) 48
Poll: Iraqis Back Attacks On U.S. Troops (AP) 49
U.S. To Gauge Iraqi Support For Operations (WP)..... 49
Rise In Violence Accompanies Ramadan (USAT/AP) 50
Cleric Said To Lose Reins Over Part Of Iraqi Militia (NYT) 51
Heralded Iraq Police Academy A 'Disaster' (WP)..... 52
Two Wars, One Mission (LAT)..... 53

DOJ:

Eid's Ethnicity An Asset, Not An Issue (DENP) 54

Corporate Scandals:

Dunn Suggests She Was Unaware Of Probe Tactics (WSJ)..... 55
Ex-H.P. Officer To Say She Knew Of No Illegality (NYT)..... 57
Ousted HP Chairwoman Says She Consulted Others In Leak Probe, Was Certain Methods Were Legal (FINDLAW/AP) 58
CEO Faces Gantlet At Hearings (USAT)..... 59
HP Leader Hurd Expected To Apologize At Hearing (USAT) 61

House Panel Expands Probe Of Hewlett-Packard Spying (HILL)62
Between The Lines Of HP's Spy Scandal (WP) 63
Dunn And Dumber (WSJ) 64
A Fugitive's Haven In Africa Turned Out To Be Anything But (WSJ) 65
Former Chief Of Comverse Is Arrested In Namibia (NYT) 66
Fugitive CEO, Sought In Brooklyn, Captured In Namibia (FINDLAW/AP) 67
Former Comverse Chief Alexander Arrested In Namibia (Update5) (BLOOM) 68
Bondholders Seek $21.5 Million In Damages From BearingPoint Default (WP) 69
Regulators Urge Joint Action On Derivatives (FT)..... 70
Projects Under Scrutiny (HC)..... 70
Some Shocked At Sentence (HC) 71

Criminal Law:

Jeanine Pirro Under Criminal Investigation (WNBC-TV)..... 73
U.S. Investigating Pirro's Talk Of Taping Spouse (NYT)..... 73
AG Candidate Focus Of FBI Investigation (AP) 75
Gifted School Teacher Arrested On Pornography Charges (NSDY)..... 76
PIRRO'S FURY AT CHEATING AL (NYPOST) 77
Uh, Jeanine, Hope You Had Career Plan B (NYDN)..... 79
Pirro: Feds' Probe Is 'Highly Improper' (CBS2CHI) 79
U.S. Attorney's Office Fires Back At Pirro Accusations (WNBC-TV) 80
In The Murky World Of Marital Spying, Legal Pitfalls Await Those Who Tape A Spouse (NYT)..... 81
Kerik Is Again A Figure In An Official Investigation (NYT)..... 82
Judge Declares Another Mistrial In Gotti Racketeering Case (FINDLAW/AP) 83
For The Third Time, A Jury Fails To Convict Gotti (NYT)..... 84
Jury Tunes Out Tapes (NYDN)..... 85
MISTRIAL TEARS OF JOY FOR 'JR.' (NYPOST)..... 86
A THIRD MISTRIAL (NSDY) 86
Fuhgeddaboud Me Stayin' Here (NYDN) 87
Will Prosecutors Throw In Towel? (NSDY)..... 89
Thank Goodness For Fair Judge (NYDN) 89
For Theft Of Rare Maps, A Sentence Of 42 Months (NYT)..... 90
Map Dealer Dealt Prison Term In Thefts (BOS)..... 91
Antique Map Thief Gets 3 1/2-Year Jail Term (AP)..... 91
Baton Rouge Woman Pleads Guilty In FEMA Fraud Counts (BRADV) 92
FEMA Workers Charged With Fraud (NYT) 92
'It's Over,' Says Ex-prosecutor (DEN)..... 92
MARLINGA ACQUITTED: 'Thank God' For The Verdict (FREEP)..... 93
Judgment For Marlinga (FREEP) 95
Figure In New Orleans Corruption Probe Avoids Prison (AP)..... 95
Feds Ask Judge To Shield Evidence In Probe Of Fumo, Nonprofit (SCCD)..... 96
Judge Bars Full Gag On Fumo Case Info (PHI)..... 96
Prosecutor Says U.S. Probe Of Fumo To End This Year (PHI).. 97
2 Ad Men Admit Pay-to-play Scheme (PHI) 98
Polygamist Sect Leader Will Stay Jailed (AP) 99
Jeffs' Attorney Says Case Is 'religious Persecution' (SGS)..... 99
Jeffs In Jail Until November (DESERET)..... 100
Warren Jeffs Trial: Witness Set To Testify In Rape Case (SLT)101
Judge Urged Not To Release Intel Reports (AP) 102
House Suspends Hill Telecom License (WP)..... 102
House Reviews Foxcom License (RC)..... 103
Woman Charged In Porn Case (PTR)..... 104
Town's Residents Say They Were Targets Of Big Mortgage Fraud (WSJ)..... 104
Mortgage Suit Says 'Trust Us' Led To Fleecing (NYT)..... 106
Good Cybercitizens Keep Watch Over ID-theft Victims (USAT) 108
Louisiana Renews Call For Dicks' Extradition (FT) 110
2nd Emergency Crime Law Eyed (WT) 110
Karr Lawyers Ask To Have Porn Charges Dropped (USAT)..... 111
Sex Offender Admits Killing Teen In NE (WP) 112
Mid Now Faces Rape Charges (BSUN) 112
Former Soldier Charged With Smuggling Machine Guns (ARMYT)..... 114
Prison For Man Who Assaulted Feds (PTR) 114
Inmate Who Assaulted Federal Deputy Gets 17-year Prison Sentence (PPG)..... 114
Man Helped By Priests Is Charged With Fraud (NYT) 115
Crime Lab Probe Tab To Grow By $1.5 Million (HC) 116
Some Lethal Injections May Have Been 'Excruciating' (LAT) ... 116

Civil Law:

S.J. Nursing Home Guilty Of Defrauding Medicare (MERCN) .. 117
House Panel Moves FOIA Bill Forward (AP-Y) 117
Court Doesn't Intervene In 'Electioneering' Case (RC) 118

Civil Rights:

Discrimination Case Opens Door To Internet ADA Claims (LAW)118
Voting Is Tricky Mission For Troops Waiting For Ballots In Battlefield (USAT) 119
Overseas Voting A Concern — Again (USAT) 120
Restore Voter Confidence (USAT) 121

Antitrust:

Mittal Prefers To Sell Weirton (BSUN)..... 121
Federated Stores Says Icahn Plans To Increase Stake (Update4) (BLOOM) 122
Judge Dismisses Key Part Of AMD Antitrust Lawsuit Against Intel, Sets Trial Date (FINDLAW/AP)..... 123
Symantec: Microsoft Won't Give Us Key Vista Tech (CNET) ... 123
Johnson & Johnson Charges Leak To Competitor Subverted $24B Acquisition (LAW)..... 124
E.On Closes In On Endesa Deal (WSJ) 125
Rural Areas Left In Slow Lane Of High-Speed Data Highway (NYT) 126
Cable Guys (WSJ) 128

Environment/Indian Affairs:

No Charges In Sound Oil Spill (SEAPI) 129
State's Greenhouse Gas Bill Signed (LAT) 131
California: Schwarzenegger Signs Gas Emissions Act (NYT/AP)131
Warming Trend Is Hatching A Business (WP)..... 132

DOJ_NMG_0070575

Heed This Warning (WP) ... 133
Number Of Smoggy Days Falls, Study Says (WP) ... 134
American Indians Await Trial On Lawsuit (AP-Y) ... 134
FBI Agent (DESERET) ... 135

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Chargers Safety Kiel Arrested On Drug-Related Charges (ESPN) ... 136
Chargers' Kiel Arrested For Trafficking Of Prescription Drugs (BLOOM) ... 136
Kiel Is Arrested In Cough Syrup Case (AP) ... 137
Charger Kiel Admits Shipping Illegal Drugs (UPI) ... 137
DEA: Kiel Arrest Linked To Codeine Diversion (SDUT) ... 137
Feds Arrest Chargers Safety During PracticeInvestigators Say Packages Shipped By Kiel Contained Controlled Substance (KNBC) ... 139
Feds Reveal Details About Charger Drug Arrest (KNSD-TV) ... 139
Feds Rounding Up Suspected Immigrant Drug Dealers (ADN) 140
Bill To Criminalize Border Tunneling Easily Finds Support (SDUT) ... 141
Plan Colombia: Big Gains, But Cocaine Still Flows (CSM) ... 141

Immigration:

Armey Blasts Republicans Over Opposition To Guest-worker Plan (MCT) ... 144
Visas For Skilled Workers Still Frozen (WP) ... 144
In Immigrant Fight, Grass-Roots Groups Boost Their Clout (WSJ) ... 145
Herndon Zeroing In On Illegal Immigrants (WP) ... 148

Tax:

How Merck Saved $1.5 Billion Paying Itself For Drug Patents (WSJ) ... 149

Congress-Administration:

Congress To Approve Defense Bill Rivaling Vietnam-Era Spending (WSJ) ... 151
Costs Of The Wars In Iraq And Afghanistan Could Reach $549 Billion (MCT) ... 152
109th Congress Gets Props For Creativity, If Nothing Else (WP)153
Bush Visits Hill To Rally Senate Troops Before Election (HILL) 154
As 2 Bushes Try To Fix Schools, Tools Differ (NYT) ... 154
Connecticut Lawsuit Is Cut Back (NYT) ... 156
Judge Dismisses Most Of No Child Lawsuit (AP) ... 156
Key Democrats Blast GOP For Failure To Rein In Budget (MCT)157
Nov. 15 Set For Vote On House GOP Leaders (HILL) ... 157
Boehner Looks Secure In 110th (RC) ... 159
'Concern' In Murtha Camp (HILL) ... 160
Big Cuts At NASA Threaten Aviation (USAT) ... 161
Veterans' Group Wants Larger Raise For Military (WP) ... 162
Goodbye, Dr. Frist (HILL) ... 163
With Love To Dear Ol' Dad (WP) ... 164
How To Deploy Paulson Might Be Bush's Biggest Economic Policy Decision (WSJ) ... 166
Prescription For A Stronger F.D.A. (NYT) ... 167

Other News:

11,722.98 (USAT) ... 167
Blue Chips Inch Closer To Record (WSJ) ... 168
Orders For Big-ticket Items Fall, Indicating Cooling Economy (USAT) ... 169
Durable-Goods Orders Fall But New-Home Sales Rise; A Hard Or Soft Landing? (WSJ) ... 169
Report Shows Home Sales Rising, But Skeptics Abound (NYT)170
Hispanic Unemployment Down, Study Finds (WP) ... 171
The Reliable Source (WP) ... 172
John Danforth (CSM) ... 173
Danforth Warns Of Christian Right But Says Tide Will Turn (WP)174
Big Openings For Democrats (RC) ... 175
A Forfeited Battleground District (WP) ... 176
Democrats Decide They Don't Need 'Contract' To Win (RC) ... 177
Warning: Races May Not Be As Close As They Appear (RC) ... 178
Calls Grow For Release Of Intelligence Report (WSJ) ... 179
House GOP Pushes Its 'Suburban Agenda' (WT) ... 180
New Hope For Democrats In Bid For Senate (NYT) ... 181
Controversy Clouds Allen's Re-election Bid (USAT) ... 182
Webb Denies Ever Using Word As Epithet (WP) ... 183
Is There Life After 'Macaca'? (WSJ) ... 184
A Platform Of Bigotry (NYT) ... 186
Tennessee Battles For Senate (WT) ... 186
Mfume Endorses Cardin, But Adds Caveat (WP) ... 187
The Democrats' Charisma Doctor (WP) ... 188
Inside Politics (WT) ... 190
Arnold's Turnaround (WP) ... 191
Democrats Follow Clinton's Lead In Ripping Fox News (WT) ... 192
Giuliani Comes To Clinton's Defense Over Terrorism Preparedness (BRAH) ... 193
Is There Life After 'Macaca'? (WSJ) ... 193
AIDS Bill Is Dilemma For Clinton (HILL) ... 195
Bill Clinton's 60th Birthday Benefit Blowout (WP) ... 196
Twin Cities To Host 2008 GOP Convention (AP) ... 197
Republicans Pick Twin Cities For 2008 Presidential Convention (MCT) ... 198
GOP Picks Minnesota For 2008 Convention (USAT) ... 199
GOP To Go To Minnesota (HILL) ... 200
G.O.P. Picks Twin Cities As '08 Site Of Convention (NYT) ... 200
With Eye On Midwest In '08, GOP Picks Twin Cities For Convention (WP) ... 201
GOP Will Convene In Battleground (RC) ... 202
RNC Picks Twin Cities For 2008 (WT) ... 203
Scientists Form Group To Support Science-Friendly Candidates (NYT) ... 203
Checkout For An Undemocratic Checkoff (WP) ... 204
The Road To Inefficiency (WP) ... 205
Oh, No, Low Prices (WSJ) ... 205
Ahmadinejad: We Won't Forgo Nuke Rights (AP) ... 206
Iran, EU Negotiators Hold Nuclear Talks (AP) ... 206
U.S. To Wait 'A Few Weeks' On Iran Move (WT) ... 207
Mr. Buffett's Excellent Idea (NYT) ... 208
Egypt Developing Nuclear Energy Program (MCT) ... 208
Envoy: Nuclear Talks Enter Crucial Phase (AP) ... 209

DOJ_NMG_0070576

US Warns Against North Korea Nuclear Test (AFP)..... 210
U.S. Weighs Moves Against Sudan Over U.N. Force (WP)..... 211
Rice Says Sudan Could Face More Sanctions Over Darfur (NYT) 212
Rice Calls For Cease-fire In Darfur (AP)..... 212
Little Pressure On Hezbollah To Disarm (AP-Y)..... 213
Israel Releases High-Ranking Hamas Official (NYT) 214
Israeli Military Court Frees Hamas Deputy PM (FT)..... 215
Israel Releases Palestinian Deputy PM (AP) 215
For Kazakh Leader's Visit, U.S. Seeks A Balance (NYT)..... 216
Kazakh Leader's Visit To Require Diplomatic Finesse (USAT). 218
Mexico Chides Rice For Political Remarks (AP-Y)..... 219
China Asks US To Drop Tariff Bill (FT)..... 219
NASA Chief, On First China Trip, Says Joint Spaceflight Is Unlikely (NYT)..... 220
Chinese Corruption Or Competition? (LAT)..... 221
At German Conference On Muslim Relations, One Vote Is Unanimous: Mozart Must Go On (NYT) 221
Exhuming The Past In A Painful Quest (WP) 222
Clinton Warns Divided Labor (WT/AP) 224
Risky Wishes At The U.N. (WP) 225

TERRORISM NEWS:

House Passes Detainee Bill As It Clears Senate Hurdle (NYT)

By Carl Hulse, Kate Zernike

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 27 — Congress took major steps on Wednesday toward establishing a new system for interrogating and trying terror suspects as the House approved legislation sought by President Bush and the Senate defeated efforts to alter the measure.

The House, in a politically charged decision, voted 253 to 168 in favor of extensive new rules governing the questioning of terror suspects and bringing them before military tribunals. The Senate was expected to follow suit on Thursday, which would deliver Republicans a major national security victory before the elections.

"The time to act is now," said Senator Bill Frist, the majority leader, as he opened Senate debate after reaching a deal with Democrats who agreed not to stand in the way of a final vote on the bill in exchange for consideration of amendments.

In the House, 219 Republicans and 34 Democrats, many in more competitive districts, supported the bill; 160 Democrats and 7 Republicans opposed it; the opponents included the Democratic leadership and major party voices on the military and intelligence issues.

Republicans immediately sought to portray the vote as a defining one between the two parties. "It is outrageous that House Democrats, at the urging of their leaders, continue to oppose giving President Bush the tools he needs to protect our country," said Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the majority leader.

But Democrats said the legislation would reverse fundamental American values by allowing seizure of evidence in this country without a search warrant, allowing evidence obtained through cruel and inhuman treatment, and denying relief or appeal to people like Maher Arar, whom the United States sent to Syria for interrogation that included torture even after the Canadian government told American officials he was not a terrorist.

"This is un-American, this is unconstitutional, this is contrary to American interests, this is not what a great and good and powerful nation should be doing," said Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont.

Backers of the measure said the legislation, which was sought by Mr. Bush after the Supreme Court in June struck down the administration's system for trying detainees, would guarantee terror suspects adequate rights while not hindering interrogations.

"We are dealing with the enemy in war, not defendants in our criminal justice system," said Representative Duncan Hunter, Republican of California and chairman of the Armed Services Committee. "In time of war it is not practical to apply the same rules of evidence that we apply in civil trials or courts martial for our troops."

Leading Democrats said the approach would result in government-sanctioned mistreatment of detainees. They predicted it would be again thrown out by the Supreme Court, leaving the United States remaining without a system to try terrorists after a wait that has already extended five years beyond Sept. 11, 2001.

"If you want to be tough on terrorists, let's not pass something that rushes to judgment and has legal loopholes that will reverse a conviction," said Representative Ike Skelton of Missouri, senior Democrat on the Armed Services Committee.

Fellow Democrats said the measure could be interpreted by other nations as reducing America's commitment to the rights of prisoners of war.

DOJ_NMG_0070577

"When our moral standing is eroded, our international credibility is diminished as well," said Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the No. 2 Democrat in the House.

Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the senior Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, characterized the bill as the product of an administration that "has been relentless in its determination to legitimize the abuse of detainees."

But Republicans argued repeatedly that the nation is facing a faceless and brutal enemy that lurks in the shadows, requiring a new way of thinking on the part of the United States and giving new importance to the ability to freely interrogate them.

"Information is the key weapon we have to prevent them from killing us and prevent them from attacking others in the future," said Representative Mac Thornberry, Republican of Texas, who said he worried the measure might go too far in tying the hands of American operatives.

The House debate was interrupted repeatedly by protesters in the gallery, who were removed by security workers.

The bill was a compromise worked out between the White House and three Senate Republicans who for weeks had resisted the administration's approach. They contended the White House's initial bill would violate the Constitution and redefine the nation's obligations under the Geneva Conventions, signaling to other nations that they too could rewrite the rules on dealing with combatants seized in wartime.

The intraparty rift had threatened to derail Republican hopes to champion theirs as the party of national security, but before the debate began, Mr. Frist smilingly declared, "Republicans united." Mr. Bush accepted Mr. Frist's invitation to meet with Republican senators on Thursday morning as they prepared to vote to rally their support and build their spirits before Republicans hit the campaign trail.

Democrats had stayed mainly on the sidelines during the fight among Republicans, but the pending votes in the House and Senate have forced them to take firm positions on the bill. Senate Democrats did allow a vote to go forward, escaping criticism that they were obstructing the measure, and thus denying Republicans a potential political hammer.

House Democrats were prevented from offering any amendments. Under the Senate agreement, Democrats were allowed four proposed amendments. One, by Mr. Levin, would have adopted the approach endorsed by the Armed Services Committee and the three Republicans who resisted the Bush administration: Senators John Warner of Virginia, John McCain of Arizona, and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina. It failed on a 54-to-43 vote, with two Democrats, Senators Mary L. Landrieu of Louisiana and Ben Nelson of Nebraska, crossing party lines.

Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and chairman of the Judiciary Committee, pressed an amendment that would strike a provision from the bill that prohibits terror suspects from challenging their detention in the courts. "What the bill seeks to do is set back basic rights by some 900 years," said Mr. Specter, who traced the ability to challenge one's detention to the Magna Carta.

Concerned the legislation was being rushed through before an election without most senators understanding what was in the final version, Democratic Senators Robert C. Byrd of Virginia and Barack Obama of Illinois planned to offer a sunset provision that would require Congress to review the military commissions, as the trials are known, in five years.

Republicans said they were confident they could hold off any changes when the remaining amendments come up for a vote on Thursday.

While Republicans were nearing success on a key element of their agenda with the terrorism bill, disputes among top Republicans in the House and Senate were threatening other measures they hoped to pass, particularly a domestic security spending bill and a Pentagon policy bill. Lawmakers were scrambling to resolve the differences to avoid leaving the bills on the shelf. They have already abandoned efforts to strike a final agreement on a measure governing a National Security Agency surveillance program, though the House is scheduled to consider the bill on Thursday.

Rules For Terror Detainees Near Final Passage (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — Legislation setting rules for the interrogation and trial of terrorism suspects passed the House on Wednesday and is headed for Senate approval today, as Congress tries to balance national security needs with the rights of prisoners.

The bill would permit creation of military tribunals to try terrorism suspects such as alleged 9/11 mastermind Khalid Sheikh Mohammed and others now held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. It also would allow President Bush to claim a legislative victory on national security 40 days before the Nov. 7 elections.

Bush hailed the 253-168 House vote as an important step to "help keep the country safe."

DOJ_NMG_0070578

The legislation was required after the Supreme Court ruled in June that Bush's previous plan for trials was unconstitutional. It reflects a compromise between the White House and three prominent Republican senators — John Warner of Virginia, John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina — who forced key changes.

Final action on another measure that Bush says he needs to fight terrorism, legislation authorizing a telephone surveillance program, has been delayed until after Election Day because of disagreements among Republicans.

Proponents of the bill the House passed Wednesday said it will provide CIA interrogators with clear rules and foreign detainees with a chance to appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court. "It gives more rights to these people than they get under any other regime in the world," said Rep. Dan Lungren, R-Calif.

Critics said it does not put enough checks on the power of the military and the White House to detain foreign terrorism suspects indefinitely, without having to present evidence of their guilt.

"From my family's personal experience, I know what can happen to the rights of Americans when an administration overreaches in time of war," said Rep. Doris Matsui, D-Calif. She was born at an internment camp where her parents and other Japanese-Americans were confined during World War II.

The bill classifies nine serious offenses against prisoners, including torture, as war crimes. McCain has said the legislation will ban extreme tactics such as "water boarding," in which a person is made to believe he is about to be drowned.

Rep. Jane Harman of California, the top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, said the bill doesn't give Congress adequate authority to monitor the CIA's interrogation program. "I remain very skeptical," she said.

In the Senate, Democrats were pushed back in their first attempt Wednesday to alter the bill. They plan to offer more amendments today. Bill opponents conceded that many lawmakers will be leery of casting a vote that could be criticized as soft on terrorism by their campaign opponents. "I think the closeness of the election has an effect," said Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the top Democrat on the Armed Services Committee.

House Clears Way For Passage Of Military-tribunal Legislation (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen, Roxana Tiron

The Hill, September 28, 2006

Republicans and Democrats in the Senate struck a deal yesterday that appeared to clear the way for the enactment of a controversial military-tribunal bill. The agreement positions the GOP to claim a significant legislative achievement, and perhaps an important political victory, before lawmakers leave town to campaign for reelection.

"If the Democrats oppose it, it will be to their political detriment," Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) said.

The House yesterday passed the bill, 252-168, with 34 Democrats voting for it and seven Republicans voting against it. The Senate was considering identical but separate legislation, meaning that one chamber would still have to pass the other chamber's version of the bill for it to be sent to the president.

Senate Democrats agreed to expedite consideration of the measure, which would establish a trial system for unlawful enemy combatants and provide more-detailed definitions of war crimes in order to protect nonmilitary intelligence officials from being prosecuted for using certain techniques to interrogate terror suspects.

"We are trying to pass a good bill and we worked on a good bill," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.).

In return, Republicans agreed to allow five amendments to be offered on the floor, four by Democrats and one by Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.).

The bill itself is the product of a compromise between the White House and a band of recalcitrant Senate Republicans led by John Warner (Va.), John McCain (Ariz.) and Lindsey Graham (S.C.), who initially differed from the president on the use of classified evidence against terrorism suspects, the treatment of detainees under the Geneva Conventions and the War Crimes Act, and other issues.

The administration ended its program for trying unlawful enemy combatants in June when the Supreme Court deemed it to be unconstitutional.

House Democrats warned that the new legislation, written by Republicans, could also be challenged in the courts.

"Our nation cannot afford to have any terrorist convictions overturned on judicial appeal," said Rep. Ike Skelton (Mo.), the top Democrat on the Armed Services Committee. "We should be taking the time to get this done right, not rushing through the process in an election-year frenzy."

They also said the measure could endanger American troops by giving the administration too much latitude to interrogate terror suspects.

DOJ_NMG_0070579

"Agreeing to such an ambiguous compromise would allow the president to define torture when and how he sees fit and would undoubtedly put our armed forces at risk of abuse while doing little to obtain the intelligence we need from terrorists currently detained," said Rep. Ellen Tauscher (D-Calif.).

Republicans argued that the legislation is an important piece of the administration's arsenal for combating terrorism.

"By formally establishing terrorist tribunals, the bill provides another critical tool in fighting the war on terror. And it provides a measure of justice to the victims of 9/11," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said.

"The American people can't afford to wait. Even though we are in the midst of an election year, this issue – the safety and security of the American people – should transcend partisan politics. The time to act is now," he said.

In the Senate, Democrats were expected to seek votes on their amendments, including one offered by Carl Levin (Mich.), the ranking Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, that would substitute a version of the bill approved by that panel, and one offered by Sen. Robert Byrd (D- W.Va.), that would end the president's authority to conduct the tribunals after five years. The Senate turned back the Levin amendment late yesterday afternoon.

Frist confidently predicted that none of the amendments would pass.

"We'll be able to defeat those," he said.

"We wanted to keep it as clean as possible," Frist spokeswoman Carolyn Weyforth said.

House Approves Bill On Terror Detainees (AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, September 27, 2006

The House approved legislation Wednesday giving the Bush administration authority to interrogate and prosecute terrorism detainees, moving President Bush to the edge of a pre-election victory with a key piece of his anti-terror plan.

The mostly party-line 253-168 vote in the Republican-run House prompted bitter charges afterward by House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., that opposition Democrats were coddling terrorists, perhaps foreshadowing campaign attack ads to come. Democrats responded that the GOP leader was trying to provoke fear.

Even as the House debated the bill, senators of the two parties agreed to limit debate on their own nearly identical measure, all but ensuring its passage on Thursday.

Republican leaders are hoping to work out differences and send Bush a final version before leaving Washington this weekend to campaign for the Nov. 7 congressional elections.

The legislation would establish a military court system to prosecute terror suspects, a response to the Supreme Court ruling in June that Congress' blessing was necessary. While the bill would grant defendants more legal rights than they had under the administration's old system, it nevertheless would eliminate rights usually granted in civilian and military courts.

The measure also provides extensive definitions of war crimes such as torture, rape and biological experiments — but gives Bush broad authority to decide which other techniques U.S. interrogators can legally use. The provisions are intended to protect CIA interrogators from being prosecuted for war crimes.

For nearly two weeks, the GOP has been embarrassed as the White House and rebellious Republican senators have fought publicly over whether Bush's plan would give him too much authority. But they struck a compromise last Thursday, and Republicans are hoping approval will bolster their effort to cast themselves as strong on national security, a marquee issue this election year.

In a statement issued after the vote, Bush, who will visit GOP senators Thursday morning, urged the Senate to approve the measure and congratulated the House for its "commitment to strengthening our national security."

Hastert's comments were biting. He said in a statement that Democrats supporting the measure "voted today in favor of MORE rights for terrorists."

He added, "So the same terrorists who plan to harm innocent Americans and their freedom worldwide would be coddled, if we followed the Democrat plan."

In response, Pelosi, D-Calif., said Democrats feared the House-passed measure could endanger U.S. soldiers by encouraging other countries to limit the rights of captured American troops. She said the bill would be vulnerable to being overturned by the Supreme Court.

"Speaker Hastert's false and inflammatory rhetoric is yet another desperate attempt to mislead the American people and provoke fear," she said, adding that Democrats "have an unshakable commitment to catching, convicting and punishing terrorists who attack Americans."

During the debate, House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, all but dared Democrats to vote against the legislation.

DOJ_NMG_0070580

"Will my Democrat friends work with Republicans to give the president the tools he needs to continue to stop terrorist attacks before they happen, or will they vote to force him to fight the terrorists with one arm tied behind his back?" Boehner asked just before members cast their ballots.

Democrats said they wanted to tone down the powers the bill would give to Bush and the limits it would impose on terror-war suspects' abilities to defend themselves during trials.

Said Dennis Kucinich, D-Ohio: "This bill is everything we don't believe in."

Overall, 219 Republicans and 34 Democrats vote for the legislation while 160 Democrats, seven Republicans and one independent voted against it.

During the often partisan debate, some Democrats contended the bill would approve torture.

"All Americans want to hold terrorists accountable, but if we try to redefine the nature of torture, whisk people into secret detention facilities and use secret evidence to convict them in special courts, our actions do in fact embolden our enemies," said Rep. Jim Moran, D-Va.

Others vehemently opposed language that would give the president wide latitude to interpret international standards of prisoner treatment and bar detainees from going to federal court to protest their treatment and detention under the right of habeas corpus. Supporters of the bill have said eliminating habeas corpus was intended to keep detainees from flooding federal courts with appeals.

The bill also gives the president the ability to interpret international standards for prisoner treatment when an act does not fall under the definition of a war crime, such as rape and torture.

"It gives too much leeway to the president," said Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa. "And I think when you tamper with the Geneva Conventions ... you hurt our ability to protect the troops."

Republicans defended the measure as sound.

"Is it perfect? No," said Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart, R-Fla. "Do we have an obligation to pass it? Yes."

Republicans said time was critical so that terrorists could be brought to justice.

Lawmakers shrugged off multiple disruptions from citizens watching the floor debate from inside the Capitol.

As the House finished its bill, Senate leaders agreed to limit debate on their version of the measure. Four Democrats and Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., were given opportunities to offer amendments in the Senate, but all were expected to be rejected.

"Until Congress passes this legislation, terrorists ... cannot be tried for war crimes in the United States and the United States risks fighting a blind war without adequate intelligence," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn. "That's simply unacceptable."

One amendment by Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., defeated 54-43, would have replaced the Senate measure with the version maverick GOP senators pushed through the Armed Services Committee two weeks ago before striking a deal with Bush. The White House had promised to block that committee bill, which was written by GOP Sens. John McCain of Arizona, John Warner of Virginia and others, contending it would force an end to the CIA interrogation program.

Specter's amendment would strike the provision in the bill barring detainees from filing habeas corpus petitions.

US House Passes Controversial Bill On Terror Suspects (AFP)

By Charlotte Raab

AFP, September 27, 2006

The US House of Representatives passed a controversial bill setting out the rules for the detention, treatment and prosecution of "war on terror" suspects, virtually assuring it will become law.

After a few hours of debate, the bill, which critics say violates human and constitutional rights, was passed in a 253-168 vote. The Republican majority had blocked opposition Democrats from presenting any amendment.

The proposed law, which US President George W. Bush calls a critical tool for the battle against terrorism, was headed for swift passage by the Senate, expected by Thursday at the latest.

The hard-fought House victory was crucial for the Bush administration six weeks ahead of legislative elections, where his Republican Party risks losing control of both chambers of Congress.

Bush administration officials have pushed approval of the deal before Congress recesses at the end of this week.

The sweeping legislation sets guidelines to interrogate war-on-terror suspects and would send several hundred inmates held at the US naval base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba to trial after years of detention.

Since the detention camp opened in 2001, after the September 11 terrorist attacks, not one of the several hundred prisoners has been afforded a trial.

The draft law authorizes special tribunals to prosecute the Guantanamo detainees, allows for secret CIA-run prisons and forbids "cruel and unusual" punishment of detainees -- without further clarification of what falls in that category.

DOJ_NMG_0070581

Detainees would be deprived of all legal recourse to protest the conditions of their detention.

Critics charge that Bush merely wants legal cover to allow interrogators to continue using "alternative" methods of questioning that reportedly include a simulated drowning technique known as "waterboarding," sleep deprivation, and subjecting suspects to extreme temperatures.

"This bill is a drastic step backwards for human rights," said Caroline Frederickson, a director of the American Civil Liberties Union.

House Minority leader Nancy Pelosi argued against the measure, saying "permitting indefinite detention under conditions that cannot be challenged in court is contrary to our history and values."

The California Democrat predicted the US Supreme Court would strike down the almost-certain new law.

But Republicans praised the effort.

"House Republicans have worked hard to create a system that will protect our troops on the battlefield, while also conforming to international laws and treaty obligations," said House Speaker Dennis Hastert.

The bill, a compromise reached after bitter debate between the White House and a handful of Republican senators opposed to torture, was expected to be approved late Wednesday or Thursday in the Senate, where the opposition has pledged not to interfere.

The Senate debate was expected to last 10 hours at most, according to the terms of an agreement reached early Wednesday between Republican and opposition lawmakers.

Only five amendments were to be presented, but they almost certainly would be rejected, which would mean the text would be signed into law just weeks ahead of the November 7 legislative elections.

House Approves Bill On Detainees (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

The House approved an administration-backed system of questioning and prosecuting terrorism suspects yesterday, setting clearer limits on CIA interrogation techniques but denying access to courts for detainees seeking to challenge their imprisonment at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and elsewhere.

The 253 to 168 vote was a victory for President Bush and fellow Republicans. Bush had yielded some ground during weeks of negotiations, but he fully embraced the language that the House approved with support from 34 Democrats and all but seven Republicans.

Senators also began debating the measure yesterday and defeated, along party lines, a Democratic-sponsored amendment that would have expanded detainees' legal rights. Senators predicted that their chamber will approve the legislation today, which would enable Bush to hold a signing ceremony on a high-profile and intensely debated bill about a month before the Nov. 7 elections.

Barring a last-minute snag, the House and Senate action will conclude three months of debate that began in late June, after the Supreme Court struck down the military commissions Bush had established to try people suspected of being members of al-Qaeda. Designated as enemy combatants, such suspects enjoy fewer rights than prisoners of war, and much of the congressional debate centered on which, if any, rudimentary legal rights should apply to them.

The administration was also eager to protect CIA officers from possible prosecution or from lawsuits stemming from their use of aggressive interrogation techniques such as extended sleep deprivation, hypothermia and "waterboarding," which simulates drowning.

Bush is scheduled to meet with GOP senators in the Capitol this morning for a final pep rally before the measure's expected passage. Republicans hope to campaign on the bill as proof of their party's tough stand against terrorists. Many congressional Democrats decided to swallow their misgivings and vote for the bill to avoid being portrayed as less than vigilant against suspects captured in Afghanistan, Iraq and elsewhere. Thirty-four Democrats joined 219 Republicans in supporting the legislation.

"It is outrageous that House Democrats, at the urging of their leaders, continue to oppose giving President Bush the tools he needs to protect our country," said House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

Such comments infuriated Democrats, who said they stand second to no one in fighting terrorists but fear the United States is abandoning fundamental principles of fairness. The bill "is really more about who we are as a people than it is about those who seek to harm us," said House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.). "Defending America requires us to marshal the full range of our power: diplomatic and military, economic and moral. And when our moral standing is eroded, our international credibility is diminished as well."

DOJ_NMG_0070582

After the June 29 Supreme Court ruling, the White House proposed legislation to address the high court's criticisms and still embrace much of its military commission setup and interrogation practices. But a trio of Republican senators forced Bush to modify several points.

The compromise legislation does not seek to narrow U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions in the treatment of prisoners, as Bush had hoped. But it would give the executive branch substantial leeway in deciding how to comply with treaty obligations in actions that fall short of "grave breaches" of the conventions.

It would bar military commissions from considering testimony obtained through interrogation techniques that involve "cruel, unusual or inhumane treatment or punishment," which is proscribed by the 5th, 8th and 14th amendments to the U.S. Constitution. But the bar would be retroactive only to Dec. 30, 2005, when Congress adopted the Detainee Treatment Act, sponsored by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), to protect CIA operatives from being prosecuted over interrogation tactics used before then.

Yesterday, Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) condemned the loophole, accusing administration officials of trying "to legitimize the mistreatment of detainees and to undermine some of the cornerstone principles of our legal system."

But GOP sponsors said the language is essential to protect well-intentioned CIA officers from vague guidelines. "The Constitution says we will provide for the common defense, not provide for the criminal defense" of enemy combatants, Rep. Louie Gohmert (R-Tex.) said during a rare instance in which both houses debated the same legislation simultaneously.

Some of the fiercest debates focused on whether foreign terrorism suspects should have access to U.S. courts for challenging the legality of their detention, a right known as habeas corpus.

House Republicans blocked Democrats from offering amendments, including one that would have extended the habeas corpus right to detainees. House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.) said terrorism suspects have enough rights without habeas corpus, including the right to a lawyer, to be presumed innocent, to cross-examine witnesses and to collect evidence. "Let's bring justice before the eyes of the children and widows of Sept. 11," he implored on the House floor.

But Rep. Jerrold Nadler (D-N.Y.) said: "This is how a nation loses its moral compass, its identity, its values and, eventually, its freedom. . . . We rebelled against King George III for less restrictions on liberty than this." Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) said the habeas corpus right is so fundamental that it "is un-American" to deny it to detainees held by U.S. forces.

The Senate will vote today on an amendment to grant the habeas corpus right to detainees. Supporters say the Supreme Court would rule the legislation unconstitutional without a habeas corpus provision, but opponents say the House would balk at the amendment.

The legislation loosely defines "cruel or inhuman treatment" of detainees, which would constitute a war crime. The administration said the term should apply to techniques resulting in "severe" physical or mental pain, but lawmakers set the standard at "serious." The abused detainee's symptoms would have to include "serious and non-transitory mental harm, which need not be prolonged."

For lesser offenses barred by the Geneva Conventions -- those falling between cruelty and minor abuse -- the legislation would authorize the president to interpret "the meaning and application" of relevant provisions of the Geneva Conventions. The administration's language would have to be published rather than provided in secret to some lawmakers.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) praised the legislation, saying Americans should not give foreigners suspected of being enemy combatants the rights that U.S. citizens enjoy. "The Global War on Terror is different from any war we have ever known," he said in a statement. "As a country we must understand that adaptation to these new situations is critical in order to achieve victory over those who seek to hurt us as a nation."

But the Center for Constitutional Rights condemned the bill, saying it would "authorize the indefinite detention of non-citizens without access to courts -- even if they are not charged with any crime."

Staff writers Jonathan Weisman and R. Jeffrey Smith contributed to this report.

House Approves Bush Proposal On Tribunals For Gitmo Suspects (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 28, 2006

The House yesterday approved President Bush's proposal for the handling of terrorism suspects held at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba, bringing the administration one step closer to having the legal authority to interrogate and prosecute the detainees.

"These terrorist tribunals will allow the suspected terrorists to address the charges against them with legal defense provided by the U.S. government," House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, said after the vote.

In a mostly party-line 253-168 vote, Republicans backed the bill by a 219-7 margin and Democrats opposed it by a 160-34 margin. The House's one independent voted "no." The measure now goes to the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0070583

Just before voting, Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, made clear that Republicans will use the vote in the November elections against Democrats who opposed the bill.

"Will my Democrat friends work with Republicans to give the president the tools he needs to continue to stop terrorist attacks before they happen, or will they vote to force him to fight the terrorists with one arm tied behind his back?" he said.

Republican leaders were quick to criticize Democrats who voted against the legislation.

"Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi and 159 of her Democrat colleagues voted today in favor of more rights for terrorists," Mr. Hastert said. "So, the same terrorists who plan to harm innocent Americans and their freedom worldwide would be coddled if we followed the Democrat plan."

Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider decried "Speaker Hastert's false and inflammatory rhetoric," calling it "yet another desperate attempt to mislead the American people and provoke fear.

"Democrats will not be swift-boated," she said, referring to ads that hurt Democrats' 2004 presidential candidate, Sen. John Kerry. "We want [terrorists] punished, whatever that punishment is, and don't want it overturned by the Supreme Court. This bill may make it more likely the Supreme Court will overturn those convictions and may put our troops at greater risk."

The proposal would grant terror suspects more legal rights than they had under the system of military tribunals set up by the administration after the September 11 attacks, which the Supreme Court struck down in June. Nevertheless, the new courts would not grant many of the basic rights Americans usually have in civilian and military courts, a point Democrats protested.

"This bill is everything we don't believe in," said Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich, Ohio Democrat.

Rep. Barney Frank, Massachusetts Democrat, said the proposal doesn't provide enough checks and balances to prevent erroneous convictions.

Other provisions opposed by Democrats give the president broad authority to decide which techniques U.S. interrogators can use legally.

American interrogators and prosecutors, Mr. Frank said, "are the good guys, but they're not the perfect guys."

During the debate, U.S. Capitol Police had to remove several hecklers from the chamber who were protesting the legislation.

The House vote took place shortly after Democrats and Republicans in the Senate reached an agreement to take up the measure with only a handful of amendments. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist told reporters that he hoped to pass the bill today without any of the amendments being approved, so it could go directly to Mr. Bush's desk for his signature.

Mr. Frist said voters will side with those who support the tribunals.

"People realize it's a new world," said Mr. Frist, Tennessee Republican. "We need to have appropriate tools."

Democrats said they expect the bill to be overwhelmingly approved on a bipartisan basis. But, they said, they will continue to work to get amendments added.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, said he opposes the bill no matter what. He also said the haste to pass the measure was politically motivated.

"By failing to renounce torture, it inflames an already dangerous world and makes for America new enemies in our war against terror," he said. "This puts our cause, our people and our troops at greater risk."

"There is no question that the rush to pass this bill -- which is the product of secret negotiations with the White House -- is about serving a political agenda," Mr. Kennedy said. "That is no way to produce careful and thoughtful legislation on profound issues of national security."

Detainee Bill Now Goes To Senate (LAT)

By Richard Simon, Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — The House on Wednesday approved administration-backed rules for interrogating and trying terrorism suspects, a key component of the national security agenda that Republicans aim to showcase in their fight to hold onto Congress.

The Senate is expected to follow suit today, making passage of the military tribunal bill one of Congress' final acts before lawmakers recess this weekend to hit the campaign trail. Barring complications, the legislation will reach President Bush's desk for a high-profile signing ceremony in the run-up to the November elections.

The measure, approved by the House 253 to 168, would preserve tough interrogation tactics that the White House has credited with helping thwart terrorist plots. It also would pave the way for trials of at least two dozen terrorism suspects, including self-proclaimed Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, who are being held at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

DOJ_NMG_0070584

"We must remember that we are fighting a different kind of enemy — and a different kind of war," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said as the chamber opened debate on the measure Wednesday. "To win this war, we must provide our military, intelligence and law enforcement communities the tools they need to keep us safe."

But Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the top Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, objected that the measure would be "used by our terrorist enemies as evidence of U.S. hypocrisy when it comes to proclamations of human rights."

The bill is one of several that GOP lawmakers have rushed to pass to spotlight an issue they consider their party's strength: national security. Another measure, authorizing Bush's once secret warrantless surveillance program, is unlikely to clear Congress until after the election.

Final action on the tribunal bill will bring to a close the wrangling that began in June, when the Supreme Court struck down the administration's earlier rules for trying terrorism suspects before military commissions. The legislation didn't fall into place until the White House and a group of Senate Republicans worked out a compromise last week.

As passed by the House, the measure would allow the administration to use interrogation methods tougher than those employed by the military; it does not specify precisely what would be permitted or explicitly banned.

Water boarding, in which a prisoner is strapped to a board and made to believe he is going to drown, would be banned, according to those who helped broker the deal. Some human rights advocates said the language of the bill would ban sleep deprivation and exposing detainees to extreme temperatures.

The approval came despite warnings from human rights groups that provisions such as prohibiting detainees from challenging their imprisonment in court and permitting the use of coerced evidence in trials under certain circumstances put the bill on questionable legal footing.

A bipartisan effort led by Republican Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania to strip out the provision preventing detainees from filing habeas corpus petitions — demands for legal justification for their imprisonment — is expected to come before the Senate today.

If that amendment passes, the overall bill would have to go to a House-Senate conference committee, which would delay its passage.

Previewing GOP plans to use the tribunal measure in the campaign, House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) challenged Democrats on Wednesday to vote against it. "Will my Democrat friends work with Republicans to give the president the tools he needs to continue to stop terrorist attacks before they happen — or will they again vote to force him to fight the terrorists with one arm tied behind his back?" he asked.

Thirty-four Democrats joined 219 Republicans in voting for the bill, while 160 Democrats, seven Republicans and one independent voted against it.

California House members voted along party lines, with all Republicans supporting the bill and Democrats opposing it. Reps. George P. Radanovich (R-Mariposa) and Juanita Millender-McDonald (D-Carson) did not vote.

"Let me be very clear. I believe that there is a special place in hell reserved for the planners and perpetrators of 9/11," said Rep. Ellen O. Tauscher (D-Alamo). But, she said, the bill would "do nothing but put us in further legal limbo."

"This bill is practically begging to be overturned by the court," added House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco).

Democrats accused Republicans of rushing to pass a legally suspect bill to score political points. Within an hour of the vote, the House GOP leadership put out a statement accusing Democrats of being weak on national security.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) issued a statement after the vote accusing Democrats of voting in favor of "more rights for terrorists."

"So the same terrorists who plan to harm innocent Americans and their freedom worldwide would be coddled, if we followed the Democrat plan," he said.

Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-El Cajon), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, expressed confidence that the bill would withstand court challenge. He also disputed contentions that detainees weren't being given enough rights.

Once trials begin, Americans can "watch all those rights being accorded to people who designed the attack against the United States and decide whether or not they agree with the Democrats that there weren't enough rights given to the defendants," Hunter said. "My instincts are that they will probably … come to the conclusion that … we gave them too many rights."

The measure that passed the House is the product of a compromise between the White House and a group of Senate Republicans led by Sen. John McCain of Arizona, a former POW who was tortured in Vietnam and who advocates that the United States must adhere to the Geneva Convention in its treatment of terrorism suspects.

DOJ_NMG_0070585

But Jumana Musa, an advocacy director of Amnesty International, said Wednesday that the administration has a track record of interpreting congressional laws creatively and permissively. Under the compromise, she said, there was no way to ensure that the CIA would treat its detainees humanely.

"This bill doesn't say what techniques are prohibited," Musa said. "That is the problem with a system that has no check and an administration with a long and colorful record of broad interpretations of the law."

The measure would define as illegal under the War Crimes Act "grave breaches" of the Geneva Convention, such as torture, cruel or inhuman treatment and intentionally causing "serious bodily injury."

It also would give the president authority to interpret the Geneva Convention by an executive order made public and subject to congressional review. The order will not list specific techniques, and no one knows for sure what exactly the order will say.

Said Tom Malinowski, Washington advocacy director of Human Rights Watch:

"I don't think that the CIA will be comfortable going back to those [tougher interrogation] techniques if McCain, the chief architect of the compromise, believes those techniques are against the law."

Rushing Off A Cliff (NYT)

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

Here's what happens when this irresponsible Congress railroads a profoundly important bill to serve the mindless politics of a midterm election: The Bush administration uses Republicans' fear of losing their majority to push through ghastly ideas about antiterrorism that will make American troops less safe and do lasting damage to our 217-year-old nation of laws — while actually doing nothing to protect the nation from terrorists. Democrats betray their principles to avoid last-minute attack ads. Our democracy is the big loser.

Republicans say Congress must act right now to create procedures for charging and trying terrorists — because the men accused of plotting the 9/11 attacks are available for trial. That's pure propaganda. Those men could have been tried and convicted long ago, but President Bush chose not to. He held them in illegal detention, had them questioned in ways that will make real trials very hard, and invented a transparently illegal system of kangaroo courts to convict them.

It was only after the Supreme Court issued the inevitable ruling striking down Mr. Bush's shadow penal system that he adopted his tone of urgency. It serves a cynical goal: Republican strategists think they can win this fall, not by passing a good law but by forcing Democrats to vote against a bad one so they could be made to look soft on terrorism.

Last week, the White House and three Republican senators announced a terrible deal on this legislation that gave Mr. Bush most of what he wanted, including a blanket waiver for crimes Americans may have committed in the service of his antiterrorism policies. Then Vice President Dick Cheney and his willing lawmakers rewrote the rest of the measure so that it would give Mr. Bush the power to jail pretty much anyone he wants for as long as he wants without charging them, to unilaterally reinterpret the Geneva Conventions, to authorize what normal people consider torture, and to deny justice to hundreds of men captured in error.

These are some of the bill's biggest flaws:

Enemy Combatants: A dangerously broad definition of "illegal enemy combatant" in the bill could subject legal residents of the United States, as well as foreign citizens living in their own countries, to summary arrest and indefinite detention with no hope of appeal. The president could give the power to apply this label to anyone he wanted.

The Geneva Conventions: The bill would repudiate a half-century of international precedent by allowing Mr. Bush to decide on his own what abusive interrogation methods he considered permissible. And his decision could stay secret — there's no requirement that this list be published.

Habeas Corpus: Detainees in U.S. military prisons would lose the basic right to challenge their imprisonment. These cases do not clog the courts, nor coddle terrorists. They simply give wrongly imprisoned people a chance to prove their innocence.

Judicial Review: The courts would have no power to review any aspect of this new system, except verdicts by military tribunals. The bill would limit appeals and bar legal actions based on the Geneva Conventions, directly or indirectly. All Mr. Bush would have to do to lock anyone up forever is to declare him an illegal combatant and not have a trial.

Coerced Evidence: Coerced evidence would be permissible if a judge considered it reliable — already a contradiction in terms — and relevant. Coercion is defined in a way that exempts anything done before the passage of the 2005 Detainee Treatment Act, and anything else Mr. Bush chooses.

Secret Evidence: American standards of justice prohibit evidence and testimony that is kept secret from the defendant, whether the accused is a corporate executive or a mass murderer. But the bill as redrafted by Mr. Cheney seems to weaken protections against such evidence.

DOJ_NMG_0070586

Offenses: The definition of torture is unacceptably narrow, a virtual reprise of the deeply cynical memos the administration produced after 9/11. Rape and sexual assault are defined in a retrograde way that covers only forced or coerced activity, and not other forms of nonconsensual sex. The bill would effectively eliminate the idea of rape as torture.

·There is not enough time to fix these bills, especially since the few Republicans who call themselves moderates have been whipped into line, and the Democratic leadership in the Senate seems to have misplaced its spine. If there was ever a moment for a filibuster, this was it.

We don't blame the Democrats for being frightened. The Republicans have made it clear that they'll use any opportunity to brand anyone who votes against this bill as a terrorist enabler. But Americans of the future won't remember the pragmatic arguments for caving in to the administration.

They'll know that in 2006, Congress passed a tyrannical law that will be ranked with the low points in American democracy, our generation's version of the Alien and Sedition Acts.

Don't Suspend Habeas Corpus (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 28, 2006

EVEN IF HE SAYS SO HIMSELF, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, is an expert on constitutional law. So his warning that the Supreme Court is likely to invalidate pending legislation that would create military commissions to try terrorist suspects deserves a hearing — in the Senate.

The problem with the legislation — even with the improvements forced on the White House by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) — is that it would make it impossible for alleged enemy combatants to file what is known as a writ of habeas corpus, which allows them to challenge the legality of their imprisonment.

In 2004, the Supreme Court rejected the Bush administration's position and ruled that detainees at the U.S. facility at Guantanamo Bay were entitled to file such petitions. In its decision, the high court cited a statute giving federal courts the authority to review habeas petitions. But in his majority opinion, Justice John Paul Stevens also quoted a 1945 case in which the court noted that habeas corpus is "a writ antecedent to statute … throwing its root deep into the genius of our common law." In fact, the "Great Writ" can be traced back to the Magna Carta. And although the Constitution allows Congress to suspend habeas corpus in "cases of rebellion or invasion," Specter rightly noted that "we don't have either."

The argument for allowing detainees to file habeas petitions goes beyond avoiding the embarrassment of a rebuke from the Supreme Court, which has already twice rebuffed the administration's legal strategy in the war against terrorism. Thirty-three former U.S. diplomats have sent a letter to Congress warning that "to deny habeas corpus to our detainees can be seen as prescription for how the captured members of our own military, diplomatic and NGO [nongovernmental organization] personnel stationed abroad may be treated."

On Wednesday, the House approved a bill that does not permit detainees to file habeas corpus petitions. That means that it will be up to Specter and his colleagues to preserve the Great Writ when the Senate votes, as early as today.

The White House Warden (LAT)

By Bruce Ackerman

The Los Angeles Times, September 28, 2006

BURIED IN THE complex Senate compromise on detainee treatment is a real shocker, reaching far beyond the legal struggles about foreign terrorist suspects in the Guantanamo Bay fortress. The compromise legislation, which is racing toward the White House, authorizes the president to seize American citizens as enemy combatants, even if they have never left the United States. And once thrown into military prison, they cannot expect a trial by their peers or any other of the normal protections of the Bill of Rights.

This dangerous compromise not only authorizes the president to seize and hold terrorists who have fought against our troops "during an armed conflict," it also allows him to seize anybody who has "purposefully and materially supported hostilities against the United States." This grants the president enormous power over citizens and legal residents. They can be designated as enemy combatants if they have contributed money to a Middle Eastern charity, and they can be held indefinitely in a military prison.

Not to worry, say the bill's defenders. The president can't detain somebody who has given money innocently, just those who contributed to terrorists on purpose.

But other provisions of the bill call even this limitation into question. What is worse, if the federal courts support the president's initial detention decision, ordinary Americans would be required to defend themselves before a military tribunal without the constitutional guarantees provided in criminal trials.

DOJ_NMG_0070587

Legal residents who aren't citizens are treated even more harshly. The bill entirely cuts off their access to federal habeas corpus, leaving them at the mercy of the president's suspicions.

We are not dealing with hypothetical abuses. The president has already subjected a citizen to military confinement. Consider the case of Jose Padilla. A few months after 9/11, he was seized by the Bush administration as an "enemy combatant" upon his arrival at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport. He was wearing civilian clothes and had no weapons. Despite his American citizenship, he was held for more than three years in a military brig, without any chance to challenge his detention before a military or civilian tribunal. After a federal appellate court upheld the president's extraordinary action, the Supreme Court refused to hear the case, handing the administration's lawyers a terrible precedent.

The new bill, if passed, would further entrench presidential power. At the very least, it would encourage the Supreme Court to draw an invidious distinction between citizens and legal residents. There are tens of millions of legal immigrants living among us, and the bill encourages the justices to uphold mass detentions without the semblance of judicial review.

But the bill also reinforces the presidential claims, made in the Padilla case, that the commander in chief has the right to designate a U.S. citizen on American soil as an enemy combatant and subject him to military justice. Congress is poised to authorized this presidential overreaching. Under existing constitutional doctrine, this show of explicit congressional support would be a key factor that the Supreme Court would consider in assessing the limits of presidential authority.

This is no time to play politics with our fundamental freedoms. Even without this massive congressional expansion of the class of enemy combatants, it is by no means clear that the present Supreme Court will protect the Bill of Rights. The Korematsu case — upholding the military detention of tens of thousands of Japanese Americans during World War II — has never been explicitly overruled. It will be tough for the high court to condemn this notorious decision, especially if passions are inflamed by another terrorist incident. But congressional support of presidential power will make it much easier to extend the Korematsu decision to future mass seizures.

Though it may not feel that way, we are living at a moment of relative calm. It would be tragic if the Republican leadership rammed through an election-year measure that would haunt all of us on the morning after the next terrorist attack.

Judge Rejects Ashcroft's Immunity Claim (AP)

By Rebecca Boone, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 28, 2006

BOISE, Idaho — Former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft could be called to testify in a lawsuit that claims a student was wrongly imprisoned in a computer terrorism case, a federal judge ruled Wednesday.

U.S. District Judge Edward Lodge rejected Ashcroft's argument to toss out the lawsuit because he was entitled to absolute immunity since his position at the Department of Justice was prosecutorial.

Abdullah al-Kidd, who played football for the University of Idaho, claimed government wrongfully arrested him in the case against a fellow student, Sami Omar Al-Hussayen, in 2003.

They both worked for the Islamic Assembly of North America, a Michigan-based charitable organization that federal investigators said funneled money to activities supporting terrorism and published material advocating suicide attacks on the United States.

A jury acquitted Al-Hussayen of using his computer skills to foster terrorism and of three immigration violations after an eight-week federal trial. But Al-Hussayen — who was only months from finishing his doctorate study at the University of Idaho — was eventually deported to Saudi Arabia.

Al-Kidd was never called to testify, but he spent two weeks in jail as a material witness and was later released to the custody of his wife with strict limitations on where he could travel.

His lawsuit claimed Ashcroft was personally liable for violating his rights because after the terrorist attacks Ashcroft "created a national policy to improperly seek material witness warrants, oversaw the execution of such warrants, and failed to correct the constitutional violations of conducting such actions," according court documents. Al-Kidd said the investigation and detainment not only caused him to lose a scholarship to study in Saudi Arabia, but that it cost him employment opportunities.

The ruling also means U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez and others in the Department of Homeland Security could be called to testify in the lawsuit.

"We are literally reviewing it at this minute and no, we have not made any decisions at this time," Charles Miller, spokesman for the Justice Department's civil division, said of the ruling.

Al-Kidd's attorney, Lee Gelernt with the ACLU's national headquarters in New York, called the ruling a "vindication" for al-Kidd.

"It will hopefully deter the government from using the material witness statute in the future in the way they did after Sept. 11," Gelernt said.

DOJ_NMG_0070588

Al-Kidd is asking the judge to declare that the federal government's actions were unconstitutional, to order the FBI and other agencies to expunge any records relating to the unlawful detention of al-Kidd and others, and for unspecified damages.

Domestic Spying Showdown Set For Detroit Court (FREEP)

By David Ashenfelter, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, September 28, 2006

Justice Department lawyers will be back in federal court in Detroit on Thursday to try to persuade a judge to delay enforcement of last month's decision to halt the National Security Agency's domestic spying program until the outcome of the government's appeal.

And ACLU lawyers will be there to try to persuade U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs to order the government to stop the program now.

Taylor ruled Aug. 17 that the Bush Administration's program of monitoring international phone calls and emails involving suspected Al Qaeda members is unconstitutional because it violates Americans' free speech and privacy rights and is contrary to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978.

Under that law, the government can eavesdrop for up to a year without a warrant provided the Attorney General certifies that the eavesdropping is legal.

The Justice Department appealed Taylor's ruling to the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati.

The ACLU sued the administration in January on behalf of scholars, lawyers, non-profit groups and journalists, who said the program had disrupted their ability to confer with sources, locate witnesses, conduct research and advocate causes

Contact DAVID ASHENFELTER at 313-223-4490 or ashenf@freepress.com.

Yassin Aref Takes The Stand (CAP9)

Capital News 9, September 28, 2006

The prosecution has rested in the trial of two Albany mosque leaders accused of supporting terrorism, and the defense wasted no time calling their client to the stand.

Mohammed Hossain and Yassin Aref are charged with laundering money to support terrorism. On Wednesday, Aref denied those charges while on the stand.

Prosecutors finished up with a Middle Eastern expert who explained what references in Aref's journal are terrorist organizations and which ones aren't.

Once Aref took the stand, the mood clearly changed in the courtroom as Aref explained his growing up in Northern Iraq where Saddam Hussein killed more than 180,000 fellow Kurds in the late 1980s.

The prosecution has rested in the trial of two Albany mosque leaders accused of supporting terrorism, and the defense wasted no time calling their client to the stand.

That's important because Aref argues that his rhetoric the courtroom previously heard was directed at Saddam's regime and that he's always been peaceful as he spoke out as a student - but not a member of any political party which prosecutors accused him of omitting on an immigration document.

Aref also contends that the government mistranslated some journal entries as well as some speeches he gave, making him look a lot worse than he really is.

PATRIOT ACT:

Terror Laws Cut Resettlement Of Refugees (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 27 — The number of refugees admitted to the United States fell 23 percent this year because of provisions in two antiterrorism laws that have sharply reduced the number of resettled refugees, State Department officials said Wednesday.

The laws, the USA Patriot Act and the Real ID Act, deny entry to anyone who belongs to or has provided material support to armed rebel groups, even if that support was coerced and even if the armed groups fought alongside American troops or opposed authoritarian governments criticized by the Bush administration.

The provisions have derailed the resettlement of thousands of refugees fleeing the authoritarian government of Myanmar, formerly known as Burma; hundreds of refugees from Vietnam and Laos who fought alongside American troops in the Vietnam

DOJ_NMG_0070589

War; and dozens of Cubans who supported armed groups opposed to Fidel Castro in the 60's, according to the State Department and the United Nations refugee agency.

Many of the refugees were barred from the United States because, under the new laws, they are deemed supporters of terrorist groups, even though the organizations that they support do not appear on the State Department list of designated terrorist groups.

The statutes have broadened the definition of terrorist groups to include any group of two or more people who take up arms against a state, even if the group supports the aims of American foreign policy.

A result, State Department officials say, is that administration officials will resettle 41,200 of the 54,000 refugees whom they had expected to admit by the end of the current fiscal year, which ends on Sept. 30. That figure is the lowest since refugee admissions plunged for nearly two years after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

The State Department can grant waivers for specific populations that have supported armed groups, if they pose no threat to the United States. In May and August, the department issued waivers for Burmese refugees who have supported the Karen National Union, a group that opposes the government in Myanmar.

But the laws do not allow waivers for refugees who were combatants, received military training from groups deemed to be terrorist organizations or were members of such groups. State Department officials say a change in the law is required to address those populations. In recent weeks, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has met with lawmakers in the House and Senate to discuss such changes.

Ellen R. Sauerbrey, an assistant secretary of state, told senators on Wednesday that the antiterrorism provisions had prevented the United States from resettling 9,500 Burmese this fiscal year. Of that group, 1,500 are expected to enter by Sept. 30 under issued waivers.

"We had anticipated bringing the majority, if not all of those, to the United States," Ms. Sauerbrey said at a hearing of the Immigration Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

She said the limited waivers meant that the resettlement of many refugees had been indefinitely delayed. In addition to the Burmese, Ms. Sauerbrey pointed to the Cubans and Vietnamese Montagnards.

"We are eagerly looking forward to expanding resettlement," she said, "to the degree that we can resolve some of these difficulties."

Refugee advocacy groups, including Human Rights First and Human Rights Watch, and conservative groups like Concerned Women for America, the National Association of Evangelicals and American Values, say officials are not moving swiftly enough.

Representative Joe Pitts, Republican of Pennsylvania, has proposed legislation that would bar only members and supporters of groups designated as terrorist organizations by the State Department.

But State Department officials say they do not expect any movement on such legislation before Nov. 7.

Many refugee advocates fear that administration officials and members of Congress are delaying action because they do not want to be viewed as easing up on terrorism during an election year.

Michael J. Horowitz, a neoconservative who worked in the White House of President Ronald Reagan and testified at the hearing on Wednesday, said in a statement that it was "inexcusable that for more than two years the administration has dragged its feet" in finding a solution for the refugees who fought alongside Americans in Vietnam.

The antiterrorism provisions have also affected 500 asylum seekers in the United States, whose cases have been delayed and has prevented 700 people, who have already been deemed refugees or granted asylum, from becoming permanent residents here for the time being.

Senator Sam Brownback, Republican of Kansas, urged the administration to redouble its efforts on behalf of the Burmese refugees and others who desperately need to resettle. "I know we have a lot security concerns to watch for," Mr. Brownback said at the hearing. "But there are huge populations that are absolutely persecuted and have no other option."

More Refugees Are Settling In Mid-Size Cities, Study Finds (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

Political refugees coming to the United States are increasingly putting down roots in metropolitan areas without large immigrant populations, according to a study being released today by the Brookings Institution.

The study, the first of its kind to analyze refugee settlement patterns in metropolitan regions, found that while traditional immigrant gateways such as New York, Chicago and Los Angeles still absorb most refugees, that flow has slowed in the past several years, and refugees are increasingly settling in Seattle, Atlanta, Sacramento, Minneapolis-St. Paul and Portland Ore., said Audrey Singer, a Brookings demographer who co-wrote the study.

DOJ_NMG_0070590

"These are places that are taking on more refugees proportionally than they have in the past, and it's helping to change the face of these cities," Singer said.

The State Department determines the first settling place for refugees, whose ranks are limited by annual caps set by the president and Congress. The ceiling for 2006 is 70,000, with 30,000 allotted to Africa.

About two-thirds of refugees are settled in places where they have a relative or friend. The remaining third are sent to communities based on availability of social services, housing and jobs.

Some states, such as Iowa, Pennsylvania and North Dakota, have been lobbying for refugees, Singer said. "Iowa is experiencing population decline and looking into its future and sees refugee resettlement as a vital way of keeping up population," she said.

In Los Angeles, Vietnamese and Cambodian refugees of Chinese ethnic origins are credited with revitalizing Chinatown. As older Chinese immigrants left the city for the suburban San Gabriel Valley, the newly arrived refugees moved into the city and now run Chinatown businesses once owned by the older generation, the study found.

But there have been problems as well.

The researchers point to Wausau, Wis., where church groups helped Hmong refugees from Laos and Thailand resettle over the past two decades. About 1,600 came to the Wausau area from 1983 to 2004. Public services were strained, and tensions were high. Property taxes were raised to help pay for welfare programs for the Hmong, and schools had to scramble to try to meet the needs of children who did not speak English.

But as the Hmong assimilated, stresses on the local government abated. State officials report that 96 percent of the Hmong in Wausau are now employed and 60 percent own homes.

More than 2 million refugees have arrived in the United States since 1980, when Congress passed the Refugee Act. Those fleeing war or other trauma in their countries have arrived in three waves: from Southeast Asia and the Soviet Union during the Cold War in the 1970s and 1980s, from Europe during the Kosovo conflict in the 1990s, and from Africa during the current decade of civil conflict.

Refugees make up about 7 percent of foreign-born residents in the United States, but the federal government spends more money integrating them into American life than any other immigrant group. Qualifying refugees are entitled to Social Security, food stamps, state child health insurance, Medicaid benefits and other assistance for their first seven years. Those who do not meet income eligibility requirements for those benefits can get cash and medical care for the first eight months. In addition, private agencies can tap federal money for a variety of social services for refugees.

More than half the refugees admitted from 1983 to 2004 came from the former Soviet Union. The next biggest group was Vietnamese, totaling about 400,000. Refugees from other countries registered in much smaller numbers. A total of 125 countries were represented during the 20-year period.

The metropolitan areas that received the largest number of refugees over the past 20 years are also the country's two largest immigrant gateways -- New York and Los Angeles. Most of the newcomers to New York were from the former Soviet Union, and those who moved to Los Angeles came from Southeast Asia, Russia, Iran, Iraq and Afghanistan.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Report To Criticize White House Over Local Effort In Terror Fight (WSJ)

By Robert Block

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Amid the political storm over the intelligence community's report that al Qaeda remains a serious threat to the U.S. homeland, House Democrats plan to release a report Thursday accusing the Bush administration of failing to support local police as the frontline against terrorism.

The report says the administration hasn't done enough to reach out to the country's 800,000 state and local police officers to determine their needs in fighting terrorism. The report1 -- entitled the Law Enforcement Assistance and Partnership Strategy -- proposes seven steps to "fulfill some of the key needs that police and sheriffs" officers are experiencing across the country," ranging from establishing a National Center for Intelligence-Led Policing to a grant program aimed at building understanding of how terrorists operate by sending local police liaison officers overseas to work with foreign law enforcement agencies.

Within the Department of Homeland Security, the Law Enforcement Terrorism Prevention Program focuses on using local law enforcement to support intelligence gathering and information sharing, but legislation funding the department for the new fiscal year that starts Sunday cuts the program by $50 million to $350 million.

DOJ_NMG_0070591

Homeland Security officials said the department is working on ways to improve the information flow to police, and next month expects to roll out initiatives to cooperate more closely with state and local law enforcement.

The report, prepared for Rep. Bennie G. Thompson (D., Miss.), the ranking Democrat on the House Homeland Security Committee, argues that local police, not federal agents, are best positioned to observe criminal activity that could portend a terrorist attack. But "five years after 9/11, critical failures of imagination continue to leave these 'first preventers' as a largely untapped resource in the war on terror," it said.

The report follows growing complaints from police departments around the country that federal agencies, especially the Department of Homeland Security, deny local law enforcement access to timely, relevant information about threats and terrorist activity. The charges were repeated Tuesday at a meeting of national police chiefs in Charlotte, N.C.

Key among the Democrats' recommendations is a National Center for Intelligence-Led Policing that would help police understand how to integrate traditional policing methods with counterterrorism.

The Los Angeles Police Department recently said it wanted to create a national anti-terrorism academy in Los Angeles where law enforcement officers from around the country could learn to identify threats and prevent attacks. Commander Michael Downing, the assistance police chief in charge of LAPD counterterrorism bureau, said while he has not seen the Democrat's final report, he welcomed for federal support.

House Democratic staffers said they expect legislation on the matter will be introduced early next year.

Sources: Homeland Agent Who Made Cuts Is Out (NSDY)

By Carol Eisenberg, Newsday Washington Bureau

Long Island Newsday, September 28, 2006

The political appointee who oversaw 40-percent cuts in anti-terror funding to New York City and Washington, D.C., is being edged out of her job at the Homeland Security Department, according to House and Senate sources.

WASHINGTON -- The political appointee who oversaw 40-percent cuts in anti-terror funding to New York City and Washington, D.C., is being edged out of her job at the Homeland Security Department, according to House and Senate sources.

Tracy Henke, executive director for grants and training, was responsible for divvying up anti-terror money to cities, ostensibly based on risk. She ignited a firestorm in June after the department slashed funding to New York and Washington while bolstering money for cities such as St. Louis and Kansas City in her home state of Missouri.

"She didn't do a good job and my understanding is she's not going to be there much longer," Rep. Peter King, chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, said yesterday.

"I view her as being primarily responsible for the terrible cuts that were made to New York in June," the Seaford Republican said. "She did a poor job in coming up with the numbers. She did a poor job of explaining it to the committee and, quite frankly, a lot of people didn't like her attitude."

That vote of no confidence appears to extend to the White House. This week, White House Homeland Security Adviser Frances Townsend told a group of reporters that she had been "quite surprised and dismayed" by the grant decisions.

Henke, 37, did not return calls for comment yesterday. Asked whether she was being forced out of the post, a Homeland Security Department spokesman, William Knocke, replied, "I've got no reason to say that."

Henke, a backdoor appointment by the White House Jan. 4, had not been confirmed by the Senate before the funding controversy because of concerns about her qualifications, as well as allegations she played politics in her prior job at the Justice Department.

House and Senate sources said she was unlikely to be confirmed in the session's remaining weeks, and that the White House would not resubmit her name to the next Congress. The White House has submitted her name for Senate confirmation three times to date -- July 14, 2005, Feb. 10 and Sept. 5.

"We were told that she was renominated by the White House [Sept. 5] to soften the landing," said a House source. "But the confirmation is not going anywhere. And the White House does not intend to renominate her ... which means the nomination will automatically expire at the end of this session."

White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore said yesterday she could not say whether the White House would renominate Henke in the next Congress.

Questions about Henke's qualifications date to her nomination. Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, the ranking member of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, asked about an incident in which she reportedly demanded changes to a release about a study that found police were more likely to handcuff or arrest minorities during traffic stops.

There also were questions about her experience. She worked for Missouri senators Christopher "Kit" Bond and John Danforth before being tapped by another Missouri politician, Attorney General John Ashcroft, to work in the Justice Department.

DOJ_NMG_0070592

King said he believed it was "no coincidence" that Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff recently announced dramatic increases to New York City. "I look upon that as a vote of no confidence in her," he said.

Package Prompted D.C. Courthouse Evacuation (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And William Branigin, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

A federal courthouse in downtown Washington was evacuated for about three hours today because of what authorities described as a suspicious package, which was later determined to be harmless.

The evacuation disrupted a hearing in a high-profile case stemming from the leak of a CIA operative's name. The hearing, originally set for 10 a.m., was rescheduled for 1:30 p.m., about an hour after authorities reopened the E. Barrett Prettyman Federal Courthouse.

According to acting chief judge Henry Kennedy, the suspicious item, which was found by a security guard in a construction zone near the courthouse, may have contained the soiled clothing of a homeless person. A bomb-sniffing dog alerted to the item, possibly because of nitrates on the clothing, Kennedy said. Nitrates used as oxidizing agents can be mixed with other compounds to form flammable or explosive material.

In addition to examining the suspicious package, authorities swept the courthouse building for explosives but did not find any, officials said.

This morning, police blocked off streets surrounding the courthouse as bomb-disposal experts, hazardous materials specialists and canine units with bomb-sniffing dogs were dispatched to the scene.

Officers in protective suits moved the package from the construction area where it was found to a waiting vehicle the size of a large SUV and picked up other materials around the construction site to be analyzed.

A court security officer found the package around 9:30 a.m., and the courthouse was evacuated about 10 minutes later. Among the evacuees were prosecutors in the case of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, the former chief of staff of Vice President Cheney. Libby has been charged with perjury and obstruction of justice in a federal investigation of the 2003 leak of the identity and CIA employment of Valerie Plame.

The suspicious item was found next to a construction trailer in an area where a courthouse annex was recently built.

Starting at about 10:30 a.m., U.S. marshals asked that the entire block around the courthouse be closed off and that passersby be cleared from the courthouse plaza in front of the building. As a result, a three-block area from 3rd St. SW to 6th St. SW between Constitution Ave. and C St. was evacuated.

As the evacuation of the courthouse was underway, Justice Department officials quickly removed a trove of highly secret national security documents, including numerous Presidential Daily Briefs, from a security courtroom facility where they were being kept for use in the Libby case. The documents were the subject of today's hearing, in which defense attorneys and prosecutors were set to pursue their arguments over whether the material should be admitted in Libby's trial.

The special counsel in the case, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, and about eight of his associates were forced to leave the building and join more than 100 others on the sidewalks nearby, the Associated Press reported. Libby, accompanied by members of his legal team, arrived shortly after the evacuation and joined the throng outside the courthouse, AP said.

The judges of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia were moved across the street to the D.C. Superior Courthouse.

D.C. Courthouse Reopens After Bomb Scare (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, The Associated Press

AP, September 28, 2006

Police dog alerts authorities to package as CIA leak hearing begins

WASHINGTON -- A federal courthouse within sight of the Capitol was set to reopen early this afternoon after authorities determined that an abandoned suitcase at the building entrance did not contain a bomb.

The building had been evacuated this morning when a police dog trained to detect explosives alerted to the softsided suitcase found near a construction trailer outside the E. Barrett Prettyman Federal Courthouse.

U.S. Marshals were to brief reporters on the incident before the building reopened.

Sheldon Snook, chief of staff to Chief Judge Thomas Hogan, said fire alarms were sounded and the building was cleared shortly after 9:30 a.m. as a precaution.

Law enforcement officials reopened Constitution Avenue, which runs next to the courthouse, after shutting it to traffic for two hours.

DOJ_NMG_0070593

Evacuation of the courthouse occurred shortly before a hearing was to begin in the CIA leak case. The hearing was reset for 1:30 p.m.

Special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald and about eight of his associates were forced to leave the building and join more than 100 others on the sidewalks nearby.

The defendant in the case, former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, and his legal team arrived a short time later and joined the throng outside the courthouse.

The judges of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia were moved across the street to the Superior Courthouse.

Crowded ERs Raise Concerns On Readiness (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

Emergency rooms at many hospitals are routinely stretched to the breaking point, raising concerns that they would not be able to handle victims during a terrorist attack or natural disaster, according to congressional testimony yesterday and a new federal study.

Between 40 percent and 50 percent of emergency departments experienced crowding during 2003 and 2004, the study by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention found. It deemed an emergency room to be crowded if so many patients flooded in that ambulances had to be diverted to other hospitals; if people in urgent need of care had to wait an average of more than an hour; or if at least 3 percent of patients simply gave up and left before being seen.

The problem is more dramatic in metropolitan areas, where almost two-thirds of emergency departments experienced crowding conditions, the study found.

The crunch springs from a problem of supply and demand. The annual number of visits to emergency departments rose 18 percent, to 110 million, from 1994 to 2004. At the same time, the number of hospitals operating 24-hour emergency departments declined by 12 percent.

The problem is exacerbated by a shortage of nurses. More than 5 percent of nursing staff positions were vacant at half of all emergency departments in metropolitan areas, the CDC reported.

The findings echo three reports published in June by the Institute of Medicine, a branch of the National Academies, which concluded that the nation's emergency medical system is "overburdened, underfunded, and highly fragmented," and is not equipped to cope with disasters such as hurricanes, disease outbreaks and terrorist strikes.

The findings are stirring interest in Congress, and the Senate Health subcommittee on bioterrorism and public health preparedness convened a panel of experts yesterday to discuss the problems.

"If our emergency rooms are stretched thin now, how will they provide medical care in the event of a disaster?" Sen. Richard Burr (R-N.C.), the subcommittee chairman, said in a statement. "Our emergency care safety net is at risk. We must identify ways to reduce overcrowding and improve coordination."

Panelist Frederick C. Blum, president of the American College of Emergency Physicians, said policymakers and emergency departments must find ways to reduce "boarding." That is the practice in which emergency patients who are admitted to a hospital are left in the emergency department because no regular beds are available, reducing the hospital's ability to handle new emergency patients. Blum said reductions in reimbursement from Medicare and Medicaid in recent years are part of the reason some hospitals have reduced the number of inpatient beds.

"We currently have no surge capacity to deal with the next big thing that comes along, be it a terrorist attack or a natural disaster," Blum said.

Leon L. Haley Jr., chief of emergency medicine for Grady Health System in Atlanta, suggested providing financial incentives for primary care physicians to see patients after hours so that fewer people with non-emergency conditions seek treatment at hospitals.

Nancy M. Bonalumi, president of the Emergency Nurses Association, said the federal government should invest more in nursing education programs. About 147,000 qualified applicants to nursing programs were turned away in 2004 because of faculty shortages, Bonalumi said.

Robert R. Bass, executive director of the Maryland Institute of EMS Systems, said experts believe that the federal government should help fund the development of a network of regional, coordinated emergency care systems. The government also should designate a lead federal agency for emergency care and should better integrate the resources of the Department of Veterans Affairs into civilian disaster planning, he said.

"Strong measures must be taken . . . to achieve the level of response that Americans expect and deserve," Bass said.

Chemical Plant Security (1 Letter) (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0070594

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

To the Editor:

Your Sept. 25 editorial "Chemical Plants, Still Unprotected" does not include some basic facts. The chemical security legislation we negotiated will give the secretary of homeland security new authority to set mandatory standards for high-risk chemical plants and, equally important, to enforce those standards.

The bill gives the secretary the strongest possible authority: the power to shut down dangerous plants.

Current law leaves dangerous gaps in our security because it does not empower the secretary to set standards or to close noncompliant plants. Our legislation closes those gaps.

For your editorial to assert that Congress has done nothing to protect Americans from a terrorist attack on chemical plants is off the mark.

We prevailed in including provisions fought by the chemical industry's trade associations. These provisions ensure that high-risk plants would be subject to mandatory standards, regular inspections and tough enforcement measures. We also included a three-year sunset to prompt Congress to pass even more extensive legislation.

Susan M. Collins

Peter T. King

Washington, Sept. 25, 2006

The writers are chairmen of the Senate and House Homeland Security Committees, respectively.

N.J. Congressman Asks For FBI Briefing Over 2001 Anthrax Scare (AP)

By Donna De La Cruz

AP, September 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A New Jersey congressman said Wednesday it should have taken the FBI days, not years, to determine the anthrax used in 2001 that killed a Connecticut woman and four other people was much less sophisticated than believed.

Democratic Rep. Rush Holt asked FBI Director Robert Mueller for a classified briefing about the status of the bureau's investigation into who was behind the attacks.

Several published reports this week said the FBI had acknowledged the anthrax used in the attacks was commonly available and not weapons-grade.

In his letter to Mueller, Holt said the FBI's failure to determine what kind of anthrax was used meant that "resources were diverted and countless agents wasted their time investigating a small pool of suspects, instead of the broader search we now know was needed."

The FBI has conducted 9,100 interviews and issued 6,000 subpoenas.

Holt asked Mueller to have Douglas Beecher, a scientist in the FBI's Hazardous Materials Response Unit, testify before the House Intelligence Committee.

Beecher recently wrote an article in a scientific journal saying there was "a widely circulated misconception" that the anthrax spores were made using additives and sophisticated engineering akin to military weapons production.

FBI spokesman Bill Carter said he did not know if Mueller had received Holt's letter.

The anthrax attacks, in the days after Sept. 11, 2001, killed five people across the country and sickened 17. There were five confirmed anthrax infections and two suspected cases in New Jersey but no fatalities. Among the victims was Ottilie Lundgren, 94, of Oxford, Conn.

Johanns: Americans Shouldn't Take Safe Food Supply For Granted (BVND)

By Maria Sudekum Fisher

The Belleville News Democrat, September 28, 2006

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - There hasn't been a specific terrorist threat against the U.S. food supply, but Americans should not take the safety of their food for granted, U.S. Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns said Wednesday.

"Agricultural goods pass quickly from one nation to another nation, from state to state," Johanns said. "But diseases and pathogens can travel just as quickly and as easily as trade, and they have no respect for borders."

Johanns, who delivered the keynote address to about 1,000 delegates from 21 countries attending the second International Symposium on Agroterrorism, said the recent outbreak of E. coli in spinach shows how quickly food-borne illnesses spread and how tough they can be to trace.

"The bacterium that has infected some of our fresh spinach was not, to the best of our knowledge, the result of an intentional contamination," Johanns said. "But it illustrates how much damage can be inflicted by an intentional act on our food supply."

DOJ_NMG_0070595

Johanns said there was no "specific or current threat" to the agriculture or food sectors in the United States at this time, but preparation remained important.

"We know that there are individuals who want to harm us, and we are aware there are people with the knowledge and the capability of sabotaging our food supply," Johanns said. "And so you see we have no choice, we must be prepared."

Johanns pointed to steps the government has taken to ensure a safe food supply, including the U.S. Department of Agriculture's animal identification system. He said more than 300,000 U.S. premises have been voluntarily registered for the animal identification system.

The Department of Agriculture wants to identify and tag each of the country's more than 9 billion cows, pigs, chickens and other livestock by 2009 so it can track them within 48 hours of a report of disease.

The plan, which is now voluntary, has been opposed in Missouri by U.S. Sen. Jim Talent and U.S. Rep. Jo Ann Emerson, who introduced a bill that would prevent the animal identification system from becoming mandatory, largely because of concerns over costs and disclosure of farmers' records to competitors.

Johanns also said the government was taking steps to keep overseas diseases and pathogens out of the United States and that the government was spending about $20 million to combat Avian Influenza worldwide.

He also pointed to an offshore pest information system and to a partnership with the Department of Human Services to develop an automated inspection system that would screen imported ag products in high-risk cargo.

"This would include remote digital imaging to quickly identify pests as well as a nationwide database of regulation violators."

Johanns said partnering with businesses and coming up with new ways to protect the food supply would be an ongoing concern of the administration.

"`We are absolutely committed to listen to the private sector," he said. "And we are committed to opening our imagination to innovations to protect our food and ag system."

WAR NEWS:

White House Refuses To Release Full NIE (AP-Y)

By Katherine Shrader

AP, September 28, 2006

The White House refused Wednesday to release the rest of a secret intelligence assessment that depicts a growing terrorist threat, as the Bush administration tried to quell election-season criticism that its anti-terror policies are seriously off track.

Press secretary Tony Snow said releasing the full report, portions of which President Bush declassified on Tuesday, would jeopardize the lives of agents who gathered the information.

It would also risk the nation's ability to work with foreign governments and to keep secret its U.S. intelligence-gathering methods, Snow said, and "compromise the independence of people doing intelligence analysis."

"If they think their work is constantly going to be released to the public they are going to pull their punches," Snow said.

In the bleak National Intelligence Estimate, the government's top analysts concluded Iraq has become a "cause celebre" for jihadists, who are growing in number and geographic reach. If the trend continues, the analysts found, the risks to the U.S. interests at home and abroad will grow.

Peppered with questions Wednesday about the report, he said the NIE report was "not designed to draw judgments about success or failure, it's an intelligence document, it's a snapshot."

Snow said the report confirms the importance of the war in Iraq as a bulwark against terrorists. "Iraq has become, for them, the battleground," he said. "If they lose, they lose their bragging rights. They lose their ability to recruit."

He said that a bleak intelligence assessment depicting a growing terrorist threat was only a "snapshot" — not a conclusion

The document has given both political parties new ammunition leading up to November's midterm elections.

For Republicans, the report provides more evidence that Iraq is central to the war on terrorism and can't be abandoned without giving jihadists a crucial victory.

For Democrats, the report furthers their argument that the 2003 Iraq invasion has inflamed anti-U.S. sentiments in the Muslim world and left the U.S. less safe. Democrats continued their push Wednesday for release of the rest of the report.

"The American people deserve the full story, not those parts of it that the Bush administration selects," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass.

DOJ_NMG_0070596

Rep. Peter Hoekstra, R-Mich., chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, warned, however, that releasing more of the intelligence assessment could aid terrorists. "We are very cautious and very restrained about the kind of information we want to give al-Qaida," Hoekstra said.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, in Tirana, Albania for a meeting of defense ministers, said Bush had declassified the report's key judgments, after parts of it were leaked to the news media, so that "the American people and the world will be able to see the truth and precisely what that document says."

The NIE report, compiled by leading analysts across 16 U.S. spy agencies, says the "global jihadist movement — which includes al-Qaida, affiliated and independent terrorist groups, and emerging networks and cells — is spreading and adapting to counterterrorism efforts."

A separate high-level assessment focused solely on Iraq may be coming soon. At least two House Democrats — Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California and Rep. Jane Harman of California — have questioned whether that report has been stamped "draft" and shelved until after the Nov. 7 elections.

An intelligence official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the process, said National Intelligence Director John Negroponte told lawmakers in writing only one month ago that he ordered a new Iraq estimate to be assembled. The estimate on terrorism released Tuesday took about a year to produce.

The broad assessment on global terror trends, completed in April, escalated an election-year battle over which party is the best steward of national security.

At a news conference Tuesday, Bush said critics who believe the Iraq war has worsened terrorism are naive and mistaken, noting that al-Qaida and other groups have found inspiration to attack for more than a decade. "My judgment is, if we weren't in Iraq, they'd find some other excuse, because they have ambitions," the president said.

But Sen. Joe Biden, the top Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee, said Wednesday that Bush has allowed Iraq to fester as a training ground for terrorists, and U.S. voters are worried about it.

"On Election Day, that morning, if there's still the carnage in the streets of Iraq, then it will be clear that they have concluded that this administration's policy has failed and there will be a political price for it," Biden, D-Del., predicted on CBS' "The Early Show."

Sen. Jay Rockefeller of West Virginia, the intelligence committee's top Democrat, said the decision to invade Iraq shifted focus away from U.S. counterterrorism efforts.

"There is no question that many of our policies have inflamed our enemies' hatred toward the U.S. and allowed violence to flourish," he said. "But it is the mistakes we made in Iraq — the lack of planning, the mismanagement and the complete incompetence of our leadership — that has done the most damage to our security."

Dispute On Intelligence Report Disrupts Republicans' Game Plan (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 27 — The dispute over a newly disclosed National Intelligence Estimate has threatened a pre-election script in which the White House had sought to put Democrats on the defensive on national security.

As the White House saw it, this was to have been the week in which Republicans seized the advantage by pushing two antiterrorism bills through Congress over the objections of recalcitrant Democrats.

Instead, on Wednesday for the second day in a row, Democrats seized on the intelligence report as confirmation of their case that the Iraq war has in fact compounded the global terrorism threat.

Republicans responded by saying Democrats were distorting the findings or were exploiting important intelligence information for political gain. In Congress, the Republicans appeared to give up on passing one of the two antiterrorism bills, the one on surveillance.

Republicans said even if they were momentarily put off course, they were confident that in the end this fight would not help the Democrats. Democrats, they said, lose every time they try to fight Republicans on the issue of security.

"This debate is bringing Republicans back into the political process," said Representative Tom Cole of Oklahoma, who is a contender to be the next leader of the Republican Congressional campaign committee. "If we're going to have an election where swing voters are the main concern, I'll be happy to talk about national security."

Republican leaders also criticized the 160 House Democrats, including Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the minority leader, who voted Wednesday against a measure sought by President Bush to change the conditions for trying and questioning terrorism suspects.

The House speaker, J. Dennis Hastert, Republican of Illinois, said, "The same terrorists who plan to harm innocent Americans and their freedoms would be coddled, if we followed the Democratic plan."

DOJ_NMG_0070597

Democrats made clear that even though many of them opposed the bill, they would not block it from becoming law, a distinction that they believe will make it more difficult for the White House to use this vote against them.

If anything this week, the back-and-forth between the parties — on the intelligence report, on the bills and on the war itself — seemed to produce at best a muddled result, rather than the sharp contrast that the White House had sought.

Democrats have watched with concern as Mr. Bush hammered his arguments on Iraq and terrorism.

There are new indications that Democrats regard the intelligence report as an opportunity to undercut what had been a main argument of Mr. Bush.

It took Democrats barely three days to seize on the intelligence findings in a new television advertisement in one of the most contested races in the country, the challenge to Representative Nancy L. Johnson, Republican of Connecticut, who supports the war. The campaign of Ms. Johnson's opponent, Christopher Murphy, began broadcasting the commercial, which says, "President Bush's war in Iraq has increased the threat of terrorism and made us less secure here at home."

Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who is leading the Democrats' campaign to win Congress, said the intelligence assessment undercut the White House attempt to move the election from Iraq and to stronger Republican ground, terrorism.

"They had a strategy for this fall to be about national security, and the entire debate this week has turned into the president's failure in Iraq," Mr. Emanuel said. "That is not where they want to be right now."

Republicans disputed the argument that the events were as significant or damaging as Democrats said. Nevertheless, the events were the latest indication that Democrats now see the war in Iraq as an issue that can help them win critical districts and that candidates and party leaders would, unlike in the elections of 2002 and 2004, challenge any attempt by the White House to claim primacy on the issue of terrorism.

Jim Jordan, a Democratic analyst, argued that Republicans were paying a price for having linked the Iraq war to terrorism in previous campaigns.

"They would rather talk about terrorism than Iraq," Mr. Jordan said. "The problem they have got is they formed a linkage between the two that helped them in '04 and hurt them in '06."

In pushing back and trying to gain dominance in the debate, Republicans made two arguments. The first was that Democrats were purposely mischaracterizing what the report said.

"The key passage in the National Intelligence Estimate declassified and released yesterday was that for us to cut and run in Iraq would simply embolden our enemy in a way that they were emboldened when we left Somalia," said Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas.

The second was to suggest that Democrats were trying to exploit intelligence for political gain and to insinuate that they were responsible for leaking the information.

"The purpose of the leak was to distort the premise of the National Intelligence Estimate to try to lend weight to the Democratic argument that the war in Iraq does not really matter, we are losing the war in Iraq, and it doesn't have anything to do with the war on terror," said Senator Christopher S. Bond, Republican of Missouri.

It was too soon to tell, aides to both parties said Wednesday, whether the arguments will hold much sway with voters, much less break through all the arguments occurring here and in Congressional campaigns at home.

Yet one thing was clear. Republicans were not talking about what they wanted to be talking about. And at a time when Democrats are trying to turn the debate from national security, where they are not strong, to the war, which is Mr. Bush's weakness, the intelligence reports provided what Democrats said was a weapon that they very much needed.

"We are less safe today because of the Iraq war," said Senator Charles E. Schumer, the New York Democrat who is Mr. Emanuel's Senate counterpart. "That is a very trenchant argument."

Iraq And Jihad: A Consensus Surfaces (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON

The bleak conclusions of a just-declassified intelligence assessment on terrorism are unlikely to push the Bush administration to change its policies in the fight against Al Qaeda. The report's finding - that Islamist terrorism continues to spread around the world - is far from new, say experts. The White House has known of its contents for months.

But the disclosure of the assessment's main points could put the White House on the political defensive at a crucial moment, with midterm elections only weeks away. It also reveals a depth of pessimism in the US government about near-term prospects for the fight against Al Qaeda that surprised some terrorism analysts.

National Intelligence Estimates, after all, represent the thinking of a wide range of US intelligence agencies. It is not as if the CIA alone has decided that the Iraq war is an underlying factor increasing Al Qaeda's appeal in the Arab world.

DOJ_NMG_0070598

"It's not the assumptions that surprised me. It's the fact that this was a consensus document," says Jessica Stern, a lecturer in public policy at Harvard's John F. Kennedy School of Government and a terrorism expert.

The existence of the terrorist NIE, along with some of its conclusions, were first revealed Sunday by the The New York Times. On Tuesday, President Bush ordered portions of the document declassified, saying that its contents were being distorted in the media. He said Wednesday he would not release the full report. Terrorists adapt to damaged Al Qaeda

Among the document's key findings is the conclusion that US-led counterterrorism efforts have seriously damaged the leadership of Al Qaeda and disrupted its operations.

But the report goes on to say that global Islamist terrorism - by which it means Al Qaeda, associated groups, and independent operators - is "spreading and adapting to counterterrorism efforts."

In addition, the report judges that fighting in Iraq is shaping a new generation of terrorist leaders and operatives. "Perceived jihadist success there would inspire more fighters to continue the struggle elsewhere," says the NIE.

Four factors are underlying the continued spread of Islamist terrorism, according to the document. They are entrenched grievances and a feeling of powerlessness among some in the Arab world; the Iraqi "jihad;" the slow pace of political reform in many Muslim nations; and pervasive anti-US sentiment.

"We assess that the underlying factors fueling the spread of the movement outweigh its vulnerabilities and are likely to do so for the [five-year] time frame of this Estimate," concludes the NIE.

Some experts find the NIE a less-than-compelling document. Its hedging and passive voice reflect an analysis-by-committee approach that isn't all that helpful to policymakers, says William Martel, associate professor of international security studies at Tufts University's Fletcher School of International Diplomacy.

One of its conclusions, Professor Martel points out, is that the global jihadist movement is now using the Internet to communicate and to promote its ideology.

"No kidding!" says Martel. "I was stunned at how pedestrian it was."

The report emphasizes that the fight against terrorism will be a long-term endeavor, and that it will require reforms in Muslim societies to be effective.

"It's unavoidable that we're involved in a war on terror," says Martel. "I prefer that we play offense and not defense," he adds, referring to the debate over the Iraq war.

Others say the bleak tone of some parts of the NIE belie Mr. Bush's optimistic assessments of progress, particularly in Iraq. The political calculus

With elections that will determine which party controls Congress now less than six weeks away, Democrats have pressed to make "Iraq" the word that pops into voters' minds when they think about Republicans. The GOP, for its part, does better when "terrorism" is the security issue voters most care about.

Thus Democrats have highlighted the NIE's conclusion that the invasion and occupation of Iraq have inflamed anti-US sentiments. Some in the party have pressed for the release of the full NIE document, not just its main findings.

"The American people deserve the full story, not those parts of it that the Bush administration selects," said Sen. Edward Kennedy (D) of Massachusetts.

Military pressure has had an effect on Al Qaeda, changing it from a centralized organization to more of a diffuse movement, according to the NIE.

But the invasion of Iraq has allowed jihadists a "cause célèbre," the document notes. They can pose as liberators of the oppressed, increasing their appeal in the Muslim world.

"The intelligence community has concluded that we did what they wanted us to do, for the reasons they wanted us to do it, and that the result they wanted has happened," says Ms. Stern of the Kennedy School of Government.

But the report also notes that the jihadists would be further helped by an appearance of success in Iraq - such as a US pullout. Their cause would be damaged, says the NIE, if "jihadists leaving Iraq perceive themselves, and be perceived, to have failed...."

For this and other reasons, "I don't think we have good choices in Iraq," says Stern.

White House Refuses To Release Full Report On Iraq, Terrorism (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon and Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

The White House refused Wednesday to release the rest of a government-intelligence report on terrorism that found the Iraq war is actually spurring the proliferation of terrorism, saying that doing so would jeopardize the lives of agents who gathered the information.

DOJ_NMG_0070599

Press secretary Tony Snow said releasing the full report, portions of which President Bush declassified on Tuesday, would also risk the nation's ability to keep secret its U.S. intelligence-gathering methods and "compromise the independence" of those charged with analyzing intelligence. "If they think their work is constantly going to be released to the public they are going to pull their punches," Mr. Snow said.

Mr. Snow said the report confirms the importance of the war in Iraq as a bulwark against terrorists. "Iraq has become, for them, the battleground," he said. "If they lose, they lose their bragging rights. They lose their ability to recruit."

INSIDE THE REPORT

· The increased role of Iraqis in opposing al Qaeda in Iraq might lead the terror group's veteran foreign fighters to focus their efforts outside the country.

· While Iran and Syria are the most active state sponsors of terror, many other countries will be unable to prevent their resources from being exploited by terrorists.

· The underlying factors that are fueling the spread of the extremist Muslim movement outweigh its vulnerabilities. These factors are entrenched grievances and a slow pace of reform in home countries, rising anti-U.S. sentiment and the Iraq war.

· Groups "of all stripes" will increasingly use the Internet to communicate, train, recruit and obtain support.

· PDF1 | Plain text2

The White House had released four pages of findings from the National Intelligence Estimate, representing the input of 16 government agencies, amid mounting pressure from Congress after four pages were leaked last week.

The report concludes that the Iraq war is a "cause célèbre" shaping a new generation of militant Islamists and terrorists. It also suggests that, while the leadership of al Qaeda has suffered serious damage in Iraq and the wider war on terror, the threat from Islamic extremists has spread in numbers and geographic reach.

The flap over whether to release the full report or not comes in the run-up to midterm elections, in which the conflict has become a defining issue. Leaders from both parties immediately seized on the findings to argue that their position on the Iraq war would better secure the U.S.

President Bush called those who believe the war has worsened terrorism "naïve," and said to withdraw from Iraq could only further embolden militant groups to spread their influence across the Middle East and the Islamic world.

Sen. Jay Rockefeller (D., W.Va.) senior Democrat on the Senate Intelligence Committee, countered that, "The reality is, the war in Iraq has inflamed Islamic extremism ... and it has created a training ground for the next generation of terrorists."

The White House initially sought to dismiss the NIE's leaked portions on Iraq as being mischaracterized, but ultimately agreed to release the report's "Key Judgments." None of the conclusions about Iraq had been redacted, said Francis Fragos Townsend, Mr. Bush's top counter-terrorism official.

The NIE seeks to assess the near-term capabilities of al Qaeda and other militant Islamist groups. It said U.S.-led counter-terrorism operations have "seriously damaged" al Qaeda's senior leadership, but the group continues to spread its ideology by breaking into more diffuse cells and communicating through the Internet. The NIE said Islamists have made particular gains in spreading their influence into Europe, and warned that non-Muslim groups in Latin America and Asia who share al Qaeda's anti-American agenda could also resort to terrorist activities.

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

3

President George Bush and Afghan President4 Hamid Karzai hold a joint press conference to discuss the Iraq policy and the leaking of classified information for political purposes.

On Iraq, the report said the war has aided al Qaeda's efforts to recruit globally by "breeding a deep resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world." It said U.S. success in stabilizing Iraq and promoting democracy, however, could ultimately bring fewer fighters into the fight. "We assess that the underlying factors fueling the spread of the movement outweigh its vulnerabilities" in the near term, the report said.

As the White House and its critics traded charges over the findings, Congress was poised to approve rules for interrogating and prosecuting suspected foreign combatants, as Democrats eager to avoid political fallout before the elections said they aren't likely to block the measure. The House will take up its bill today and the Senate could follow today or tomorrow.

Some critics of the legislation, which would set up military commissions to try "enemy combatants," want to propose changes. But even without those revisions, Democrats aren't likely to filibuster and many might decide to vote for it, Senate aides said.

One sticking point is a change made in recent days that expands the definition of "enemy combatant." Sen. Carl Levin (D., Mich.) called it "much broader than anyone simply caught in terrorist activity." Another is a provision that would prevent suspects held at Guantanamo Bay from challenging their detention with a habeas corpus petition. Human-rights groups have said this would invite abuse of prisoners and allow the government to hold suspects indefinitely.

DOJ_NMG_0070600

In related action, the House approved a $447 billion Pentagon budget for the new fiscal year that begins Oct. 1, including $70 billion in emergency funding for military operations overseas. But a companion defense authorization bill remains stymied by a standoff between Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) and the Senate.

--David Rogers and the Associated Press contributed to this article.

Iraq Report Is Due In '07; Skeptics Want To See It Now (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 27 — In the fall of 2002, weeks before the midterm elections, American intelligence agencies were racing to complete an assessment of Iraq as the Senate prepared to vote on a resolution sought by the White House to prepare the groundwork for war.

Four years later, in the shadow of another midterm campaign, the agencies are again drafting a formal assessment on Iraq. But this time, the document is one that the White House might prefer to see finished later rather than sooner.

In mid-August, John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, gave the go-ahead for a National Intelligence Estimate that will address security in Iraq and the potential for civil war there. White House and intelligence officials say the work is still in its early stages and will not be done until next year.

But Democrats contend that the White House is "slow rolling" the document — that is, deliberately withholding what could be bleak conclusions — until after the November elections. The Democrats have intensified those complaints since the White House, under political pressure, on Tuesday released parts of a separate intelligence report, a sober assessment of global terrorism.

On Wednesday, Representative Jane Harman of California, the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, even said sources had told her that a draft of the document had been finished.

"I have heard that it's complete, and that it's grim," Ms. Harman said.

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, fired back, calling Ms. Harman's assertion "flat wrong."

"There is not a waiting Iraq document that reflects the National Intelligence Estimate that's sitting around gathering dust waiting until after the election," Mr. Snow said.

The intelligence estimate is being done at the behest of members of Congress, including Senator Pat Roberts, Republican of Kansas and chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee. It will be the American intelligence community's first comprehensive assessment on the state of the Iraqi insurgency and the sectarian violence in the country since the summer of 2004.

Intelligence analysts are supposed to keep political calculations out of their work. At the same time, those who have worked at the National Intelligence Council, the group in charge of producing the intelligence estimates, say the sometimes politically charged nature of the reports' conclusions make it impossible to operate in a political vacuum.

"The challenge for intelligence officers is how to walk a fine line, not only with regard to judgments, but with regard to timing," said Paul R. Pillar, who until a year ago oversaw American intelligence assessments about the Middle East.

Alan Pino, Mr. Pillar's successor at the National Intelligence Council, is now the one walking the fine line. As the national intelligence officer for assessments about the Middle East, Mr. Pino is in charge of a process that usually lasts several months: from first deciding what specific subjects a National Intelligence Estimate will examine to ensuring that the government's 16 intelligence agencies sign off on the final draft.

The clock on the current report started running with Mr. Negroponte's approval in August, and on Tuesday, Frances Fragos Townsend, the president's domestic security adviser, said it would probably be completed in January.

In a letter to Mr. Negroponte on Wednesday, Ms. Harman called the timetable "unacceptable," and suggested that he might be trying to hold the report until after Election Day.

"N.I.E.'s have been produced in as little as several weeks, as in the case of the 2002 report on Iraqi W.M.D.," Ms. Harmon wrote.

Republicans counter that the 2002 Iraq assessment was hardly a model to emulate. Several government investigations have discredited the conclusions of that report, which asserted that Saddam Hussein had stockpiles of chemical and biological weapons. That estimate was hastily assembled in the fall of 2002, requested by lawmakers who said they wanted the intelligence community's best judgments about Iraq before they voted to authorize the invasion.

But after American troops invaded Iraq in March 2003, Iraq became the primary focus of American intelligence agencies. They have produced volumes of analysis on the insurgency and sectarian violence in Iraq, and on the political and economic situation there.

DOJ_NMG_0070601

This, some experts say, already gives intelligence officials the building blocks for a National Intelligence Estimate that could be completed in a relatively short time.

"There's not a lot of basic research that needs to be done, that's for sure," Mr. Pillar said.

White House Holds Ground On Terror Study (LAT)

By Greg Miller And Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — The White House defended its interpretation of declassified intelligence findings Wednesday, saying they back President Bush's rationale for sticking with his strategy in Iraq, while Democrats and others said the document proved that the U.S. invasion had increased the terrorist threat.

The administration refused to release the full 30-page report, saying that doing so would endanger the lives of U.S. operatives and possibly reveal surveillance methods. The White House also rebuffed calls for the quick completion and release of a new intelligence report underway that focuses even more closely on conditions in Iraq. That report will not be finished before next year, the White House said.

The five-page portion of the report declassified and released Tuesday concluded that terrorism was growing and spreading worldwide, fueled by the war in Iraq, and that the "Iraq jihad" was shaping "a new generation of terrorist leaders and operatives." The report is known as a National Intelligence Estimate, a consensus view of the CIA and all of the other 15 U.S. intelligence agencies.

White House spokesman Tony Snow, facing questions about how Bush's views that the U.S. is winning the war against terrorism square with the considerably bleaker findings of the intelligence report, fiercely defended the president's stance.

"Let's start with the obvious: Since Sept. 11, 2001, we have not been attacked," Snow said, adding that aggressive American tactics had made it difficult for terrorist organizations to mobilize and strike the United States.

A chorus of Democrats, however, countered that the report showed that the U.S.-led war in Iraq was inspiring, training and equipping militants to launch attacks elsewhere. "Iraq has become a breeding ground for terrorists," Sen. Ken Salazar (D-Colo.) said. "The world is a much more dangerous place today."

The debate over the intelligence findings comes as national security dominates the midterm election campaigns that will determine control of Congress, and as U.S. forces in Iraq struggle to establish order in Baghdad.

U.S. military officials in Iraq said Wednesday that the number of suicide attacks this week was the highest of any week since the war began. Without giving numbers, they said that attacks overall had risen in the last two weeks, especially in and around Baghdad, despite an ongoing U.S.-led crackdown on militants in the capital.

American intelligence officials said they did not expect any other portions of the intelligence estimate to be declassified. Officials from both parties who have read the document said the remaining pages provided far more detail on the complexion of the spread of Islamic radicalism, but were consistent with the "key judgments" that had been declassified.

"It just expands on those key judgments," said a senior U.S. intelligence official who spoke on condition of anonymity. "It's not like there's a Version A and a Version B. They are the underpinning or basis for the statements" that were released.

Rep. Jane Harman (D-Venice), the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, said the complete report had "more information on Iraq, more nuance, more detail."

"But I'm not telling you these key judgments are an unfair representation of the report," she said.

The document was delivered to the House and Senate intelligence committees after its completion in April, but few members not on those panels have seen the entire report. Congressional officials said that Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte's office had informed members this week that it planned to make the entire classified document available to all lawmakers.

The impact of the intelligence estimate prompted new calls Wednesday for faster completion of the second report in the works that is to focus exclusively on the situation in Iraq.

Frances Townsend, White House domestic security advisor, said Wednesday that the intelligence estimate focusing on Iraq was expected to be finished in January. A senior U.S. intelligence official cautioned, however, that Negroponte's office had not set a timetable for the completion of the work, suggesting it could be delayed beyond the beginning of next year.

Harman called that "unacceptable" in a letter to Negroponte on Wednesday, and questioned whether there were political reasons for putting the report off until next year.

Work on the new intelligence estimate on Iraq was begun in August, after Democrats on the Senate Intelligence Committee requested a new, thorough intelligence examination of the state of the conflict there.

DOJ_NMG_0070602

Meanwhile, the White House moved aggressively Wednesday to counter arguments from Democrats that the intelligence report painted a dismal picture of Bush's policies and challenged administration descriptions of terrorist groups reeling under the U.S.-led assault.

"The critical judgment here is Iraq has become for [terrorists] the battleground," Snow said. "If they lose, they lose their bragging rights. They lose their ability to recruit…. The president has made the point over and over."

Snow said Bush's position that Americans were safer now was not undermined by the intelligence estimate's assertion that the number of jihadists had grown. Instead, Snow argued that militants were less organized than before, and that, as a result, the U.S. was less likely to be hit.

Bush "has not tried to say there are fewer," Snow said. "He has not tried to say that they haven't been winning propaganda victories. What he has said is: We've got a different kind of enemy, and we have kept America safe, and we will continue to do it."

Snow said that the report, along with additional information about how terrorists were doing business, had prompted changes in U.S. strategy.

"It does, in fact, talk about a more dispersed terror network; it does talk about [how] people are communicating over the Internet; it does talk about the necessity of approaching this from a number of different angles," he said. "So the answer is, yes, there has been a much more nuanced approach to doing this. And this is what happens as the war against terror continues. As they adjust, we adjust."

Lessons Of The NIE (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

National Intelligence Estimates are bland documents that represent the lowest-common-denominator judgment of more than a dozen intelligence agencies. We doubt they're very useful for policy makers, and they certainly aren't suitable for use as political cudgels in a national election.

But we now know that's exactly what a few leaking spooks, the New York Times and credulous Democrats just tried to do. Sunday's Times led with a story sourced to anonymous "intelligence officials" and headlined "Spy Agencies Say Iraq War Worsens Terrorism Threat." Democratic critics of the Iraq war promptly seized on the report. But now that President Bush has declassified the "Key Findings" of the April 2006 NIE on "Trends in Global Terrorism," we know this scoop was largely political spin. A more accurate headline would have been: "Spy Agencies Say Abandoning Iraq Would Worsen Terror Threat."

True, the NIE says post-Saddam Iraq has become a "cause celebre" for jihadists. But that's merely stating the obvious. Any U.S. intervention in the Mideast was going to provoke an extremist response. The more important statement in that same bullet point is: "Should jihadists leaving Iraq perceive themselves, and be perceived, to have failed, we judge fewer fighters will be inspired to carry on the fight."

In other words, it's abandoning Iraq that would be the huge mistake -- while success would be a major antiterror victory. This is a blunt rebuke of Democratic Representative Jack Murtha and his House allies, who want to replace U.S. troops in Iraq with an "over-the-horizon" force -- in Okinawa, as he once put it.

And what about the larger Democratic theme that the war in Iraq has been a "distraction" from the fight against al Qaeda? In its very first sentence, the NIE says "United States-led counterterrorism efforts have seriously damaged the leadership of al Qaeda and disrupted its operations." It also suggests dwelling on the failure to capture or kill Osama bin Laden is a mistake: "Countering the spread of the jihadist movement will require coordinated multilateral efforts that go well beyond operations to capture or kill terrorist leaders."

More broadly, the NIE seems to endorse addressing the root causes of terrorism through democracy promotion: "If democratic reform efforts in Muslim majority nations progress over the next five years, political participation probably would drive a wedge between intransigent extremists and groups willing to use the political process."

And: "Greater pluralism and more responsive political systems in Muslim majority nations would alleviate some of the grievances jihadists exploit. Over time, such progress, together with sustained, multifaceted programs targeting the vulnerabilities of the jihadist movement and continued pressure on al Qaeda, could erode support for the jihadists."

This is hardly earth-shattering stuff, we grant. But it sure sounds more like an affirmation of the Bush Administration's general approach to the war on terror than what the Times described when it quoted an unnamed "intelligence official" that "the Iraq war has made the overall terrorism problem worse."

But then anyone who understood the process of producing NIEs would never have made such a big deal about the document. President Bush could do himself, and the country, a favor if he reacted to this latest attempt to politicize NIEs by asking our spy agencies to stop producing them. Their focus should be more and better intelligence. They should leave the policy judgments to elected officials -- and the voters.

DOJ_NMG_0070603

A Good Estimate (WP)

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

THOUGH IT undermined some of his rhetoric, President Bush was right to declassify and release the intelligence community's most recent estimate of global terrorism. The three-page summary of "key judgments," originally delivered to the White House in April, provides a clear, reasoned and sobering account of the state of the Islamic extremist threat five years after Sept. 11, 2001. Its release ought to deepen rather than inflame the debate in Washington -- if only because the assessment is far superior to that being retailed to the country by the president or by most Democrats.

The bad news in the report -- and there is a lot of it -- is that U.S. intelligence agencies believe that the number of Islamic "jihadists" is growing and that the threat is spreading to more countries, particularly in Europe. The Iraq conflict, it says, "has become the 'cause celebre' " for such militants, and "the Iraq jihad is shaping a new generation of terrorist leaders and operatives." If current trends continue, the report predicts "increasing attacks worldwide."

These grim conclusions are hard to square with Mr. Bush's contention that the country is "safer" today than it was five years ago or that the invasion of Iraq helped rather than hindered the fight against terrorism. In fact, the president seems unwilling to accept the conclusions of the intelligence professionals. On Tuesday he said it is naive to think that terrorism would be less pervasive if the invasion of Iraq had not taken place.

Democrats are citing the intelligence estimate as proof that Iraq has been a catastrophe. Those among them who prophesied four years ago that an invasion would provide new recruits for al-Qaeda's cause can justifiably claim some vindication. But the report also poses problems for Democratic leaders such as House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.), who say the solution in Iraq is an early withdrawal of U.S. troops. The report supports Mr. Bush's contention that Iraq is now a central front in the war on terrorism; it says "perceived jihadist success there would inspire more fighters to continue the struggle elsewhere," while defeat would mean that "fewer fighters will be inspired to carry on the fight."

The larger thrust of the report goes well beyond Iraq or the cacophony of the midterm election campaign. It says "the most powerful weapon in the war on terror" over time will be not military success in Iraq or the capturing and killing of al-Qaeda leaders, but "the Muslim mainstream." The vast majority of Muslims are likely to reject the extreme political solutions proposed by al-Qaeda and its allies, and they will be more likely to do so if "democratic reform efforts in Muslim-majority nations progress" and entrenched problems of "corruption, injustice, and fear of Western domination" are alleviated.

The U.S. mission in Iraq since the overthrow of Saddam Hussein has been largely aimed at those goals, in one of the Muslim world's most important countries. It should be little wonder that the effort, like U.S. promotion of democracy in Lebanon and within the Palestinian Authority, has provoked an extremist backlash. Were it to retreat altogether from the Middle East, the United States could probably reduce the number of Islamic extremist recruits in the next five years. Yet any careful reader of the intelligence estimate will find it hard to conclude that the war can be won that way.

Declassifying The Obvious (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 28, 2006

THE JUDGMENT OF THE National Intelligence Estimate partly made public this week — that "the Iraq conflict has become the 'cause celebre' for jihadists" — did not unveil an especially novel viewpoint or theory. So why has the report, assembled by U.S. intelligence agencies in April, caused such a sensation?

Partly it's the official pedigree of the document; partly it's the unconvincing attempt by President Bush to explain it away. In announcing Tuesday that he would declassify parts of the report, he testily suggested that the actual language would discredit "speculation" that it had linked the war in Iraq to a heightened terrorist threat. But the material released to the public came to essentially that conclusion (though it also backed Bush's contention that if jihadists failed in Iraq, they would recruit "fewer fighters" in the future).

Yet even before Bush declassified parts of the report, the document exerted a fascination that cannot be explained solely by its conclusions. Some of the report's mystique stems from the fact that, until Tuesday, it had been a secret.

Several of its observations — not just about the relationship between the U.S. presence in Iraq and the growth of "a deep resentment of U.S. involvement in the Muslim world" — are by now conventional wisdom: Jihadism is fostered not only by the Iraq war but also by corruption and repression in Muslim societies; countering the movement will require more than a military response; greater political participation in Muslim societies could drive a wedge between jihadists and political reformers, though it might also cause "destabilizing transitions." Yet because these conclusions were pried from a classified document, there is a frisson that would have been missing if the administration had made them public last spring.

Remember the "Downing Street memo," a once-secret document from 2002 recording a British intelligence official's view that "intelligence and facts were being fixed" by the Bush administration to support its long-standing intention to topple Saddam

DOJ_NMG_0070604

Hussein? The publication of the memo in 2005 created a sensation in Britain and the United States, even though it reflected one man's view (albeit one long held by critics of the war in both countries) and was far from a smoking gun.

Government officials often are accused of belonging to a cult of classification, and officials in the Bush administration have a particular fetish about secrecy. But they aren't the only ones to ascribe special importance to a secret, whether it's "The Da Vinci Code" or the Downing Street memo. Forbidden fruits of intelligence analysis always will be more tantalizing than the ones put on public view.

The argument that the U.S. presence in Iraq has exacerbated the international terrorist threat is an important one fully deserving of discussion. So is the NIE's conclusion, more congenial to the Bush administration, that defeating insurgents in Iraq would demoralize other potential jihadists. That debate was going on before the NIE was publicized. And it should continue after the thrill of declassification is gone.

Infidel Documents (WSJ)

By Fouad Ajami

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

The scaffolding of the Iraq war is under renewed attack. So there had been no meeting between Mohamed Atta and Iraqi intelligence operative Ahmad al-Ani in Prague; and Saddam's regime was "intensely secular" while al Qaeda was steeped in religious doctrine. Tariq Aziz, once Goebbels to his master, now in captivity, says that Saddam had only "negative sentiments" about Osama bin Laden, and that the despot had issued a decree "outlawing Wahhabism in Iraq and threatening offenders with execution."

The case against the Iraq war now has a new canonical document: a report by the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, released on Sept. 8. Opponents of the war -- to use their own language against the Bush administration -- now "cherry pick" this report, and they find in it the damning evidence that had been their conviction all along. In their eyes, the case for this war was a willful hoax. And on the heels of this report, it was revealed that the National Intelligence Estimate now depicts Iraq as the breeding ground of a new generation of terrorists.

Intended or not, the release of the Senate report, around the fifth anniversary of 9/11, has been read as definitive proof that the Iraq war stands alone, that the terrors that came America's way on 9/11 had nothing to do with the origins of the war. Few will read this report; fewer still will ask why a virtually incomprehensible Arab-Islamic world that has eluded us for so long now yields its secrets to a congressional committee. On the face of it, and on the narrowest of grounds, the report maintains that the link between the war on terror and the invasion of Iraq cannot stand in a Western court of inquiry.

But this brutal drawn-out struggle between American power and the furies of the Arab-Islamic world was never a Western war. Our enemies were full of cunning and expert at dissimulation, hunkering down when needed. No one in the coffeehouses of the Arab world (let alone in the safe houses of the terrorists) would be led astray by that distinction between "secular" and "religious" movements emphasized by the Senate Intelligence Committee. They live in a world where the enemies of order move with remarkable ease from outward religious piety to the most secular of appearances. It is no mystery to them that Saddam, once the most secular of despots, fell back on religious symbols after the first Gulf War, added Allahu Akbar (God is great) to Iraq's flag, and launched a mosque-building campaign whose remnants -- half-finished mosques all over Baghdad -- now stand mute.

No Iraqi agents had to slip into hotel rooms in Prague for meetings with jihadists to plot against America. The plot sprang out of the deep structure of Arab opinion. We waged a war against Saddam in 1991 and then spared him. We established a presence in the Arabian Peninsula to monitor him, only to help radicalize a population with religious phobias about the "infidel" presence on Arabian soil. The most devout and the most religiously lapsed of the Arabs alike could see the feebleness of America's response to a decade of subversion and terror waged by Arab plotters and bankrolled by Arab financiers. The American desire to launch out of Iraq a broader campaign of deterrence against the radical forces of the region may not have been successful in every way, but the effort was driven by a shrewd reading that, after Kabul, the war had to be taken deep into the Arab world itself. * * *

Strictly speaking, the National Intelligence Estimate -- another "canonical" document -- is not a finding: It is an assessment of Islamic terrorism and its perceived links to Iraq. (It is odd, and ironic, that the intelligence agencies that had been mocked by liberal opinion for their reporting on Iraq before the war have now acquired an aura of infallibility.) Islamic terror did not wait on the Iraq war. The assertion that Islamic terrorism has "metastasized and spread across the globe" because of Iraq takes at face value what the jihadists themselves proclaim. It would stand to reason that their Web sites, and the audiotapes of their leaders, would trumpet their attachment to the cause of Iraq. It is inevitable that American analysts glued to jihadist cyberspace, and lacking intimate knowledge of Arab ways, would take the jihadists at their word. But Islamic radicals have not lacked for grievances. The anti-Americanism and antimodernism that brought them onto American soil five years ago predated Iraq. For the good part of two decades, jihadist terror blew at will, driven by the conviction in the lands of Islam and its diaspora communities that America was a pampered land with little zeal for bloody struggles.

DOJ_NMG_0070605

The declassified portions of the NIE are not particularly profound in the reading of Islamism. Their sociologese is of a piece with a big body of writing on Islamist movements -- that the resentments of these movements arise out of "anger, humiliation and a sense of powerlessness" in the face of the West. I dare guess that were Ayman al-Zawahiri to make his way through this report, he would marvel at the naïveté of those who set out to read him and his fellow warriors of the faith. Ayoob al-Masri (Zarqawi's successor in Iraq) would not find himself and his phobias and his will to power in this "infidel document." These warriors have a utopia -- an Islamic world ruled by their own merciless brand of the faith. With or without Iraq, the work of "cleansing" Islam's world would continue to rage on.

It was inevitable that the Arabs would regard this American project in Iraq through the prism of their own experience. We upended an order of power in Baghdad, dominated as it had been by the Sunni Arabs; and we emancipated the Shiite stepchildren of the Arab world, as well as the Kurds. Our innocence was astounding. We sinned against the order of the universe, but called on the region to celebrate, to bless our work. More to the point, we set the Shia on their own course. We did for them what they could not have done on their own. For our part, we were ambivalent about the coming of age of the Shia. We had battled radical Shiism in Iran and in Lebanon in the 1980s. The symbols of Shiism we associated with political violence -- radical mullahs, martyrology, suicide bombers. True, in the interim, we had had a war -- undeclared, but still a war -- with Sunni jihadists. But there lingered in us an aversion to radical Shiism, an understandable residue of the campaign that Ayatollah Khomeini had waged against American power in the '80s. We were susceptible as well to the representations made to us by rulers in the Sunni-ruled states about the dangers of radical Shiism.

The case against the war makes much of Iran's new power in Iraq. To the war critics, President Bush has midwifed a second Islamic republic in Iraq, next door to Iran. But Iran cannot run away with Iraq, and talk of an ascendant Iran in Iraqi affairs is overblown. We belittle the Iraqi Shiites -- their sense of home, and of a tradition so thoroughly Iraqi and Arab -- when we write them off as instruments of Iran. Inevitably, there is Iranian money in Iraq, and there are agents, but this is the logic of the 900-mile Iranian-Iraqi border.

True, in the long years of Tikriti/Saddamist dominion, Shiite political men persecuted by the regime sought sanctuary in Iran; a political party, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, and its military arm, the Badr Brigade, rose in those years with Iranian patronage. But the Iraqi exiles are not uniform in their attitudes toward Iran. Exile was hard, and the Iranian hosts were given to arrogance and paternalism. Iraqi exiles were subordinated to the strategic needs of the Iranian regime. Much is made, and appropriately, of the way the Americans who prosecuted the first Gulf War called for rebellions by the Shiites (and the Kurds), only to walk away in indifference as the Saddam regime struck back with vengeance. But the Iranians, too, averted their gaze from the slaughter. States are merciless, the Persian state no exception to that rule.

We should not try to impose more order and consensus on the world of Shiite Iraq than is warranted by the facts. In recent days a great faultline within the Shiites could be seen: The leader of the Supreme Council for the Revolution in Iraq, Sayyid Abdulaziz al-Hakim, has launched a big campaign for an autonomous Shiite federated unit that would take in the overwhelmingly Shiite provinces in the south and the middle Euphrates, but this project has triggered the furious opposition of Hakim's nemesis, the young cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. Hakim's bid was transparent. He sought to be the uncrowned king of a Shiite polity. But he was rebuffed. Sadr was joined in opposition to that scheme by the Daawa Party of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, by the Virtue Party, and by those secular Shiites who had come into the national assembly with former Prime Minister Iyad Allawi. A bitter struggle now plays out in the Shiite provinces between the operatives of the Badr Brigade and Sadr's Mahdi Army. The fight is draped in religious colors -- but it is about the spoils of power.

The truculence of the Sunni Arabs has brought forth the Shiite vengeance that a steady campaign of anti-Shiite terror was bound to trigger. Sunni elements have come into the government, but only partly so. President Jalal Talabani put it well when he said that there are elements in Iraq that partake of government in the daytime, and of terror at night. This is as true of the Sunni Arabs as it is of the Shiites. The (Sunni) insurgents were relentless: In the most recent of events, they have taken terror deep into Sadr City. The results were predictable: The death squads of the Mahdi Army struck back.

It is idle to debate whether Iraq is in a state of civil war. The semantics are tendentious, and in the end irrelevant. There is mayhem, to be sure, but Iraq has arrived at a rough balance of terror. The Sunni Arabs now know, as they had never before, that their tyranny is broken for good. And the most recent reports from Anbar province speak of a determination of the Sunni tribes to be done with the Arab jihadists.

It is not a rhetorical flourish to say that the burden of rescuing Iraq lies with its leaders. No script had America staying indefinitely, fighting Iraq's wars, securing Iraq's peace. The best we can do for Iraq is grant it time to develop the military and political capabilities that would secure it against insurgencies at home and subversion from across its borders. No one can say with confidence how long the American body politic will tolerate the expense in blood and treasure. It would be safe to assume that this president will stay with this war, that its burden is likely to be passed onto his successor. The Iraqis are approaching reckoning time, for America's leaders are under pressure to force history's pace. The political process here at home is not likely to impose a precise deadline for withdrawal. But the Iraqis should not be lulled into complacency, for the same political process is more likely to place limits on this commitment in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0070606

For their part, the Iranians will press on: The spectacle of power they display is illusory. It is a broken society over which the mullahs rule. A society that throws on the scene a leader of Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's derangement is not an orderly land; foreigners may not be able to overthrow that regime, but countries can atrophy as their leaders -- armed, here, by an oil windfall of uncertain duration -- strut on the world stage. Iran's is a deeper culture than Iraq's, possessed of a keen sense of Persia's primacy in the region around it. What Iranians make of their own history will not wait on the kind of society that will emerge in Iraq. On the margins, a scholarly tradition in Najaf given to moderation could be a boon to the clerics of Iran. But the Iranians will not know deliverance from the sterility of their world if Iraq were to fail. Their schadenfreude over an American debacle in Iraq will have to be brief. A raging fire next door to them would not be pretty. And, crafty players, the Iranians know what so many in America who guess at such matters do not: that Iraq is an unwieldy land, that the Arab-Persian divide in culture, language and temperament is not easy to bridge.

We needn't give credence to the assertion of President Bush -- that the jihadists would turn up in our cities if we pulled up stakes from Baghdad -- to recognize that a terrible price would be paid were we to opt for a hasty and unseemly withdrawal from Iraq. This is a region with a keen eye for the weakness of strangers. The heated debate about the origins of our drive into Iraq would surely pale by comparison to the debate that would erupt -- here and elsewhere -- were we to give in to despair and cast the Iraqis adrift.

Mr. Ajami, a professor at the School of Advanced International Studies at Johns Hopkins, is the author, most recently, of "The Foreigner's Gift" (Free Press, 2006). He is a recipient of the 2006 Bradley Prize.

The Grand Delusion (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

You probably know Daniel Defoe as the author of “Robinson Crusoe,” but he was also a journalist, and in 1705, he noticed a gigantic change occurring around him. “The Power of Nations,” he wrote, “is not now measur’d, as it has been, by Prowess, Gallantry, and Conduct. ’Tis the Wealth of Nations that makes them Great.”

In other words, nations had begun measuring themselves not by whom they conquered, but by how they fared in the competition for economic success. This was a major shift in consciousness, and as the great historian of nationalism, Liah Greenfeld, observes, today you can see a wide variety of societies — the U.S., Japan, China, India, Europe — that define their national greatness in this way.

The Arab world, though famous for its bazaars, has not defined national glory economically, Greenfeld adds. Instead, the rising radical groups today define greatness negatively through acts of anti-Western defiance.

Superseding market entrepreneurs, there are terror entrepreneurs competing to see who can issue the most militant call and perform the most galvanizing act of violence. They are driven by resentment toward the West, but also by the internal competition for prestige and standing.

To his eternal credit, after 9/11 George Bush quickly understood that the terror threat was fundamentally an ideological threat, a product of deep historical consciousness. To his eternal discredit, he didn’t commit enough resources to successfully defeat and discredit that ideology. The chance to deliver the sort of blow that the Six Day War delivered to an earlier version of Arab nationalism may now be lost.

As a result, as the National Intelligence Estimate makes clear, the West now faces a diverse and metastasizing set of foes. The report also makes clear that while the Iraq war has so far enhanced the prestige of the terrorists, Iraq remains the crucial battleground where they will either gain glory or face humiliation.

If we lived in a serious political culture, we’d be discussing what we’ve learned from Iraq and how to proceed. Instead, all of Washington is involved in a juvenile game of gotcha. Bill Clinton is fighting about what did or didn’t happen 10 years ago. The White House is still exaggerating the positive. Democratic senators purr like happy kittens as retired generals slam Donald Rumsfeld, and then stop up their ears when those same generals call for more troops and a longer war.

Voters now confront a Republican Party that understands the breadth of the threat but has bungled the central campaign, and a Democratic Party that is quick to criticize but lacks an understanding of the jihadists and a strategy for confronting them.

Worse, more and more people are falling for the Grand Delusion — the notion that if we just leave the extremists alone, they will leave us alone. On the right, some believe that if we just stop this Wilsonian madness of trying to introduce democracy into the Arab world, we can return to an age of stability and balance. On the left, many people can’t seem to fathom an enemy the U.S. isn't somehow responsible for. Others think the entire threat has been exaggerated by Karl Rove for the sake of political scaremongering.

DOJ_NMG_0070607

Perhaps it's understandable that many Americans would fall for this Grand Delusion. The Israelis, who have more experience with Islamic extremism, recently did. They imagined that they could build a security barrier and unilaterally withdraw from their historical reality. It took the war in south Lebanon to make them see there is no way to unilaterally withdraw. There is no way to become a normal society. Even if they pulled out of Lebanon, Gaza and the West Bank, they would still have to confront an existential foe, so long as the forces of political Islam continued to wage their competition for anti-Semitic glory all around.

The blunt fact is that groups of Islamic extremists will continue to compete and grow until mainstream Islamic moderates can establish a more civilized set of criteria for prestige and greatness. Today's extremists are not the product of short-term historical circumstances, but of consciousness and culture. They are not the fault of the United States, but have roots stretching back centuries. They will not suddenly ignore their foe — us — when their hatred of us is the core of their identity.

The National Intelligence Estimate predicts terror violence will get worse in the years ahead. The scarier estimate was made by a veteran of the 1948 Arab-Israeli war, in conversation with his grandson who now lives in Boston: "This is forever."

At Dinner Table, Bush Plays Role Of Mediator (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

President Bush welcomed the feuding leaders of Afghanistan and Pakistan to the White House last night for an unusual round of personal diplomacy aimed at forging better relations between two key partners in U.S. efforts to hunt down members of al-Qaeda and other Islamic terrorists.

Dining on spicy sea bass and pumpkin cake with Bush and his most senior advisers were Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, and his Afghan counterpart, Hamid Karzai. The two have been sniping at each other for months over what Karzai considers Pakistan's tolerance of Taliban militants crossing the border to mount armed attacks in Afghanistan.

Musharraf has testily rebutted Karzai's assertions, but U.S. officials are worried that the deteriorating relations between the two men threaten their effort to pacify Afghanistan and hunt down Osama bin Laden, who is believed to be hiding in the mountainous region of Pakistan bordering Afghanistan.

"They really get under each other's skin," said one senior U.S. official who was not authorized to speak publicly about the White House dinner before it got started last night.

Administration officials said they hoped at the very least the two men would find less public forums to express their annoyance with each other. Shortly before going into the White House last night, Bush told reporters in the Rose Garden that the dinner was "a chance for us to strategize together, to talk about the need to cooperate."

"These two men are personal friends of mine," Bush said, with Karzai and Musharraf standing by his side, not looking at each other. "They are strong leaders who have a understanding of the world in which we live. They understand that the forces of moderation are being challenged by extremists and radicals."

The dinner lasted about 2 1/2 hours, and the White House offered only a vague indication of what occurred. A White House statement said the three leaders "committed to supporting moderation and defeating extremism through greater intelligence sharing, coordinated action against terrorists, and common efforts to enhance the prosperity of the people of Afghanistan and Pakistan."

The three-way summit came as the Bush administration, already grappling with crises over the Iraq war and over Iran's nuclear ambitions, is confronting a resurgent Taliban.

Although toppled five years ago in a U.S.-led invasion, the Taliban now controls swaths of southern Afghanistan and has fought increasingly violent battles with NATO troops patrolling the border regions. The number of U.S. troops in Afghanistan in recent months has swelled to more than 20,000.

Tense relations between Pakistan and Afghanistan date back years. Pakistan was one of three countries to recognize the previous Taliban government that sheltered bin Laden. Pakistan broke with the Taliban after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, and the leaders have blamed each other in recent months for insufficient zeal in fighting Islamic militants along the countries' long border.

Answering questions last week at the Council on Foreign Relations in New York, Karzai said Taliban leader Mullah Omar is hiding out in the Pakistani provincial capital of Quetta and suggested that Musharraf is not interested in hunting him down.

For his part, Musharraf has suggested that Karzai has bad information and, as he said in an interview on CNN this week, is not telling the truth about circumstances in Afghanistan. "He knows everything, but he's purposely denying -- turning a blind eye, like an ostrich," Musharraf said.

DOJ_NMG_0070608

Musharraf has also been using his visit to the United States to promote his new memoirs, which offer provocative statements about his battle with Islamic militants. U.S. officials believe that bin Laden is in Pakistan, but Musharraf speculates that because of the large number of Saudis living in the Konar province of Afghanistan, the al-Qaeda leader is probably hiding there.

Bush Urges Karzai, Musharraf To Unite To Defeat Terrorism (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush appealed to the bickering presidents of Pakistan and Afghanistan on Wednesday to put aside their differences and "strategize together" over dinner on ways to defeat the common enemy of terrorism.

Standing between Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf and Afghan President Hamid Karzai, Mr. Bush emphasized "the need to cooperate, to make sure that people have got a hopeful future" in both countries.

Mr. Karzai calls Mr. Musharraf "my brother," but after months of sniping that put the White House in the middle of a spat between two of its closest allies, Mr. Bush decided it was time to bring the leaders together.

Judging by the body language Mr. Bush himself had said he would be watching, there were plenty of tensions to overcome over a light dinner of soup, sea bass and salad. The meal was billed as an "iftar," a meal that breaks the daytime fast during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan. Messrs. Musharraf and Karzai are Muslims.

The Afghan and Pakistani leaders stood stiffly on either side of Mr. Bush during a brief Rose Garden appearance before they ate. "I look forward to having dinner with friends of mine who don't happen to share the same faith I do but nevertheless share the same outlook for a more hopeful world," Mr. Bush said in the brief remarks before dinner.

"It's very important for the people in Pakistan and in Afghanistan to know that America respects religion, and we respect the right for people to worship the way they see fit," he said.

"Today's dinner is a chance for us to strategize together" and find common solutions, Mr. Bush said.

Neither Messrs. Musharraf nor Karzai, both key U.S. allies in the region, spoke.

Mr. Musharraf remained expressionless during his host's brief remarks, while Mr. Karzai repeatedly nodded agreeably. Messrs. Karzai and Musharraf never touched, each taking Bush's hand before turning to go inside, but not each other's.

"These two men are personal friends of mine," Mr. Bush said. "They are strong leaders who have an understanding of the world in which we live. They understand that the forces of moderation are being challenged by extremists and radicals."

For months, Messrs. Karzai and Musharraf have been trading barbs and criticizing each other's efforts to fight terrorists along their long, remote, mountainous border.

Afghan officials allege that Pakistan lets Taliban militants hide out and launch attacks into Afghanistan. Mr. Musharraf says Mr. Karzai has bad information and notes that Pakistan has deployed 80,000 troops along the porous border.

Mr. Karzai says Mr. Musharraf turns a blind eye to hatred and extremism being bred at Islamic schools in Pakistan. At one point, Mr. Musharraf said Mr. Karzai is behaving "like an ostrich," refusing to acknowledge the truth and trying to shore up his political standing at home.

Right up to Wednesday night's White House dinner, they also have pointed fingers at one another over al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden and other terror leaders. Each says Mr. bin Laden isn't hiding in his country and suggests the other might do more to help find him.

Mr. Musharraf wants Mr. Karzai to agree to "a verbal cease-fire" and stepped-up intelligence cooperation to fight terrorism and bring peace to both countries, Pakistan's Foreign Minister Khurshid Kasuri said Wednesday in an Associated Press interview.

All this comes as Afghanistan suffers its worst reversals since the U.S.-led ouster of the extremist Taliban regime nearly five years ago.

The Taliban militants have regrouped and launched an offensive earlier this year whose strength and organization took Afghan and U.S. officials by surprise. They have adopted methods commonly used by militants in Iraq: suicide bombings, ambushes and beheadings. Illegal opium production has risen yearly despite billions spent to suppress it, and Afghanistan is now the source of more than 90% of the world's supply.

The White House clearly thinks that enough is enough.

"The president has made it clear that they've got a shared interest, and the shared interest is combating terrorism," White House press secretary Tony Snow told reporters. "He will remind them of the fact, and I think both men understand that."

Mr. Bush's three-way dinner party, just weeks before the November congressional elections, comes as he is working to convince voters that Republicans are best able to guide the U.S.-led war against terrorism. He faces declining American support for both the U.S.-led war in Iraq and the U.S. military commitment in Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0070609

Bush administration officials say that Messrs. Karzai and Musharraf, along with the influential and relatively moderate Iraqi Shiite cleric Ali al-Sistani, are the "indispensable men" of post-Sept. 11 foreign policy for their ability to hold Islamic extremism at bay.

Mr. Musharraf faces little political opposition within Pakistan, but he lives under constant threat of assassination. Mr. Karzai is increasingly embattled, hard-pressed to extend his political control into many regions of Afghanistan and facing a loss of popular support.

Bush Plays Chaperon For Awkward Encounter (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 27 — For the past week, the presidents of Afghanistan and Pakistan have been in the United States, circling one another like wary cats as they lobbed insults across the airwaves from a distance.

On Wednesday night, they stood glumly — more like caged cats — in the Rose Garden with President Bush, who had invited them to the White House for dinner and a little talking-to.

"We've got a lot of challenges facing us," Mr. Bush said, with President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan on his right and President Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan a safe distance away on his left. "All of us must protect our countries, but at the same time we all must work to make the world a more hopeful place."

Having already met separately with the two men — he received General Musharraf on Friday and President Karzai on Tuesday — Mr. Bush used his three-minute speech to proclaim them both "personal friends of mine" and describe the intimate dinner as "a chance for us to strategize together."

Peter Brookes, a national security expert at the Heritage Foundation, put it another way. "They're looking for marriage counseling," he said, "and maybe President Bush will provide some of that."

The strains in their relationship — each blames the other for the resurgence of the Taliban in Afghanistan — are so obvious that Mr. Bush openly joked about the breach in the East Room of the White House on Tuesday, with Mr. Karzai at his side.

"It will be interesting for me to watch the body language of these two leaders to determine how tense things are," Mr. Bush told reporters then, though he insisted later he was only teasing.

"I'll be good," Mr. Karzai responded.

Though Mr. Karzai politely referred to General Musharraf as "my brother," that has been pretty much the extent of the politesse this week. As General Musharraf toured about, promoting his new autobiography on television programs as varied as "60 Minutes" and "The Daily Show With Jon Stewart," he has made clear his disdain for Mr. Karzai, whom he accuses of "turning a blind eye" to his own deteriorating political situation.

"He is like an ostrich with his head buried in the sand," the general said.

Mr. Karzai was a tad more muted; asked by Wolf Blitzer of CNN on Friday whether he thought General Musharraf was himself "an ostrich," he did not take the bait. But he has made no bones about the fact that he sees the Pakistani leader as giving the Taliban safe haven across the border.

Complicating matters is a deal General Musharraf recently signed with tribal chiefs along the Afghanistan border; Mr. Karzai views it as a pact to cede control to the Taliban.

"Terrorism has only enemies and knows no boundaries," Mr. Karzai told the Council on Foreign Relations last week. "The only course is to kill it. You cannot train a snake to bite someone else."

Whether Mr. Bush can tame the war of words is unclear, but foreign policy experts across the political spectrum give him credit for trying.

"You do have two leaders who want to have a good relationship with the United States and particularly George Bush," said Ivo H. Daalder, a scholar at the Brookings Institution, "so that does provide Bush an opportunity to say, 'You guys need to cooperate. We have a common enemy.' I admire him for doing this. It's the right thing to do."

Richard N. Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, said Mr. Bush's primary challenge was "not only to broker a verbal cease-fire," but also to get the two men to "deal with the core issue" of their dispute over the Taliban.

"What's ironic is these two leaders need each other," he said. "Their personal futures as well as their countries' futures are very much intertwined, yet there is tremendous mistrust and bad blood."

That much was evident Wednesday in the Rose Garden body language, which was as interesting as Mr. Bush had predicted. Although the two foreign leaders were handshake-distance apart — and some thought the president might prod them into one — no hands were extended.

DOJ_NMG_0070610

Instead, both stood stiff and expressionless as the president spoke, their hands clasped tightly in front of them. When Mr. Bush ended the awkwardness by announcing, “Let’s go eat dinner,” General Musharraf gave a quick salute to the press corps. President Karzai extended his arms, palms up, in an empty embrace of the sky.

Bush Hosts Tense Dinner For Karzai, Musharraf (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, September 28, 2006

President Bush joked that he planned to "watch the body language" of Afghan President Hamid Karzai and Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf when he presided over a White House dinner with the two adversaries last night, but if he did, what he saw was grim.

As the president stood between the two leaders, Gen. Musharraf remained expressionless and Mr. Karzai nodded. But neither man looked at the other.

At the end of a brief statement, in which Mr. Bush said with understatement, "We've got a lot of challenges facing us," he shook hands with Gen. Musharraf, then Mr. Karzai. But the two neighbors neither shook hands, nor looked at each other.

The three men then walked grim-faced down the colonnade, heading to what was expected to be a tense dinner of "sunchoke" soup, spicy sea bass and endive salad in the Old Family Dining Room of the White House.

"All of us must protect our countries, but at the same time, we all must work to make the world a more hopeful place," Mr. Bush said in the Rose Garden. "And so today's dinner is a chance for us to strategize together, to talk about the need to cooperate."

"We're proud to have you here, Mr. President," Mr. Bush said to Gen. Musharraf, who replied quietly, "My pleasure."

"Proud to have you here, Mr. President," Mr. Bush said to Mr. Karzai. "Thanks very much," the Afghan leader said.

Mr. Bush offered words of praise for the two leaders, who have been engaged in an increasingly belligerent exchange of words.

"These two men are personal friends of mine; they are strong leaders who have an understanding of the world in which we live; they understand that the forces of moderation are being challenged by extremists and radicals."

Joining the three leaders at dinner -- billed an "iftar," a meal that breaks the dawn-to-dusk fast during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, because Gen. Musharraf and Mr. Karzai are Muslim -- were Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley. The two nations' ambassadors to the U.S. also attended.

More than two hours after the dinner was scheduled to end, the White House said the three leaders had shared their views during the "post-sundown meal." But when asked by reporters how long the dinner had lasted, White House spokesman Nicole Guillemart would not say.

"The three leaders had a constructive exchange on the common challenges facing our three nations," spokesman Tony Snow said.

The White House dinner came as violence rises in Afghanistan.

This month, a suicide bombing killed a provincial governor, a close associate of Mr. Karzai's. On Monday, Safia Ama Jan, a women's rights advocate who ran an underground school for girls during Taliban rule, was assassinated.

Yesterday, Afghan security forces killed 25 insurgency suspects during a clash in southern Afghanistan, and a suicide bombing targeting a NATO convoy wounded one civilian.

A U.S. military official said American troops on Afghanistan's eastern border have seen a threefold increase in attacks since a recent truce between Pakistan and pro-Taliban tribesmen that was supposed to have stopped cross-border raids by the militants.

Mr. Bush's first challenge was to figure out how to push the two neighbors to stop their war of words and work together to clamp down on their porous borders and improve efforts to defeat the Taliban. The Taliban is growing in strength and conducting coordinated attacks on coalition forces in Afghanistan five years after being ousted from power in the wake of the September 11 attacks.

But the Afghan leader has for months accused Gen. Musharraf of allowing terrorists to cross his country's border and upset a delicate balance in Afghanistan, while the Pakistani leader has brusquely told Mr. Karzai that he does not know his own country.

Mr. Bush has been caught in the middle, seeking to find common ground on which the leaders of Pakistan, a chief ally in the war on terror, and Afghanistan, a fledgling democracy, can agree and act.

"It will be interesting for me to watch the body language of these two leaders to determine how tense things are," Mr. Bush said in a Tuesday press conference with Mr. Karzai, a few days after he held a similar event with Gen. Musharraf.

The Afghan leader cracked up the audience in the White House East Room when he replied with a smile: "I'll be good."

DOJ_NMG_0070611

The White House knows there is tension between the two leaders, and Mr. Snow said yesterday that Mr. Bush will seek to "do whatever we can, that they want us to do, to help resolve them."

"But the two leaders also understand that they've got a shared interest in making sure that the other guy succeeds," Mr. Snow said.

Although Mr. Karzai refers to Gen. Musharraf as "my friend" or "my brother," the two have split over a recent deal with Islamic extremists. Gen. Musharraf recently signed a pact with pro-Taliban tribal leaders on the Afghanistan-Pakistan border, a deal Mr. Karzai initially condemned.

But he said this week that the deal will be useful if it achieves one goal -- "that the terrorists will not be allowed to cross over into Afghanistan to attack the coalition against terror -- that is, the international community and Afghanistan together."

The deal requires Pakistani troops to end military action against the pro-Taliban fighters in return for the militants stopping attacks on Pakistani forces and not crossing into Afghanistan to launch ambushes.

"We will have to wait and see if that is going to be implemented exactly the way it is signed. So, from our side, it's a wait-and-see attitude. But, generally, we will back any move, any deal that would deny terrorism sanctuary in North Waziristan or in the tribal territories of Pakistan," Mr. Karzai said.

Gen. Musharraf has bristled at accusations that he is allowing terrorists to roam freely in his country.

He said that Afghanistan, not Pakistan -- which has deployed 80,000 troops along the border -- is responsible for the problem, and that it is hurting his nation.

"He is not oblivious. He knows everything. But he is purposely denying, turning a blind eye like an ostrich. He doesn't want to tell the world what is the fact for his own personal reasons," Gen. Musharraf told CNN.

The two also have clashed over the whereabouts of Taliban chief Mullah Mohammed Omar and al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden, who has long been suspected of being holed up in the mountainous region along the border.

Mr. Karzai said Mullah Omar is "for sure" in Pakistan, but Gen. Musharraf says he's in Afghanistan.

On bin Laden, Mr. Karzai says: "If I told you he was in Pakistan, President Musharraf, my friend, would be mad at me. But if I said he was in Afghanistan, that would not be true."

But as the joint dinner approached, both tempered their words and sought to put the United States in the middle to mediate differences.

"The United States, as our ally, is helping both countries," Mr. Karzai said Tuesday. "And I think it is very important that we have more dedication and more intense work with sincerity, all of us, to get rid of the problems that we have around the world."

Yesterday, the Afghan leader said, "I'm simply seeking more coordination. Afghanistan has to do more. Pakistan has to do more."

Gen. Musharraf said Pakistan and Afghanistan had settled some differences when he visited Kabul earlier this month.

"God willing, in the future, we have a concerted strategy and we trust each other in our fight against terrorism and extremism," he said.

Hold The Vinegar, Bush Urges (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush brought the leaders of Afghanistan and Pakistan to the White House on Wednesday evening, hoping that over a quiet meal in the family dining room he could persuade two key U.S. allies to stop blaming each other for their neighborhood's deepening terrorist threat.

Aides said Bush hoped that after days of exchanging charges and counter-charges, Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf and Afghan President Hamid Karzai would promise to improve cooperation and intelligence-sharing on their shared border, the site of escalating attacks by Taliban and Al Qaeda fighters.

"We understand that there are tensions between the countries, and we're going to do whatever we can, that they want us to do, to help resolve them," said White House Press Secretary Tony Snow. "But the two leaders also understand that they've got a shared interest in making sure that the other guy succeeds."

After dinner, Snow released a statement saying the three leaders had "committed to supporting moderation and defeating extremism through greater intelligence sharing, coordinated action against terrorists, and common efforts to enhance the prosperity of the people of Afghanistan and Pakistan."

Musharraf discussed economic and security initiatives in tribal areas, and Karzai talked about enhanced security and speedier development, Snow said.

DOJ_NMG_0070612

Karzai has accused Pakistan of allowing Taliban and Al Qaeda fighters to find sanctuary on its side of the border. He has said that Pakistan's recent agreement with pro-Taliban militants to withdraw troops from the North Waziristan border area would shift much more of the anti-terrorist fight to Afghan, U.S. and NATO forces across the border.

Musharraf has denied that his government is permitting the groups to elude justice or is scaling back its efforts. He, in turn, has accused Karzai of failing to deal with violence and drugs in his country.

As the three leaders headed inside Wednesday evening, Bush told reporters from the Rose Garden steps that the dinner was "a chance to strategize together, to make sure that people have got a hopeful future."

Also invited, the White House said, were Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, national security advisor Stephen Hadley and the Pakistani and Afghan ambassadors to the United States. The menu included spicy sea bass and sunchoke soup.

In an appearance earlier Wednesday in Tampa, Fla., where he met with officials at the U.S. military command responsible for the Mideast and Central Asia, the Afghan leader muted his criticisms. "I'm simply seeking more cooperation," said Karzai, who is struggling with declining public support at home. "Afghanistan has to do more. Pakistan has to do more."

Karzai has indicated that he wants Musharraf to commit to doing more to capture militants, to close down religious schools that foster terrorism, and to recognize the Karzai government.

Musharraf, who has also used his U.S. visit to promote his new book, "In the Line of Fire," has been tough on Karzai as well.

He told CNN that Karzai had denied the deep problems of his own country, "turning a blind eye, like an ostrich," to the sources of violence within Afghanistan. And the two nations shouldn't be compared, Musharraf said, because while Pakistan has a strong government and military, in Afghanistan "everything had broken down."

Musharraf didn't hold back on the Bush administration either. He said he had never supported the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq and continued to believe that "it has made the world a more dangerous place."

The Pakistani president also stopped by "The Daily Show," where political satirist Jon Stewart asked him who would win an election in Pakistan: Bush or Osama bin Laden.

"I think they'll both lose miserably," Musharraf replied.

An expert on the region said the meeting might prove a tactical gain for the White House, but said ending the conflict between the two neighboring countries would be difficult.

"In public relations terms, it will probably help quite a bit," said Husain Haqqani, director of the Center for International Relations at Boston University. "President Bush will show himself bringing the two closer together, and perhaps they'll agree on a specific laundry list of steps to improve their cooperation."

But the meeting probably will not fundamentally change relations between the neighbors, Haqqani added, because Pakistan will not want to entirely give up support for Islamist groups, which it has used as a lever of influence over events in Afghanistan.

"The duality over the Pakistani approach is not going to end just because there was a great dinner at the White House," said Haqqani, a former Pakistani government official and journalist.

Taliban Strikes On U.S. Troops Triple After Truce (WT/AP)

By Jim Krane

The Washington Times, September 28, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan -- American troops on Afghanistan's eastern frontier have seen a tripling of attacks since a truce between the Pakistani army and pro-Taliban tribesmen that was supposed to stop cross-border raids by militants, a U.S. military officer said yesterday.

Pakistan's Foreign Ministry rejected the U.S. assertion and said home-based insurgents were behind the violence in Afghanistan, where at least 25 militants were reported killed in fighting yesterday.

Raising further questions about the cease-fire, a Pakistani political leader maintained that Taliban leader Mullah Mohammed Omar approved the deal. A government official denied that.

The developments came amid a public feud between Afghan President Hamid Karzai and Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf, who had dinner last night with President Bush at the White House.

The U.S. officer said the cease-fire that began June 25, cemented by the signing of a peace accord Sept. 5, contributed to the Taliban's resurgence in Afghanistan. He said ethnic Pashtun insurgents are no longer fighting Pakistani troops and are using Pakistan's North Waziristan border area as a command-and-control hub for attacks in Afghanistan.

Pakistani tribal elders brokered the truce between Gen. Musharraf's government and militants, which ended years of unrest in the tribal region bordering Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0070613

But the agreement appears to have bolstered Taliban infiltrators, with the number of attacks in eastern Afghan provinces rising threefold since July 31, said the U.S. officer, who agreed to discuss the situation only if not quoted by name because of the sensitivity of the issue.

"That's why they had the chance to rest and refit, because they were in a sanctuary," he said, referring to a surge in Taliban attacks over the past several months but without giving specific numbers for incidents before or after the truce.

Pakistan's Foreign Ministry rejected that view, insisting Afghan insurgents get no help from inside Pakistan.

"We don't agree with this. These are just excuses," Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Tasnim Aslam said. "Whatever is happening, it is deep inside Afghanistan and is not because of Pakistan."

Pakistan turned over several Taliban fighters to the Afghan government after the accord, Mrs. Aslam said.

The U.S. officer acknowledged that the truce, championed by Gen. Musharraf, is not the only factor behind Taliban attacks in Afghanistan's eastern Paktika, Khost and Paktia provinces.

The Army's 10th Mountain Division has been pressing its own offensive, Operation Mountain Fury, sparking firefights and bombings that otherwise might not have occurred, the officer said.

Meanwhile, Latif Afridi, a top official in Pakistan's Awami National Party, said he received a letter containing Taliban leader Mullah Omar's approval of the North Waziristan peace deal.

He said the letter also claimed that Pakistani militants who back the Taliban in North Waziristan would fall under the command of Jalaluddin Haqqani, a front-line Taliban commander.

It was not immediately possible to verify Mr. Afridi's contentions. Government spokesman Shah Zaman dismissed them as "baseless."

Since the U.S.-led offensive that ousted the Taliban in late 2001, many of Afghanistan's former rulers are thought to have found sanctuary in Pakistan.

Some 30 members of the Taliban's top leadership, including Mullah Omar and the group's 10- to 12-member Shura Council, are thought to be in Pakistan, mainly Quetta, Miran Shah and Peshawar, the U.S. officer said.

Gen. Musharraf has said Mullah Omar is not in Pakistan, and that he is more likely to be in his former power base of Kandahar in southern Afghanistan.

The U.S. officer said the Taliban's connections with Pakistan run so deep that wounded fighters seek treatment on the Pakistani side of the border and even carry their dead to Pakistan for burial.

Some of the suicide bombers in Afghanistan have been recruited in Pakistan, including a 17-year-old boy who blew himself up in front of a U.S. military convoy in Kabul this month, killing a bystander and wounding three American soldiers, Afghan police say.

The border region is also thought to harbor top al Qaeda fugitives Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahri, the U.S. officer said, discounting reports that bin Laden may have died from typhoid or that his trail has gone cold.

"No, I don't think he's dead. The overall assessment is that they're still in Pakistan," the officer said.

In Afghanistan yesterday, insurgents attacked an Afghan police checkpoint in southern Helmand province and "at least 25 insurgents" were killed in the ensuing clash with international troops, the NATO-led force said.

Three Italian soldiers attached to the NATO force and one civilian were wounded yesterday when a roadside bomb hit their vehicle in the western Herat province, the Italian Defense Ministry said.

The attack was the latest in a spree of bombings in previously calm western Afghanistan, where NATO and Afghan officials have reported an increase in Taliban activity. Four Italian soldiers were wounded Sept. 8 by a roadside bomb in neighboring Farah province.

In Tribal Pakistan, An Uneasy Quiet (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

PESHAWAR, Pakistan, Sept. 27 -- Three weeks after Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, announced a peace pact with Taliban radicals in a tribal area bordering Afghanistan, recent visitors say there is now pin-drop silence in a territory that once shook with artillery and bomb blasts. Religious patrols are enforcing law and order, they say, in place of Pakistan army troops who have withdrawn to their barracks.

But as the toll from violence rises across the border in Afghanistan, with suicide bombings killing 22 people in three cities this week, there are reports that militant Pakistani tribal leaders, while complying with their pledge to reduce the presence of foreign Islamic fighters, intend to defy the peace pact by sending local fighters and suicide bombers into Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0070614

Musharraf continues to deny Afghan charges that the Pakistani government is sheltering and encouraging the revived Taliban insurgency from the tribal zones. But people interviewed in northwest Pakistan said there is widespread support in the tribal region for the Taliban movement's harsh Islamic morality and its war against U.S. forces and their allies in Afghanistan.

The tribal zones are a cluster of seven remote and rugged border districts where Pakistan's central government has never exerted more than nominal control. AK-47 assault rifles are common household possessions. Most of the people are Pashtun, the same ethnic group that dominates neighboring southern Afghanistan and that gave rise to the Taliban movement in the 1990s. Many Pashtun don't recognize the Pakistan-Afghan border, crossing it at will in both directions.

Under terms of the Sept. 5 agreement, Musharraf pledged to withdraw troops who had been attacking armed Islamic groups in the tribal area. In return, the fighters agreed to stop attacks on both sides of the border and expel foreign fighters unless they take up a peaceful life.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai has faulted the pact in the past as taking pressure off the Taliban. But in remarks to reporters Tuesday in Washington he toned down his remarks, saying he would take a "wait-and-see attitude." Karzai said he was encouraged to learn that the pact had been signed with tribal elders, not with Taliban commanders.

But the traditional system of tribal self-governance has been weakened during three years of conflict with Pakistan troops. More than 200 tribal chiefs have reportedly been killed. It is not clear whether the Taliban leadership feels bound to any agreement made by local elders.

In the past two weeks, an elderly Afghan man accused of spying was decapitated in North Waziristan, the tribal area where the pact was signed. The teenage brother of a Pakistani journalist slain there earlier this year was also found dead. One source said he had been told that a group of teenagers, fresh from religious and military training, had recently headed for the border to carry out suicide bombings in Afghanistan.

In a recent telephone interview with a Pakistani reporter, senior Taliban leader Dadullah Akhund said he had told local Taliban members to cease attacks in Pakistan but to continue their fight "abroad" against the U.S. military. He said that he had 500 suicide bombers and 12,000 fighters at his disposal and that by next spring the Taliban would have enough force to launch major attacks on Kabul, the Afghan capital.

The revived Taliban insurgency has already cut a swath of violence across Afghanistan. This year, more than 2,000 people have been reported killed in numerous provinces. NATO forces are struggling to secure southern provinces where the fighting is focused.

On both sides of the border, critics of the peace pact condemn it as a farce. They described it as a major concession to the Islamic radicals by Musharraf after he failed to quell them by force, and a ruse to persuade the United States and European powers that he is serious about stopping the Taliban.

"This deal has handed over North Waziristan to the Taliban," Afrasiab Khattak, a human rights activist and secular politician, said in an interview in Peshawar, located in the so-called settled areas outside the tribal region. He said a hierarchy of Taliban commanders had taken control of North Waziristan, collecting taxes and meting out rough justice.

"The war in Afghanistan is totally from this side," Khattak said. "It is a new round of jihad, and it is not going to remain inside the tribal enclaves."

U.S. officials have long believed that al-Qaeda members from various Muslim countries as well as renegade Taliban fighters had sought refuge in the tribal areas after the U.S.-led ouster of Taliban rule in Kabul in 2001. In recent months, fighters of an Uzbek Muslim militia, expert in explosives and sabotage, have reportedly been operating in the area. At U.S. urging, Pakistani troops in 2003 began staging repeated raids in the region but encountered tough resistance.

Several Pakistani journalists with contacts in North Waziristan have reported that since the peace pact was signed, local Islamic militants and clerics have abided by its term to ask foreigners to leave, making appeals from mosque loudspeakers. Groups of armed men affiliated with local religious parties are now enforcing order, the journalists said.

Officials of the major religious party that dominates the northwest tribal region -- though they were closely involved in negotiating the pact -- deny that there are any Taliban or foreign fighters in Waziristan at all. These leaders insisted the agreement was signed with local tribesmen who had nothing to do with attacks inside Afghanistan.

Qari Abdullah, a religious leader from the Jamiat-e-Ulema-i-Islami party in Bannu, a Pakistani city just outside North Waziristan, said Tuesday that his party was committed to bringing peace, democracy and development to the city's district.

"If the West calls us fundamentalists and terrorists, they are wrong," Abdullah said in an interview in his mosque. "If we had not helped make peace possible, North Waziristan would have turned into another Beirut." He asserted that the Taliban had been falsely blamed for attacks in Afghanistan: "The question is why there is an American army bombing innocent civilians, 15,000 kilometers from its own country."

DOJ_NMG_0070615

Foreign journalists are not allowed to enter the tribal region, but some of its prevailing atmosphere and attitude spill into neighboring areas of Pakistan. During a visit this week to Bannu, the closest city to the zone, a reporter found a curious mixture of rapid modernization and strong support for the Taliban.

Many people interviewed said admiringly that the Taliban had brought Islamic justice and moral order to Afghanistan, which it ruled from 1996 to 2001. They expressed little fear of the reported presence of Taliban or al-Qaeda fighters in the neighboring tribal areas, and some condoned the recent late-night bombings of two CD shops in Bannu, presumed to be a Taliban warning against music.

Many people interviewed in Peshawar and Bannu tended to dismiss the troubles facing Afghanistan as the result of indigenous tribal enmities and historical conflicts. Few except a handful of secular activists gave any credence to the repeated claims by the Afghan government of Pakistani interference and sponsorship of Islamic insurgents.

"We like the Taliban because they are against drugs, television, CDs and other sinful things," said Aminullah, 35, who sells sacks of grain in a market. "Bush is the real warlord who is invading other countries and making Muslims hate America."

Once an isolated backwater of donkey carts and thorny fields, Bannu now teems with signs of construction and modernization, including a new hospital, new schools and cellphone shops. At the same time, residents said the area has become increasingly conservative in its religious views and that dozens of new Islamic academies, or madrassas, have opened. Some people embodied these contrasts as they spoke.

"The Taliban are quiet in the tribal area, but now they are starting to cause some problems here," said Amanullah, the owner of a busy cellphone shop adorned with verses from the Koran. "Their actions are bad but their ideas are right. If they became the government here, it would be good. We would have no cinemas, no vulgarity, nothing with a bad impact on our women and children."

Bush Urges Karzai, Musharraf To Put Terror Fight Before Feud (USAT/AP)

USA Today, September 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush appealed to the bickering presidents of Pakistan and Afghanistan on Wednesday to put aside their differences and "strategize together" over dinner on ways to defeat the common enemy of terrorism.

Standing between Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf and Afghan President Hamid Karzai, Bush emphasized "the need to cooperate, to make sure that people have got a hopeful future" in both countries.

"Today's dinner is a chance for us to strategize together" and find common solutions, Bush said shortly before the meal.

"These two men are personal friends of mine," Bush said. "They are strong leaders who … understand that the forces of moderation are being challenged by extremists and radicals."

The meal was billed as an iftar, the meal that breaks the daytime fast during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan. Musharraf and Karzai are Muslims.

After the meal, the White House issued a statement that called the session a "constructive exchange."

"They committed to supporting moderation and defeating extremism through greater intelligence sharing, coordinated action against terrorists and common efforts to enhance the prosperity of the people of Afghanistan and Pakistan," press secretary Tony Snow said.

For months, Karzai and Musharraf have been trading barbs and criticizing each other's efforts to fight terrorists along their long, mountainous border.

Afghanistan has alleged that Pakistan lets Taliban militants launch attacks into Afghanistan from Pakistani territory. Karzai has said Musharraf turns a blind eye to hatred being bred at Islamic schools in Pakistan.

Musharraf says Karzai has bad information and noted that Pakistan has deployed 80,000 troops along the border.

Musharraf said Karzai is behaving "like an ostrich," refusing to acknowledge the truth and just being political.

Nato 'must Speed Up Reaction' To Taliban (FT)

By Stephen Fidler

Financial Times, September 28, 2006

Nato takes too long to build forces for its missions and needs to be able to respond more rapidly to requests for troops, Des Browne, the UK's defence minister, said on Wednesday.

Speaking the day before a meeting of defence ministers of the 26-member alliance in Slovenia that is set to discuss a military request for more Nato troops in Afghanistan, Mr Browne said Nato faced a short-term test in getting "boots on the ground or the equipment in to support them" in Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0070616

He said Nato was rising to the challenge in Afghanistan, where it has more than 20,000 troops in place, but has struggled to find extra forces to meet unexpectedly fierce resistance from the Taliban militia. But he said there were lessons to be learnt from the deployment and he would tell the other ministers that Nato needed to modernise the way it generated its forces.

"It needs to look at its structures and its bureaucracy so that it can generate force in a way that responds in real time to the needs. I think it's becoming apparent in Afghanistan that the process of discussion is more complex than it needs to be," he said in a telephone interview from Manchester where he was attending the Labour party's annual conference.

UK officials said each country needed to look at its own operations but said too many Nato troops were still tied up in headquarters operations, for example.

Mr Browne said Nato's operations in southern Afghanistan, both those led by the Canadians in Kandahar and the British in Helmand, had been successful, but work was needed in reconstruction to improve the way the country was governed and to build economic opportunities.

Mr Browne said Nato needed to build a more comprehensive approach to its missions, bringing civilian agencies more closely into its operations. Officials said this would require closer co-operation with other bodies such as the United Nations and the World Bank.

The meeting in Portoroz is one of a series ahead of a summit of alliance leaders in Riga in late November, which is likely to give a political push to the efforts to increase the force in Afghanistan. However, the struggle Nato faces in generating troops is replicated by other international organisations because of the increasing number of multinational interventions under way.

American Commanders Question Political Will Of Iraqi Prime Minister (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 27 -- Senior U.S. military commanders are questioning whether Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has the political will to weed out official corruption and tackle the brutal militias that are threatening to plunge Iraq into civil war.

"It's going to take time for a government to cleanse itself over time," said a senior U.S. military official who spoke on condition of anonymity at a briefing with reporters. "I've got to give it time to do that and hope that I have a prime minister that's going to take that on."

The questions come as sectarian violence and the spread of militias have replaced the insurgency as the biggest challenge to U.S. efforts to bring security to Baghdad and other parts of Iraq. The major militias are arms of political parties inside Iraq's fragile coalition government and have widely infiltrated the security forces, placing Maliki, who has vowed to disarm the militias, in a delicate political position.

The questions about Maliki are being posed only privately, with U.S. officials in their public statements still voicing cautious confidence in Maliki's ability to recognize and tackle the problems.

"We have to fix this militia issue," said Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the second-ranking U.S. military official in Baghdad. "We can't have armed militias competing with Iraq's security forces. But I have to trust the prime minister to decide when it is that we do that."

But in recent days, senior U.S. military commanders have suggested that if the Maliki government fails to take action soon, they may have to step in and pressure the government to go after militias holed up in neighborhoods around Baghdad. Their primary target is most likely the Mahdi Army, a militia linked to radical anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr that Sunni Muslims accuse of running death squads under the mantle of Shiite Islam.

"We are now at a time when we have a little bit of influence there," said the senior U.S. military official. "There is going to come a time when I would argue we are going to have to force this issue. . . . We have to, wherever we can, use what pressure, what influence we have, to get them as quickly as possible to clear these places out."

Complicating matters for the Maliki government are growing concerns over official graft that is so rife that it resembles the days under President Saddam Hussein, when such corruption was an accepted part of life.

"I can tell you in every single ministry how they are using that ministry to fill the coffers of the political parties," said the senior U.S. military official. "They are doing that because that is exactly what Saddam Hussein did."

The officials' comments underscore a growing frustration over the speed of government reform efforts, at a time when pressure is mounting back home for a withdrawal of U.S. troops. The private questions about Maliki's abilities also come after a particularly violent month in Baghdad and across Iraq, as suicide bombings and execution-style slayings have continued unabated.

"This has been a tough week. Over the past two weeks, we have seen a rise in the number of attacks, especially in Baghdad," said Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell. "Murders and executions are currently the number one cause of civilian deaths in Baghdad."

DOJ_NMG_0070617

Ali Dabbagh, a government spokesman, said Wednesday that the militia problem needed to be tackled carefully in order not to disrupt the nation's delicate political balance and efforts to reconcile warring factions. If a political solution cannot be found, he said, the government will need to use force against the militias. But he said such measures should be undertaken by Iraqi security forces. "This issue is very critical," Dabbagh said. "I do not think the U.S. needs to interfere with this issue. The government should do this by themselves."

Dabbagh said the government is planning to install an inspector general in each ministry to audit its finances. He said a new integrity commission has already been launched to investigate corrupt officials. While Dabbagh said he was not aware if large sums of money had been stolen from the coffers of ministries, he conceded that corruption was a major problem for the government.

Senior U.S. military commanders are urging the government to take faster action against the militias, particularly those that have infiltrated various government ministries.

"There's a political piece to this to see if they deal with these guys," said another senior U.S. military official, who also spoke on condition of anonymity at a separate briefing with reporters. "I won't deny the fact that there is corruption and problems in some of these ministries, but it's got to be dealt with and it ought to be dealt with by the prime minister and the folks that are inside this government. And I think the time is short for them to deal with that over time because this can't go on like that."

"I don't see an open end to this deal, I mean, where this just goes on and on. I think the government, the people will get tired if they don't see any action on this," the U.S. official said.

Sadr and his allies, however, control four government ministries and hold 30 seats in the Iraqi parliament, more than any other faction. He played an instrumental role in propelling Maliki into power in April following several months of Shiite political infighting. For the past two months, thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops have entered some of Baghdad's roughest neighborhoods as part of an operation to quell the sectarian strife. But no major operations have been undertaken in Sadr City, Sadr's stronghold and where his Mahdi Army is in full control.

A third senior U.S. military official, who also spoke on condition of anonymity in a briefing to reporters, similarly questioned the government's resolve to tackle Iraq's myriad problems. "There are still folks who think they can win a sectarian conflict, inside the political parties as well as some guys inside the government," he said. "I think the senior leadership recognizes that that's a failing policy. But getting from sort of the platitude to the reality is the challenge and growth."

He added, "And I'll tell you, the other aspect is, don't assume competency."

Military Officials Add To U.S. Criticism Of Iraq's Government (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 27 — Senior American military officials are warning that time is growing short for Iraq to root out militias inside and outside the government and purge ministries of corrupt officials who are diverting large sums of money to their own political parties.

"We are now at a time when we have a little bit of influence there," a senior military official said. Referring to the problem of militias, he added, "There is going to come a time when I would argue we are going to have to force this issue."

The official said political parties who were plundering ministries were squandering chances to make progress that could reduce sectarian violence.

"I can tell you in every single ministry how they are using that ministry to fill the coffers of the political parties," the official said. "They are doing that because that is exactly what Saddam Hussein did."

Another sign of how acute Iraq's security woes have become emerged Wednesday: the past week saw the highest number of suicide bomb attacks of any week since the American-led invasion in 2003, according to the chief United States military spokesman in Iraq, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV.

"This has been a tough week," General Caldwell said. "This week's suicide attacks were at their highest level in any given week." But such attacks, he said, are still not the No. 1 killer of Baghdad civilians. "Murders and executions are," he said.

In recent weeks American and Iraqi officials have privately voiced concerns that Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki might not have the will or the political dexterity to bring the country together and avoid a full-scale civil war. Mr. Maliki, they say, is hamstrung and beholden to rival political parties with their own large militias.

Comments offered by senior United States military officials in the last few days have been even more pointed and take in not only the Maliki administration but also the whole of the Iraqi government bureaucracy. The senior military officials agreed to speak only without being identified, because of the delicate nature of the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0070618

Another senior military official said Mr. Maliki needed to move quickly to rid ministries of death squads and militiamen. "I think the time is short for them to deal with that over time, 'cause this can't go on like that," the official said. Speaking about the militias and other problems, he added that "people will get tired if they don't see any action on this."

The Iraqi national security adviser, Mowaffak al-Rubaie, said Mr. Maliki had little support within his own government to take action.

"The situation is really serious," Mr. Rubaie said. "There is no cohesion in the government to help him. There are so many circles he needs to take into consideration when he wants to make a decision. There is a lack of will to stop the violence among the politicians."

An American raid on Wednesday in the restive city of Baquba, north of Baghdad, killed four women and four men. The military identified the men as "suspected terrorists," but family members said they were innocent.

The military said American forces had taken heavy fire from a building where terrorists were believed to be hiding, even after interpreters announced that the forces were in the area.

The military said that troops had killed two men it described as terrorists, and that United States aircraft had fired "multiple rounds" at the building. The military said that the dead found inside included another two male terrorists and four women, and that two terrorists and one woman had been wounded. Weapons and a global positioning system were found.

Relatives said the eight people killed were from the same family and had no ties to terrorism. Associated Press Television News quoted the homeowner's daughter, Manal Jassim, as saying: "They were all innocent people. We were sleeping when they entered our house at dawn. I found my father, mother, aunt and sister-in-law lying dead. We were an 11-member family. Eight were killed."

The western Baghdad neighborhood of Huriya continued to be a sectarian battleground where militiamen terrorize and kill Sunni Arabs. According to an Interior Ministry official, gunmen in two cars on Wednesday sprayed fire at Sunnis gathered near a mosque, killing 10 and wounding 11.

A car bomb in Huriya wounded two civilians, and another car bomb exploded elsewhere in Baghdad, killing five people and wounding eight, the Interior Ministry official said.

The United States military said a marine from Regimental Combat Team Seven was killed Monday during "enemy action" in Anbar Province, west of Baghdad. No details were provided.

An American soldier also died Wednesday, after being attacked by small-arms fire in southern Baghdad.

Iraq Impeding Efforts To Go After Shiite Militias, U.S. Military Says (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, September 28, 2006

BAGHDAD — Senior U.S. military officials have stepped up complaints that Iraq's Shiite-led government is thwarting efforts to go after Shiite death squads blamed in the execution-style killings of Sunni Arabs in neighborhoods across this capital.

Although deadly Sunni Arab rebel attacks remain frequent in Baghdad, U.S. officials, including Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, say death squads affiliated with Shiite militias have become the main factors ratcheting up the capital's death toll from sectarian killings.

Civilian deaths in Baghdad during July and August totaled more than 5,100, according to United Nations figures, and most were caused by the sectarian strife.

However, the 8,000 U.S. troops sent to Baghdad in recent weeks to restore order have been largely prevented from confronting those militias, many of which have ties to Iraqi government officials.

The statements by ranking U.S. authorities complaining about the situation highlight rising American dissatisfaction with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki and an increasing willingness to exert pressure on the fledging Iraqi government.

The U.S. forces would like to stage heightened military operations in Baghdad neighborhoods such as Sadr City, a stronghold for anti-U.S. Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada Sadr's Al Mahdi militia.

"We have to fix this militia issue," Army Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, commander of day-to-day operations in Iraq, said Wednesday.

"We can't have armed militias competing with Iraq's security forces. But I have to trust the prime minister to decide when it is that we do that."

U.S. officials are anxious for Iraqis to take a stronger role in their country's security because of mounting pressure to withdraw American troops as soon as possible. Rising public discontent in the United States with the war, tired troops on their third and fourth rotations in the Middle East and huge expenditures by American taxpayers are all driving U.S. officials to press the government of Maliki, a Shiite, to quickly take more responsibility.

DOJ_NMG_0070619

A map provided by the U.S. military on Wednesday identified nine neighborhoods that have been targeted in a Baghdad security plan, a major effort aimed at ridding the capital of Sunni Arab insurgents and Shiite militias.

However, all but two of these neighborhoods are predominantly Sunni.

Publicly, U.S. military leaders say they are simply conducting operations in areas where they are tracking the most killings, but privately they acknowledge that the Iraqi government has been reluctant to go after Shiite militias.

Tensions increased between the U.S. military and the Iraqi government after the Iraqi army's recent failure to deploy 4,000 troops to Baghdad.

Iraqi officials have attempted to send soldiers from the south to Diyala province to stabilize sectarian strife in the provincial capital, Baqubah, 35 miles north of the capital.

But a U.S. military official with knowledge of combat operations in Iraq said, "We told them that they can't send anybody to Diyala until they give us the troops we need for Baghdad."

The military official, who requested anonymity because of restrictions about speaking to news media about combat operations, also complained that Maliki's government had scrapped a plan to move U.S. and Iraqi troops into Sadr City before the start of the current holy month of Ramadan, a sign of how sectarian political considerations were hampering attempts to quell violence in Baghdad.

U.S. Army Maj. Gen. James Thurman, commander of military forces in the capital, said last week that "one of the sources of death groups are militias."

"I consider that issue a problem that the [Iraqi] government must deal with immediately."

Iraqi government spokesman Ali Dabbagh said Maliki well understood the dangers posed by Shiite militias, but he said that political realities in Iraq could present the prime minister with even greater peril.

"This might create a negative reaction, and it may affect the political situation as well as the security situation in Baghdad," he said, defending Maliki's refusal to allow the U.S. military to raid Sadr City this month.

Dabbagh also said it was unfair to treat the Shiite militias the same as the Sunni Arab insurgents, because, he said, the paramilitaries were reacting to first blows by the rebels.

"Extremists and Saddamist parties are making bombs and killing Iraqis," Dabbagh said. "We do agree that there are revenge killings taking place, but not in the way of the Saddamists — this is just a reaction. We have to deal with the main causes: There are suicide bombers and car bombs attacking the Iraqis every day."

The American frustration in Baghdad is part of a growing chorus in recent weeks from officials both in Iraq and Washington expressing disappointment that Maliki has not taken a stronger stand against the militias, some of whose members serve in Iraq's army and police forces.

The dissatisfaction comes as scores of corpses — many mutilated by power drills, knives and multiple gunshots — continue to arrive at Baghdad's morgues, victims of death squads that officials fear are affiliated with politically backed militias.

The Sadr movement has control of some of Iraq's most powerful ministries, including Health, Transportation and Agriculture. The Badr Organization, a militia affiliated with the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq — a leading Shiite political party — and followers of Sadr have a strong influence at the Interior Ministry, which supervises the nation's police forces. Many ministries have their own security forces, which have been implicated in killings.

U.S. officials said they worried that a hands-off stance toward the militias could alienate those Sunni Arabs who have entered Iraqi civil society, including the army. They say they are concerned that Maliki's unity government could fray and that disaffected Sunni Arabs could drift into militancy.

U.S. military leaders described various obstacles facing them as they attempt to quell sectarian violence in Baghdad, including "no-touch lists" that prohibit them from arresting politicians and other high-status individuals, and off-limits areas in Baghdad that the U.S. military may not enter without permission from the Iraqi government.

U.S. military officials said they were also constrained by their desire to see the Iraqi government prove its ability to rule fairly, without regard to narrow sectarian interests and without significant U.S. interference, by resolving the sectarian conflict.

"There's a political piece to this to see if they deal with these guys," said another high-ranking U.S. military official in Baghdad, who also requested anonymity in order to maintain relationships with the Iraqi government.

"I won't deny the fact that there is corruption and problems in some of the ministries, but it's got to be dealt with, and it ought to be dealt with by the prime minister and the folks inside his government."

Instead, Maliki's government has often appeared to respond with ambivalence and occasional hostility to efforts to crack down on Shiite gunmen.

In August, U.S. forces raided Sadr City and battled with suspected militia members in one of the first thrusts of the Baghdad offensive. The prime minister responded by rebuking the American government for conducting the Sadr City incursion without permission from his administration.

DOJ_NMG_0070620

Maliki's government also criticized two raids last week that captured suspected Al Mahdi militia leaders in the southern holy city of Najaf and in Baghdad.

In Washington, members of the Iraq Study Group — a high-profile, administration-backed panel examining U.S. policy in Iraq — recently held a news conference to say that they believed Maliki had just three months to act against the militias and restore stability.

But some observers say that Americans may have unrealistic expectations for an embryonic government so riven with sectarian and partisan fissures. Even if the Iraqi government had the will to act, it might not be able to control the militias, which U.S. and Iraqi officials contend have splintered into more radicalized and deadly elements.

"For example, Muqtada Sadr was ordered to control the militias, but even he can't control them," said Suha Azzawi, a Sunni Arab politician.

U.S. General Warns That Iraq Is Close To Dissolving Into Civil War (MCT)

By Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy, September 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - A top-ranked U.S. military officer in Iraq said Wednesday that the United States thought that the government of Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki was running out of time to prevent Iraq from dissolving into outright civil war.

"We have to fix this militia issue. We can't have armed militias competing with Iraq's security forces. But I have to trust the prime minister to decide when it is that we do that," said Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the second-highest-ranking American military official in Baghdad.

Chiarelli's comments to a gathering of reporters were a part of a growing chorus of concerns from U.S. political and military leaders about the Iraqi government's ability and willingness to tackle corruption and militia-run death squads. They suggest that top American leaders are growing frustrated with the pace of reforms and may even be starting to argue for eventual U.S. withdrawal.

Throughout the month, senior military officials - almost always speaking anonymously because of the sensitivity of the subject - have expressed frustration with the government, saying corruption and rogue militias backed by rebel Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada al Sadr are rampant. They've complained of ministers using their offices to fill the coffers of their political parties and of government workers using their jobs to attack rival sects. They said the Iraqi government turned a blind eye, embracing a sectarian winner-take-all approach to governance.

American and some Iraqi leaders quietly complain that Maliki isn't willing to make difficult decisions because he's politically beholden to the followers of Sadr, who backed his premiership. He often has blocked U.S. military officials from entering Shiite militia areas such as the Baghdad slum of Sadr City to make arrests.

"There's a political piece to this to see if they deal with these guys," a senior military official said earlier this month, speaking on condition of anonymity. "There is corruption and problems in some of these ministries, but it's got to be dealt with and it ought to be dealt with by the prime minister and the folks that are inside this government. I think the time is short for them to deal with that over time, because this can't go on like that."

Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, a top American military spokesman, said Wednesday that murders and executions were now the top reasons for civilian deaths in Baghdad. He said it was widely believed that Shiite militias and Sunni Muslim insurgency groups were doing the killing.

"When we say murders and executions, we're assuming murders and executions are in fact sectarian violence that is occurring within the city," Caldwell said.

In a WorldPublicOpinion.org poll conducted Sept. 1-4 by the Program on International Policy Attitudes at the University of Maryland, 77 percent of Iraqi respondents, including 100 percent of Sunnis polled, said they'd prefer a strong government that would get rid of militias.

The minority Sunnis, whom U.S. officials want to remain in the political process, threatened last week to leave the government if Maliki doesn't address the problem of the militias.

Hassan Sineid, a Shiite assemblyman and fellow member of Maliki's Dawa Party, said security forces had performed badly, and he called for the defense and interior ministers to resign. He said the prime minister soon would present a resolution before parliament calling for the disbanding of militias.

Recently, Maliki publicly denounced an attack in Sadr City that killed 34 people last week. It was one of the few occasions he's condemned violence in Iraq at a time when an average of 100 people are killed in the country each day.

American officials continue to support Maliki because he's the country's elected leader.

DOJ_NMG_0070621

In other developments, the U.S. military said eight people, including four women, were killed early Wednesday in a raid in Baqouba that targeted a terrorist with ties to the group al Qaida in Iraq. Three other people, including two whom the military said were tied to terrorist activity, were wounded.

During the raid, gunfire came from the building that soldiers were targeting and from throughout the neighborhood. The military called in an air attack.

Weapons and a global positioning system were found in the targeted building. American military spokesman Lt. Col. Barry Johnson said the deaths of the women came after those in the building were warned repeatedly to stop firing.

McClatchy special correspondent Zaineb Obeid and Mark Brunswick of the Minneapolis Star Tribune contributed to this report from Baghdad.

Poll: Iraqis Back Attacks On U.S. Troops (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, September 27, 2006

About six in 10 Iraqis say they approve of attacks on U.S.-led forces, and slightly more than that want their government to ask U.S. troops to leave within a year, a poll finds.

The Iraqis also have negative views of Osama bin Laden, according to the early September poll of 1,150.

The poll, done for University of Maryland's Program on International Policy Attitudes, found:

_Almost four in five Iraqis say the U.S. military force in Iraq provokes more violence than it prevents.

_About 61 percent approved of the attacks — up from 47 percent in January. A solid majority of Shiite and Sunni Arabs approved of the attacks, according to the poll. The increase came mostly among Shiite Iraqis.

_An overwhelmingly negative opinion of terror chief bin Laden and more than half, 57 percent, disapproving of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

_Three-fourths say they think the U.S. plans to keep military bases in Iraq permanently.

_A majority of Iraqis, 72 percent, say they think Iraq will be one state five years from now. Shiite Iraqis were most likely to feel that way, though a majority of Sunnis and Kurds also believed that would be the case.

The PIPA poll, which included an oversample of 150 Sunni Iraqis, has a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

The State Department, meanwhile, has conducted its own poll, something it does periodically, spokesman Sean McCormack said. The State Department poll found two-thirds of Iraqis in Baghdad favor an immediate withdrawal of U.S. forces, according to The Washington Post. McCormack declined to discuss details of the department's poll.

"What I hear from government representatives and other anecdotal evidence that you hear from Iraqis that is collected by embassy personnel and military personnel is that Iraqis do appreciate our presence there," he said. "They do understand the reasons for it, they do understand that we don't want to or we don't intend to be there indefinitely."

An Iraqi public opinion research firm with a proven record of conducting scientifically valid surveys conducted the department's poll, press officer Janelle Hironimus said later.

"We will not identify the firm in order to protect it and its employees from danger," she said.

Iraqi officials have said Iraq's security was improving and expanding throughout the country, and most U.S. troops might be able to leave eventually.

Last week, Iraqi President Jalal Talibani told the United Nations that coalition forces should remain in Iraq until Iraqi security forces are "capable of putting an end to terrorism and maintaining stability and security."

U.S. To Gauge Iraqi Support For Operations (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, September 28, 2006

As violence continues in Iraq, the military is looking for ways to achieve stability through opinion polls and public relations.

The Multi-National Command in Baghdad wants to hire a private firm to conduct polling and focus groups in Iraq "to assess the effectiveness of operations as they relate to gaining and maintaining popular support," according to a notice the Department of the Army posted yesterday.

"Since the end of major combat operations in Operation Iraqi Freedom, Coalition Forces have sought to build robust and positive relations with the people of Iraq and to assist the Iraqi people in forming a new government," the notice says, posted on the government contracting Web site FBODaily.com.

Polling and focus groups are being sought as "important tools for assessing changes in the level of a population's support for various groups," according to the posting.

DOJ_NMG_0070622

Polling in Iraq is so sensitive that the contract proposal states that the winner must ensure those being questioned "are not aware of the survey sponsor's identity." One member of a firm that has conducted polling for the Baghdad command said yesterday that "if someone out there believes the client is the U.S. government, the persons doing the polling could get killed." The official insisted on anonymity for fear of putting his company's employees at risk.

Word of the proposed new contract comes a day after release of a State Department poll that found that majorities in all regions of Iraq, except the Kurdish areas, want U.S. and allied troops to withdraw immediately and that their departure would make people feel safer. It also follows the release of an April 2006 National Intelligence Estimate on terrorism that found that U.S. military action has become a "cause celebre" in the Arab world and has fueled anti-American feelings in Iraq and the Middle East.

The Baghdad command also confirmed yesterday that it has awarded a two-year, $12.4 million contact to handle strategic communications management to the Lincoln Group, the Washington-based public relations company found late last year to have been paying money to place favorable articles in the Iraqi news media.

William Dixon, a spokesman for the Lincoln Group, said yesterday he could not comment on the details of particular contracts and deferred comment to the Baghdad command.

Lincoln was the lowest of seven bidders on what was estimated as a $20 million contract to help military commanders in Baghdad get what they considered the positive side of their operations in the news, according to one of the bidders who was briefed on the contract. The contract calls for providing media strategy such as setting up news conferences and public speeches, media training for Iraqi government officials in addition to military commanders, and monitoring of Middle East and some U.S. news outlets, including The Washington Post, New York Times and major television networks. The monitoring would include creating a database of articles graded as favorable or unfavorable.

Lincoln's practices have attracted controversy, most recently because of a report in the current issue of Harper's Magazine. In it, Willem Marx, an Oxford University student, describes working for Lincoln in Baghdad last summer and using a spreadsheet listing amounts charged by Iraqi newspapers to run articles written by Army personnel, at costs that ran from $50 to $1,500.

At least one of the bidders who lost to Lincoln is considering a challenge to the award based on Lincoln's record.

Lincoln's spokesman dismissed the article's claims. "The former intern's exaggerated and misleading account does not accurately depict the firm's activities in the emerging markets and challenging environments," Dixon said.

Rise In Violence Accompanies Ramadan (USAT/AP)

The Associated Press

USA Today, September 28, 2006

BAGHDAD — The top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq said Wednesday that violence in Baghdad had risen, as predicted, with the onset of Ramadan. In Iraq, the Muslim holy month officially started on Monday.

Suicide attacks were at their highest level ever, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said. He didn't provide any figures.

“We are seeing an increase in attacks, as anticipated. The terrorists and illegal armed groups are punching back in an effort to discredit the government of Iraq and more specifically the Baghdad security plan,” Caldwell said. “This has been a tough week.”

He said murders and executions are the No. 1 cause of civilian deaths in Baghdad, and operations against sectarian death squads have been stepped up. Since mid-July, 29 death squad cell leaders and 254 members have been killed or captured, he said.

Wednesday, the bodies of 15 people found around Baghdad were turned in to the morgue in Kut, 100 miles southeast of the capital, morgue official Mahmoun Ajeel al-Rubaie said.

After evening prayers in the al-Meshahda Sunni mosque in Baghdad's northern Huriyah neighborhood, 10 people were killed in a shootout between gunmen near the mosque, police 1st Lt. Maythem Abdul Razzaq said.

Operation Together Forward, a neighborhood-by-neighborhood security drive, was launched this summer after U.S. generals warned that escalating violence in Baghdad was leading to civil war. Sweeps for weapons and insurgents have been started or completed in about half the neighborhoods.

Also Wednesday, U.S. troops got into a firefight when they approached a home of a suspected terrorist for al-Qaeda in Iraq. Troops killed two terrorist suspects and called in airstrikes because of “the heavy volume of enemy fire,” the statement said. In the rubble were found the bodies of two more terror suspects and four women.

Relatives of those killed in the raid in Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, said their family had nothing to do with terrorists.

Meanwhile, Sunni tribal leaders who have vowed to drive al-Qaeda out of Iraq's most restive province met the Shiite prime minister.

DOJ_NMG_0070623

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki met with sheiks from Anbar province who have said al-Qaeda's violent ways and severe interpretation of Sunni Islam have alienated traditional-minded Sunnis.

The efforts to contain the violence came amid a poll that found most Iraqis would prefer to see foreign forces leave. A poll of 1,150 Iraqis done for the University of Maryland's Program on International Policy Attitudes found about six in 10 Iraqis say they approve of attacks on U.S.-led forces.

A State Department poll found two-thirds of Iraqis in Baghdad favor an immediate withdrawal of U.S. forces, according to The Washington Post. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack confirmed the poll had been conducted but declined to discuss details.

Cleric Said To Lose Reins Over Part Of Iraqi Militia (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, September 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 27 — The radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr has lost control of portions of his Mahdi Army militia that are splintering off into freelance death squads and criminal gangs, a senior coalition intelligence official said Wednesday.

The question of how tightly Mr. Sadr holds the militia, one of the largest armed groups in Iraq, is of critical importance to American and Iraqi officials. Seeking to ease the sectarian violence raging across the country, they have pressed him to join the political process and curb his fighters, who see themselves as defenders of Shiism — and often as agents of vengeance against Sunnis.

But as Mr. Sadr has taken a more active role in the government, as many as a third of his militiamen have grown frustrated with the constraints of compromise and have broken off, often selling their services to the highest bidders, said the official, who spoke to reporters in Baghdad on condition of anonymity because he was not permitted to speak publicly on intelligence issues.

“When Sadr says you can’t do this, for whatever political reason, that’s when they start to go rogue,” the official said. “Frankly, at that point, they start to become very open to alternative sources of sponsorship.” The official said that opened the door to control by Iran.

Mr. Sadr’s militia — dominated by impoverished Shiites who are loosely organized into groups that resemble neighborhood protection forces — has always operated in a grass-roots style but generally tended to heed his commands. It answered his call to battle American forces in two uprisings in 2004, and stopped fighting when he ordered it. But as the violence in Iraq has spread, evidence of freelancing Shiites has accumulated.

After the bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra in February, bands of militants dressed in black, the favorite color of Sadr loyalists, drove into neighborhoods, kidnapping and killing Sunnis. Mr. Sadr, who was abroad at the time, returned home and gave a rare public speech calling on his followers to stop, even proposing joint prayer sessions with Sunni clerics. Still, the rampage continued.

In Basra, a province in southeastern Iraq, Mr. Sadr has less direct control over militiamen, and they have tended to operate to suit their own agenda. Local leaders there have said that he has disciplined some members and fired others, but with little overall effect. He has run through four different leaders in Basra, according to the intelligence official, and has even had to shut offices temporarily, when local leaders ignored him and acted on their own.

Mr. Sadr is still immensely powerful, with as many as 7,000 militiamen in Baghdad, the official said. And the cleric has turned that firepower into political might. His candidate list won about 30 seats in Parliament this year, one of the largest shares. The participation was a central goal for American officials, who tried for months to persuade him to stop fighting and enter politics.

Still, six major leaders here no longer answer to Mr. Sadr’s organization, according to the intelligence official. Most describe themselves as Mahdi Army members, the official said, and even get money from Mr. Sadr’s organization, but “are effectively beyond his control.” Some of those who moved away from Mr. Sadr saw him as too accommodating to the United States. Others saw him as too bound by politics, particularly as killings of Shiite civilians in mixed neighborhoods began to soar.

“They’re not content to sit there and just defend their family on the street corner,” the official said. “They want to go out and take on what they view as Al Qaeda or Baathists or both in aggressive measure.”

One example is Abu Dera, a fighter in the Shiite stronghold of Sadr City in the capital who used to be loyal to Mr. Sadr. Residents said that as he began to gain a reputation for killing Sunni figures, Mr. Sadr told him to stop. But he ignored the order, and now he is referred to as the “Shiite Zarqawi,” after Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the terrorist leader who exhorted Sunnis to kill Shiites.
